He was from one of the Southern tribes, the warrior Creeks—the brown Apollos of the wilderness. He had been taken captive when a youth, by a hunting-party of the Mohawks—the most formidable of the northern tribes; the terror, in fact,—such was their warlike temper, their fierce, adventurous, unappeasable appetite for dominion,—the terror alike of everybody—white and red—all over North America. He had run the gauntlet, with six other captives. Four of them sunk under the blows; two of them faltered on the way; but he ran it without flinching or failing—perhaps without winking—at a speed, and with a sort of audacious valour, that amazed the enemy. He was adopted by a Mohawk woman; a mother, whose only child had been cut off by the relations of Eagle. Our Eagle was rather small, not more than five feet six or seven; but straight as an arrow. His carriage was that of the indolent young Greek, as we see it in statuary; the head rather forward; arms free; toes turned in. Such was the general bearing of Bald Eagle; but in council, or on coming near a white man of authority, he would uprear himself to his topmost elevation, as if measuring stature with all about him. His common pace, when he had any object in view, was a kind of loose, long, lazy trot, like that of the wolf through a light snow. Wherefore it is called in America the Indian "loup." It is a step nevertheless with which a North American savage will go, day after day, at the rate of about five miles an hour. At the age of two-and-forty, there was not a wrinkle to be found in the face of Bald Eagle, nor was there any appearance of muscle or sinew in his frame. His whole body was round, smooth, and effeminate. His limbs were daintily made, his joints were finely articulated; and his feet remarkably small. And yet, fashioned so delicately, built up so lightly, there was no man able to stand before him at a wrestling-match. His general behaviour was that of a loitering, weak, indolent, peaceable creature, whom anybody might overlook or affront with safety. But, once fully awake, there was no lulling or appeasing the miraculous instinct of the savage. He was capable of enduring incredible fatigue, and was called by the southern tribes, to whom he went repeatedly as messenger from the northern, Arka-poo-too, the spirit; or literally, the man without a body—All-heart. His little, keen, sharp, shining eyes, were like those of the large black snake—the boa-constrictor of North America; his cheek-bones were high; his forehead, low, narrow, and flat—or square; mouth handsome, broad and expressive; teeth uncommonly large—of a startling whiteness, when abruptly or unexpectedly disclosed; nostrils wide and vigorous; nose rather flat; hair coarse, black, and shining, like the mane of a young stallion, roughened, if you will, in the blaze and smoke of battle, or scorched by unholy fires. It was carefully parted from the middle of his head, all the way over, and hung behind, somewhat after the fashion of the squaws, in a large heavy club. No man shot so true an arrow as Bald Eagle; and few hurled such a deadly tomahawk. He "swam like a frog—he ran like a deer—he clomb like a squirrel—and jumped like a cattermount"—so said all the whites. See him when or where you might, unless in the hunting-season, or at a time of war, and he was always idling about, before somebody's great kitchen-fire, half-asleep; or under some great old overgrown tree, twisting the tendons of a newly-slain deer for his bow; or splitting them into threads; polishing white bone fish-hooks and arrow-heads; playing checkers; or staining slips of ash and willow for basket-work; feathering arrows; or working colored beads and brilliantly-dyed porcupine quills into his bullet-pouch, mocassins, or belt. His carriage, dress, and appearance were pretty much of a piece, at all times, under all circumstances, winter and summer. If he were not lying before the fire, with his dog, or underneath a tree, he would be lounging about with a negligent, graceful swing of his whole body, surrounded by a troop of children; a large, loose, dirty blanket, falling off—or quite ready to fall off, at every step, from his fine square shoulders; yet so disposed, nevertheless, with a slovenly brave air, as to show a sort of scarlet uniform underneath, encumbered with absurd ornaments—large plates of silver, rough medals, wampun, a knife, and a pipe or two—all ringing and rattling together at every motion of his body. It was amusing enough to see how patiently, how unconcernedly, he would bear the impertinent, annoying examination of the white people. No matter what was done, or offered, especially by the children; they might strip him naked, or turn him inside out, in a good-natured way—it was all the same to our savage, if they would only let his rifle be.—Brother Jonathan, or the New Englanders.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—And The Legion of Honour.
COVENT GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—And Neuha's Cave.

DRURY LANE.

THE tendency of dramatic writers to select for the subject of plays, actions distinguished chiefly by their violence and departure from the ordinary tenor of human affairs, and to exert their talent in giving interest to the characters of men whose will has been their only law, and whose existence has been the curse of their fellow-creatures, is perhaps as much attributable to the facility with which such actions and characters can be made available to the purposes of the drama, as to the exclusive fitness which is very generally claimed for them. Whatever be the cause, the fact is certain, that the really great characters of history are seldom standard favourites on the stage. Yet if the theatre be a school in which historical character may he rendered impressive; if the illustration of eminent virtue may be made to excite admiration and reverence, no less than the display of the enormities of the vicious the opposite feelings of disgust and abhorrence, it may deserve the consideration of men of talent, whether in following the beaten track as to choice of subject, they are not neglecting a nobler field, merely because its produce, however rich, can be raised but with skill and difficulty. Who, for instance, is at all acquainted with English history, that is not familiar with the glorious character of Alfred? a prince in whom the various qualities which give eminence to the warrior, the statesman, and the sage, meet and shed lustre on each other; and yet the stage has hitherto presented nothing at all worthy of this striking example of moral beauty. Last night, however, an attempt was made; and if the mute attention, and the vehement and almost involuntary acclamations of a crowded audience, may be regarded as evidence, an attempt in the highest degree successful.

The author (Mr KNOWLES) commences his story with the depressed condition of Alfred, at the time when his unsuccessful conflict with the Danes at Wilton had induced him to lay aside his regal dignity, and seek in disguise a shelter among his own neatherds. The incident of the burnt cakes is preserved. His subsequent disguise as a minstrel in the camp of Guthrum, the Danish prince, is made subservient to the winding-up of the historical part of the story, which consists of the ultimate encounter of the troops of Alfred and Guthrum, and the defeat and subjugation of the latter.

As the printed play will no doubt be shortly before the public, and it will be the agreeable task of THE TATLER to give a detailed criticism upon it, it may suffice to say here, that such touches of domestic tenderness and poetic beauty as might be expected from the author of Virginius are very happily mingled in this piece. There are also numerous patriotic sentiments uttered by Alfred, which the audience were not slow to seize, as applicable to the present time, and to applaud to the very echo. The play was given out by Mr MACREADY for repetition on every evening until further notice, amidst immense plaudits.

The performers, one and all, appeared to exert themselves as if they had a personal interest in the success of the play. MACREADY, in Alfred, had ample scope for both his mental and physical energies, and shewed himself fully aware of it. He appeared to be much exhausted towards the close. Miss PHILLIPS played the Daughter of Guthrum, a character of considerable difficulty, with judgment and feeling; and in the Queen (Elswith) of Miss HUDDART there was one touch of nature so admirably given, as to excite repeated and enthusiastic applause. After the play, "God save the King" was vociferously called for, and sung by the whole dramatis personæ.

F. F.

VALUE OF CONVERSATION.—Varillas, a French historian, used to say, that out of ten things he knew, he had learnt nine in conversation.

Digitized by Google

A Case for the Lawyers.—Mr Johnson, on his return from a meeting of the Society for the Protection of Property, found he had brought away a wrong umbrella. Mentioning the circumstance to his neighbour Jones, he learnt that the latter had made a like mistake. But Jones made an additional discovery, which was, that the umbrella that Johnson had got was his. He accordingly claimed it, but Johnson demurred, having repaired the handle, and thinking himself entitled to be repaid the expenditure, and also to receive from Jones the umbrella which Jones had mistaken. Jones answered, that as to the repair, he had not required it, and as to giving up the other umbrella, he should also resist that, for clearly the counter-claims were essentially different. I claim the umbrella you have got, because it is mine; but what you claim of me is confessedly not yours, but the property of another, who may still hear I have had it, and claim it of me. After much disputing, they agreed to refer the matter to Lawyer Findaflaw, who decided in favour of Jones, charging each a guinea.—From a Correspondent.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr Knowles.]

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscur, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.
Priest, Mr Dowsing. Boy, Master Fenton.

In the course of the Evening, "His Majesty's Grand Accession March," by Mr T. Cooke.
And Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell."

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

HOFER.

[By Mr Planche.]

Bertha, Miss Pearson. Josephine Negretti, Miss Russell.
Margaretta, Mrs Newcombe.
Peasants—Therese, Mrs Bedford. Maria, Miss Faucit.
Bavarians—The Commandant of Innspruck, Mr Thompson.
Colonel Donner, Mr Bland. Herr Stetten, Mr Webster. Batz, Mr Salter.
Tyrolese—Andreas Hofer, Mr Phillips. Gottlieb, Mr Yarnold.
Father Joachim Haspinger, Mr Bedford. Walther, Mr Sinclair.
Stephen, Mr Tayleure. Karl, Miss Chikini.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; a Ballet; and The Legion of Honour.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Comedy, in Five Acts, called

THE EXQUISITES.

Mrs Stockland, Mrs Gibbs. Harriet, Miss Nelson.
Lilian Evendale, Miss E. Tree. Kitty, Mrs Keeley.
Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble. Count Valmore, Mr G. Bennett.
Lord Belcourt, Mr Parry. Hon. Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott. Melton, Mr Wrench.
Gosling, Mr Keeley. Sir Benjamin Bonus, Mr Bartley.
Mr Stockland, Mr Egerton. Thornton, Mr Durusset.
Timothy Oldstyle, Mr Blanchard. Strut, Mr Power.
James, Mr Mears. Robert, Mr Heath. Gentleman, Mr Irwin.
The Prologue to be spoken by Mr Abbott.

Previous to the Comedy, an Overture by Spohr.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on Lord Byron's Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr Peake.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.
Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.
Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ludwig Bomperts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Locksley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; and Neuha's Cave.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

CALEB.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. Dartois et E. Scribe.
Emmy, Mme. Albert. Clara, Mlle. Florval.
Henri, M. Alfred. Edouard, M. Paulin. Jaket, M. Préval.
Kirk, M. Guenée. Caleb, M. Gamard. Le Greffier, M. Granville.

Suivi de

ISAURE.

Drame en Trois Actes, Mêlé de Chant, par MM. Theodore, Benjamin et Francis.
Isaure, Mme. Albert. Blanchette, Mlle. St Ange.
M. de St Valier, M. St Aubert. Marcilly, M. Alfred. Selmar, M. Pelissié.
Jules de St Valier, M. Paulin. Blanchet, M. Gamard.
Laurent, M. Guenée. Lafleur, M. Granville. Henry, M. Arnaud.

On Finira par

LE DESESPOIR DE JOCRISSE.

Folie en Deux Actes, du Théâtre des Variétés.
Sophie, Mlle. Florval. La Mère de Jocrisse, Mme. Baudin.
Nicette, Mlle. St Ange.
Jocrisse, M. Brunet. M. Duval, M. Préval. M. Dupont, M. Cloup.
Dupont Fils, M. Paulin. Le petite Colin, Le petite Auguste.

THE FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW,

No. XIV.

IS PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

Contents:

1. Theories of Light.
2. Present State of Egypt.
3. German Manners in the Sixteenth Century.
4. Whale Fishery.
5. Ancient Teutonic Rhythmic Gospel Harmony.
6. French Finance.
7. Letters on Croatia and Italy.
8. Modern Architecture and Architectural Study.
9. Greek Texts of the Roman Law.
10. Paganini.
11. Poland under Sobieski.
12. Poland in 1830.
13. Life of Cola di Rienzo, the Roman Tribune.
14. French Historical Dramas.
15. The Cholera Morbus in Russia.
16. Spanish Tales.
17. History of the Polish Legions in Italy.
18. Miscellaneous Literary Intelligence.
19. List of New Publications within the last three months.

Printed for TREUTTEL and WURTZ, TREUTTEL, Jun. and RICHTER, 30 Soho Square;
And BLACK, YOUNG, and YOUNG, Tavistock Street.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

Part I.

In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

Part II.

'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BAR MAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.
Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

To conclude with the Comic, Local and Musical Entertainment, entitled

SHAKSPEARE'S FESTIVAL.

Preceded by Mozart's Grand Overture to "Il Don Giovanni."
Rosalind Arden, Miss Somerville. Anne Hathaway, Miss Vincent.
Miss Simper, Miss Nicol. Sally, Miss Jordan. Betty, Miss Rumens.
Mr Shakspeare Arden, Mr Williams. George Hart, Mr Maitland.
Frederick Montague, Mr Dibdin Pitt. Guy Colthead, Mr Vale.
Gaius, Mr Gough. Cauliflower, Mr C. Hill.
Gimp, Mr Webb. Mortcloth, Mr Asbury.

In Act I.—A Dance, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Comic Operetta, to be called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr Raymond.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.
Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorensa, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

After which a New Comedietta, in Three Acts, entitled

"THE TIMES."

The New Overture by G. A. Macfarren, of the Royal Academy of Music.
Miss Nancy Nightingale, (with Two New Songs) Mrs Humby.
Rachel, Miss Wells. Mrs Cosey, Mrs Glover.
Captain Lance, Mr Green. Mr Nicholas Scratch, Mr Wilkinson.
Mr Mus, Mr Marshall. Humphrey Honeysuckle, Mr Barnett.
Walter Wasp, Esq. Mr J. Russell.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr Haines.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.
French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louisen, Miss Stolzwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.—The Assassin of Dijon.

Coburg Theatre.—The Red Banner—Forty Thieves—Mutiny at the Nore.

Sadler's Wells.—The Nationals—The Miller's Maid—Senor Valli—The Brigand's Wife—The Brothers of Turin.

City Vaudeville.—Intrigue—The Breakfast-Table—New Ballet—The Weathercock.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at Eber's Library, Old Bond street; W. Kenneth, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Google

Nº 205.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1831.

SPECIMENS OF THE OLD ENGLISH DRAMATISTS.

[TO BE CONTINUED OCCASIONALLY.]

NO. I.—SPECIMENS OF CYRIL TOURNEUR.

Most persons are aware, from Mr Lamb's Specimens, that 'The Revenger's Tragedy' contains one or two beautiful scenes, in which the virtue of a young girl is put to the test, by her brother, who comes in disguise for that purpose. It was Mr Lamb's plan to "give entire scenes, rather than to string together single passages and detached beauties;" (Preface) and to this only is to be attributed the fact of his omitting some striking passages in Tourneur's play. A few of these will be found below. They occur, for the most part, in scenes which are either too gross or too barren of merit, to justify a complete extract.

Cyril Tourneur was a writer of very considerable power. The measure of praise (if indeed it can be called praise at all) which has been awarded to him, is by much too small. His 'Atheist's Tragedy' is but an indifferent work; but 'The Revenger's Tragedy' contains some bold and striking things. To judge of his capacity by the quality of this play only (for if the quantity of his works is to be considered, he must give way to others) he was second to scarcely any writer of his time. Webster, Beaumont and Fletcher, Deckar, and perhaps Marlowe, may take precedence of him; but he was equal to Forde, (and like him fond of interdicted subjects;) and in point of strenuous writing, he was superior to both Shirley and Massinger. In his turns of thought, he is not unlike Old Chapman; and like him also—although in a less degree—he is occasionally more than sufficiently sententious.

The 'Atheist's Tragedy' furnishes but few passages beyond those which Mr Lamb has taken. The following, however, do not occur in the 'Specimens;' and they are now taken the more readily, as the tragedy is by no means common. It has escaped all the modern collections of 'Old Plays.'

A FUNERAL OFFERING.

Be not displeas'd, if on
The altar of his tomb I sacrifice
My tears. They are jewels of my love
Dissolved into grief; and fall upon
His blasted spring as April dew upon
A sweet young blossom shak'd before its time.

THE LAST WORD THE BEST.

But you, dear mistress, being the last and best
That speak'st my farewell; like the imperious close
Of a sweet oration, shall for ever live
Within the soul of my true memory.

THE WAY TO ARGUE WITH WOMEN.

Tush, you mistake the way into a woman,
The passage lies not through her reason, but her blood.

DREAMS.

These idle dreams
Are fabulous. Our boiling phantasies,
Like troubled waters, falsify the shapes
Of things retained in them; and make them seem Confounded, when they are distinguished.

VIRTUE SHOULD INCREASE WITH PROSPERITY.

Since by your greatness you
Are nearer Heaven in place, be nearer it
In goodness. Rich men should transcend the poor,
As clouds the earth; raised by the comfort of
The Sun to water dry and barren grounds.

A TRIFLE DANGEROUS.

That fellow's life, Borachio,
Like a superfluous letter in the law,
Endangers our assurance.

MERCY TO THE DYING, NOBLE.

O my good lord! Let charity forbear
To vex the spirit of a dying man.
A cheerful eye upon the face of death
Is the true countenance of a noble mind.
For honour's sake, my lord, molest it not.

TRUE COURAGE ASKS NO SUPPORT.

(A glass of water is offered to one sentenced to die).

Come, thou clear emblem of cool temperance,
Be thou my witness, that I use no art
To force my courage; nor have need of helps
To raise my spirits, like those weaker men
Who mix their blood with wine, and out of that Adulterate conjunction do beget
A bastard valour. Native courage, thanks!
Thou lead'st me soberly to undertake
This great hard work of magnanimity.

The Revenger's Tragedy would furnish more pithy extracts, but that it is frequently difficult to disentangle the thought from the impurities that surround it, in such a way as to present it without offence to the reader. There are parts, however, which require no apology. The following is a fine apostrophe to

IMPUDENCE.

Impudence!
Thou goddess of the palace, mistress of mistresses,
To whom the costly perfumed people pray,
Strike thou my forehead into dauntless marble,
Mine eyes to steady sapphires! Turn my visage;
And if I needs must glow, let me blush inward,
That this immodest season may not spy
That scholar in my cheeks, fool Bashfulness!

MIDNIGHT.

It is the Judas of the hours, wherein Honest Salvation is betrayed to sin.

THE FATE OF KINGS.

That which would seem treason in our lives
Is laughter when we're dead. - - It is our fate
To live in fear, and die to live in hate.

THE VICES OF THE GREAT.

If she were bent lasciviously (the fault
Of mighty women that sleep soft)—O Death!
Must she needs chuse such an unequal sinner
To make all worse!

A WIFE'S REVENGE.

Some now would plot his death
With easy doctors, those loose-living men;
Some second wife would do this, and dispatch
Her double-loathed lord at meat or sleep.
- - - - - One of his single words
Would quite have freed my youngest, dearest son
From death or durance; and have made him walk
With a bold foot upon the thorny law,
Whose prickles should bow under him; but 'tis not,
And therefore wedlock faith shall be forgot.
I'll kill him in his forehead! Hate, there feed,
That wound is deepest, though it never bleed.

INUTILITY OF EXAMPLE.

It is our blood to err, though Hell gape wide:
Ladies know Lucifer fell, yet still are proud.

A BASTARD'S EXCUSE FOR VICE.

- - - Adultery is my nature.
Faith, if the truth were known, I was begot
After some gluttonous dinner: Some stirring dish
Was my first father, when deep healths went round,
And ladies' cheeks were painted red with wine;
Their tongues as short and nimble as their heels,
Uttering words sweet and thick. - - -
- - - - Oh! Damnation meet,
The sin of feasts, drunken Adultery,
I feel it swell me: My revenge is just.

Digitized by Google

A DANGEROUS INSTRUMENT.

There's hope in him, for discontent and want
Are the best clay to mould a villain of. - - -
- - - This fellow will come fitly: He shall kill
That other slave that did abuse my spleen,
And make it swell to treason.

ONE THING WANTING.

Great men were Gods, if beggars could not kill them.

These passages, and various others extracted by Mr Lamb, are sufficient, I think, to justify my estimate of Cyril Tourneur.

DRAMATICUS.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lectures on Anatomy, Surgery, and Pathology; including Observations on the Nature and Treatment of Local Diseases. By John Abernethy, F.R.S. &c.&c. 12mo. pp. 580. Second edit. Westley.

[Concluded.]

MR ABERNETHY was, in the generality of cases, known to be strongly opposed to the use of the knife; and he considered that in a more advanced stage of science, amputation would be but seldom resorted to. In his Lecture on Accidents about the ancle joint, he states several cases which he successfully treated by milder processes, contrary to the opinion of some of his professional brethren. The following is characteristically related, and is no less creditable to his humanity than to his skill:—

'A poor wee man, who lived in my own neighbourhood, who was employed as a labourer at some buildings, and tumbling off a scaffold, he got a dislocation of the foot inwards. I was, at the time, sitting very quietly at home, when I was called upon to go to an accident that happened in an adjoining street. I went, and when I got there, the door of the house was open, and there I saw this little wee man lying on a mattress in his own parlour, with his foot up. I looked at it, and said to him, "Sir, this is a sad accident, but do not be out of heart about it, we must put it to rights again;" and so I took the skin out, which was turned in over the astragalus, which I think you should always do. I laid the man fairly on his side, with his limb in a comfortable position, his thigh half bent upon the pelvis, and the leg half bent upon the thigh; laid him on his side, and his foot, as much as could be, upon the fibular surface; then I had to use very little effort indeed to put it all right. The semilunar rent of the skin, and the other edge, came in such close contact, that it did not seem as if there had been any wound at all. The foot altogether went into its right position; and an accident, which at first you would have said was one of the most horrible kind, appeared to me to be of no consequence. And when the little man saw his leg and foot looking as they ought, he said to me, "Is it possible, Sir, that this case should do well?"—"Yea, verily," said I, "and I have seen many such cases do well." He said, "Why, Sir, they have gone for the instruments." Two surgeons had been there, and they actually agreed that amputation should take place immediately. I had not been at all informed of this, so that I was put into an awkward predicament, and was obliged to wait for the arrival of those heroes. When they came and saw the man lying very comfortably, they really seemed staggered, and said, "But, Mr Abernethy, you are well aware of these complicated accidents, and can you give us an assurance that this will do well?" I said, "No, certainly not; I can do no such thing; but if it does not do well, you can but have recourse to amputation afterwards, and my surgical character is pledged no farther than this. I give you an assurance that no immediate mischief will come on to endanger the man's life; and you may wait to see if his constitution will allow him to do well."—"Now," I said, "I feel I have got into rather an awkward situation, and, if you please, you must just allow me to finish it in my own way." I then got splints, closed the wound, varnished the sticking plaster, and plastered it up. Then I told them about sponging, sponging it continually, so as never to let there be any increase of temperature. In short, there are but two holds you have over any person's mind—those are fear and hope; and I make use of them both with my patients. I say, if you will be perfectly still, I am confident you will do well; if you move one jot, I am sure you will do ill, that is all. You must not move, not the variation of a hair: not even if an army of fleas were biting you all over, because your safety depends upon perfect steadiness. Well, as to this poor little wee man, God bless me, the wound would not heal; abscesses formed, large ones they were; they were let out, and it is upon this point I have now to speak. The mischief is not done to the joint only, but all the muscles are sprained in a most horrible degree; sprained to such an extent, that the inflammation will take place between the fascia and the substance connecting the muscles; and as soon as you see the fluxion formed, you put a lancet into the abscess and let it out; for the want of doing this would be, that the joint would come out, and the matter would burst out, leaving a large open abscess and cavity. Now that is necessary to be attended to. But I suppose the wound of this man was all shut up and well in about three months; in six months he walked with a stick; in a year he walked without any stick, and after that he walked about, I believe, for twenty years, pretty well, as long as I knew him. Well, that is the case of an unhealthy man, but without any particular disorder of his constitution.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— The theatre has much the same effect on the manners of the age, as the Bank on the credit of the nation. * * * The seat of wit, when one speaks as a man of the town and of the world, is the playhouse.—Steele.

— Addison ridicules, with great humour, the English translations of the Italian, and the singular effect of the translator transposing the words, and making the music very absurd in one tongue that was natural in another. "I remember," says he, "an Italian verse that ran thus, word for word:—

'And turn'd my pity into rage:'

which the English, for rhyme-sake, translated,

'And into pity turn'd his rage.'"

On the operas being performed entirely in Italian, Addison supposes it very natural for an historian, two or three hundred years afterwards, who does not know the taste of his forefathers, to record that, "in the beginning of the eighteenth century the Italian tongue was so well understood in England, that operas were acted on the public stage in that language."—Companion to the Theatres.

INGENIOUS PRECAUTIONS AGAINST FIRE DEFEATED.—In the construction of the old Drury Lane Theatre, as a precaution against fire, an iron curtain was constructed, so as to let down in a moment of danger, and separate the audience from the stage, while a reservoir was formed on the top of the house, filled with water sufficient, as the Epilogue spoken at the opening of the theatre (in 1794) stated, to "drown the audience in a minute." On the first night the iron curtain was let down, and the stage was filled with water, on which a man rowed round with a boat. It is singular, that notwithstanding the immense reservoirs, and the iron curtain abovementioned, the whole of the property was consumed (Feb. 24, 1809.) Probably the reservoirs were empty, or no one was at hand to set the water free, if they were full. The iron curtain had been removed a few months previous to the fire, it being so rusted, it was impossible to work it.—Companion to the Theatres.

RADACK MODE OF WARFARE.—I expressed to Rarik my wish to know more of their method of warfare; he and Lagediak in consequence assembled two troops, which they opposed to each other at a short distance, as hostile armies; the first rank in both, consisting of men, and the second of women. The former was armed with sticks instead of lances, the latter had their baskets filled with pandana seeds for stones; and their hair, instead of being, as usual, tastefully bound up, hung dishevelled and wild about their heads, giving them the appearance of maniacs. Rarik placed himself at the head of one troop, and Lagediak of the other: both gave the signal for attack, by blowing their muscle horns. The adverse forces approached; but instead of the battle, began a comic dance, in which the two armies emulated each other in grimaces, furious gesticulations, and a distortion of the eyes, which left only the whites visible, while the women shrieked a war-song, which, if their opponents had been lovers of harmony, would assuredly have put them to flight. The leaders took no share in these violent exertions, but still, animating their troops by the tones of the muscle horn. When exhausted by these efforts, the horns were silent, and the armies separated by mutual consent, looking on while some of the most valiant from each side came forward to challenge with threats and abuse a champion of the enemy to single combat. This was represented by dancing and songs, and occasional movements with the hands as if to throw the lance, which the antagonist sought to avoid by dexterously springing aside. The respective armies and their leaders animated the courage of their warriors by battle-songs, till the horns were blown again; the armies once more slowly approached each other; the champions retired into their ranks, and the battle was renewed with a prodigious noise; spears waved in the air; pandana seeds flew from the delicate hands of the female warriors, over the heads of their husbands, upon the enemy, but the armies never came near enough to be really engaged. The leaders remained in front, loudly blowing their horns, and sometimes giving commands. At length, by accident or design, one of Lagediak's men fell; the battle was now over, the victory decided, and the signal given for drawing off the forces. Both armies were so exhausted that they threw themselves on the grass, and, amidst laughing and merriment, gave themselves up to repose.—Kotzebue's New Voyage round the World.—[It is a pity this mode of warfare is not followed by Christian countries; for none can be more humane. The armies make every possible exertion in the dance which precedes the fight; it is not till they have succeeded in wearying themselves almost to exhaustion, that they actually commence hostilities; and when the first man falls, they cease. It would be an admirable thing, whether in public or private quarrels, if the hostile parties were obliged to dance to the sound of a trumpet for a few hours, before they proceeded to the attack. The exertion would be a help to digestion, and consequently an incentive to harmony.]

Digitized by Google

— I am a very constant frequenter of the playhouse; a place to which I suppose the Idler not a stranger, since he can have nowhere else so much entertainment with so little concurrence of his own endeavours. At all other assemblies, he that comes to receive delight, will be expected to give it; but in the theatre, nothing is necessary to the amusement of two hours, but to sit down and be willing to be pleased.—Johnson.

THEATRICAL REVOLT.—In 1733, Theophilus Cibber and others revolted from Drury Lane, and opened the Haymarket, although an attempt was made to suppress them by the patentee of the former theatre. Among the rebels was Joe Miller. One of the company, Harper, the competitor of Quin in Falstaff, was committed to Bridewell on this occasion; but was "soon after," says Davies, "triumphantly delivered by the Court of King's Bench." The reason of this decision, as appears from Cibber, was, that Harper was not a "vagabond," within the meaning of the Act of the 12th year of Queen Anne,—"he being a housekeeper, and having a vote for the Westminster Members of Parliament."—Companion to the Theatres.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—And Hofer.
COVENT-GARDEN.—The Exquisites—And Neuha's Cave.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE new comedy of The Exquisites, produced at this theatre last night, is an agreeable satire on those fleeting nothings which, under a diversity of appellations, are pleased from time to time to disgust rational and disfigure fashionable society by constituting its froth. The mode in which the present author (M. de TRUEBA) has chosen to effect his purpose, is by collecting, as in a menagerie, a great variety of the species, and letting them exemplify, in their words and actions, the follies and vices (for they have sufficient capacity to be vicious) which constitute their distinction. This is judicious, and better than any description, for by beholding through successive scenes the pursuits of these negations, the contempt of at least the commonly sensible, can hardly fail to be secured, and their consequent extinction a little accelerated. Whether an author is consulting his own fame in making the staple of his production of such very frail materials, is more open to doubt. The characters from whom the play derives its title, have their representatives in chief under the designations of Lord Belcourt, a Peer Exquisite (Mr PARRY) a mere abortion; the Hon. Frank Cecil, a Military Exquisite (Mr ABBOTT) an intriguer, who is desirous of marrying the daughter of a rich citizen whom he despises, that he may thereby repair a shattered fortune; Melton, a Sporting Exquisite (Mr WRENCH) a knowing gambler, who has fixed on for his prey, a Country Exquisite, Gosling (Mr KEELEY) whom he introduces into fashionable society, and fleeces of his money; and lastly, Strut, a Valet Exquisite (Mr POWER) the ape of his nominal superiors. These characters furnish the principal part of the dialogue, but none of them have much to do with the plot, which wants filling up, and indeed is altogether subordinate to them. The following is an outline. Lilian Evondale. (Miss E. TREE) the natural daughter of a deceased Lord Castleton, has been left by her father under the protection of a City Alderman, Sir Benjamin Bonus (Mr BARTLEY), a man kind but narrow-minded, and who annoys her by pertinaciously pressing her to become the wife of his clerk. To escape from the scene of her discomfort, she resolves to quit his house clandestinely, and endeavour to procure for herself the situation of a governess or companion. Unluckily her enquiries are made without due circumspection, for by the management of Strut, the valet of Lord Castleton (Mr C. KEMBLE) she is induced by a false representation to call at the house of the latter, the nature of whose designs she very soon perceives. From this trap she is relieved by an accidental circumstance. Strut, in the absence of his master, had taken the liberty of meeting his sweetheart Kitty (Mrs KEELEY) and on his master's unexpected return, he, to conceal his impropriety, hurries her into a private recess in the library. Lord Castleton is interrupted in his love professions by his servant announcing that Alderman Bonus is on the stairs in his way to his Lordship, who had sent for him on money matters. To avoid seeing her guardian, Lilian easily suffers herself to be persuaded by Lord Castleton to enter the same recess in which Kitty has been previously concealed. Lord Castleton leaves the room with Bonus, and Strut takes advantage of his absence to go and relieve Kitty. But Kitty having, while in the recess, been made the confidant of Lilian, they exchange cloaks and hats, and the latter by this stratagem gets let out of doors by Strut, and Kitty presents herself to the astonished Lord Castleton. Lilian in the street encounters two of the Exquisites returning from a revel, and is rescued from their insults by the timely approach of Count Valmore, a French nobleman of merit, from whom her mother and herself had received some attentions at Paris, and who was her declared admirer. He provides apartments for her, on proceeding to which she is unfortunately seen by Strut, who gives his master the information. Lord Castleton unexpectedly presents himself to her, renews his importunity, to the great distress of Lilian, who on her knees entreats him not to persecute her. In kneeling, a locket falls from her bosom; he takes it up and discovers it to be the portrait of his father, and that the wearer is his neglected sister. Remorse seizes him, and is followed by a cordial reconciliation with his intended victim. Count Valmore then appears, and after due explanation of circumstances, accepts the hand of Lilian, with the perfect concurrence of all parties, including Bonus, who foregoes, on this occasion, his prejudices against foreigners. This is the conclusion of the play. Besides the characters already mentioned, there are a Mr and Mrs Stockland (Mr EGERTON and Mrs GIBBS) a merchant and his wife, who give parties in emulation of the great, by whom they are looked upon with suitable contempt.

The play was extremely well received, and although it does not aspire to the highest rank of comedy, may fairly take its place among a very respectable class. As the duration of a piece is greatly dependent on the manners it portrays, the author will have himself to blame in part, if the oblivion into which Exquisitism must soon inevitably pass should be fatal to the continued favour of his comedy. The general good sense and taste, and the occasional spirit of the dialogue, warrant a confidence that the hand which has done so well may yet do better. M. DE TRUEBA, we believe, is an unwilling exile from his native country (Spain) where he has been honourably distinguished by his hostility to the tyranny under which it groans; and he has already obtained a reputation here by some historical novels.

The piece was very strongly cast, and in its principal characters well played. The Lord Castleton of Mr C. KEMBLE was a most felicitous personation of the man of fashion, gay from constitution and corrupted by the indulgence of vicious habits, but discerning all the while the shallowness and absurdity of the society with which he was willing to be numbered. A neat prologue was well delivered by Mr ABBOTT. We have neither time nor space for further remark.

F. F.

MINOR THEATRES.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—May I ask the reason, why you never, in your amusing little journal, give us criticisms upon the performances of the Surrey, Coburg, Astley's, and other Minors, as well as upon the Queen's and Adelphi Theatres? If you will answer this question through the medium of your paper, you will greatly oblige your sincere well-wisher, EDRIC.

[The reason is, that the Theatres we notice are at hand, and the others a good way off; which makes a considerable difference; especially when the criticism is to be written the same night on which the play is seen. Some of the theatres that we do notice, are not in the habit of being criticised by the papers in general; and though the others are mentioned on particular occasions, yet as we pay far more attention to Theatricals than any other Periodical, we have taken the liberty hitherto of saving ourselves trouble with regard to the places mentioned by our correspondent. Among the speculations, however, which we entertain for making this our little journal large and comprehensive, we purpose to leave no theatre that is noticeable, unnoticed. We have often longed to have another sight of our old acquaintance Elliston; and from what we have heard of him, we feel a wish to see Mr Serle of the Coburg. As to Mr Ducrow's horses, we would cheerfully go half-a-dozen miles any day to see them, if we had time.]

Digitized by Google

COMEDY OF "THE EXQUISITES."

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—As your paper is devoted to Theatricals, I consider it the most proper channel for contradicting a paragraph which has appeared in a Sunday journal, and a report partially spread abroad, that the comedy of The Exquisites is the joint production of another writer and myself. I shall therefore feel obliged by your affording me an opportunity of stating, explicitly, that the comedy in question is my own, and that I alone am responsible for its merits or demerits. I remain, your obedient servant,

TELESFORO DE TRUEBA.

Sabloniere's Hotel, Thursday, April 27.

[To receive a card from "Don Telesforo de Trueba," or any other Spanish gentleman, always appears to us bookmen like having a personal communication with one of the personages in 'Gil Blas,' or 'The Devil on Two Sticks;'—not Gil himself;—that might not be so proper; but with Don Alphonso de Leyva, or Don Cleofas, or Don Fabricio, or the Devil himself; for "the Prince of Darkness is a gentleman." Perhaps the report spoken of by our accomplished correspondent, originated in his having put his MS. into somebody's hands, to correct little recondite errors of orthography, and perfect it with o's and a's.

The Times, by the way, is mistaken in thinking that Don Telesforo's Comedy is the first produced on the English Stage from the pen of a foreigner. Motteux, the translator of 'Don Quixote,' wrote both comedy and tragedy for the English Stage, besides dramatic pieces of other kinds, amounting in the whole to a considerable number. It is in an epistle to Motteux that Dryden introduces his fine lines, comparing the English and French languages. He is speaking of the tragedy called Beauty in Distress:—

'Thy incidents, perhaps, too thick are sown,
But too much plenty is thy fault alone.
At least but two can that good crime commit,
Thou in design, and Wycherly in wit.
Let thy own Gauls condemn thee, if they dare,
Contented to be thinly regular:
Born there, but not for them, our fruitful soil
With more increase rewards thy happy toil.
Their tongue, enfeebled, is refined too much,
And, like pure gold, it bends at every touch.
Our sturdy Teuton yet will art obey,
More fit for manly thought, and strengthen'd with allay.']

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

IL PIRATA.

[By BELLINI.]

The principal Characters by Madame Rubini, Madame Castelli, Signor Santini, Signor Deville, Signor De Angeli, and Signor Rubini.

Between the Acts,

A FAVORITE DIVERTISSEMENT.

Principal Dancers Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, and Mlle. Brocard, M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

After the Opera will be presented the Second Act of

GUILLAUME TELL.

In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will Dance The Tyrolienne.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.
Priest, Mr Dowsing. Boy, Master Fenton.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles.'

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr Benson Hill.
Hector, Miss Poole. Guillaume, Master Richardson.

On Monday, Alfred the Great; The Brigand; and other Entertainments.

This Day is published, No. II, of

THE ENGLISHMAN'S MAGAZINE,

With an Engraving of the Villa D'Este, Tivoli.

CONTENTS:—1. The Pilgrimage to Glen Ora, by Christopher —— in a Fytte.—2. May—sweet May!—3. Nature and Cure of the Indian Cholera (with a chart illustrative of its progress.)—4. He is gone—he is gone!—5. Slavery Question.—6. Battle Flag of Sigurd.—7. Notices of England, her People and Institutions, by a Yankee Oxonian. No. I. State of Education and the Universities.—8. Song.—9. Scenes in Poland. No. II.—10.—Villa d'Este.—11. Black and White.—12. The School of Saint Simon.—13. The Three Dukes.—14. The Dropping Glen.—15. Recent Rambles in the Footsteps of Don Quixote.—No. II.—16. Bird-nesting, by a Field Naturalist.—17. Trustees of the Nation.—18. The Drama — Knowles' Alfred.—19. Reporting Progress.—20. Colloquial Dictionary.—21. Journal of Literature, &c.

London: HURST and CHANCE, St Paul's Church yard.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Lesbia, Zemira, Miss Cawse, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON'S Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr PEAKE.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.

Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ladwig Bomperts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Locksley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

On Monday, The Exquisites; and Neuha's Cave.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

By desire, The Military Brigand Dance, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

To conclude with an entirely new Romantic Drama, entitled

ALWYN AND BERTHOLDY.

[By Mr ALMAR.]

Guthela, Miss Somerville. Madelon, Miss Vincent.
Leopold, Mr Almar. The Headsman, Mr Williams. Alwyn, Mr C. Hill.
Bertholdy, Mr Osbaldiston. Romberg, Mr D. Pitt. Herman, Mr Lee.
Mr Balaam Brown, Mr Vale. Arnold, Mr Gough. Solomon, Mr Webb.
Peter and Paul, Mr Asbury and Mr Hobbs. Reichkel Snips, Mr Rogers.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

After which a New Comedietta, in Three Acts, entitled

"THE TIMES."

The New Overture by G. A. Macfarren, of the Royal Academy of Music.
Miss Nancy Nightingale, (with Two New Songs) Mrs Humby.
Rachel, Miss Wells. Mrs Cosey, Mrs Glover.
Captain Lance, Mr Green. Mr Nicholas Scratch, Mr Wilkinson.
Mr Mux, Mr Marshall. Humphrey Honeysuckle, Mr Barnett.
Walter Wasp, Esq. Mr J. Russell.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.—The Assassin of Dijon.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Red Banner—Forty Thieves —Mutiny at the Nore.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Nationals—The Miller's Maid —Senor Valli—The Brigand's Wife—The Brothers of Turin.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court

Digitized by Google

Nº 206.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1831.

THE DO-NOTHINGS AND THE DO-MUCHES.

The following extract is taken from the last number of the Westminster Review. It is a pleasant exposition of a state of society, involving a numerous train of evils, which are acquiesced in by many from mental indolence, and a confused notion that all change must necessarily be for the worse; while others are desirous of perpetuating every species of abuse, in order that they may now, or at some futurer time, profit by them. But since education is extending its useful light into every corner of society, the general perception is becoming clearer, and the conviction is growing, that what is best for all is best also for each; for highly as the distinctions of the "Do-nothings" may be prized by themselves or their worshippers, it is altogether a mistake to suppose they will lose any real comfort or enjoyment by the improvement of the condition of the "Do-muches." That this is the feeling of the more intelligent among the Aristocracy is evident from their recent judicious conduct.

'Property may be compared to a fall of snow; if it were to fall equally and impartially on all to-day, to-morrow it would be in heaps; the snow that fell in a warm valley would be melted; on the frigid hill tops it would remain in virgin whiteness till the arrival of summer; on the level plains we should see it accumulated in huge drifts, leaving the land bare in places, and loading it in others. So it would be with money, were the whole stock in the country divided equally between every individual in it. It would soon drift.

'Persons into whose possession it has drifted have no uneasiness about the security of their subsistence; their hands are not to labour, but to spend; the industrious world is at their command. This difference of circumstances sets a wide distinction between the spending and the getting class.

'If property has remained long in the same family, or, in other words, if the successive spenders have not spent too much, the idea of property becomes connected with the idea of a particular family, and the labour-sellers begin to be in the habit of looking upon this family of labour-buyers or labour-commanders as something peculiar—as entitled by birth or descent to some superiority. This is the meaning of the word "gentleman:" a gentleman is one who is not under the necessity of doing anything, and whose ancestors for several generations have done nothing.

'The upper classes consist chiefly of persons of this class; the lower classes are those who must do something to live. An upper class man goes to bed as he got up in the morning; a lower-class man has changed the world to some small extent: out of a block of wood he has made a chair or a table; out of a piece of cloth, a coat; out of a brute lump of iron, several horse-shoes.

'The upper class men, depending on no one, and doing as they like, naturally form a high opinion of themselves; the lower-class men are too busy to put their thoughts in the shape of opinion; and, besides, they necessarily incline to bow to the purchasers of their labour, and the possessors of that choice metal, the smallest portion of which would go far to pay for a whole day of their lives. Thus it comes to pass, that the do-nothings become greatly conceited, and the much-doers greatly contemned.

'But as people get tired of doing nothing, and must amuse themselves, the upper classes, both by way of amusing themselves and more effectually securing possession of the "drift," take it into their heads to make the laws. In making these laws they have several things to attend to. First, they must punish with various penalties, from death to cart-whipping, all those who may disturb them in any of their enjoyments; next, they must prevent the lower classes from cutting each other's throats, for thereby they would lose one or more of their labourers; next, as these labour-sellers often make more money than is absolutely necessary to subsistence, they ordain that all such sums shall be paid into the state-chest, to which they (the do-nothings) alone have access; and, in order more effectually to distinguish the do-nothings from the much-doers, they direct that they shall wear certain badges, be called by certain titles, and be exempt from the burthens imposed upon others.

'In this state of things it is clear that the "drift" is kept secure in the class to which it belongs, or should it, by possibility, shift, as in some cases of melting or otherwise disappearing, it is renewed out of the state-chest; for it is held, that there is something shocking in the fact of a do-nothing ever falling into the ranks of a much-doer. For a man who never made anything, except, perhaps, a bad law, to be compelled to make a shoe or a gate, would be held by the whole class of do-nothings as perfectly horrible.

'By an examination of the laws of the people, it may be clearly seen which class has made them. If, in the law of high-roads, it be forbidden that a plantation should grow by the hedge-side in a common farm, but the same plantation be permitted in a park, to the injury of the road, it is thence clear that park-owners have made the law. If privileges are accumulated by any particular set, we may be sure that it is this set which has been employed in law-making.

'Those who have long been in the habit of making laws become to be considered as the only right law-makers; and, as it has been seen that the do-nothings not only make laws, but also are the chief opinion-formers, and esteem themselves greatly, it necessarily follows, that the greater part of mankind view them in their own light, and take them at their own value. This is the plan which has been pursued; by means of it a very few have long had the command of the whole world. Being in the possession of some power to begin with, they multiplied it a thousand-fold by means of law and opinion, just as the mechanician increases his power by the wheel or the lever.

'Deference for the do-nothings is no where carried to a higher pitch than in England: every sign or symptom of doing nothing is respected. A white hand would be bowed over, whereas the broad and brawny fist, speaking of a vast treasure of labour laid out for the use of mankind, would be sneered at as vulgar. A delicate complexion is genteel: its being akin to disease is forgiven for the sake of its connexion with the do-nothings; robustness is low. In Wallachia and Moldavia the boyars used to pretend to be unable to walk; for the same reason, a prince always moved supported by a person on each side, by way of living crutches.

'The complexion of the public opinion is, in this respect, suffused over our literature, and in no department more visibly displayed than it that popular branch of it,—the Novel. The novel is now read by all classes, and is, perhaps, more relished by those that can read of the lower orders than even of the upper ranks; and it may, without fear of mistake, be considered as a tolerably just mirror of the popular prejudices. Now, in the novel, we always find that the interest of the story turns upon members of the aristocracy: for the service of the novel a new batch of peers is always created; baronets are part of the common stock in trade; and, if an untitled individual is ever introduced, he is always a gentleman of a very ancient family, the possessor of a mansion of great antiquity, and descended from many generations of do-nothings. The hero or heroine, if they are not of the upper ranks to begin with, always turn out to be so at last: it is a denouement of a sufficient interest, if he who has always been supposed a plain Mister, ends in being proved, to the satisfaction of all, a My Lord. The romance-writers would appear to have followed Tarquin's advice, and cut off all the tallest poppies for the composition of their dramatis personæ; their hands are all trumps. It might be supposed from them, that nothing existed under the rank of a gentlemen, were it not that they are obliged to introduce tradesmen and others ministering to the wants of the true men; the old story of little china dandled in the arms of crockery.

'The newspapers also, in this point, faithfully represent the national tendency. The most trivial movements of the do-nothings are faithfully recorded. Instead of doing nothing, look at the broad sheet, and it might be supposed they did everything and were everything. Here is a marriage in high life, and there is a long obituary of a man loaded with titles, whose distinction seems to have been, that he had freer access to the state-chest than any other: in this column we have a list of arrivals, in that a list of dinners, in the next a long enumeration of the horses they are training to run for their amusement. If a do-nothing discovers that a do-nothing who lived a thousand years ago, from whom he is descended, was called Lord Barbecue instead of Mr Barbecue, he proceeds to get himself called Lord instead of Mr Barbecue, and the newspaper is filled with learned arguments on the subject, and with reports as to what the Lord Chancellor thought on the chain of evidence. If a titled do-nothing has run away with another do-nothing's wife—for men must be doing something,—the noise is far greater than in the case of a mere lower-class man, and the newspaper is especially copious on the subject.

'The great and titled do-nothings have acquired among the vulgar, that is the many, the name of "Corinthians," from their forming the capital or top of the social pillar. This is true, not only generally but particularly. What society or institution exists without possessing, by way of ornament, several titled do-nothings? They are almost considered an essential in every association of whatever kind; no public meeting is expected to effect its object without a great do-nothing in the chair. Parties do not look out for a man of the highest character, or the most extensive information, for a chairman: they canvass among the House of Lords, and, when they find an illustrious idler, not too fond of other kinds of amusement, to preside, like King Log, they are wonderously pleased, and expect great things from the public meeting. That Great Britain is the most aristocratical country in the world, has been a received opinion on the continent for some time; but it was reserved for M. de Staël, who lately wrote a book on this country, to find out that the "lower orders" were proud of their upper class, and, in short, gloried in their chains. This astonished the young Frenchman; but we have long known it; and they who understand the nature of opinion, and observe how many means the aristocracy of an ignorant people have of moulding it, need not marvel to find that, at this moment, the annihilation of the privileges and titles of the hereditary legislators would be generally esteemed the utter destruction of the British constitution, and the extinction of all rational liberty.'

Digitized by Google

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE SULPHUR BATH AT AIX.

Till the year 1772, the sulphur bath was merely a large cave cut in the rock, and divided by a wall into two apartments, one for the men, the other for the women, with an iron balustrade in front. At that period, the King of Sardinia caused the present handsome building to be erected, and fitted-up expressly for the operation of douching. The apartments for douching, to the number of fifteen, are placed in a semicircular corridor; and in a lower story are two other rooms, into which the water falls with greater force. On the south side, is the large bath intended for the royal family, with dressing-rooms round it. There are also apartments where the poor are douched gratis. To a person taking the douche for the first time, the process is somewhat formidable. He is introduced into a dark cell or arched vault, about thirteen feet by eleven, and twenty-two feet high, where he finds himself involved in dense vapours, and sulphurous odours. Two silent and nearly naked figures then step forward, and conduct him to a flight of steps, leading down to the douching place. The water descends in columns as large as the arm, from the height of eight or ten feet, and is made to pass through long jointed tin tubes, which are fixed on the two apertures through which the stream enters. Each doucher takes one of these tubes, which he directs to different parts of the body with one hand, while with the other he rubs or champooes the part on which the water falls. The operation is continued at first for only five minutes, and is lengthened each succeeding morning, as the patient becomes better able to endure it; it is somewhat painful, and very exhausting; and when the water is at its highest temperature, it is not uncommon for the patient to faint away. The douching being finished, the performers set up a yell as a signal for the porters to enter, by whom the patient is wound round in a linen sheet and a thick woollen wrapper, and borne home with great rapidity in a chair, closely covered up with a cotton hood and curtains. The bed being previously warmed, the woollen wrapper is taken off the patient, and he is lifted into bed in the wet sheet, where he undergoes a profuse perspiration. The season for taking the douches is from the middle of June to the latter end of September. Before or after that time, it is deemed dangerous, as the mornings and evenings are frequently cold. The annual number of patients at Aix varies from 1500 to 1800; and as the baths belong to Government, it is calculated, that the King of Sardinia derives from them a clear revenue of 1500l. a year. The whole expense, including the porters, is thirty sous, French money, out of which the douchers and porters have only a sou each, and the remainder goes to the King. Ladies are, of course, attended by female opetators, who are called douchesses. The same champooing is practised when the patient is only steamed. There is no place in Europe, says Mr Bakewell, where douching can be practised with so much advantage. At Aix la Chapelle, the water is too hot, and the temperature must be reduced before it is used. Here, it is not only of the proper temperature, but so abundant, that, were the upper source employed in the same manner as the lower spring, there would be sufficient to douche a thousand persons a day.—Conder's Italy.

YOUTHFUL INTREPIDITY.

During the reign of Sigismund the first, of Poland, the Poles were compelled to take arms against the incursions of the Grand Duke of Russia. Among other captains who at that period deserted the cause of Poland, was Glinski, a Lithuanian general, to whom Sigismund was warmly attached. On learning that the renegade already repented his disloyal flight, and was only retained in the service of the emperor by apprehension of encountering the vengeance of his former sovereign, the King of Poland was heard in the midst of his camp to express a wish that some one could be found courageous enough to undertake the task of entering the enemy's camp, and acquainting General Glinski with the lenient feelings entertained towards him by the master he had betrayed. On this, a young Podolian soldier named Trepka, stepped from the ranks, and volunteered to execute the commission of the king; but Sigismund declined his services, conceiving that his extreme youth rendered him unworthy of trust in so confidential a mission. Trepka, however, persisted; and by the frankness of his address, and the audacity of his design, so won the confidence of Sigismund's staff, that his youth and imputed want of prudence were at length overlooked, and he was entrusted with a conciliatory message from the King of Poland to the Lithuanian general. Trepka now disguised himself as a peasant of the country, and penetrated into the enemy's camp; where, having evaded the advanced guard, he attempted to reach the tent of Glinski. The eagerness of his manner, however, his inquiries, and his foreign accent, soon attracted attention among the soldiery; he was apprehended as a spy, put in irons, and conducted before the commander-in-chief. Notwithstanding the close enquiries addressed to him, Trepka maintained a resolute silence; being resolved to die rather than betray the oath under which he had undertaken his mission to General Glinski. Irritated by his firmness, the Muscovites brought a lighted brasier before their prisoner, and resumed their interrogatories; when, finding that he was steadfast in his courageous resolution, they attached him to a spit, and deliberately proceeded to roast him before the fire! But even in the midst of his tortures, not one syllable could be extracted from the lips of the young soldier, and after exhibiting the fortitude of a Scœvola, he expired in agonies, without having in the slightest degree compromised the secret committed to his keeping by the king.—Historical Traveller, Vol. II.

THE GOBELINS TAPESTRY.

In the reign of Francis the First, Giles Gobelin, a dyer of Paris, who had learned the secrets of his art from a native of Leyden, named Van der Vecht, perceiving that the rivulet of the Bierre, which runs through the Faubourg St Marceau, at Paris, was peculiarly favourable to the brilliancy of a scarlet dye then in use, erected a large manufactory on the spot, which at that period went by the name of La Folie Gobelin, on "Gobelin's Folly." In process of time, however, Colbert the minister accorded his protection to one of Gobelin's successors, and enabled him to perfect his art under the instructions of a dyer named Gulick, a German, who had acquired his experience during a residence in Persia. In the year 1687, Colbert recommended Louis XIV to purchase "Gobelin's Folly," which was afterwards called L'Hotel Royal des Gobelins, and converted into a species of palace for the assemblage of first rate artists in weaving, dying, painting, goldsmith's work, and other decorative arts. The rivulet of the Bierre now exchanged its name for that of Gobelins; and the tapestry which at present wholly engrosses the factory, has acquired for this obscure appellation, a celebrity throughout all civilized countries. A similar manufactory has been established at St Petersburg, with great and increasing success; but since the introduction of paper hangings, the art of weaving tapestry has been wholly abandoned in England, where the dampness of the atmosphere was found fatal to the coloring of the worsted of which it is composed.—Historical Traveller, Vol. II.

ST BERNARD.

About two miles from Talloires, is Chateau Menthon, interesting as having been the birth-place of the first St Bernard (born in 924—died in 1008) who was heir to the noble family of Menthon. The castle is a lofty irregular building in the Norman style, with massive gates and portcullis; but part of the front is more modern. The rooms are hung with tapestry. In the chapel, on the altar, is a small statue of St Bernard holding several monsters enchained,—the giants, according to the current legend, whom the saint vanquished on the Alps. Mr Bakewell interprets the groupe as representing the triumph he achieved over the pagan deities, which were, in his time, still adored in some of the sequestered valleys of the Pennine and Graian Alps. In the castle is also shewn a portrait of the young lady to whom the heir of Menthon was to have been married, in compliance with the ambitious arrangements of his parents; but the evening before the day fixed for the nuptials, Bernard made his escape out of a window, and fled over the Alps to Aosta, where he obtained ordination as a priest, and rose to be archdeacon. As the picture of the fair lady, and also one of the saint, are in oils, they must be of a later date than the tenth century. There is however a portrait of St Bernard, painted in distemper, with but little shading, which appears very ancient: it represents him as extremely handsome, with an expression of great dignity and benevolence. For two and forty years he is stated to have laboured with the zeal of an apostle in converting the pagans of the Alpine regions; and after he had destroyed the remains of heathen superstition, he laid the foundation of the two hospices from which the passes of the Pennine and the Graian Alps derive their present appellation. Tradition relates, says Mr Bakewell, that St Bernard's parents, after having bewailed the unknown fate of their son for twenty-six years, discovered him at the newly erected hospice on the Great St Bernard. If there is any truth in this legend, that hospice must have been built at a much earlier period of his labours. Indeed there is historical evidence, that a monastery existed on the Great St Bernard, before the year 851; and the original foundation of the hospice has been attributed to Louis le Debonnaire, or to Charlemagne, whose uncle Bernard, an illegitimate son of Charles Martel, led a division of the invading army of Charlemagne over the Great St Bernard. From this Bernard, Saussure supposes the present name of the pass to be derived. But there was another Bernard, an illegitimate son of Pepin, to whom Charlemagne bequeathed the kingdom of Italy; and to him, Mr Brockedon thinks the original establishment of the monastery and the name of the pass may be more probably attributed. The present hospices on both the Great and the Little St Bernard were, however, founded by the Archdeacon of Aosta, whose name has come to supersede that of his predecessors.—Conder's Italy.—[It seems that one of the relatives of Charlemagne was godfather to the mountain-pass, which in turn became godfather to the saintly Archdeacon.]

Digitized by Google

ARTIFICIAL PEARLS.

Among the few national manufactures still exported from the city of Rome, is the species of beads known by the name of Roman pearl, which consist of globules of alabaster, covered with the scales of a fish abounding in the Tiber. The first manufacture of artificial pearls was established at Murano, in the fifteenth century; but it was suppressed by the government of Venice as fraudulent. After this, small balls of wax, covered with pearl-coloured enamel, were much in use; and at length a French bead-maker, named Jaquin, discovered the present method of making artificial pearls, in 1656. He observed, at his estate at Passy, near Paris, that after washing some small fish, called ablettes, the water was filled with fine silver-coloured particles; and on suffering it to stand, he obtained a sediment equalling the lustre of pearls. Having scraped off the scales of fresh fish, he formed a fine powder, which he called Essence d'Orient; and contrived to make it adhere to small beads made of gypsum, till at length, he improved his invention, by applying it to the inside of hollow glass beads. Of these, one workman can blow six thousand in a day, through a glass tube called a girasol. The ablette producing the pearl essence, is the Cyprinus Alburnus, called in English the Bleak. It is caught in almost all the large rivers of Europe; four thousand fish are necessary to obtain a pound of scales; while, for a pound of the pearl essence, from eighteen to twenty thousand are required. In the Chalonnois, the fisherman receive one guinea a pound for the washed scales, and the fish are afterwards sold at a cheap rate. At Mezel, in the same part of the country, ten thousand pearls are made daily; but a much larger quantity is manufactured at Rome, where the essence obtained from the scales of the bleak is applied externally to beads made of alabaster. The chief objection to these is their weight, and a disposition in the pearly surface to wear away from the stone. The Chinese have a method of incrusting beads with a similar substance, by inserting them into the shells of muscles; but Linnæus invented a mode of puncturing oysters and muscles, so as to facilitate the formation of real pearls.—Historical Traveller, Vol. II.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

American Wit.—The following is from the Intelligencer—on the marriage of Miss Pistol to Mr Gun, by the Reverend Mr Cannon:—

"Could Ovid dream the like of this,
In all his Metamorphoses?
It made me think of Paddy's fun,
To learn Miss Pistol's made a Gun:
But that which made me laugh the rather,
A Cannon was her Reverend father."

— A French gentleman, totally unacquainted with the English language, being introduced to a circle of ladies and gentlemen at Boston, after the usual compliments had passed, seated himself beside a beautiful young lady; and being deprived of the satisfaction of conversing with her (his countenance however expressed the emotions of his heart) he seized her by the hand. She requested him to be easy, which he mistook for the French word baisez (kiss me), and began kissing her, to the great mirth of the whole company. The consequence was, that the ladies came to the unanimous determination never to say "be easy" to a Frenchman.—American paper.

Reluctance to Save a Drowning Man.—"Are you mad?" said he, "you that have lived sae long in Fetland, to risk the saving of a drowning man? Wot ye not if you bring him to life again, he will be sure to do you some capital injury?"—It is remarkable, that in an archipelago where so many persons must necessarily be endangered by the waves, so strange and inhuman a maxim should have engrafted itself upon the minds of a people otherwise kind, moral, and hospitable. But all with whom I have spoken agree, that it was almost general in the beginning of the eighteenth century, and was with difficulty weeded out by the sedulous instructions of the clergy, and the rigorous injunctions of the proprietors. There is little doubt it had been originally introduced as an excuse for suffering those who attempted to escape from the wreck, to perish unassisted, so that, there being no survivor, she might be considered as lawful plunder. A story was told me, I hope an untrue one, that a vessel having got ashore among the breakers on one of the remote Fetland islands, five or six men, the whole or greater part of the unfortunate crew, endeavoured to land by assistance of a hawser, which they had secured to a rock; the inhabitants were assembled, and looked on with some uncertainty, till an old man said, "Sirs, if these men come ashore, the additional mouths will eat all the meal we have in store for winter; and how are we to get more?" A young fellow, moved with this argument, struck the rope asunder with his axe, and all the poor wretches were immersed among the breakers and perished.—Notes to the Pirate.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—La Pirata—A Divertissement—And Guillaume Tell.
Drury-Lane.—Alfred the Great—The Legion of Honour.
Covent Garden.—Asor and Zemira—And Neuha's Cave.

King's Theatre.

The opera of Il Pirata was repeated a second time on Saturday night, Signor and Madame Rubini performing the principal characters. Bellini the composer is a pupil in the Rossini school, and a very clever one; moreover, he is a young man, and, unless the fates forbid, he will do greater things hereafter. Rossini himself, in complimenting him upon this identical production, observed, that "he began where others finished." We can easily believe that auditors who are not critically judges, or are essentially musical without the power to follow the composer's design both in his harmonies and instrumentation, will find Il Pirata a dull opera; it certainly wants relief; the characters are all grave and distressed; the general run of the movements, therefore, is in minor keys, and it requires both a natural as well as a refined taste to appreciate well-wrought music in the minor mode. The musician, however, will find much matter for applause and gratification in this opera. The second movement in the overture is well worked, and not bearing the stamp of a young musician; the modulations and harmonies in the accompanied recitatives are natural, rich, and unvulgar. The air for the principal tenor at the close of the first scene has a charming cantabile character, and is well scored; and the concerted movement concluding the first act, is both various and masterly. In two or three instances, the choruses accompanying the principal singer sotto voce are written with good effect, and the opening chorus accompanying the description of the tempest is well conceived and ingenious. The conclusion, however, of the second act displays to most advantage the musician's power in pathetic composition. The distraction of the pirate's inamorata, and his own portraiture of his ill-fortune, are beautifully drawn and richly coloured. After all this praise, however, we must acknowledge that there are movements in the opera, which in their execution are totally at variance with the subject, or rather passion, intended to be conveyed. Triplets, for instance, seldom have a good effect, unless in conveying light and cheerful emotion, and the greatest composers have ever been the most sparing in the use of them; but an accompaniment of triplets to an expression of grief, or description of general calamity, is perfectly ludicrous; and this occurs in a chorus, if we recollect, in the 2nd act. Yet, if Signor Bellini entertains that respect for his art, of which he gives ample manifestation, we feel assured, that he has power to bring valuable assistance towards rescuing it from the hands of flippant and boisterous pretenders—the Paccinis, the Meyerbeers, and the Mercadantes.

Signor Rubini will become a great favourite with the town, and we think deservedly. He has a tenor of a full and sweet quality, and sings with considerable feeling, judicious expression, and uniformly in tune. (We speak upon a single hearing.) He makes too much use of his falsetto, which is pure and delicate; and what to our ears is disagreeable, he is redundant in ornament, particularly in the higher region of his voice. Moreover, he is prone to demand attention by abrupt transitions from his full, loud, and natural tones, to the most minute and piano breathings of his voce di testa, or falsetto; this, when frequently repeated, shows a poverty of mind unworthy of a good artist, and Rubini is one. He sings, however, like a musician, and always with certainty and firmness. The two solos allotted to him, and already referred to, he delivered with a delightfully pathetic expression; so much so indeed, as to produce a unanimous call for their repetition.

After the pretensions of other donne who have hitherto this season been appointed to fill the principal characters, Madame Rubini is heard to more than ordinary advantage. She sings well, also generally in tune, and is acquainted with her part. These qualifications are something at all events, after enduring the impertinent deficiency of Madame Vespermann in every one of the points enumerated.

Digitized by Google

We should describe her also to be a sensible singer, and one who can appreciate good composition. It is therefore to be regretted that her accomplishment of voice should not keep pace with her judgment. It is unequal; the lower tones are the best, and one or two of the upper are full and clear; but we feel that she wants sweetness, and ease in her execution of florid passages. Her sostenuto, when singing in concert, was frequently sweet and effective, and in short we may say gave us no displeasure, except when she—(we must use a strong word) vomitted forth that execrable run of semitones; which she repeated three times, and badly, in the course of one air. To venture upon a deformity, and to boggle at it, raises endurence in the listener into a virtue. After all our objections, we think Madame RUBINI did not receive the encouragement she deserved.

We cannot like the style of Signor SANTINI, or the quality of his voice; the former is crude, and the latter blaring and brassy. His action too is ungraceful: he walks like one crossing a furrowed field, and swings his right arm as if he had been accustomed to carry a seed-basket before him.

It is too late now to enter into a regular description of Madlle. TAGLIONI's perfect accomplishments. None of our readers who have been able to attend the opera can have failed to satisfy their curiosity in that particular. If any such remain, we charge them to give it quick and plenary indulgence. They will for the first time realise the perfect description of a dancer they read of in 'The Winter's Tale:'—

> "When you do dance, I wish you
> A wave of the Sea, that you might ever do
> Nothing but that; move still, still so, and own
> No other function: each your doing
> So singular in each particular,
> Crowns what you are doing in the present deeds,
> That all your acts are Queens."—

She claims not only the merit of performing more than the best have hitherto attempted, but her most difficult evolutions all appear to be effected with the placid ease of ordinary emotion. In the dance called the 'Tyrolienne,' that graceful, fawn-like bound, when advancing towards the spectators, has all the native freedom of the little creature itself tripping through a glade. C.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Fancit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra."

After which will be Exhibited, the New and Splendid DIORAMA, designed and painted by Mr STANFIELD.

The Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Ottavia, Miss Fancit. Maria Grazie, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge. Nicole, Mr Webster. Fabio, Mr Hughes.
Albert, Mr H. Wallack. Theodore, Mr J. Vining.
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr Wallack.
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford. Spoletto, Mr Bland.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; a Ballet; and The Legion of Honour.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Comedy, in Five Acts, called

THE EXQUISITES.

[By Don TRUEBA.]

Mrs Stockland, Mrs Gibbs. Harriet, Miss Nelson.
Lilian Evendale, Miss E. Tree. Kitty, Mrs Keeley.
Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble. Count Valmore, Mr G. Bennett.
Lord Belcourt, Mr Parry. Hon. Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott. Melton, Mr Wrench.
Gosling, Mr Keeley. Sir Benjamin Bonus, Mr Bartley.
Mr Stockland, Mr Egerton. Thornton, Mr Duruset.
Timothy Oldstyle, Mr Blanchard. Strut, Mr Power.

The Prologue to be spoken by Mr Abbott.

Previous to the Comedy, an Overture by Spohr.

Previous to the Comedy, a Grand Overture by Louis Spohr.

Before St Patrick's Day, a favourite Medley Overture, consisting of Irish Airs, by H. R. Bishop.

After which the Farce of

ST PATRICK'S DAY.

Mrs Bridget Credulous, Mrs Tayleure. Laurette, Miss Nelson.
Lieutenant O'Connor, Mr Power. Dr Rosy, Mr Bartley.
Justice Credulous, Mr Blanchard. Sergeant Trounce, Mr Baker.
Corporal Flint, Mr Turnour. John, Mr Heath.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON's Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr PEAKE.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.

Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ludwig Bompserts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Buntang, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Lockaley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; The Waterman.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

VALENTINE: OU, LA CHUTE DES FEUILLES.

Drame en Deux Actes, Mêlé de Chant, par MM. St HILAIRE et VILLENEUVE.
Valentine, Mme Albert. Mathilde de Leonits, Mlle. Jamain.
Marguerite, Mme. Préval. Georgette, Mlle. St Ange.
Alfred, M. Alfred. M. de Valhen, M. Cloup. Muller, M. St Aubert.
Ladwic, M. Gamard. Un Valet, M. Granville.

Suivi de la Seconde Représentation de

LA FIANCEE DU FLEUVE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, par MM. CHARLES et CARMOUCHE.
Nelly, Mme. Albert. Joana, Mme. Préval.
Arthur D'Hermilly, M. Alfred. Jobson, M. Laporte. Jacques, M. Guenée.

On Finira par

LE MARIAGE EXTRAVAGANT.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de DESAUGIER.
Betsy, Mme. Albert.
Le Docteur Verner, M. Cloup. Blinval, M. Pelissié. Dermancé, M. Laporte.
Simplet, M. Gamard.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.

In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.

'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BAR MAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gosson; Bean Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

After which a Drama, entitled

DAMON AND PYTHIAS.

Hermion, Miss M. C. Poole. Calanthe, Miss Scott. Phygenia, Miss Vincent.
Eudosia, Miss Somerville. Arria, Miss Rumens.
Rygcia, Madame Simon. Lyphrasia, Mrs Vale. Listea, Miss Nichol.
Damon, Mr Osbaldiston. Philistius, Mr Almar. Damocles, Mr Gough.
Procles, Mr Honner. Dionysius, Mr D. Pitt. Pythias, Mr C. Hill.
Lucullus, Mr Lee. Fabius, Mr Webb. Pellagus, Mr Young.
Arcas, Mr Hobbs. Melothon, Mr Edwin. Aranthon, Mr Ransford.

To conclude with a new Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Georgiana Dorio, Miss M. C. Poole, Babbla, Miss Vincent.
Arabella, Mlle. Rosier. Rosa, Miss Somerville.
Count di Dorio, Mr Gough. The Marquis Sapparino, Mr C. Hill.
Count Fernando, Mr Edwin. Sancho, Mr Vale.
Ladroni, Mr Rogers. Old Jeromo, Mr Webb.

A Pas Seul, by Mlle. Rosier, introducing the Brigand's Military Exercise.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houssa, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stobwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Clemenza di Tito;' Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Luke the Labourer—A day after the Wedding—Senor Valli—The Knight of Blood.

CITY VAUDEVILLE.—Maid's Stratagem — Irishman in London—William and Mary—The Lancers.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBER's Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre: and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Digitized by Google

No. 207.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1831.

THE CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.

Poor little chimney-sweepers! this is but sorry weather for your long-expected holiday. These continued plashings of disheartening rain, these dripping eaves, and these puddled streets and flowing gutters, are but ill calculated for your wonted display of garlanded heads, tinsel-covered garments, and merry, never-tiring gambols! The sun, which now and then peeps forth in all the "uncertain glory of an April day," seems as if, with unworthy emulation of your hard masters, it would tantalize and mock you with the hope of enjoyment never to be realized. Alas! why are the hopes of your only, your so rare recurring holiday, to be thus cruelly damped?

A friend of mine, whose kindness of heart is only equalled by his firmness of belief in the prevalence of good, maintains that chimney-sweepers are by no means the unhappy class of beings they are generally believed to be. Their tender years, and the peculiar nature of their occupation, interest every kind-natured being; and perhaps there is no poor child who has so many stranger-friends as the little chimney-sweeper. Many, certainly, surreptitious two-pences, and treats of tartlets, have fallen to his lot, rather than to the poor child of any other occupation; and most infallibly does he gain the kind glances, the compassionating words, and sympathising sighs (so invaluable to the poor and lowly) of any who shall see or hear him as he proceeds to his bitter early task—more especially if the pitying person be a reader of the beneficent and all-delightful Elia.

In corroboration of my friend's opinion, I recollect a circumstance which occurred to myself in the middle of last winter. Just as the first indistinct light of morning was beginning to break, I was awakened by a loud knocking at the door of the opposite house, accompanied by the plaintive cry of "Sweep! sweep!" so touchingly compared by the inimitable author above-mentioned, to the "Peep! peep! of a young sparrow." I arose, and went shivering to the window, to endeavour to ascertain the cause of the delay in opening the door. The street was perfectly quiet, no one passing, and no sign of stirring in the opposite house. The little object of my sympathy was patiently seated on a heap of stones which lay on one side of the road (the street was being paved) and was knocking them one upon the other as if playing with them, while he continued his appealing cry, now and then looking up at the house, to see whether it produced the desired effect of awakening the drowsy servant.

Upon my throwing out a small sum to the poor little fellow, he picked it up, unrolled it from the paper in which I had wrapped it, placed it in his pocket, looked up at my window in astonishment, and then quietly went and resumed his seat and amusement on the heap of stones.

Upon a gentleman's expressing his wonder to one of these little fellows, that he should have chosen such an employment (for he had told him that it was his own choice) and asking him whether he really liked climbing chimneys, the boy answered, that he certainly "did not like that much."

"Then why did you choose such a dirty occupation?" urged the gentleman.

"I thought that it would be so very pleasant to dance on a May-day!"

"And did you like it?"

"I was apprenticed, and master would not let me go out."

I had once the honour of hearing from the lips of one of the finest feelers and writers of his age, the following pathetic tale, which I only trust I may not spoil by repeating. He said that his father (who had told him the story) never related it without tears in his eyes.

A poor woman had apprenticed her little son to a master-chimney-sweeper for fourteen years. A short time after, when she came to see the boy, she wept bitterly, and complained of the immense length of time that he was to be away. "Never mind, mammy, don't cry," said the boy, "fourteen days of it's gone a'ready!"

M. V. C.

May 2, 1831.

PAGANINI.

Nicolo Paganini was born in Genoa, in February 1784. At an unusually early age he began to give strong indications of musical talent, and in his eighth year, under the superintendence of his father, he wrote a sonata; and as he played about three times a week in public, upon a fiddle nearly as large as himself, he soon became known among his townsmen. In his ninth year he appeared at the great theatre at Genoa, and played the French air, 'La Carmagnole,' with his own variations. He was shortly after introduced to the celebrated Paer, who enabled him to procure instructions in counterpoint, and otherwise interested himself in promoting his views. At the age of fifteen, young Paganini sought to emancipate himself from the control of his father, who appears, from mercenary motives, to have hawked him about the principal towns of Italy, rewarding him with spare diet and severe discipline. He accordingly contrived to commence vagabondizing on his own account, encouraged by his success as a solo player at a great musical festival held at Lucca. He soon amassed about 20,000 francs, part of which he proposed to devote to his parents; his father, however, having threatened him with instant death unless he agreed to assign to him nearly the whole, he thought it prudent to comply. His career was most prosperous. "Wherever he went his fame preceded his approach, and the multitudes poured in to hear him in streams," as if he had been a worker of miracles. At Rome the Pope conferred on him the order of the Speron d'Oro. Paganini was not inflated with his honours, nor slow to admit the merits of brother artists; but he loved to triumph over professed rivals. Lafont, the Parisian violinist, challenged him to join in a concert at Milan;—the result is thus described:—

'At the rehearsal the wary Italian manœuvred in such a way that his adversary must have been quite unprepared for the discomfiture which awaited him, and very probably might have been misled to anticipate an opposite result. The hour of the concert arrived, and the public were breathless with anxiety to witness the contest of the rival masters. Lafont played first. His fine tone and his graceful and elegant performance, as might be supposed, drew down much applause. Next came Paganini; but now it was not merely the purity of the intonation, the beauty of the style, the neatness and distinctness of the execution. A more powerful enchanter waved the magic wand, and it seemed to those present as if the soul of melody itself stood before them, confessed in all her charms, her grace and tenderness, her grandeur and sublimity. Besides the superiority of his adagio playing, Paganini was determined, in feats of execution, completely to outstrip his antagonist. The same passages, accordingly, which the latter had performed in single stops, he executed in double; rapid successions which the one had achieved in double ordinary sounds, the other produced in the most perfect manner in double harmonic sounds: where the one had accompanied his melody with chords, the other superadded to the chords the most rapid and distinct pizzicatos with the left hand: where Lafont had astonished his audience with his octaves and tenths, Paganini amazed them still more by stretching with the same ease and certainty fourteenths and sixteenths. Having now routed the foe at all points, he had amply made good his title to be proclaimed the victor.'

Paganini, in a most unusual degree, seems to have been the subject of calumny, and has had to sustain the reproach of being a brigand, and even the assassin of his own mistress, and all without the least foundation.

'In reality, a person of the gentlest and most inoffensive habits, he is anything rather than the desperate ruffian he has been described. In his demeanour he is modest and unassuming, in his disposition liberal and generous to a fault. Like most artists, ardent and enthusiastic in his temperament, and in his actions very much a creature of impulse; he is full of all that unaffected simplicity which we almost invariably find associated with true genius. He has an only son, by a Signora Antonia Bianchi, a singer from Palermo, with whom he lived for several years until the summer of 1828, when he was under the necessity of separating from her in consequence of the extreme violence of her temper, and in this little boy all his affections are concentrated. He is a very precocious child, and already indicates strong signs of musical talent.

Digitized by Google

Being of a delicate frame of health, Paganini never can bear to trust him out of his sight. "If I were to lose him," says he, "I would be lost myself; it is quite impossible that ever I can separate myself from him; when I awake in the night, he is my first thought." Accordingly, ever since he parted from his mother, he has himself enacted the part of the child's nurse; and that our readers may form some idea of the manner in which he acquits himself in this new capacity, and of the character of the young Paganini, we shall here insert a description with which we are furnished by a friend of his who happened to call upon him at his lodgings at Prague, in 1828, in order to take him out to dinner. We may mention that the youth goes by the classic cognomen of Achilles Lyrus Alexander.

'"Everything was lying in its usual disorder; here one violin, there another, one snuff-box on the bed, another under one of the boy's play-things. Music, money, caps, letters, watches, and boots were scattered about in the utmost confusion. The chairs, tables, and even the bed, had all been removed from their proper places. In the midst of the chaos sat Paganini, his black silk nightcap covering his still blacker hair, a yellow handkerchief carelessly tied round his neck, and a chocolate-coloured jacket hanging loose upon his shoulders. On his knees he held Achillino, his little son of four years of age, at that time in very bad humour, because he had to allow his hands to be washed.

'"His affectionate forbearance is truly extraordinary. Let the boy be ever so troublesome, he never gets angry, but merely turns round and observes to those present, "The poor child is wearied, I do not know what I shall do, I am already quite worn out with playing with him. I have been fighting with him all the morning, I have carried him about, made him chocolate, I do not know what more to do." It was enough to make one die of laughing, to see Paganini in his slippers fighting with his little son, who reached to about his knee; sometimes the little Achillino would get into a rage, draw his sabre upon his father, who would retreat into the corner of the room, and call out, "Enough, enough! I am wounded aleady;" but the little fellow would never leave off until he had had his gigantic adversary tottering and prostrate on the bed.

'"Paganini had now finished the dressing of his Achillino, but was himself still in sad dishabille. And now arose the great difficulty, how to accomplish his own toilette; where to find his neckcloth, his boots, his coat. All were hid, and by whom? by Achillino. The urchin laughed when he saw his father pacing with long strides through the apartment, his searching looks glancing in all directions. And upon his asking where he had put his things, the little wag pretended astonishment, and held his tongue, shrugged up his shoulders, shook his head, and signified by his gestures that he knew nothing about them. After a long search, the boots were found; they were hid under the trunk; the handkerchief lay in one of the boots; the coat in the box; and the waistcoat in the drawer of the table. Every time that Paganini had found one of his things, he drew it out in triumph, took a great pinch of snuff, and went with new zeal to search for the remaining articles, always followed by the little fellow, who enjoyed it vastly when he saw his papa searching in places where he knew nothing was hid. At last we went out, and Paganini shut the door of the apartment, leaving behind him, lying about on the tables and in the cupboards, rings, watches, gold, and, what I most wondered at, his most precious violins. Any idea of the insecurity of his property never entered his head; and, fortunately for him, in the lodgings which he occupied the people were honest."

'We must not omit the remainder of the scene:—

'"The day being cold, Paganini had put on a monstrous cloak. And as he was afraid that Achillino might catch cold, he took him up in his arms, and carefully lapped him over and over with it. The little one, who wanted to breathe more freely, soon poked his head out,—it was like a fine spring day in the arms of winter."

'In the discharge of his filial duties, Paganini has always shown himself to be quite as exemplary as in that of his parental. The wealth which he has amassed has been partly applied to provide for the comforts of his aged mother, and not unfrequently dispensed in acts of bounty towards his more necessitous relations and friends. Having now traversed Germany,—Paris and London will complete his professional tour, after which he intends to revisit his native city, and to see his mother once more.'

Abridged from No. XIV of the Foreign Quarterly Review.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

PAVING OF MODERN CITIES.

Paris was the first of our modern cities to be enriched with a pavement. * * * * The French capital was paved by command of Phillip II, and orders were issued for that purpose, by government, in 1184, upon which occasion the name of the city was changed from Lutetia to that of Paris. Dijon, at that time the capital of Burgundy, is known to have been paved in 1391, by Philip the Bold. * * * * In the year of 1090, when the church of St Mary-le-Bow, in Cheapside, was unroofed by a violent storm, four beams or pillars, twenty-six feet in length, sunk so deep into the ground, that only four feet were visible above the surface. "At that time," says Howel, "the streets of London consisted of soft earth." Holborn was paved by the royal command in 1417, and the great market of Smithfield in 1614. * * * * Berlin was only very partially adorned with pavement till the close of the seventeenth century. At Spandau, in 1357, the skinners were obliged by law to sweep the market-place; and in Hamburgh, the cleansing of the muddy streets was assigned to the Jews. At the present day, the pavement of the city of London is unquestionably the finest in the world; after which, but without the useful appendage of flagstones for foot passengers, may be reckoned that of Vienna, which is formed of beautiful Silesian granite. The streets of several cities in Holland are also admirably neat and well arranged.—Historical Traveller, Vol. II.

A MAN RISEN FROM THE TOMB.

Among the many histories of escapes, or endeavours to escape from a violent death, during the reign of terror, which have been recorded by different authors, are several of a character so dramatic, as to be almost self-adapted for the stage. The following, taken from Legowe's, "Le Merite des Femmes," might easily be moulded into dramatic form;—if, indeed, it has not already been done. It is the story of a young Frenchman saved by the niece of a Sacristan of Brussels. After the battle of Fleurus, when the troops re-entered Belgium, afraid of being taken in Brussels, the young man took to flight, but was stopped by a young girl who was sitting at her door, and who, prompted by the interest inspired by misfortune, said to him—"If you go on, you are lost."—"So I am if I return."—"Well, then you had better come in here." He accepted her offer. Having told him that she was in the house of her uncle, who would not allow her to protect him, she led him into a barn, where he concealed himself. At the approach of night, several soldiers went into the barn to rest. The niece followed them, unperceived, and took advantage of their sleep to lead the fugitive from his dangerous hiding-place. As he passed, one of the soldiers woke, and seized his hand. The niece immediately sprung to them, crying aloud, "Leave me alone!—Don't you know me?" The soldier, deceived by the female voice, released his captive, who immediately followed his kind guide to her chamber, where she provided herself with a light and the keys of the church. They entered the church; behind the altar was a trap very artfully concealed, which the girl raised, saying, "You see this dark staircase, it leads to a vault in which repose the remains of an illustrious family. No one will be likely to discover you here. You must have the courage to remain by yourself till a favourable opportunity occurs for your escape." The Frenchman did not hesitate; he descended with the utmost confidence; but what was his surprise on beholding by the light of the lamp, an escutcheon emblazoned with the arms of his family, suspended on the walls of the vault! He recognised the tomb of his ancestors who had formerly been settled in this part of the country. He was left alone. The hope of escaping, to rejoin his beloved wife, for a time softened the horror of his situation, but two days passed away, and his preserver did not appear. He knew not what to fear; sometimes he thought she had forgotten him; sometimes, that she had fallen a victim to her generosity. Extreme hunger added to his misery, and he trembled at the prospect of a death more terrible than that from which he had escaped. His strength at last failed, and he fell senseless on one of the surrounding coffins. Sometime after, he revived, he fancied he heard a slight noise; he listened;—it was the voice of his compassionate friend. Overcome with joy and weakness, he was unable to answer. She thought him dead, and dropped the trap in despair. The unfortunate captive, with one desperate effort, forced a shout. She heard, and hastened to him. She gave him food, explained the cause of her absence, and assured him that she had taken precautions to prevent its recurrence. She was about to leave him, when the clash of arms struck her ear; and she hastily turned back into the vault, taking care not to make the slightest noise. The Sacristan, who had been accused of concealing a fugitive in the church, and who was ignorant of the imprudence of his niece, had conducted the soldiers there, to convince them of his innocence. They searched every where; they even trod on the fatal trap. What a dreadful moment for the captives! Every step found an echo in their hearts, and their last moments seemed rapidly approaching. Gradually the sounds died away. The young girl ventured into the church; she looked fearfully around; it was entirely empty: she returned to the vault to set the mind of her entombed friend at ease, and then retired. Our poor captive remained long in his subterranean abode, daily supplied with food by his attentive friend. A moment of tranquillity at last arrived; she carried the news to her prisoner; he bade adieu to the tomb of his ancestors in which he had so long remained concealed; and, gaining his home in safety, felt doubly grateful to his generous deliverer, as he clasped to his heart his beloved and happy wife.

ANECDOTES OF THE FIRST FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Innumerable instances have been recorded of the courage and constancy of women, in aiding the escape, or concealing the retreat of the condemned, during the reign of terror. Nor was it love or friendship alone that actuated them, but as if their generous and kindly feelings gained strength by the contemplation of unceasing horrors, they, in many instances, risked and forfeited their lives, by assisting total strangers, who had no other claims upon them, than the common claims of humanity. Among many records of this kind, collected by M. Legouve, in his little work entitled "La Merite des Femmes," we find one of a Madame Ruvilly, residing in Brest. A man, eighty years of age, utterly unknown to her, entered her house to beg for refuge. Aware of the danger she incurred, Madame

Digitized by Google

Ruvilly granted it, without a moment's hesitation. After remaining two days, the old man proposed to depart, and went to take leave of his generous hostess. She expressed surprise at his leaving her, while he was yet in danger; but he told her that he was a priest, more especially liable by his profession, to persecution, and that he feared a longer stay might involve her in his ruin. "Whither do you intend to go?" enquired the lady. "Heaven knows!" replied her visitor. "What!" cried she, "you have no place of refuge, yet think that I will suffer you to leave me!—For heaven's sake, remain here, till the times become more tranquil." The old man, however, persisted in his purpose, and took his leave. Madame Desmarets was present at this scene between her sister and the old priest; she faithfully kept the secret; but this act of generous hospitality was soon discovered, and both the sisters suffered execution in consequence of it. The one for having received and concealed in her house, a condemned person; the other, for not having denounced her.—Madame Paysac not only granted hospitality to one of the proscribed, but voluntarily offered it. Rabaud de St Etienne was invited to her house. He refused the asylum offered him, on account of the danger she would incur by his acceptance of it; but she persisted. He yielded. He was soon after discovered in her house, and she followed him to execution with the same courage with which she had risked her danger. There are many instances which exhibit a more heroic courage, zealous exertion, and completeness of self-devotion, but these are mostly cases in which love or friendship rendered sacrifice comparatively easy, and in which excitement was kept up by action. They do not, therefore, appear so extraordinary, upon reflection, as the voluntary incurring of danger for a person unknown, and awaiting the result to both in helpless inactivity. A story is told of a young man whose weak health occasioned him to be transferred from the prison to the hospital, and as it seems, merely to preserve him for a violent death, he was committed to the charge of a young man, named Teresa. He was young, handsome, and amiable. The tale of his misfortunes interested his young nurse. Like Desdemona, she gave her heart to one who had suffered so many "hair-breadth 'scapes;" and she resolved to add one to the number. Having told him her plan, she bade him feign violent convulsions and death. The young man obeyed the instructions given him; Sister Teresa, according to custom, extended the sheet over his head, and when the physician paid his usual visit, told him the sick man had just expired. In the evening Teresa, knowing that the body would be claimed by the pupils, had it conveyed to the dissecting-room. When there, the pretended corpse was dressed in the clothes of a surgeon who was in the secret, and, by means of this disguise, he escaped without remark. The trick was not discovered till the next day. Teresa was questioned. She answered with unhesitating truth; and, in consideration of this frankness, was spared. She had inspired him whom she had saved with a sentiment as lively as she herself felt. He persuaded her to visit him in the asylum to which he had flown, and throwing himself at her feet, he entreated her to bless the life she had preserved, by becoming his wife. It will not be supposed that she refused him. She became happy herself by conferring happiness on him. They fled to Spain, and were married.

'THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE.—This personage, who has played so conspicuous a part in the affairs of Poland, is worthy of something more than a mere passing notice. Though possessed of very considerable talents, he is, in fact, an untamed tiger, giving way on all occasions to the most violent paroxysms of temper. He has a deep sense of the rights of his order, and holds the feelings of every other class of human beings as absolutely nought. So soon therefore, as he found that his imperial brother was no longer the liberal patron of constitutional rights, he gave the most unrestrained licence to his capricious and violent injustice. A few instances are better than general assertion:—A most opulent and respectable man named Woloski, the principle brewer of Warsaw, had, through some of his people, without his own knowledge, hired as a servant in his establishment a Russian deserter. The offender was detected, and proof of innocence on the part of his employer being disallowed, the grand Duke, by his individual decree, ordered this respectable individual to be fettered, and in that condition he was compelled to work with a wheelbarrow in the public streets! His daughter, an amiable young lady, ventured to appeal to the mercy of the Grand Duke in behalf of her parent, and the unmanly monster kicked her down stairs, using at the same time the most abusive language.——A boy of nine years of age, a son of Count Plater, had in the playfulness of childhood written in chalk on one of the forms, "The 3rd of May for ever," that being the anniversary of Kosciusko's constitution. The fact was discovered by some of the innumerable spies, employed even among these infants, to Nowozilzoff, who instituted an enquiry among the boys,—not one would betray poor Plater: they were all ordered to be flogged with the utmost severity. The unhappy offender declared that he had written the offensive words. The Grand Duke condemned him to be a soldier for life, incapable of advancement in the army; and when his mother threw herself before his carriage to implore forgiveness for her wretched child, he spurned her like a dog with his foot.

'Every one possessed of the means naturally fled from such unheard of tyranny, and among others, a highly accomplished man, who sought refuge in London. Constantine sent emissaries, in the foolish belief that he could carry him off. The emissary soon discovered the folly of his errand, and returned to the great chagrin of his master.

'Shaving the heads of ladies of rank who displeased him, was a common occurrence; and, on one occasion, four soldiers were hanged because they abstained from carrying such an order into effect, as they found it impossible to do so without using personal violence. Tarring and feathering the shaved heads of the offenders was also a favourite recreation of the commander-in-chief.'—The New Periodical, called The Metropolitan.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—The Brigand.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Exquisites—St Patrick's Day—And Neuha's Cave.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE space we devoted to the plot and merits of the new Comedy of The Exquisites prevented us from doing justice to the exertions of the performers. The managers, with commendable attention to the enjoyment of the audience, with which indeed their own interests are inseparable, assigned the characters to suitable actors, and, in consequence, although none of them are very strongly marked, the ability of the acting saved their second-rate quality from sinking into insignificance. Mr Stockland, the citizen, who, under the influence of a vain and foolish wife, becomes a resident in Portland Place, and an emulator of the follies of fashion, was creditably performed by Mr EGERTON, an actor of judgment in his particular department and always attentive to the requirements of the parts allotted to him. Mrs GIBBS in Mrs Stockland, gave a faithful portraiture of a vulgar-minded woman, without principle; her head turned by show and fineries she had not been accustomed to. Mr ABBOTT, whose lot it is, too often, to personate characters for which he has not a single natural qualification, and whose destination to the stage one may fairly attribute more to inclination than particular genius, shews occasionally how good sense and diligence can triumph over apparent obstacles, by playing, with an ability which secures praise, characters not considered generally within his sphere. The part of Cecil is one of these; an Exquisite of the true languishing sort, too much of whom would soon become an exemplification of his own most expressive phrase,—"a horrid bore." In the scene where he is dislodged from the bonnet-basket, his fanning himself with the bonnet, and proper adjustment of his hair before the looking-glass, were excellently in keeping with the character. Mr KEELEY, in the country Exquisite, displayed his usual aptness and broad humour; and in the spirited scene in which Lord Castleton (Mr C. KEMBLE) instructs him in Exquisitism, with a skill and delicacy which no other actor could equal, the pleasure of the audience was the united triumph of the author and the actors. The valet Exquisite of Mr POWER is but a slight part, the actor made the most of it. The same may be said of Mr BARTLEY's Alderman Bonus, and Mrs KEELEY's Kitty. The latter is an actress from a good school, that of Miss KELLY, and it is always a pleasure to praise her. Miss ELLEN TREE is a good representative of feminine distress, whether, as in Hide and Seek, it have a ludicrous aspect towards the audience, or altogether a serious one, as in the present comedy. For an evening passed agreeably we incurred a debt of acknowledgment, and are happy in having an occasion to pay it.

DRURY LANE.

Every Play-goer knows how much of his pleasure depends on the actors, for let the play be as excellent as genius can make it, if its representation be intrusted to incompetent performers, its natural effects are at once neutralised, and dissatisfaction is produced instead of enjoyment. This is more particularly the case with new pieces; and accordingly we find that managers are careful on first bringing out a piece, to put into it as much strength as they can muster; although afterwards (as in the Brigand) when the public attention is less awake, they sometimes relax in their endeavour to please.

The following paragraph from the Englishman's Magazine is illustrative of the point in question:

"WALLACK, the melo-dramatic actor, was cast for the part of Oscyth, in Mr KNOWLES' play of Alfred, of which we have given a review on its independent merits. From a fit of histrionic jealousy or spleen, he declined to play it, and his example was followed by all of name or note in Drury, with the exception of Cooper, who, much to his credit, proposed an exchange of parts. This, however, did not satisfy 'King Bolingbroke;' and the character, for lack of a better representative, was finally transferred to Mr H. Wallack. Osmyth is the lover of the piece, and much of the business devolves upon him. By the perverseness of one performer, not only is the success of a drama, which may have cost a man of genius the labour of many months, endangered, but the public are treated with gross disrespect in having an incompetent person put forward in the room of him who is capable.'

Digitized by Google

We have little to add to this. As it happened Mr Wallack was not greatly missed; for his brother exerted himself with more success than might have been expected; and the spirited acting of Macready, Cooper, and Miss Phillips left little to be desired.

F. F.

French Plays.—It appears that the Haymarket was originally appropriated to the performance of French plays. The first theatre was erected in 1720, by a builder named Potter, whose object was to let the house to companies of foreign performers, which at that period were much encouraged by the nobility. The opening of the house was thus announced in a daily paper of December 15, 1720:—"At the New Theatre in the Haymarket, between Little Suffolk street and James street, which is now completely finished, will be performed a French comedy, as soon as the rest of the actors arrive from Paris." The house opened with a French comedy, called 'La Fille à la Morte; ou Badeaut de Paris:' the company performing under the designation of "the French Comedians of his Grace the Duke of Montaigne."

A Real Jew.—Promenading the streets of Amsterdam, I was accosted by one of those travelling nuisances which infest that city under the habit of a Jew, who pressed me to purchase some of his ware. "Here is some very scharming shuelry," said he, "vich you vant to carry to your vife,"—"No," replied I, "I have no wife, nor do I wish for any of your jewels."—"But, surely, my dear Shur, you will buy this very fine timond ring; it is but forty keelders [40 guilders—16 dollars] vich is very cheap intead for it."—"Dat is vat I can shware to," said another Ishmaelite coming up at this moment; "I vould keeve tirty-nine to trade upon myself."—"But I do not want it," said I with warmth; "leave me!"—"But vat vill you keeve me for it?" continued the former, seizing me by the coat as I was going. "Twenty stivers" [20 cents] I answered, to get rid of him. "You shall have it," returned the Jew, and shaved me after all!—American paper.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

IL PIRATA.

[By Bellini.]

Imogene, wife of Ernest, formerly beloved by Gualtiero . . Signora Rubini.
Adele, an attendant to Imogene . Madame Castelli.
Ernest, Duke of Caldora, a partisan of the House of Angio Signor Santini.
Gualtiero, Count of Montalto, and partisan of King Manfredi . . . . Sig. Rubini.
Stulbo, companion of Gualtiero . Signor Deville.
Goffredo, formerly tutor to Gualtiero, and then a hermit . . Sig. De Angeli.

After which, a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA NAYADE.

Principal Characters, Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, and Mlle. Brocard.
M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr Knowles.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.
Priest, Mr Dowsing. Boy, Master Fenton.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); Rossini's Overture to 'Il Turco in Italia;' and A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles.'

After which, a New

DIVERTISSEMENT.

[By M. Simon.]

The principal Dancers by Mlle. Rosalia Guet, Miss Barnett, Miss Baseke, Misses Ballin, Lane, M'Henry, Lydia. Mesdames Gear, Vallancey, Webster, Griffiths, Claire, A. Jones, Willmott, E. Jones, &c.
Messrs. Wieland, Chikini, Baker, &c. &c.

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr Planché.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; and Masaniello.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr Sheridan.]

Lady Teazle, Miss Fanny Kemble. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Vining.
Mrs Candour, Mrs Gibbs. Maria, Miss Taylor.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr Bartley. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr F. Matthews.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr Wrench. Crabtree, Mr Blanchard.
Charles Surface, Mr C. Kemble. Joseph Surface, Mr Warde.
Careless, Mr Durusset. Rowley, Mr Evans. Moses, Mr Farley.
Trip, Mr Parry. Sir Harry, Mr Wilson.

In the course of the Evening, Miss Inverarity will sing 'Should he upbraid,' and the Duet of 'When thy bosom,' with Mr Braham.

After which the Musical Entertainment of

THE WATERMAN.

[By Mr Dibdin.]

Tom Tug, Mr Braham, in which he will introduce 'The Bay of Biscay O.'

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; Hide and Seek; and Teddy the Tiler.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. Poole. Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott. Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Florence, Mr D. Pitt. Gonsalvo, Mr Gough.
Falsetto, Mr Honner. Giraldi Fazio, Mr Osbaldiston. Bartolo, Mr Williams.
Philario, Mr Almar. Antonio, Mr Young. Theodore, Mr Webb.
Piero, Mr Lee. Gentleman, Mr Tully. Keeper, Mr Hobbs.

The Highland Fling, by Mlle. Rosier.

After which, a Dramatic Romance, in Two Acts, called

THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS.

Helena di Rosalvi, Miss M. C Poole. Claudine, Miss Jordan.
Jacinthe, Miss Rumens. Rosa, Miss Nicol. Genevieve, Miss Vincent.
Felix, Mr Osbaldiston. Rosalvi, Mr D. Pitt. Jeronymo, Mr Young.
Marco, Mr Lee. Florio di Rosalvi, Miss Ellis. Baptista, Mr Webb.
Julio di Rosalvi, Master F. Carbery. Juan, Mr Tully.
Pietro, Mr Collier. Fabricio, Mr Fone.

To conclude with an Historical Musical Drama, entitled

THE BEGGAR OF CRIPPLEGATE.

Marian, Miss Somerville, in which she will introduce, 'Tell me my heart.'
Millicent, Miss Vincent. Mother Milldoll, Mrs Rogers. Alison, Miss Perry.
Annot, Miss Nicol. Kate, Miss Rumens.
King Henry VIII, Mr D. Pitt. Sir Piers Maltravers, Mr Almar.
Vincent Lorimer, Mr Honor. Godfrey Osgood, Mr Gough.
The Beggar of Cripplegate, Mr C. Hill. Barnaby, Mr Williams.
Cocke Lorell, Mr Vale. Father Ignatius, Mr Ransford. Fabian, Mr Asbury.
Valentine, Mr Rogers. Wynkin Cross-eye, Mr Webb. Ambrose, Mr Young.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'Farren.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr Raymond.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr Haines.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Grasiot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Hussah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mouss, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Clemenza di Tito;' Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.

Sadler's Wells.—Luke the Labourer—A Day after the Wedding—Senor Valli—The Knight of Blood.

City Vaudeville.—The Bee Hive—Maid's Stratagem—Two Gregories—New Ballet.

New City Subscription Theatre.—The Bold Dragoons—The Waterman—The Young Widow—Quadrupeds.

Royal Panarmonion Theatre.—Jew of Cadiz—Love in Arcadia—Mrs P.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 163 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Eber's Library, Old Bond street; W. Kennath, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

No. 208.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1831.

ANOMYMOUS CRITICISM.

[It is proper to observe, that the following dialogue was written a few years ago, at a time when our periodical literature was disgraced by the personality and virulence in which some influential journals indulged. Since then the evil has been greatly abated; but believing that it can never be entirely cured while the system out of which it grows is tolerated, the objections originally made have not been qualified. They pretend to no originality, and are confessedly imperfect; but it should be recollected that abuses at last give way, less to any novelty in the mode of attack than to the reiteration of blows on vulnerable parts from the quarters of fresh assailants. As the dialogue is left unfinished, the good-natured reader may infer, if he pleases, that its deficiences would have been supplied if it had been completed.]

A. We were interrupted lately in our conversation on the subject of anonymous criticism. I confess that reflection has brought me nearer to your opinion; and when I remember how many instances of manifest partiality and injustice have occurred, I am inclined to acknowledge that periodical criticism, as at present conducted, is an evil rather than a benefit to literature.

B. If articles of the kind you allude to were rare, I should object to your conclusion, as too sweeping and undiscriminating; but unhappily they are not accidental, but form part, and a main part too, of the system by which much of our periodical criticism is governed, and by which the journal we have been speaking of is particularly distinguished. That being the case, I avow that I have long been of opinion that anonymous criticism is a serious and crying evil, which ought by all means to be discountenanced. But independently of flagrant instances of injustice, it is by no means clear that the journals in question are so superabundant in merit as to deserve unqualified patronage. It is in their very nature to mislead. Importance is often attached to an opinion when it is supposed to be that of a body of learned men, numbering among them unquestionably a few of superior minds, which importance it would never obtain if the name of the writer were affixed to the article. It is true, men ought not to be governed by names, but it is equally true that they are so governed; and until they are better taught, they may suppose they have got the opinion of an able and honest man, when, perhaps, they have only that of some malignant slanderer, the publication of whose name might render his censure acceptable, or his praise valueless.

A. I admit there is some weight in your objections; yet, as their want of impartiality is felt to be their chief defect, that defect supplied, I should regret their total extinction.

B. Doubtless their chief defect is gross partiality—general subserviency to sinister and party purposes; but it is a defect not removable, it is inherent in the system. Lessened, it may be occasionally, but never will it be removed, while men have an object to attain in detracting from the merit of their rivals or contemporaries, and while they can shield themselves from the just vengeance of those they injure by entrenching themselves behind a masked battery. Let critics be no longer anonymous, and you get rid of the evil at once. Prudence and the fear of shame will do that which may be expected in vain from an abstract sense of justice. The midnight assassin braves the chances of detection by the hired retainers of the police, but hides himself instinctively at the approach of daylight.

A. But suppose our literary critics were, as you propose, to avow their names, and be willing to incur the responsibility of their writings, would not they be exposed to the annoyance of every self-conceited scribbler who might think an exposure of his imbecility a sufficient warrant to retaliate on the person of the critic a lashing of another but equally unpleasant kind?

B. The objection is almost groundless. Such an instance could rarely or never occur. When it did, I suspect the criticism, on examination, would be found to have wandered beyond its proper limits.

A. May be so; but what more difficult to avoid? Who shall define the limits of just criticism; mete out the proper degree of censure to each particular offence, and select the terms most fitting to be its medium? Reluctantly, I confess that I see in the avowal of names a tendency to give to our criticism a timid and feeble tone; too timid to dare the exposure of the strong and unprincipled, too feeble to sustain the assaults which even its gentle reproofs might provoke. We have already too much feeble criticism.

B. Granted; how then shall we strengthen it? Assuredly not by a mask. That may hide its weakness, but certainly cannot promote its strength. That may make the weak pass for the strong, and must be continually misleading, in some way or other. If an inferior critic's opinion be mistaken for that of a superior, it will obtain more consideration than it ought; if the opinion of a superior critic be unrecognised as his, it will be attributed variously, and in that case, by being confounded with feebler pens, will lose something of its legitimate influence. Suppose, for instance, Mr Southey and Mr —— should be contributors to the same review, and I, a reader, be unable to distinguish their respective styles. An article may be before me in which some facts are stated for which I have no better voucher than the critic's authority. If I believe the article to be written by Mr Southey, whatever I may think of his inconsistency as a politician, having unlimited confidence in his veracity, believing him to be utterly incapable of stating wilfully a falsehood, I should give implicit credit to any fact he might state, founded on his own knowledge, even though that fact should be to the prejudice of another. But if, on the other hand, I should for some reason suppose that the fact stated rests on the authority of a former contributor to ——, one who had interpolated a passage from a popular work, and then cited it as a correct quotation; one who had seriously asserted falsehoods with respect to private character, and when called upon for explanation, kept himself in the dark, denied the obvious meaning of his scandal, or pretended that he put forth his poison in jest;—if I believed the article to be written by such a character, I should treat the fact stated as a fiction, most likely invented, agreeably to the habits of the writer, to gratify private malice. No, let our critics stand forth in their proper characters, with no object but truth, with no pretensions but such as their acquirements and talents can justify, and they may safely challenge the approbation of all whose approbation is worth their reception, and they may and will hold in merited contempt the croakings and upbraidings of the foolishly discontented. Besides, let us not forget that criticism is subject to laws, and although those laws have received various modifications, yet are there certain general principles universally admitted. An enlightened critic never loses sight of these; a just one frames his criticisms upon them. If the critic then be enlightened, and moreover possessed of an upright mind, there need be no fear that his strictures will evince either timidity or feebleness. A clear conviction of the justness of his censures or his praises will ensure a correspondent firmness in their delivery; for men are timid, not so frequently from their necessarily uncertain estimate of the strength to which they may be opposed, as from an inward consciousness of their personal insufficiency. Confident men are bold. Indeed the boldness of the personal attacks which so often disgrace our modern critics, is the result of confidence, with this disadvantage, that the anonymous critic derives his confidence from the fact of his being concealed, while that of the known and genuine critic is founded on the unimpeachable correctness of the propositions he advances.

* * * *

F. F.

JUVENILE THEATRICALS.

TO THE TATLER.

Sir,—The pleasure of seeing registered in print some pleasant school recollections, makes me willing to hazard the infliction upon your readers of a juvenile prologue, written for a school drama. The plot of the piece itself for which it was written, is clean gone from my memory. If indeed

> "Plot it might be called that plot had none, > Distinguishable in chorus, act, or scene."

Nor is its name even upon record, though I think it to have been decidedly allied to the 'Montalto' or 'Otranto' family. What I recollect with most vivacity respecting it is, that it formed an extremely curious combination of the first scene in 'Romeo and Juliet' and 'Obi, or Three-fingered Jack.' The author and hero of the performance underwent a series of perplexities during its representation, arising partly from the zealous candour of his prologist, who, as the reader will perceive, had tenderly hinted at certain plagiarisms in the dialogue: and chiefly from his own intemperate ambition to impress his juniors with an idea of his tragic powers. He was a strapping fellow, and the eldest in the school. Never shall I forget the prodigality of suffering which attended his dying scene. He made a spring into the arms of death as though he had been leaping a ditch; and not having practised that branch of histrionic science, he "fell with such hideous ruin and combustion down," that, like the Arch-fiend, he lay weltering with pain—and no wonder, "falling such a pernicious height." Lord! how we laughed! To complete my satanic simile, it was his luck to lie immediately under a lamp which dropped liquid fire upon his face. The Promethean heat reanimating his lifeless clay, he walked off amid the congratulations of the spectators.

Digitized by Google

PROLOGUE

TO A SCHOOL PLAY.

In times of yore, when our first Edward reign'd,
(Edward, whose brows by Patriot blood were stain'd)
In times of yore, when learning in our isle
Dared not assume her present winning smile;
When dark-eyed Superstition's icy hand
Benumb'd th' aspiring Genius of the land;
The British Drama first began its course:—
Weak in its onset, feeble as the source
Of great Maragnon, whose gigantic wave
Rolls on (by thousand rills enhanc'd) to lave
Each fertile region gladdening as he rolls:—
E'en so our Drama, breaking from the thralls
Of purblind ignorance, first wound her way;
Her stream was small, and weak her first essay.
And our first Actor was the Parish Clerk!
A man not quite the fittest form'd to work
Upon the feelings, or to rouse the mind
To deeds of fame—unless perchance you find
That Edward's Clerks were far more erudite
Than those whom we are doom'd to hear recite
Sublimest words in quaint and vulgar tone.
The taste improv'd as men had wiser grown,
And Plays were played by Dramatists alone.
Then mighty SHAKSPEARE burst to life and light!—
The Genius of our Drama hail'd the sight,
And darted forth exulting, on the wings of fame,
To publish to the world her victory, and claim
The wreaths that long had been the proud rewards
Bestow'd on Grecian and on Roman Bards.
Our Author, who to-night implores your smile
On this his first attempt, though puerile,
Begs me to warn you from the ill-timed laugh:
(For you must be inform'd that more than half
Is SHAKSPEARE'S language blended with his own;
And with such art, that they can scarce be known
Asunder.) You therefore that are well read
In SHAKSPEARE, must be cautious ere you spread
The sneer sarcastic, since you may be found
Committing sacrilege on Bardic ground.
Our Author and his friends in nought have spar'd expense,
And you yourselves can testify their diligence—
Then give them your applause—their sweetest recompence.

Your constant Reader,

C. E.

THE LAST OF THE MATERIALISTS.

"The clearest and most enlarged understandings of thinking men find themselves puzzled, and at a loss, in every particle of matter."—LOCKE.

SIR,—The majority of those who have studied "the science of the principles and causes of all things existing," have generally terminated their researches by attempting to demonstrate the existence of nothing; and those of their brethren, who have arrived at other conclusions, have, for the most part, found nothing to demonstrate. Instead of demonstration, however, they have reaped a plentiful harvest of conjecture; and the minds of our philosophers must have suffered a little, I think, in the article of sanity, in bringing forth all those monstrous adumbrations, which the study of metaphysics has so plentifully engendered.

"Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimæras dire,"

Some of the most acute of them have contemplated the existence of an universal medium, endowed with repulsion; and a medium by which its possibility may be very aptly illustrated, is Metaphysics; for, of all who have entered its domains, none has ever shewn any attraction to the principles of another; each has exhibited an unaccountable degree of repulsion to entertaining opinions formerly held.

"As if 'twere more
Their destiny than will, to make the eternal years
Their date of war,—and their 'Champ clos' the spheres."

The study of most sciences conduces to render the student more familiar with the departments which they include: here, alone, the result of profound enquiry appears to be profounder ignorance.

Whether we arrive at the sage conclusions of some, that the mind is probably endowed with reasoning faculties,—suppose, that the vital principle is caloric, or "magnetic aura,"—discover, that we have an extreme propensity to believe in our own existence,—believe, with Hartley, that the phrenologists are wrong in separating, in the mind, an organ of music, inasmuch as, the mind itself is a musical organ,—whether we prove to our own satisfaction, that a candle is no more, to us, a candle, than is the King of Madagascar,—promulgate the immateriality of broad-swords, and leaden bullets,—are preserved from the enormity of eating animals by making them machines,—or, raise them in the scale of existence to "natural immortality,"—whether,

"With a peremptory tone,
We call the nose upon our face our own,"—

or, like Hume,

"Hold fire in our hand,
By thinking of the frosty Caucasus;
Or, cloy the hungry edge of appetite,
By bare imagination of a feast,"—

whether, with Malebranche, whilst seeing all things in God, we walk altogether out of his sight,—whether, we call life, instinct, or instinct, life,—whether, following the advocates of the universality of matter, or, of the superaddition of something in nature, "distinct from matter," "more than matter," or "matter in its most active, and etherealized form,"—or, finally joining issue with those who say, that it is but little matter, what matter is;—we shall at least discover that we have embarked on a perilous and uncertain voyage, where we may be, indeed, stranded, or wrecked, but, where the hope of again gaining the firm shore we have left, is never entertained. "The last of the Materialists" is the celebrated anatomist, Mr Dermott;* and his system should be the more known, as he has added, a conservative principle to the common doctrine of Materialism,—a character-preserver, by which all the obloquy, formerly attendant on its disciples, is removed—viz. a "dormant soul." The manner of discovery is also somewhat novel, when we consider the extent and clearness of his researches into physical science; having denied the demonstrability of the soul during life, if asked how he knows its existence, he replies, Behold the Book,—the argumentatum ad librum. Mr Dermott calls himself "a physiological, not a theological materialist;" he, indeed, evidently writes with the 'odium theologicum' before his eyes. He appears to assume, from the first, that the doctrine of materialism is altogether inconsistent with revealed religion: from this error the perusal of many parts of the Old Testament would redeem him, particularly, of Job and Solomon. Besides, has he not studied brother Priestley? I merely say this, to prove that his triumphant manner of bringing forward "the Book," does not speak much for his knowledge of its contents. His manner of reasoning reminds one of Majendie, who speaking, somewhere, of the existence of a first cause, I think, says, "Il est trop consolant de croire à cet être, pour que le physiologiste mette en doute son existence." Of course, having provided a soul, he proceeds very cavalierly with the body. The cortical part of the brain, secretes the properties of the medullary. The secretions of thought, bile, and blood, go on very humorously together. Camper has already measured our intellect; Dermott steadily proceeds to weigh it down to that of the polypus and zoophyte, "which have all more or less minds."

It is strongly intimated that health of body, when it exists, is something more than concomitant with health of mind (rather too hard, by the bye, upon a brother philosopher, Dr Watts.) The mind appears to be perpetually varying in power, under the influence of the circulatory system; until at length, cogiguination and chylification, and sanguification, depart together;

"Death strikes 'the mortal part,
Where the strong fibres bind the solid heart;'" and, to conclude the scene, we remain in much the same condition as those who die by other systems of philosophy,—

"The beauteous body's left a load of clay."

Mr Dermott having discovered that the soul is dormant and inactive, here, does not trouble himself at all about its temporary

* See a "Discussion on the Materiality of the Mind, &c." By G. D. Dermott. J. Wilson. 1830.

Digitized by Google

residence; about introducing us to its domicile; he omits to "draw the curtain—shew the picture;" whether it is still resident in the pineal gland, or "through the systems utmost depth diffused," we are as ignorant as ever. Our physiologists need not as yet weep for fresh space to enter.—I hope, Mr Tatler, that the light manner in which I have treated the speculations of men on doctrines involving many points of action here, and of being, hereafter, will not induce a belief that I am unconscious of the magnitude of the subject; fervently do I hope, with the eloquent and soul-stirring Channing, "that the time is coming when the human intellect is to strike into new paths, and to view itself, and its Creator, and the Universe, from new positions; and that the darkness which has so long hung over our moral nature, will be, for ever, dispersed." With him, also, I may be allowed to express an inclination to believe in the fallacy of the doctrines of those men, "whose hearts are frozen by an earth-born philosophy." AGIS.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— I had the assurance to dispute with him (Dr Johnson) on the subject of human malignity, and wondered to hear a man who by his actions shows so much benevolence, maintain that the human heart is naturally malevolent, and that all the benevolence we see in the few who are good, is acquired by reason and religion. You may believe I entirely disagreed with him, being, as you know, fully persuaded that benevolence, or the love of our fellow-creatures, is as much a part of our nature as self-love, and that it cannot be suppressed or extinguished without great violence from the force of other passions. I told him I had suspected him of some of these bad notions, from some of his Ramblers, and had accused him to you; but that you persuaded me I had mistaken his sense. To which he answered, that if he had betrayed such sentiments in the Ramblers, it was not with design, for that he believed the doctrine of human malevolence, though a true one, is not a useful one, and ought not to be published to the world. Is there any truth that would not be useful, or that should not be known?—Posthumous Works of Mrs Chapone.

MR A. BARING—MR MANNERS SUTTON.—Mr Alexander Baring, who is looked upon as a species of commercial Goliah, being the accredited organ of the wealthiest of England's "merchant-princes," never yet premeditated a three-column concatenation of "remarks" without specially premising, by way of exordium, that he did not rise to prolong the debate. He then proceeds to address his would-be auditors in a circumlocutory sibillating whisper, through the medium of which, by a faculty fortunately peculiar to himself, he insinuates his sentiments in such mystified language, that, when all is over, 'twill be an even wager whether any present can conjecture on which side he will eventually vote;—and this is what the member for Callington has the hardihood to call public speaking! 'Tis much. The Right Honourable Gentleman, who so ably embodies the official dignity of the House, alone emulates this "palpable obscure" with any degree of success; but he is equally remarkable for the power of his voice and correspondent excellence of enunciation. His speeches, explanatory of a point of order, clear and perspicuous at the commencement, never assume the appearance of intricacy or confusion, until he becomes professedly more explicit, "fearing that he has not made himself sufficiently understood:" then, indeed, are we reminded of lucus à non lucendo, and "find no end in wandering mazes lost;" then, indeed, do we experience the usual effects of an "excess of light."—Fraser's Magazine—Parliamentary Eloquence.

MR TRANT AND MR GOULBURN.—SPECIMENS OF THE BATHOS.—Mr O'Connell's exertions to cause a run on the Waterford Bank having been incidentally mentioned in debate, Mr Trant rose apparently in travail, with somewhat of portentous importance. "Would to God," said he, "that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, even now at the eleventh hour, would hearken to my feeble voice, when I conjure him to pause in this his dangerous career, and desist from courses only calculated to inflict upon his country calamities innumerable,—to convulse the entire system of society with anarchy and revolution,—to shake the very pillars of civil government itself, and cause—a fall in the price of butter in Waterford!"—(Cheers, long, loud, and universal.) This is worthy of the landed interest, or King Cophetua himself; but the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, of whose head-piece the technical phrase in stationery, "extra thick," is tolerably descriptive, is no less happy in the application of the same beautiful figure of speech, as the following extract from his exposition of a budget will peradventure suffice to shew:—"I am not ignorant that there are who take a gloomier view of our resources; but let it be remembered, that the wings of commerce are triumphantly wafting the produce of British industry to the furthest confines of the globe, and that—there is a material increase in the consumption of soap and candles!" The effect of this appeal was far from being diminished by the pompous delivery of the speaker, who at the moment (not to say it profanely) vouchsafed to copy the action of Paul when exhorting the Athenians, as represented in the Cartoon.—Fraser's Magazine—Art. Parliamentary Eloquence.

GOETHE'S DIRECTIONS FOR GETTING-UP MACBETH.—Theatrical matters, as may be supposed, occupy a very prominent place in these volumes; the direction of the Weimar theatre being in the hands of Goëthe. This, notwithstanding the many inconveniences with which it must have been accompanied, seems always to have been a labour of love to Goëthe, who devoted himself to the task, until the introduction of the dog in the Forest of Bondy proved too much for his patience. As a specimen of the sort of duty which he had occasionally to perform, we may refer to the following directions for getting up Macbeth, which emanated from his pen, and the Sylvester Daggerwood style of which is amusing enough.

Act I.—'Some persons should enter along with Macbeth and Banquo, to enable the latter to ask, "How far is't called to Forres?"

Act II.—'"The bell invites me." No ringing of bells here, but the stroke of a clock heard.

Act III.—'Macbeth's boy should be better dressed, somewhat in the style of a page.

'Eilenstein's mantle is too scanty; a piece should be added to it.

'The fruits on the table should be painted red.

'Banquo's ghost looks too prosaic in a coat. And yet I don't very well know what else we can give him.

Act V.—'The shields to be repainted.

'No fighting in ermine mantles.'—Edinburgh Review.—Correspondence between Schiller and Goëthe.

TRUE CHARACTER OF WILLIAM TELL.—One valuable idea Goëthe certainly appears to have communicated to Schiller, namely, his own conception of the character of Tell. With the exception of Schiller, all dramatists who have attempted this theme, have painted him too much as a sentimental reformer. But Goëthe saw that the true dramatic capability of the character lay in his simplicity both of feeling and expression; in representing him as he was,—a rude dweller upon the mountains, leading a life of labour, and never thinking of political freedom or slavery, till oppression penetrated even to his own fire-side; and even then, only anxious at first to escape the evil as he best might, till, step by step, he is led on to the death of Gessler, as the only means of preserving his existence and that of his family. And thus, too, Schiller has represented him as a man of iron nerves, with all the homeliness of an Alpine shepherd, an affectionate father and husband, a being naturally of a soft and gentle heart, who, even when driven at last to the death of his enemy, and watching, from his rocky cover, the advance of the Governor along the lonely valley, shudders at the prospect that his hands, which have hitherto been only dyed with the blood of the chamois, are now to be steeped in that of his fellow man. Accordingly, as might have been expected, the success of this living picture on the stage was complete.—Edinburgh Review.—Correspondence between Schiller and Goëthe.

A CURIOUS FACT.—About thirty years ago, Charles Marsh, and honest Tom Paine, the bookseller, bought a parcel of books in conjunction, amongst which was a shabby set of Tillotson's works. The executors of Bishop Hoadley, in a prayer book which they preserved, found these memorandums:—Til. 20l. page 8.—Til. 60l. page 12.—Til. 100l. page 200.—Til. 70l. page 90." On the death of the good bishop, it was mentioned in the papers that he was the editor of Tillotson's works, 3 vols. fol. It directly struck the executors that the treasure was in the volumes they had sold. They immediately applied to the booksellers, and recovered the Tillotson, and with it the notes. What is extraordinary,—the Tillotson had travelled to Oxford, and to a gentleman at the Charter House, and was returned as a bad copy. Bishop Burnet used to lay up his bank-notes in books.—Taylor's Cabinet of Curiosities.

NEW MUSIC.

The Letter. 'Go, still voice of fond affection.' The Words by Thomas Atkinson, Esq.; the Music by Thomas Macfarlane. Clementi and Co.

THIS song has a simple melody in it, well enough adapted to the character of the words: it is written in the key of B flat, and goes no higher than G, so that it is within the compass of most young ladies' voices. The Poet, it would seem, intended his song for the gentlemen, for one of the lines begins thus—"Tell my mistress all my ardour:" but the music being composed for a mezzo soprano voice, the word "lover" has been printed under the word "mistress," so that the song may be sung by either lady or gentleman. The accompaniment is rather common-place, and is not varied in the second verse, which is an abomination, although we readily admit Mr Macfarlane is only one of a multitude who are guilty of the same offence. To the words "trembling warder" (whatever may be their meaning) at the bottom of page 3, a pretty effect might have been produced by accompanying the voice with a descending succession of chords of the 6th, instead of the tiresome repetition of the same unmeaning notes, which seem stuck in merely for the sake of filling up the bar. There are two or three typographical errors: at the first cadence in the third page, the E ought to have had a natural placed before it; and in the fourth page, at the words, "Bid my doubts," the second D should be E flat. D.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Il Pirata—La Nayade.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—A Divertissement—The Legion of Honour.
COVENT GARDEN.—The School for Scandal—The Waterman.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.
Priest, Mr Dowsing. Boy, Master Fenton.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and Auber's Overture to 'La Muette de Portici.'

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

MASANIELLO.

[By M. AUBER.]

Elvira, Miss Byfeld. Fenella, Mrs W. Barrymore. Inis, Miss Chikini.
Masaniello, Mr Sinclair. Don Alphonso, Mr T. Cooke. Pietro, Mr Bedford.
Ruffino, Mr Bland. Lorenzo, Mr Howard. Moreno, Mr Yarnold.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; The Diorama; and The Legion of Honour.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Lesbia, Zemira, Miss Cawse, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After the Opera, Mozart's Overture to 'La Clemenza di Tito.'
Previous to 'Teddy the Tiler,' Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflöte.'

After which, an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. Tree. Charlotte, Miss Lawrence.
Mordaunt, Mr Baker. Bertrand, Mr Duruset. Moses, Mr Keeley.

To conclude with the Farce of

TEDDY THE TILER.

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly. Oriel, Miss Lawrence. Flora, Miss Nelson.
Julia, Mrs Brown. Ladies, Mesds. Perry and Appleton.
Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans. Henry, Mr Duruset. Frederick, Mr Baker.
Bombardine, Mr Henry. Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour. Tim, Mr Addison.
Teddy Mulowney, Mr Power. Stiff, Mr Mears.
Apewell, Mr Irwin. Constable, Mr Fuller. Richard, Mr Heath.

To-morrow, The Exquisites; The Irish Tutor; and Neuha's Cave.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

JOCRISSE MAITRE, ET JOCRISSE VALET.

Comédie en Un Acte, du Théâtre des Variétés.

Javotte, Mme. Gamard. Fanchette, Mlle. St Ange.
Jocrisse, Maître, M. Brunet. Jocrisse, Valet, M. Gamard. M. Dumont, M. Préval.

Suivi de

MADAME DU BARRY.

Comédie Vaudeville, en Trois Actes, par M. ANCELOT.

Madame du Barry, Mme. Albert. La Maréchal de Mirepoix, Mme. Baudin.
Cécile, Mlle. Florval. Mathilde, Mlle. Eliza. Marie, Mlle. St Ange.
Eulalie, Mlle. Corra. Hortense, Mme. Gamard. Délia, Mlle. Emma.
Adèle, Mlle. Jamain. Une Femme de la Comtesse Du Barry, Mme. Préval.
Louis XV., M. Albert. Le Maréchal de Richelieu, M. St Aubert.
Le Duc d'Aiguillon, M. Alfred. Le Duc de Lavrillière, M. Préval.
Le Chancelier Meaupou, M. Guenée. Le Comte Jean du Barry, M. Laporte.
Cazotte, M. Cloup. Adrien Mirval, M. Paulin.
Le Nonce du Pape, M. Gamard. Un Coureur, M. Arnaud.
Un Huissier, M. Granville. Un Valet, M. Edouard.

In the course of the Evening, Singing by Signor Rubini and Signor Santini

On Finira par

LE PROCES DU FANDANGO.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. BARRE, RADET, et DESFONTAINE.

Madame de Folignac, Mme. Albert, qui dansera Le Fandango, avec M. Lefevre.
Madame Bichon, Mme. Préval. M. Prudendin, M. Préval.
M. Clopineau, M. Guenée. Gavotino, M. Pelissié. M. Poudardin, M. Laporte.
Griffonet, M. Arnaud. Un Huissier, M. Granville.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zittn, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Clemenza di Tito;' Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

THE LITTLE BOOT HANGING OVER THE DOOR.

T. STEEL,

On introducing his name at this season of the year to the Nobility, Gentry, and the Public, takes this opportunity of returning his best thanks for the liberal patronage with which they have so unremittingly honoured him during the last FIFTEEN YEARS, and begs leave to remind them he was the first in the trade who reduced the price of the BEST manufactured Boots and Shoes to a LEVEL WITH THE DEPRESSION OF THE TIMES. This just sense of economy and fair dealing, he indulges the hope, will ensure to him a repetition of their favours, and assures them, that at no period of his Establishment, wherein they have so highly patronized him, could he submit for their approval such an EXTENSIVE, FASHIONABLE, and WELL-ASSORTED STOCK as at the present time.—T. S. begs to say that he is particularly importunate in drawing the attention of those Ladies and Gentlemen who perhaps have not already heard of

THE CELEBRATED LITTLE BOOT,

And from whom he most respectfully solicits a call, that they may judge for themselves, and T. S. feels confident, that, after an impartial inspection, they will become willing purchasers, and, by comparison, will be compelled to admit, that they are equal in every respect, and without fear of contradiction, he may say his Goods are frequently much better than those purchased at the most extravagant prices at the Fashionable Houses at the West End of the Town.

LADIES'	s.	d.
House Shoes	2	0
Common Lasting	2	9
Superior ditto, trimmings included	3	9
PRUNELLO of the finest quality that can be obtained, ditto	4	6
REAL SPANISH, ditto	4	6
Stout Leather Walking Shoes, do.	3	6
Newest Fashion of the best Buenos Ayrean Cordovan, ditto	4	6
Best Kid Walking Shoes	4	9
FASHIONABLE COLOURS — The ADELAIDE — GREEN — BROWN — DRAB — ROYAL WILLIAM—BYRON, and several other colours, of all sizes, and of peculiar fineness	4	6
BOOTS.
Lasting Boots	4	9
Best ditto	5	6
Coloured ditto	5	6
An IMMENSE STOCK of LACE SIDE Boots cut to various patterns, and of the most fashionable colours, got up with every attention to the anatomy of the foot. T. S. has taken particular care in the manufacture of this article to avoid the pressure of an uncomfortable seam across the tender part of the foot, so much complained of in LACE SIDE Boots, purchased from unskilful makers	6	6 and 7	6
SILK SIDE LACE of various fashionable colours, usually sold at the West End at 14s.; an Article perfectly unique	10	6
DRESS.
Silk Slippers, various colours	4	6
Best Kid Operas, Black or Bronze	4	9
BLACK or WHITE SATIN, equal to the bespoke of any house in London; this article has been spoken of in terms of unqualified approbation	6	6
Mock Kid	2	6
GENTLEMEN'S
Light Calf Walking Pump or Shoe, unequalled at the price	5	6
Ditto, a degree stouter	6	6
BEST SUMMER WALKING SHOES, not to be surpassed by any House in London—the great praise, recommendation and extensive Sale of these Shoes, particularly for the last few Summers, afford sufficient evidence of the approbation of the Public, and the conviction that they are deserving such recommendation	7	6
STOUT GAITER SHOE, double tie, an Article which has given the highest satisfaction	8	6
STOUT BLUCHERS	8	6
EXTRA QUALITY ditto, very best	9	6
BLUCHERS OF SPANISH dressed in Oil, cool summer wear. T. S. feels justified in expressing an opinion that this Article will be a great favourite with the Public	9	6
IMPROVED OXONIANS	10	6
The much-admired GERMAN BOOT—this is an article partaking both of the qualities of a Boot and Shoe, with Trowsers or Gaiters in appearance a perfect Boot, and in other respects a comfortable fitting Shoe, exclusively T. S.'s	10	6
Shooting and Fishing Shoes, double throughout	10	6
BOOTS.
EXCELLENT WELLINGTON BOOTS	16	6
SUPERIOR DITTO.—T. S. feels pleasure in recommending a trial of these Boots (particularly to those Gentlemen accustomed to pay extravagantly). They are got up with the greatest attention to cut and quality, and will be found equal to the 26s. Boots usually sold by other Houses	18	6
BOOTS OF SPANISH dressed in Oil	£1.
DRESS BOOTS of the finest Chamois Leather, sold at most Houses for 28s.	£1.
DRESS.
DRESS PUMPS	5	6
Very best, lined with Silk	7	6
IMPROVED BUFF SOLE DANCING PUMPS. This for a long time has been a desideratum in the Dancing World	5	6

AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF CHILDREN'S BOOTS AND SHOES.

YOUTH'S SHOES AND WELLINGTON BOOTS OF ALL SIZES.

Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families going abroad will find it much to their interest in purchasing at this Shop as they will have the advantage of Selecting from one of the LARGEST STOCKS IN THE KINGDOM, and of Qualities suitable to any Climate.

Of all things notice the LITTLE BOOT hanging over the door.
No. 25 GREAT SURRY STREET, SOUTHWARK.
(Near the Magdalen.)

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BAR MAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonanini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gosson; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.

After which, the Historical Drama of

WILLIAM TELL.

Austrians—Annell, Miss Vincent. Agnes, Miss Scott.
Gealer, Mr D. Pitt. Sarnam, Mr Almar. Struth, Mr Hobbs. Braun, Mr Rogers.
Swiss—Emma, Miss M. C. Poole. William Tell, Mr Osbaldiston.

To conclude with the Drama, entitled

LAW AND LIONS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Mrs Mammoth, Mrs Vale. Miss Jane, Miss Vincent, in which character she will sing "Oh men what silly things ye are."
Jemmy Mammoth, Mr Vale.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER's Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office,

Nº 209.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1831.

INVALUABLE DISCOVERIES.

[If we did not happen to know it to be the contrary, the following letter might be taken for a shrewd series of puffs, silly recommended to us by one surpassing them all!]

TO THE TATLER.

My Dear Mr Tatler,—Seeing your earnestness for the public welfare in general, I have been somewhat surprised at your remissness on one point—I mean, your failing to extend the knowledge of certain invaluable discoveries, and to recommend to your readers the use of articles, whereby they might bid defiance to Climate, Time, and Fate itself. When I speak of the Macassar Oil, you may reply, that it is too well known to need your aid. Not so, Mr Tatler, while there are any individuals who do not benefit by this wonderful oil, those who have influence over the public mind should exert it in the endeavour to save them from the result of their own incredulity. It is evident, that in moments of great interest, this oil has been considered important enough to be remembered and mentioned in correspondence by some great men of the day. One writes from Warsaw—"We are all bustle and confusion; but waving for a moment political matters, I wish to inform you of a singular circumstance. A Polish nobleman, in consequence of a fever, had been deprived of his hair; he remained bald for some years. Not twelve months since, he accidentally heard of Rowland's Macassar Oil, by the application of which article, to the astonishment of all his friends and acquaintance, he has now an uncommon fine head of hair."—But the philanthropy of the said Rowland does not end here;—he has invented a lotion, called Kalydor, which "imparts a beautiful juvenile bloom to the complexion:" another, called Essence of Tyre, which "changes red or grey hair to brown or black:" the most salutary and efficacious Dentifrice that was ever discovered; and an Extract for "immediately relieving the most violent tooth-ache," &c. He has also purchased the recipe for the "Imperial Cerelœum, one of the most important, as being the most ameliorative, and generally useful emanations of science, in ancient or modern times." This recipe was the result of the most anxious endeavours to relieve the Emperor Napoleon from the intense head-aches to which even he was subject. The imperial physicians laboured with assiduous zeal; the vegetable and mineral worlds were explored, and at last, "profound science, aided by unremitting perseverance, succeeded, happily, in eliciting the grand desideratum of unwearied research." This must, indeed, be an invaluable treasure, for we are assured that it confers immediate ease under agony! I trouble you with but a sketch of the illustrious history, and incalculable virtues, of this Imperial Cerelœum, but I think I have said enough to excite your remorse for having hitherto overlooked it. The proprietor of all these valuable articles is not the only one, however, whom you have neglected, Mr Tatler. How could you possibly omit to mention, with due honour, the "Real Pearl Milk," sold by another Benefactor of Mankind, Mr Prince of Poland street? This milk not only preserves age from wrinkles, but actually removes wrinkles that have appeared before the application of it. Neither age nor disease can cope with it,—it conquers all enemies, and "makes coarse, sallow, and sickly complexions a healthy bloom and radiant whiteness." Ladies who use the Pearl Milk will have no occasion to rouge, paint, &c. as the best of them is unhealthy and injurious to the skin. * * * * * There are young as well as elderly gentlemen who are subject to pimples, and particularly elderly gentlemen, whose chins naturally get soft and begin to wrinkle, and shaving becomes difficult, and they often cut themselves; but by washing their face with the Pearl Milk, or by putting some on the soap when shaving, instead of water, it makes the chin hard and plump, clears all imperfections, and shaving will be comfortable. * * * * * "A lady of distinction, about 45, has declared to the proprietor, about two years ago, after recovering from an illness, she observed wrinkles under her eyes that made her look years older; and had had the first medical advice, and used several French and English cosmetics, yet found the wrinkles increased; but of late, washing her face with the Real Pearl Milk, her skin gradually became smooth and even, and made her complexion look healthy and youthful. And what makes the Real Pearl Milk so valuable to young ladies as well as elderly, when washing with it the face, neck, hands, and arms, makes them look healthy, fair, and beautiful. * * * * * The reason the Pearl Milk is so high a price, is through the principal ingredient being very rare and very expensive; but a bottle lasts a long time, and a little has great effect.—A good price given for old discoloured and unshaped real pearls, unfit for ladies' ornaments, as real pearls is the principal ingredient of the Real Pearl Milk; and if a lady has such real pearls to dispose of, the proprietor will either give a good price, or exchange them for Pearl Milk."

Now, Mr Tatler, I am the more earnest to convince you of the propriety of recommending to your readers articles by which they must benefit so largely, as I am about to offer to the world the Grand Incomparable Intellectual Vapour, at ten shillings a bottle, duty included. This Vapour is extracted from the hair of poets, philosophers, &c. The hair, nourished by the brain, has been discovered to partake, in a powerful degree, of its peculiar qualities; and the Vapour, whether scented or inhaled, communicates these qualities in proportion to the quantity imbibed. Intellects of various kinds are mingled in the Vapour, as being more useful for general purposes; but those who desire to shine as poets, romance-writers, &c. may be supplied with the Grand Incomparable Imaginative Vapour. The quantity imbibed must be regulated by the purpose for which it is designed, and by the degree of natural intellect in the individual; but as the effects are instantaneous, there can be no difficulty in determining it. For conversation, the Vapour may be inhaled;—for all other purposes it should be imbibed by scent. A handsome price will be given for the hair of first-rate geniuses, well-warranted. Any one possessed of a lock of Shakspeare's will be readily treated with, by the patentee. If you have any spare locks yourself, Mr Tatler, I shall be happy to purchase them, those in the immediate vicinity of the temples, would be preferred. Their value will be increased in proportion to the judgment shown, by your notice of this letter; but though you should prove deficient in that quality, they will yet possess powers sufficient to render them very desirable to

Your obedient humble servant,

* The Patentee of the Grand Incomparable, Intellectual, and Imaginative—Vapour.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs for 1831. In 2 volumes. Vol. II. (Forming the 4th volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library). 12mo. pp. 333. Longman.

The first volume of this very useful summary has been already noticed in The Tatler. The present volume relates to the progress of the Belgic revolution, the revolutionary movements in Germany, Spain, Portugal, and Switzerland, our own domestic agitations, and, finally, the insurrection at Warsaw, and subsequent Polish revolution. At present we shall confine ourselves to some extracts illustrative of the justice of the Polish cause, as exhibited by the charter granted to them in 1815, and the manner in which that charter has been acted upon by Russia and its representative, the Grand Duke Constantine.

'This Polish charter was promulgated in the end of November 1815, not many months after the rising of the Vienna Congress, and consists of one hundred and sixty-five articles, which, if honestly executed in all their protecting clauses and provisions, would have secured the allegiance and promoted the welfare of Poland. The fifth article guarantees the direction of the government, under the name of Lieutenant of the kingdom, to a native of the country, unless one of the imperial princes be appointed Viceroy. This article was rendered nugatory by the presence of the Emperor's brother, Constantine, as commander-in-chief of the army. The eleventh article secures protection to the Catholic religion, as the religion of the majority, with a perfect toleration to every other worship, and a perfect equality of privileges to all religious sects. The Catholic church is to send eight Bishops to the Senate. The nineteenth article declares that no citizen can be arrested but in the forms prescribed, and in the cases determined by the law. This provision of the charter was subject to the most capricious and arbitrary violations. The next article, which ordains that a notification of the cause of arrest shall be immediately given to the person arrested, was violated with equal frequency and cruelty. Years sometimes intervened between a man's imprisonment and the notification of his offence. Another article declares that no punishment can be inflicted, except in virtue of existing laws and the sentence of a competent magistrate. The Poles have told us how seldom this law interfered with the passions of their Russian masters.

'As if to show an utter contempt for public opinion, and to give an opportunity of outrageously insulting a solemn engagement, the following article is introduced on the rights of the press :—"The liberty of the press is guaranteed. The law will regulate the means of repressing its abuses." It need not be said that this article was broken; it never was executed, nor was intended to be executed.

Digitized by Google

'The twenty-fifth article secured to the Polish people an entire possession of all places of trust and profit in their own country, by limiting to the Poles all employments, civil and military. With such a provision they ought to have been freed from the tyranny of Russian agents, and might have considered their country as their own but for the sight of Russian garrisons. But the Russians employed generally the very worst natives of Poland, and made them the instruments of an oppression which they would scarcely have dared to exercise without their intervention. In order to secure these rights, the thirty-first article provides a national representation, consisting of the Diet, composed of two chambers, and the king, or his lieutenant. This national representation had no power. Its sittings were interrupted for five years at a time. All the acts of the king must be signed by a minister, who is responsible for their conformity to the laws and constitution of the kingdom, this article was always eluded.

'The two chambers of the Diet are to deliberate publicly, by the ninety-fifth article. This article was violated by the founder of the charter, who shut the doors of the senate and house of deputies.

'In the composition of the two chambers, and the mode of electing that of representatives, a great degree of independence might have been secured, had the law been faithfully executed. The senate, by the 108th article, is to be composed of the princes of the blood; nine Bishops, one being of the Greek church; and of Palatins and Castellans, orders of nobility, who are appointed for life by the king out of a double list presented by the senate itself, and who must pay an annual contribution of 2,000 florins to the State. The lower chamber consists of seventy-seven Nuncios or Representatives of the Assemblies of the Nobility, being one Nuncio for every district, and of fifty-one Deputies of Communes, or Representatives of the artisans, traders, and proprietors who are not noble. The functions of the Deputies returned by these bodies last for six years, unless the King dissolves the Chamber, being renewed by thirds every two years. Both Chambers have for Presidents, or Marshals, one of their own body nominated by the Crown. The noble proprietors of the country, assembled in a little Diet, nominate their Representatives, who must be thirty years of age, and pay 100 florins of direct contribution. The commercial assemblies, consisting of citizens not noble, of manufacturers, of shop-keepers possessing property to a certain amount, of priests, and of artists of any name or standing, elect the Deputies.

'These more important provisions are followed by an article which shows the homage which the Emperor was obliged to show to the proud spirit of the Poles. It is declared, towards the conclusion of the charter, that "the Polish army preserves its colours, its uniform, and everything that belongs to its nationality."

'Such a charter, if executed with good faith and in the spirit of freedom, was calculated to secure the most essential blessings of independence and popular government to the nation. But the history of Poland since its grant has only been a continued violation of its provisions and guarantees.'

That the effects of these violations of the charter would be softened by the hand of the delegated violator, was not to be expected. His character was too well known and appreciated. Accordingly, we find the personal character of the oppressor adding every possible aggravation to the oppressions.

'The Grand Duke Constantine, as commander-in-chief of the forces, acted on a system of military despotism, which entirely overpowered the action of the civil government, and rendered nugatory every constitutional safeguard of freedom. Without regard to the separate rights of the kingdom, his great object was to destroy the nationality of the Poles, and to convert them into Russian vassals. Inaccessible to any feeling of political rights, or to any desire for the progress of knowledge or liberty, he considered the Polish kingdom as a province which he could rule on the principles of a Turkish Pacha. Knowing nothing but military discipline, and placing his whole pride and duty in the sinister activity with which he tortured the troops by useless and vexatious exercises, he was in the habit of punishing or degrading both officers and men for the most minute and trifling fault. Even the highest ranks of the army were not safe from his brutal insults; and often the general and the ensign met in the same prison for defects of discipline or neglect of orders, of which neither could see the importance. Courts-martial were employed as the instruments of his never-ending tyranny; but when their decisions did not accord with his views, he annulled their sentence, and inflicted punishment by his own sole authority. He even endeavoured to change the uniform of the Poles, notwithstanding the charter, and to destroy all distinction between them and the Muscovites.

'The citizens were as much oppressed and insulted as the army. The Grand Duke made himself master of the police, and employed spies to watch the movements, words, and actions of every person in the least elevated above the common level of society. On the slightest suspicion of dissatisfaction with his Government, the most noble and honourable citizens were dragged before him, and punished in his presence without law or justice. Individual liberty, guaranteed by the charter, was never allowed to stand between him and the indulgence of his brutal caprices. Rich proprietors, wealthy merchants, professional men of eminence, were all treated with the most insulting indignities, and often condemned to the most degrading punishments.'

Where such proceedings distinguish the ruling powers, the inconvenience of letting the public voice be heard must be manifest. Our annalist therefore proceeds :—

'It is needless to say that the freedom of the press did not exist in such a state of things. No stricture was allowed on the conduct of the administration. Discussion of every kind was prohibited, and knowledge was treated like an enemy.

'By the charter it was decreed that the Chambers should be convoked at least every two years, and that all the financial measures of Government should be submitted to their examination and sanction. This security for national rights, the best that could be devised, was openly violated. The Grand Duke decided on the budget of the army without consulting the Diet, and admitted no check on his authority from the civil government.

'Thus the meeting of the Diet was rendered a mere ceremony. It had no power of refusing supplies; it had no freedom of debate; it could successfully oppose no arbitrary act. The Government submitted to its deliberations projects of no interest or importance, to occupy the time of its necessary session, and withheld from it the cognizance or discussion of questions connected with the public administration and the financial interests of the kingdom. When money is demanded, grievances may be stated; but when a budget can be obtained without the sanction of the legislature, no opportunity is left for checking the excesses of the executive.

'Thus the army, both in its numbers and management, was entirely at the mercy and under the direction of Muscovite despotism; the resources of the State were employed, without the legal control of the Diet, to strengthen Russian tyranny; the press was enslaved, that no remonstrance might be made against Russian oppression; the citizens were arrested, imprisoned, and punished by a Russian military chieftain, without being brought to trial before the proper native tribunals; the Legislative Chambers were deprived of their just prerogatives; the national customs, habits, and feelings were hourly insulted; the citizens were beset with an infamous police, and deprived even of the melancholy consolation of complaint; thus, in short, every Polish right was violated—every article of the charter broken—and the whole efforts of an imperial savage, at the head of a strong military force, directed to efface from the countrymen of the Sobieskis and the Kosciuszkos all the remains of the Polish character.

'This, it must be allowed, is a picture of tyranny and misgovernment sufficiently appalling to justify the resistance of any people, but more especially that of a people which had long been accustomed to even a licentious freedom; which was proud of its national honour and ancient renown; which entertained such a veneration for its laws and usages, as to preserve for two centuries the liberum veto and the rights of elective monarchy, the source of all its calamities; and which had the positive stipulations of its sovereign for the preservation of its national rights. But, like most general pictures, its impression may be diminished by its generality. We shall therefore make no apology for introducing, on the authority of an Englishman who had been twelve years in Poland, a few facts, to give the character of precision and truth to the outline. In the fortress of Zamosc twelve state prisoners were found, some of whom had been incarcerated for six years without having undergone a trial, and whose names were only known to the commander of the castle. In the dungeons of Marienanski, in Warsaw, was found a victim of the Russian police, who had been kept in solitary confinement for ten years, and whose fate was entirely unknown to his friends and relatives. Respectable inhabitants of Warsaw were often taken and flogged before the grand Duke without the formality of a trial, or the specification of a charge. Some were even, in the same unlawful manner, made to break stones or wheel barrows on the streets or highways like galley slaves. Persons of rank were frequently taken from their homes, immured in prison, and dismissed after several weeks' incarceration, without knowing what alleged offence had provoked such a wanton exercise of power, contrary to the charter and the privileges of Poland; State offenders were carried out of the country to Russian prisons, and attempts were made to give them a journey to Siberia, which were only prevented by the threat of suicide on the part of the victims. The resources of the kingdom were squandered entirely for Russian objects; and the people were oppressed to maintain a Polish and a Russian army. Peculation and pillage was the order of the day. The President of the town of Warsaw, with a salary of between 500l. and 600l. contrived to amass a fortune of 100,000l. in fifteen years, besides living in splendour, and squandering twice his legal income. The same unprincipled peculation was practised by other municipal or state officers. The Russian Generals were in league with the Magistrates and Billet-master, to divide the booty received from the inhabitants, as the price of exemption from the oppressive quartering of troops on their houses. Spies were employed by the police to watch every man of the least consequence in society, and the nobility were often driven to the country, to avoid such dangeroes intruders. In several instances, members of the Diet were banished to their estates, and made to pay the troops that guarded them, for having ventured in the assembly, whose discussions ought to have been free, to express a suspicion of the Government, or to hint an opinion contrary to the taste of the Grand Duke.

Digitized by Google

'In the affair of the conspiracy on the accession of Nicholas, to which we have alluded, the grossest iniquity and barbarities were practised. Hundreds of persons, from eighty to nine years of age, senators of the kingdom and boys in the schools, were thrown into solitary dungeons. There they were deprived even of the benefit of daylight; and some of them are nearly blind from the effect of their treatment. Four times were some of them driven from Warsaw to St Petersburg, with more than the rapidity of a courier, in carriages without springs, in violation of one of the most important articles of the charter. An ordinance was drawn up speculating on their death. The Senators refused to condemn them, guided by a President who paid for his heroic exertions, in keeping at his post to see justice administered, by his death after the trial. The vengeance of the Government was not satisfied. Several of the acquitted prisoners were transported to the dungeons of St Petersburg, where, at the Polish revolution, one of them still groaned in close confinement.'

Such was the state of Poland under the sway of Russia. May the glorious efforts of her people be crowned with the success which is due to their matchless patriotism and valour.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE SLEEPY SCHOOL-BOY.

Behold! the school-boy sleepy grows,
His eyelids gradually close;
The glance is gone, th' intenter look,
His opening hand lets fall the book;
He sinks! all consciousness is fled;
Down drops his unsupported head,
At which he starts!—and sneaks to bed!

J. H. Junior.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

RUMP STEAK AND BEEF STEAK.—Two Frenchmen on their return from London, compared notes. "Oh," says Monsieur de la Chicorie, "le bif roti is charmant à London."—"Oui, yes," replies M. des Epinards, "dat is vrai, but je prefère de rum-teak."—"Le rum-teak, vat is the rum-teak?"—"Voyez-vous, it is toujours de bif-teak, mais day call it rum-teak, parceque day put de rum in de sauce."—American Paper.

TYRANNY CHARITABLY JUDGED.—I am now reading Voltaire's 'Louis the Fourteenth,' which everybody else has read long ago. How amazing it is to me that mankind should agree to dignify with the epithets of great and glorious, so black a character! Yet how if this man himself, the scourge and enemy of human kind, should have been able to persuade himself, or suffer others to persuade him, that he was really acting a laudable and glorious part. Supposing this possible, is he not rather an object of compassion than of hatred; and should we not rather lament human blindness, than exclaim against human wickedness? I am fond of this supposition, because it saves poor Louis some part of his guilt. Do tell me I am right, and let me fancy I have found an excuse or palliation even for a conqueror and persecutor.—Mrs Chapone's Posthumous Works.

THE CATALANI SCHOOL AT FLORENCE.—The celebrated Madame Catalani, who has definitively taken up her residence near Florence, has lately founded a music school, at her own expense, for the instruction of young women of poor families in singing. They are given lodging, board, and clothing; and at the end of a certain time of instruction engagements are procured for them. One stipulation on the scholar's entering this establishment is rather curious; viz. that on quitting it at the expiration of the term of engagement she is to append to her family name that of Catalani. The first instance of this is in the singer Maselli-Catalani, whose talents are said to augur well to the new institution, and who has obtained an engagement at Paris.—Harmonicon for May.

DR WITHERING'S EARLY DISTASTE FOR BOTANY.—It is remarkable that Dr Withering, who afterwards became the author of a British Flora, incomparably more complete than any other that the country then could boast, had in his youth a strong prejudice against the study of botany. He says, in a letter to his parents,—"The Botanical Professor gives annually a gold medal to such of his pupils as are most industrious in that branch of science. An incitement of this kind is often productive of the greatest emulation in young minds, though, I confess, it will hardly have charm enough to banish the disagreeable ideas I have formed of the study of botany." His biographer is disposed to attribute this change in his taste to his habit of seeking flowers as subjects for the pencil of his mistress, whose education he in some degree directed, for several years before he married. "For her," says his son, the author of his memoirs, "he explored enamelled meadows watered by the Trent, the varied lawns of Shugborough, and the wild recesses of Haywood Park; and being less engaged in severer studies, he became more and more enamoured of the novel pursuit, and soon began to collect specimens for that herbarium which he afterwards rendered so complete." This pursuit subsequently became a great solace to him during the many tedious hours of protracted disease.

A FATHER'S IMPULSE.—When Lord Erskine made his debut at the bar, his agitation almost overcame him, and he was just going to sit down. "At that moment," said he, "I thought I felt my little children tugging at my gown, and the idea roused me to an exertion of which I did not think myself capable."—Legal Observer.

FLY-BURNING AT FLORENCE.—Mr Galiffe witnessed an extraordinary spectacle, which he states to be an annual performance,—the burning of some myriads of flies, which ascend the Arno towards the end of July or the beginning of August, and are immediately devoted to the flames. Great fires were lighted for the purpose, on the two upper bridges, into which immense crowds of them rushed in rapid succession, and the ground was covered with their remains, all round the fires, to the depth of at least two inches. The operation seemed to inspire all the spectators with mirth.—Conder's Italy.

SAILS LOST BY THE SAVING OF SHIPS.—The ancient Zetlander looked upon the sea as the provider of his living, not only by the plenty produced by the fishings, but by the spoil of wrecks. Some particular islands have fallen off very considerably in their rent, since the commissioners of the light-houses have ordered lights on the Isle of Sands and the Pentland Skerries. A gentleman familiar with those seas, expressed surprise at seeing the farmer of one of the isles in a boat with a very old pair of sails. "Had it been His will,"—said the old man, with an affected deference to Providence, very inconsistent with the sentiment of his speech—"Had it been His will that light had not been placed yonder, I would have had enough of new sails last winter."—Notes to the Pirate.

THE KINDNESS OF THE VENETIANS.—Much has been said of the licentiousness of the Venetians, which is doubtless owing to the peculiar character of their city, and the indolent habits consequent upon it; but travellers agree in representing them as remarkably pleasant and amiable in general intercourse. "The Venetians, says Mr Galiffe, are certainly an affectionate, kind-hearted set of beings; very cheerful, active, fond of pleasure, of music, dancing, dress, and everything that is gay. Almost all the young men of eighteen or twenty years of age, play on the guitar, and give serenades every evening to the young females of their acquaintance. * * * * The Venetians are the most agreeable companions in the world." * * * * "I am ready to maintain," says Mr Rose, "that I never visited any country where the people seemed equally linked in love. You cannot walk the town for a day, without being struck with this universal spirit of kindness. The Venetians really give you the idea of being members of one family."—Conder's Italy.—[By walking the town, it is to be presumed the author means floating about the town, on its canals, for to walk the streets for a day, or even for an hour, seems a thing very seldom done, either by the inhabitants, or by visitors. The bridges are very numerous, and being steep, are cut into steps, so that "taking a walk in Venice," is represented as "perpetually going up and down stairs."]

— When the French General, Baraguay de Hilliers, took possession of the city (of Venice) the prisons of the State Inquisition were thrown open. Contrary to expectation, three persons only were found in them, one of whom had been there two-and-twenty years, another three years, and a third ten months. The first, a Dalmatian subject of the republic, wore a venerable beard down to his middle. When taken out of his cell, he appeared much frightened, and struggled hard not to leave it, calling out, "What is all this? Leave me, you hurt me!" and uttering many incoherent exclamations. The change proved too much for one whose health had withstood two-and-twenty years of close confinement, and in less than four days he was dead.—Conder's Italy. (Quoted from Simond.)—[This unfortunate man may possibly have been one of those who defend the confining of birds, by the poor argument, that they would die if set free, and that though the cage-doors have been thrown open, birds have sometimes refused to avail themselves of this offered freedom. Upon the same principle, this man's case might be taken as a ground of belief that men are easily reconciled to captivity. This may appear to the reader a comparison of great things with small; but that is only because the reader is not a bird.]

IMPROVING A TONE.—* * * Next, our oboeist and clarionetist; or, as the leader used to call him, the professor of the greater and lesser howling-sticks. His assiduity in cultivating the art in which he made so poor a figure was exemplary; on his oboe-parts of a symphony or concerto, each several time that he had played it, and the number of minutes and seconds it took upon each occasion in performance, were carefully noted; he walked the city with music buttoned under his coat, and studied the first clarionet of Mozart in E flat, while waiting for an appointment at Tom's coffee-house. His condescension in pointing out to much better players, but less important men, than himself, the most approved way of fingering a difficult passage on the oboe or clarionet, was no less praiseworthy; and his almost childish innocence soared above all. At my chambers, while I was a Benedict, he was to play a concerto, but on which of his sticks was undecided; so he brought one oboe, and three clarionets, an A, B, and C one. A wag suggested to him, that in a cold January night, the tone of his instruments would be much improved by pouring boiling water through them, and drying them before a rousing sea-coal fire. He was obliged by, and before I could prevent it, adopted the hint; kept jealous guard that no one interposed his cold body between the grate and the four instruments arranged in semi-circle, bells downward, around it, and had the satisfaction of seeing his oboe and B clarionet split past curing.—Autobiography in Harmonicon for May.

Digitized by Google

VENERATION FOR A FIDDLE.—A German visitor, of whom I afterwards knew a little, was in some respects an original worth studying, though not imitating. He loved nothing so well as fiddling, and had two violins, a best and a second-best, on the first of which, I firmly believe, he would not have allowed his own father to draw a bow. Quitting England to settle in South America, he tore himself from this beloved instrument for the first time; but it was only to export it, highly insured, in a different, and as he thought, a safer ship, than the one he was to sail supercargo in!—Autobiography in Harmonicon for May.

OATH UPON THE DIRK.—As the Heathen deities contracted an indelible obligation if they swore by Styx, the Scottish Highlanders had usually some peculiar solemnity attached to an oath, which they intended should be binding on them. Very frequently it consisted in laying their hand, as they swore, on their own dirk; which dagger becoming a party to the transaction, was invoked to punish any breach of faith. But by whatever ritual the oath was sanctioned, the party was extremely desirous to keep secret what the especial oath was, which he considered as irrevocable. This was a matter of great convenience, as he felt no scruple in breaking his asseveration, when made in any other form than that which he accounted as peculiarly solemn; and therefore readily granted any engagement which bound him no longer than he inclined. Whereas, if the oath which he accounted inviolable, was once publicly known, no party with whom he might have occasion to contract would have rested satisfied with any other. Louis XI of France practised the same sophistry, for he also had a peculiar species of oath, the only one which he was ever known to respect, and which, therefore, he was very unwilling to pledge. The only engagement which that wily tyrant accounted binding upon him, was an oath by the Holy Cross of Saint Lo d'Angers, which contained a portion of the True Cross. If he prevaricated after taking this oath, Louis believed he should die within the year. The Constable St Paul being invited to a personal conference with Louis, refused to meet the king, unless he would agree to ensure him safe conduct, under sanction of this oath. But, says Comines, the king replied he would never again pledge that engagement to mortal man, though he was willing to take any other oath which could be devised. The treaty broke off, therefore, after much chaffering concerning the nature of the vow that Louis was to take. Such is the difference between the dictates of superstition, and those of conscience.—Notes to Waverley.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PHILO-TATLER is informed, that the eminent person alluded to in a late number of this journal, as the "reposer in Arianism," who had a tendency to believe in the "French prophets," &c. is NEWTON.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—And Masaniello.

COVENT GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—Hide and Seek—Teddy the Tiler.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Semi-Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

LA DONNA DEL LAGO.

[By ROSSINI.]

The principal Characters by Madame Rubini, Madame Castelli, Mlle. Beck. Signor Rubini, Signor Santini, Signor Deville, and Signor Curioni.

After which, the New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA NAYADE.

Principal Characters, Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, and Mlle. Brocard. M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); P. De Winter's Overture to 'Das Unterbrochene Opferfest,' and A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles.'

After which will be Exhibited, the New and Splendid DIORAMA, designed and painted by Mr STANFIELD.

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; and Hofer, the Tell of the Tyrol.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Comedy, in Five Acts, called

THE EXQUISITES.

[By DON TELESFORO DE TRUEBA Y COSIO.]

Mrs Stockland, Mrs Gibbs. Harriet, Miss Nelson.
Lilian Evondale, Miss E. Tree. Kitty, Mrs Keeley.
Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble. Count Valmore, Mr G. Bennett.
Lord Belcourt, Mr Parry. Hon. Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott. Melton, Mr Wrench.
Gosling, Mr Keeley. Sir Benjamin Bonus, Mr Bartley.
Mr Stockland, Mr Egerton. Thornton, Mr Henry.
Timothy Oldstyle, Mr Blanchard. Col. O'Rasrod, Mr Turnour.
Strut, Mr Power.

The Prologue to be spoken by Mr Abbott.

Previous to the Comedy, a Grand Overture by Louis Spohr.

After which,

THE IRISH TUTOR.

Rosa, Miss Lawrence. Mary, Mrs J. Hughes. Terry O'Rourke, Mr Power.
Mr Tillwell, Mr Evans. Charles, Mr Baker. Dr Flail, Mr Blanchard.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON'S Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr PEAKE.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.
Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ludwig Bomperts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Lockaley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; A Day After the Wedding; and Neuha's Cave.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

To which will be added, an entirely New Interlude, called

"MY OWN BLUE BELL;" OR, THE ARMY AND NAVY.

[By Mr D. PITT.]

Lucy Lance, Miss Nicol.

Miss Bella Blue, Ensign Blue, of the Guards, and David Allan, by Miss L. Slade. In which she will introduce 'My own Blue Bell,' 'All among the Hottentots,' and A Sailor's Hornpipe.

Major-General Sir Basil Blue, Mr D. Pitt.
Sergeant Bang, with the Song of 'Who'll serve the King,' Mr Vale.

To conclude with an entirely new Romantic Drama, entitled

ALWYN AND BERTHOLDY.

[By Mr G. ALMAR.]

Guthela, Miss Somerville. Madelca, Miss Vincent.
Leopold, Mr Almar. The Headsman, Mr Williams. Alwyn, Mr C. Hill.
Bertholdy, Mr Osbaldiston. Romberg, Mr D. Pitt. Herman, Mr Lee.
Mr Balsam Brown, Mr Vale. Arnold, Mr Gough. Solomon, Mr Webb.
Peter and Paul, Mr Asbury and Mr Hobbs. Reichkel Snips, Mr Rogers.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

And a New Divertissement Ballet, entitled

THE PATRIOTS OF POLAND.

With New Music by Mr Harroway.

The principal Characters by Mlle. Celeste, Mlle. Constance, Mlle. Josephine, Mr H. Cooke, Mr Seymour, and the Corps de Ballet.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, a New Overture by Spohr, Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

COBURG THEATRE.—Devil's Ducat—Peter Bell—Red Banner.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Bladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; R. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newsmanager and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reed.

Nº 210.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MAY 6, 1831.

THE JESUITS.

From the Second volume of Mackintosh's History of England, (just published.)

[PERHAPS so concise and comprehensive an account of this once formidable (and, as some think, still formidable) body, has never yet been laid before the reader.]

The institution of the Jesuits was a third means of opposing the rebellious and heretical spirit of the Lutheran age. Ignatius or Inigo Loyola, a Spanish Biscayan, of ardent and meditative temper, had imbibed a more than usual portion of the hatred towards the enemies of the catholic religion, which Spaniards had, beyond other nations, learnt in the course of the mortal feuds and fierce wars which had for centuries raged between the Christians and Mahometans of the peninsula, rather with the fury of civil discord than with the more regulated hostilities of foreign warfare. He was distinguished by imagination and feeling. His breast glowed with sincere piety; but his religion was that of a soldier determined to defend his faith, and ready to spread it by the sword. All the noble feats of Spaniards had been achieved for religion. It was the basis of their martial renown and of their national honour. He who was not an orthodox catholic could not be embraced as a true Spaniard. Loyola and his first associates amounted only to eight, all superior to other men in enthusiasm and fortitude: some possessed of those great qualities which enable men to produce mighty changes in the opinions of their fellows, and to exercise a lasting sway over willing minds. Their original purpose was limited to pilgrimages to the holy sepulchre and missions into unbelieving lands. Faure, Jai, and Coduri, of Geneva; Lainez, Salmeron, and Bobadilla, Spaniards; Roderic and Xavier, Portuguese; and Broet from Dauphiné, were the original Jesuits, of whom Francis Xavier, the apostle of the Indies, was a man worthy of everlasting honour, for devoting himself to a life of suffering for what he believed to be the supreme good of mankind; and the name of Lainez, the second general, cannot be forgotten as the man of legislative genius, who formed the plan and laid the foundation of that system which rendered the order memorable. Pope Paul III approved of their institution, under the name of "the Society of Jesus," on condition that their number should not exceed sixty. In 1543, when the restriction was removed, they increased to eighty. In the course of about fifty years their number was estimated at more than 10,000, or, according to some accounts, at nearly double that number. They were neither confined nor apparelled like monks. They were allowed to live in the world dressed like the secular clergy. They were destined to preach, to teach, to confute heretics, to convert unbelievers, to confess dying penitents, or to act in any manner required by the holy see for the interests of religion. The authority of their general was more absolute than that of the chief of any other order; and they were dispensed from the obligation of offering daily prayers in public, that they might have more leisure for their special and momentous destination.

Having arisen in the age of reformation, they became the chosen champions of the church against her new enemies. They used some generous and liberal weapons in their warfare. Instead of following the unlettered monks, who decided knowledge as the parent of heresy, they joined in the general movement of mankind towards polite literature, which they cultivated with splendid success. They were the earliest reformers of European education. "For education," said Lord Bacon, "consult the colleges of the Jesuits. Nothing hitherto tried in practice surpasses them."—"Education," says he, "has been in some sort revived in the colleges of the Jesuits, of whom, in regard to this and other sorts of human learning and moral discipline, talis cum sis utinam noster esses."

Peculiarly subjected to the see of Rome by their constitution, they were devoted to its highest pretensions from feeling the necessity of a monarchical power, to conduct their efforts against formidable enemies. While the nations of the Spanish peninsula, with barbaric chivalry, carried religion at the point of the sword to the uttermost extremes of the East and the West, the Jesuits reclaimed the American cannibals from savage customs, and taught them the arts and duties of civilised life. In India they suffered martyrdom with heroic constancy. They penetrated the barrier which shuts out strangers from China; and by the obvious usefulness of their scientific acquirements they obtained toleration, patronage, and honours, from the most jealous of governments. They were fitted by their release from conventual life, and from their allowed intercourse with the world, to be the confessors of kings; and while some guided the conscience of a royal penitent at Versailles or Vienna, others were teaching the use of the spade and the shuttle in California, and a third body were braving a death of torture from the mountain chiefs of southern India. No community ever practised with so much success the art of discerning the fitness of a peculiar frame of mind for some specific station. Hence this society of missionaries and schoolmasters had to boast of the most vigorous controversialists, the most polite scholars, the most refined courtiers, and (unfortunately) the most flexible casuists of their age.

They are the strongest if not the only proof afforded by authentic history, that an artificial system of government and education, formed at once by human contrivance, is, in some circumstances, more capable of attaining its proposed object than the general experience of mankind would warrant us to expect. The Jesuits had not leisure for works of genius or for discoveries in science, to say nothing of philosophical speculation, from which last they were interdicted by the adoption, or sometimes only by the profession, of implicit faith. Though they covered the world for two centuries with their fame and their power, they had no names who could be opposed to Racine and Pascal; the produce of the little persecuted community of Port Royal during its short and precarious existence. This observation, however, only imports that their powers were more applied to active than to contemplative life. It is foreign from our present purpose to trace the story of their downfall. They were hated by the secular clergy, and envied by other regulars, because they were the most potent of all associations of a monastic nature. They were watched with jealousy by statesmen and magistrates, on account of their boundless obedience to the see of Rome. To exalt the papal power, they renewed the scholastic doctrine of the popular delegation of the powers of government to rulers. The people themselves were on all controversies between them and their chiefs, to listen with reverential awe and unconditional subjection to the holy pontiff, the pastor of all subjects and sovereigns.

The doctrines of deposition and regicide were not peculiar to the Jesuits. They had been taught by other religious orders; and the first of them had been inculcated by Aquinas himself, the main column of the theological schools. It had been adopted by eminent persons among those protestants who, under Calvin, had risen against the civil authority, instead of being influenced by its guidance, like the followers of Luther. But the whole odium belonging to some of these opinions fell on the Jesuits, the stanchest polemics of the court of Rome, who were looked on with an evil eye by those true catholics, who acknowledged no final jurisdiction but that of the universal church, while they religiously respected the independent authority of the civil magistrate. As the Jesuits were a militia called out to combat the reformation, it is no wonder that they were regarded throughout all the reformed communions as incendiaries, always engaged in plotting the overthrow of protestant thrones, and in heaping up fuel to feed the flames, by which alone protestant nations could be recalled from heresy.

But they owed their decay to the use of the fatal expedients to which many of them, doubtless, trusted as the strongest props of their greatness. However shallow statesmen may be deluded by some short and superficial appearance to the contrary, it is a truth proclaimed by the whole course of human affairs, that public bodies and associations vested with legal rights cannot very long survive the decline and downfall of their moral character. General contempt and disgust are fatal to institutions which can flourish only by reverence. The corruption of those who profess to teach morality, or are appointed to enforce it, is an inconsistency which in the course of time shocks even the profligate. The Jesuits split on this rock. They had too carefully cultivated the dangerous science of casuistry, the inevitable growth of the practices of confession and absolution, which by inuring the mind to the habitual contemplation of those extreme cases in which there is a conflict of duties, and where one virtue may or must be sacrificed for the sake of a greater, does more to lessen the authority of conscience than to guide its perplexities. Casuistry has generally vibrated between the extremes of impracticable severity and contemptible indulgence. The irresponsible guides of the conscience of kings were led to treat their penitents with a very compliant morality, by the belief that no other could be observed by such penitents, by making too large allowances for the allurements which palliate royal vices, by the real difficulty of discovering when more austerity might plunge a prince into deeper depravity, by the immense importance of rendering his measures and councils, if not his example, favourable to religion: to say nothing of the subtle snares with which selfishness and ambition, often without the consciousness of the individuals, surrounded their narrow and slippery path. These and the like circumstances betrayed some of their doctors into shocking principles, which were held out to the world as the maxims of the society itself by the wit and eloquence of Pascal, one of the greatest, and, except to the Jesuists, one of the most just of men. The order certainly did not adopt the odious extravagancies of some members. But the immoralities were not sufficiently disavowed. The selection of particular cases, as matter of charge against a large body, has often the unjust effect of exaggeration. Yet it must be owned that invidious selection and even gross exaggeration are the indications of a proneness in the accused body towards the vice which appears in its harshest and most hideous shape in some of their worst members; and that they are a sort of natural, though not nicely equal, punishment of the wrong disposition which has infected the whole mass.

Digitized by Google

These were the principal preparations for those wars of religious opinion, in which the most conspicuous leaders on the side of the ancient establishment were Philip II and the duke of Alva; while the party who contended for reformation were conducted by William of Nassau prince of Orange, Henry of Bourbon king of Navarre, and Elizabeth Tudor queen of England. The mention of these names suggests to every writer of English history that he is about to enter on a more arduous task; to relate events which more powerfully command the fellow-feeling of after-times.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Sunday Library; or the Protestant's Manual for the Sabbath-day: being a Selection of Sermons from Eminent Divines of the Church of England, chiefly written within the last half century: with occasional Biographical Sketches and Notes. By the Rev. T. T. Dibdin, D.D. Rector of St Mary's, Bryanstone square, and Vicar of Exning, Suffolk. Vol. III. 12mo. pp. 332. Longman.

The present volume consists of 13 Sermons, by Bishops Horsley, Van Mildert and Gray, Professor White, Dr Parr, and Dr D'Oyly. It is ornamented by a good engraving of Bishop Horsley, the bishop who distinguished himself in the House of Lords by his violence against the first French revolution, and by his declared opinion, that "the people had nothing to do with the laws but to obey them." He here appears with all the advantages of those inequalities of which he was the advocate; his enlarged person displays his unfitness for the labours of a curate, and the plurality of his chins is emblamatic of his capacity to receive the double revenues of the Bishopric of Rochester and the Deanery of Westminster, two appointments which were conferred on him at the same time.

In glancing over the volume, the following passage in a sermon of Dr Parr has struck us as worth extracting:—

'In the careless undistinguishing admission of every doctrine which Christianity has been tortured to defend, no man can find his account, unless he be too lazy to examine Scripture proofs, or too stupid to comprehend them. But implicit belief, whether it arise from incapacity or idleness, makes no part of religion. It exposes men to delusion upon topics where it is their duty and their interest to obtain the most faithful and precise information. It disgraces Christianity, by infusing suspicions that the Scriptures cannot endure the test of impartial scrutiny; and it seduces Christians to affront a God of infinite wisdom, by offering to him a sacrifice of fools. Good works are the legitimate offspring of a rational belief; but an irrational beginning in credulity is not likely to terminate in virtue. The enthusiast indeed expects to propitiate the Almighty by the neglect rather than the exertion of his talents,—by the ardour of admiration, rather than the firmness of obedience,—by gloomy meditations amidst the obscurities of mystery, rather than serious attention to the clearest and most interesting truths.'

The series is to consist of six volumes.

MARMONTEL'S "ZEMIRE ET AZOR."

The account given by Marmontel of his Zémire et Azor, in his own life, has always been found entertaining, and is rendered particularly interesting at the present moment. 'When it was announced,' he says, 'at Fontainebleau, the current report was, that I had introduced on the stage the story of Beauty and the Beast, and that the principal character would enter on all fours. I quietly suffered the public to talk. I had written copious instructions for the dresses and decorations: but neither the tailor nor the decorator had given themselves the trouble to read what I had written; and all their preparations were made after the story of Beauty and the Beast. My friends were uneasy concerning the success of my piece: Grétry looked disconsolate: Clairval himself, who had so readily played all my other parts, expressed some repugnance at performing this. I asked him the reason:—"How can you expect," said he, "that I should render interesting a character in which I shall be hideous?"—"Hideous!" answered I: "you will not be at all so. You will be frightful at first sight; but in your ugliness you will have dignity and grace."—"Go then," said he, "and look at the beast-like dress they are preparing for me; for I am told it is horrible."

'The piece was to be played the next day; there was not a moment to lose. I asked to see the dress of Azor. I had great difficulty in obtaining permission from the tailor. He bade me be easy, and rely on him. But I insisted; and the Duke de Duras, ordering him to conduct me to the working-room, had the kindness to accompany me. "Show," said the tailor disdainfully to his workmen, "show the gentleman the dress of the Beast." What did I see? a close dress for the whole body, exactly like the skin of a monkey, with a long bare tail, a bald back, enormous claws to the four paws, two long horns to the cowl, and a mask of disgusting deformity, with boar's teeth! I was thunderstruck, and protested that my piece should not be played in this ridiculous and monstrous disguise. "What could you have wished?" said the tailor, with an impertinent air. "I could have wished," answered I, "that you had read the instructions I wrote: you would have seen that I desired to have the dress of a man, not that of a monkey."—"The dress of a man for a beast!"—"And who has told you that Azor is a beast?"—"The story tells me so."—"The story is not my work, and my work shall not be represented till all this be changed."—"It is too late now."—"Then I will go and petition the king to consent that this hideous spectacle may not be represented; and I will give my reason."

'My man then became more tame, and asked me what he should make "The simplest thing in the world," answered I; "a spotted pantaloon, shoes and gloves of the same, a doliman of pure satin, with black flowing hair, picturesquely scattered, a frightful mask, but not deformed, nor like a snout." There was great difficulty in finding all this, for the store-room was empty; but, by dint of obstinacy, I made myself obeyed; and for the mask, I formed it myself of pieces cut out of several others, and then joined together.

'The next morning I made Clairval try this dress; and, on looking at himself in his glass, he found it noble and imposing.—"Now, my friend," said I, "your success depends upon the manner in which you shall enter on the stage. If you appear confused, timid, embarrassed, we are ruined; but if you present yourself boldly, with assurance, and with a firm, expressive action, you will command respect; and this danger once past, I will answer for the rest."

'I found the decorator guilty of the same negligence with which this impertinent tailor had served me; and the magic picture, the most interesting incident of the piece, must have failed, if I had not done what his awkwardness would have spoiled. With two ells of silver mohair, to imitate a pier looking-glass, I taught him to produce one of the most agreeable of theatrical illusions.

'It was thus that, by my assiduity, instead of the disgrace with which I was threatened, I obtained the most brilliant success. Clairval played his part as I desired. The bold and firm step with which he entered produced that impression of astonishment which I expected, and from that instant I was at ease. I was in a corner of the orchestra, and had behind me a row of the court ladies. When Azor on his knees at the feet of Zémire, sang to her—

'Du moment qu'on aime
L'on devient si doux!
Et je suis moi-meme
Plus tremblant que vous.'

I heard these ladies say to each other, "He's now no longer ugly;" and added, the moment afterwards, "He is handsome."

'I ought not to dissemble that the charm of the music contributed marvellously to produce such effects. Grétry's was then what it very rarely has been since; and he was not sufficiently sensible of the care I took to trace him the character, the form, and the design of an agreeable and natural song. In general, the fatuity of musicians is to believe that they owe nothing to their poet; and Grétry, with much talent, had this folly in the highest degree.'—Harmonicon for May.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— It is not perhaps generally known, that Protestants dying in Spain are customarily buried at midnight (as if by stealth) and in unconsecrated ground; such is the prejudice of the Catholic natives! Within the last year, however, even in that bigoted country, a something like reform has been commenced, owing to the indefatigable exertions of the British Consul for Granada, resident at Malaga, where he has managed to obtain from the Spanish Government, confirmed by Fernando himself, a grant of a piece of ground for the express purpose of being hereafter used as a Protestant cemetery, which the Consul is causing to be circummured in a handsome manner; and in the absence of all Protestant Clergymen, he officiates as need may be. In the first instance of the ground being used, the lower classes of the natives evinced a disposition to ridicule the decorum with which the ceremony of interment, so novel to them, was conducted; but at length they appeared to view it with very different feelings! Formerly, our Protestant countrymen dying at Malaga were carried in the dead of the night to the sea-shore, and buried at low-water mark, lest the dogs or other animals should disturb the bodies!—J. T.

— An elderly lady residing at Southernsay, asked Tomkins, what sort of a tree the tree of liberty was? "A pop'lar tree, ma'am," was the immediate reply of our sagacious friend.—Exeter Gazette.

Digitized by Google

TITIAN.—Adjoining to this (the Pisani) palace, is one which formerly belonged to the Barberigo palace, and which is still honoured as the residence of Titian. The windows of the apartment in which the great painter died are kept closed, and his painting-room is said to be preserved exactly in the state in which he left it. It is decorated with his own productions, consisting chiefly of his latest works, and an unfinished sketch of S. Sebastian, upon which he was engaged at the period of his death, when he fell a victim to an epidemic pestilence, at the advanced age of ninety-nine!—Conder's Italy.

THE ANCIENT IRISH.

The Irish, who had previously worshipped one God, gradually fell into idolatry. Every hill, valley, fountain, and stream, had its presiding deity. They offered their devotions to things animate and inanimate. To the Sun they made regular sacrifices:—in the spring, when they committed the seed to the earth, "as he then dispels the dreary cold of winter, beautifies the face of nature, and, with his enlivening rays, is the great principle of life to the vegetable creation. They sacrificed to him at midsummer, that he might bring to maturity the fruits of the earth; and at November, when they were safely got in, they presented to him a sacrifice of thanksgiving. Of these, the sacrifice at midsummer is preserved in the fires which at that season are still regularly lighted up by the natives. The Druids, whose influence with the people was almost irresistible, are said to have been the corruptors of religion. Cormac, so famous in Irish story, saw with much concern the idolatrous practices of the nation. He laboured to reform them: but in vain. The Druids conspired against him; he was sacrificed to their resentment fur endeavouring to impress the people with a persuasion of the unity and perfections of God. * * * * * The houses of the Irish were first made of wood, or the branches of trees, afterwards necessity pointed out the additions of green turf, or of clay wrought into mortar, with a roof covered with straw or rushes; and in this rude state did they continue for many ages. The church of St Kianon, built in the sixth century, was the first structure of stone erected in the kingdom. Much has been said of the magnificence of the palace of Tarah, the ancient residence of our Irish kings. The author of the Philosophical Survey, who examined the ruins of it, asserts that it never could have been a building of much consequence. A regard to safety obliged the Irish early to collect themselves into villages. These consisted of huts irregularly disposed, and placed at a convenient distance, for the sake of subsistence. Our ancestors were plain in their dress, a long beard was a great ornament. But the highest object of their vanity or ambition was the privilege of wearing a variety of colours, as that was a principal mark of dignity. Next to the supreme monarch, those who were entitled to display six colours possessed the first place of honour. This distinction produced greater emulation, and commanded more respect than our modern stars and garters, and all the splendid trappings of eastern magnificence. The manners of the Irish were simple. They were frank, open-hearted, amorous, proud, much given to resentment. Their passions were quick and violent. No people in the world were more distinguished by warmth of affection. * * * * They were, in general, of a tall stature, well made, of a robust constitution, and patient of cold and hunger. Two creaghts travelling, when the fields were covered with snow, were overtaken by the night; upon going to sleep, one of them made a roll of snow for his pillow, "For shame!" said his companion, "are you grown effeminate?"—Crawford's Ireland.—[This story of the snow-ball has frequently been repeated, contrasted with that of the Sybarite who complained that the fold of a rose-leaf under him disturbed his rest, and applied to different individuals of different countries. The reader must determine for himself to whom he will give the most credit. The book from which this extract is made, bears the date of 1783.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—La Donna del Lago—La Nayade.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—And The Legion of Honour.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Exquisites—The Irish Tutor—And Neuha's Cave.

THE want of novelty at the Theatres during the last three or four days, together with the protracted indisposition of the Editor, have occasioned a temporary chasm in this department of the Tatler. The reader will be better served next week. In the meantime, that the absence of the usual heading may not suggest doubts as to when it will be resumed, we have prefixed it to the present article.

To those who consider the Theatre a school of humanity,—as a place in which all the varieties of which society is composed may meet, and, forgetting their artificial and even real distinctions, be made by one touch of nature to feel themselves akin, the labours of the dramatist and the actor will never be devoid of interest and importance. Few will be disposed to question, that instruction, and that of a very elevated kind, may be derived from dramatic exhibitions; and fewer still, that follies, pernicious in their influence on our habits and manners, may by this, better than by any other means, be held up to notice and contempt. Of the latter effect, numerous instances might be cited, and the extinction of such follies be clearly traced to the salutary counter-influence of the stage. But foregoing, for the present, all claim to consideration on these accounts, the stage may fairly challenge encouragement and praise on the score of its capability to afford relaxation and amusement; effects, however some may underrate them, that will never be thought unimportant by the considerate, or the truly wise. What a pleasant reflection it is, that to-night, for instance, hundreds of persons have been able to rescue themselves from the toils and anxieties of business, or even the dull routine of fashion and ceremony, to realise by the help of stage illusion and their own imaginations, the glorious deeds of patriotism by which Alfred won for himself never-dying fame, conferred on his subjects invaluable benefits, and bequeathed to posterity an example, not less worthy of the imitation of princes than of the admiration of the people. And even though less exalted sentiments than these may be excited by witnessing the representation of subjects of inferior moral elevation, the very disposition to be pleased, which must have preceded a visit to the theatre, is of itself so deserving of cultivation, that whatever may have tended to produce or increase it, whether recollections of past enjoyments, or anticipations of future pleasures, must be held entitled to the praise which is due to useful incentives, from all who interest themselves in the happiness of others.

F. F.

NEW THEATRES.—A New Theatre at Knightsbridge is projected; and anticipating the objection that its success will involve the distress and perhaps ruin of persons attached to the patent establishments, a writer sensibly observes, "What have the authorities of the state to do with that? A theatre is a shop where amusement is sold; and why should any public officer be required to take care that two many are not opened, more than to provide that in particular neighbourhoods only a certain number of grocers or cheesemongers should commence business? These are matters that must be left to time. A community has a right to the advantage of competition in everything, and those that give the best commodities will be sure to succeed." Nothing can be more unreasonable, and also more unsound in humanity, than to look at one side of the picture only—that of the distress to individuals attending the breaking down of a monopoly disadvantageous to the public; another side is also to be seen, and it presents the prosperity of persons employed in the new speculations. Here are two gains for one loss—the gain of the individuals engaged in the new concerns, and the gain of the public, which obtains new advantages in point of amusement and convenience. It is well to think of the people thrown into employment as of those thrown out. If some of the people of Covent Garden or Drury Lane must suffer by the establishment of new theatres, it is clear that by refusing the establishment of such theatres, there is another set of persons kept out of employment who would find employment in them. Thus, if in any case individuals are to suffer either by the monopoly or the injury of the monopoly, it is surely best that the public benefit should determine the question. As the patent theatres are not thriving properties, because their scale, plan, and management are not suited to the present convenience and taste of society, they, in fact, employ fewer persons than would be employed were the stage as flourishing as competition, securing public satisfaction and public favour, would render it. Supposing the old diligences, that travelled five-and-twenty miles a day, had enjoyed protecting patents, there would clearly have been fewer travellers than are now flying over the country. Improved convenience and adaptation to taste, produce an increased demand. By arbitrarily maintaining and giving a false encouragement to an unprofitable system, a market is prevented, and a failing trade carried on in a narrow space in place of it; various energies and applications of industry are thus refused scope and reward, individuals lose opportunities of employment, and the public the advantage which would result from leaving the field open to improvement.—New Monthly Magazine for May.—[The projectors of this undertaking are said to be Messrs Abbott, Ward, and Egerton.]

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE RIDICULOUS.—SAVAGE ROYALTY.—When the unfortunate King and Queen of the Sandwich Islands were in this country, they were taken to see Pizarro and a pantomime at Drury-Lane. Uninitiated in civilized feelings, however, the poor barbaric Sovereigns laughed heartily at the heroic deeds of Rolla and the maternal sorrows of Cora, whilst they never stirred a muscle at all the antics of the Clown, which they seemed to regard quite as "serious business." It would puzzle a philosopher (unless he were a Sandwich Island one) to account for this unusual effect of tragedy and pantomime.—[Their Majesties of the Sandwich Islands were not, perhaps, quite so absurd and irrational in the allotment of their laughter and gravity as the above paragraph seems disposed to represent them. If it be true, it is what Mr Coleridge would call a psycological curiosity. Perhaps their laughter at the heroic deeds of Rolla and the maternal sorrows of Cora was occasioned by a consciousness that it was all acting. Garrick himself is said to have made a joke of the exquisite pathos which he threw into the character of Lear, and to have laughed aside at the tears of the audience. By laughter, perhaps, these poor barbaric sovereigns expressed their approbation of the actors, or by laughter they may have shown that they saw through the hollowness of the pretence. Every one knows that a tragedy so performed as to be laughable, is, of all ludicrous exhibitions, the most ludicrous. But how are we to account for their gravity at the pantomime? They saw more deeply into it than nine-tenths of the spectators. They saw that it was, indeed, a serious business; they saw that the actors underwent much toil, and they pitied the labourers; or, peradventure, they did not know what it meant; or they might have had some compassion on the Clown, apprehending that he might break or dislocate his limbs; or, lastly, they might have imagined that so wise and enlightened a people as the English would not have exhibited such a spectacle but for some allegorical meaning, which they of the Sandwich Islands could not fathom, and they might have looked serious in the mere effort to ascertain the object of it.]—Atlas.

Digitized by Google

TO THE READER.

We have now before us, for regular notice (in addition to the brief ones that may be taken in the mean while), the second volume of 'Mackintosh's History of England,' the Poems of Mr Landor, 'Tales from the German of Tieck,' 'Keightley's Mythology,' Mr Knowles's New Tragedy, the opening numbers of two new magazines (the ENGLISHMAN and METROPOLITAN), the second volume of 'A Retrospect of Public Affairs,' &c. The Editor will resume his pen on these and other subjects at the beginning of the week.

The gentleman is thanked who sent us the Old Play-bill of the New Farce. It will appear, with due notice, at the same time.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke; and Rossini's Overture to 'Guillaume Tell.'

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

HOFER.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Bertha, Miss Pearson. Josephine Negretti, Miss Russell.
Margaretta, Mrs Newcombe.
Peasants—Therese, Mrs Bedford. Maria, Miss Faucit.
Bavarians—The Commandant of Innspruck, Mr Thompson. Batz, Mr Salter.
Colonel Donner, Mr Bland. Her Stetten, Mr Webster.
Tyrolese—Andreas Hofer, Mr Phillips. Gottlieb, Mr Yarnold.
Father Joachim Haspinger, Mr Bedford. Walther, Mr Sinclair.
Stephen, Mr Tayleure. Karl, Miss Chikini.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; a Ballet; and The Legion of Honour.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LES PROJETS DE MARIAGE.

Comédie en Un Acte, de M. A. DUVAL.

Rosaline, Mlle. Jamain.
M. Cazini, M. Préval. Germency, M. Pelissié. Belmont, M. Alfred.
Pedro, M. Laporte. Un Domestique, M. Granville.

Suivie de

MALVINA; OU, UN MARIAGE D'INCLINATION.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. SCRIBE.

Maivina, Mlle. L. Fay. Marie, Mlle. Florval. Catherine, Mme. Baudin.
M. Dubreuil, M. St Aubert. Arved Dubreuil, M. Paulin.
M. de Barentin, M. Alfred.

On Finira par

LA MARRAINE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.

Marriane, Mlle. L. Fay. Cécile, Mme. Gamard.
Edouard, M. Paulin. M. de Jordy, M. St Aubert. Champenoux, M. Laporte.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BAR MAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—

Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Lesbia, Zemira, Miss Cawse, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After which, the Interlude of

A DAY AFTER THE WEDDING.

Lady Elizabeth Freelove, Miss E. Tree. Mrs Davies, Mrs Tayleure.
Colonel Freelove, Mr Abbott. Lord Rivers, Mr Duruset. James, Mr Barnes.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON'S Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr PEAKE.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.
Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Spraying, Mr G Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ladwig Bompertz, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Locksley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, The Exquisites; and The Romance of a Day.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND; OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

After which,

A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.

[By MASSINGER.]

Lady Allworth, Miss M. C. Poole. Margaret, Miss Vincent.
Froth, Miss Nicol. Tabitha, Miss Rumens. Abigal, Miss Jordan.
Sir Giles Overreach, Mr Osbaldiston. Lord Lovel, Mr Gough.
Wellborn, Mr C. Hill. Allworth, Mr Honner.
Justice Greedy, Mr Vale. Marrall, Mr Williams. Tapwell, Mr Hobbs.
Order, Mr Lee. Amble, Mr Rogers.
Vintner, Mr Collier. Watchall, Mr Maitland. Furnace, Mr Webb.
Welldo, Mr Young. Tailor, Mr Asbury.

To conclude with a Romantic Melo-Drama, entitled

THE BROKEN SWORD.

[By W. DIMOND, Esq.]

Rosara, Miss Vincent. Stella, Miss Somerville. Jacintha, Miss Jordan.
Beatrice, Miss Nicol. Ninna, Miss Rumens. Jannette, Miss Boden.
Rosa, Miss R. Boden. Baron Maraldi, Mr Gough. Captain Zavior, Mr Williams.
Col. Rigolio, Mr D. Pitt. Claudio, Mr Honner. Pedro, Mr Thompson.
Pablo, Mr Vale. Esteven de Burgos, Mr C. Hill. Myrtillo, Mlle. Rosier.
Fabio, Mr Smith. Nicaro, Mr Boulanger. Bartolo, Mr Jones. Thomaso, Mr Wild.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

And a New Divertissement Ballet, entitled

THE PATRIOTS OF POLAND.

With New Music by Mr Harroway.

The principal Characters by Mlle. Celeste, Mlle. Constance,
Mlle. Josephine, Mr H. Cooke, Mr Seymour, and the Corps de Ballet.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stobwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr Lejeune. Sergeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, a New Overture by Spohr, Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

COBURG THEATRE.—Devil's Ducat—Peter Bell—Red Banner.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 10 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 149 Oxford street, next A... Flaxlone's Hotel; at EARL'S Library, Old Bond street.

Digitized by Google

No. 211.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Speech of the Right Hon. Edw. G. Stanley, Secretary for Ireland, &c. Delivered at the Town Hall, Windsor. 8vo. pp. 8. Oxley.

The above Speech is of some importance at the present moment, as it conveys the sentiments of a talented member of the Government on several subjects in which the public take a lively interest. The all-engrossing subject of Parliamentary Reform is naturally its prominent feature; but it also touches on the recent proceedings in Poland and Italy, in a tone perfectly accordant with the feelings of the country at large, and characteristic, it may be presumed, of the feelings of the Administration. Contrasting the actual position of England, availing herself of a season of peace to turn her attention to the abuses and defects of her institutions, Mr Stanley calls on his auditors to "observe the struggle which is now going on in Poland, and the blow which that glorious people are striking at the inhuman despotism of Russia, which it threatens to shake to its centre;—to turn their eyes towards Italy, and observe the troubles in the south, which so much disturb the councils of Vienna." Proceeding to the question of Reform, he vindicates Ministers from the charge which the opponents of the bill have brought against them,—that of arbitrarily requiring that it shall be accepted as perfect, without allowing due consideration of its details:—

'Allusions have been made, both in and out of Parliament, to the alleged pertinacity of Ministers in adhering to "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill;" as if this implied such a doggedness as might prevent them from availing themselves of any useful suggestions that might be thrown out for consideration. Ministers disclaimed any such motives. But for the principle, they would not abate one inch. They will have the whole principle of the Bill, and nothing but the principle of the Bill; and the principle of it is, that there shall be no nomination borough,—no, not one; that no corporations, in great towns, shall monopolize to themselves the nomination of Members of Parliament, to the exclusion of the inhabitants of the town. No non-resident voters,—persons who have no connexion with the place, shall exercise the suffrage, to the exclusion of persons who have an immediate interest in it.'

The Hon. Gentleman takes occasion to expose the hypocrisy of those pretended Reformers who profess a willingness to punish the delinquencies of such corrupt boroughs as may have been so unfortunate as to be found out, while they are willing to afford their sanction to persons whom they are morally certain differ only from the discovered offenders in the more skilful concealment of their guilt. The purchaser of a seat by wholesale sitting in judgment on the purchasers and sellers by retail, is judiciously brought in to give effect to the picture.

'I have seen five or six cases of this description during my short Parliamentary career, and I hope I may never be doomed to see another; for, independent of the enormous expense to the country, these exhibitions are, to my mind, most absurd and disgusting; for, be it observed, these scrupulous personages not only require the best and strongest proof, but evidence with all the clearness and technicality of law, concerning transactions, of the existence of which everybody is morally certain; which, in fact, is matter of public notoriety. But when it is obtained, what does the proof amount to, after all? Why, to this—that a poor labourer has been prevailed upon to receive five guineas for his vote. (Loud cries of "Hear!") Then it is that the virtuous indignation of these gentlemen is excited (a laugh)—then they lift up their hands and eyes in utter amazement, astounded at the delinquency that has been brought to light (loud laughter); and vehemently insist—do these virtuous gentlemen—that the poor man shall be brought to the bar of the House, to be reprimanded for his profligate conduct, and to be told, that for his crimes the borough is to be disfranchised! (Loud cheers). But when a case came before the public—and the public were in the habit of hearing of such things every day—of Lord A. selling a seat to Lord B. for two thousand pounds,—then there is no indignation, no astonishment at the magnitude of the crime—no denouncement of the profligacy of the criminal—no threat of punishment or disfranchisement. (Loud cheering). Oh, no! quite the contrary; this very man is permitted, not only to take his seat in the House unquestioned, and by the side of the real representatives of the people, but is allowed even to sit on the committee to try the very case of delinquency to which he is himself an accomplice, and very possibly to express his pious horror at conduct in which he may have himself so largely participated. (Cheers, and laughter.)—"Now this is a case which must not—which shall not be!" (Enthusiastic cheering). These, it would be seen, are the excrescences, and not the spirit of the Constitution, sapping instead of cementing the rights and liberties of Englishmen. This is a system, which it is evident cannot last; and it will be the endeavour of Ministers to build up their new Constitution—call it revolution—call it what you please—in such a manner as to establish all that is good in the old Constitution on a more firm and permanent foundation. (Loud cheers).'

The measure is now in the hands of the people, who have, in no equivocal manner, shewn their sense of its importance. Everywhere are the advocates of abuse and of the strong-holds of corruption meeting with discomfiture; everywhere is the cause of improvement finding fresh advocates and making new converts, and speedily will the issue be tried—speedily will the combatants for and against the interests of the people encounter in the proper arena; and momentous as will be the consequences of victory, on whichever side it may be determined, the country is looking on with the tranquillity of well-founded hope, and the certainty arising from conviction, that the ultimate result is in her own power.

The Works of Lord Byron. In 6 vols. Vols. V and VI, 18mo. pp. 460 and 476. Murray.

The publication of these two volumes completes, with the exception of 'Don Juan,' the small edition of his Lordship's works. They comprise The Hours of Idleness, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, Hints from Horace, The Curse of Minerva, The Waltz, The Age of Bronze, The Vision of Judgment, Morgante Maggiore, Werner, The Deformed Transformed, Heaven and Earth, The Island, and a variety of smaller Poems not before collected, including those contained in Mr Moore's two volumes of Memoirs. They contain, besides, two neat engravings by Finden, from drawings by Richter.

The works themselves are too well known to require criticism; and nothing more is necessary than the announcement of their publication, and to bestow just commendation on the manner in which they are got up, and their extraordinary cheapness.

F. F,

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

History of England; Family Library, No. XXI. Murray.

THE ENGLISH IN THE DAYS OF POPE GREGORY.

Pope Gregory had become much interested in the welfare of the Anglo-Saxons, in consequence of an incident which happened to him at an early period of his life. It chanced that he passed through the market at Rome, where certain dealers had just arrived from foreign parts with various kinds of merchandise. Amongst other articles, there were slaves for sale, like cattle. This wicked traffic had existed from time immemorial; and though Christianity had alleviated the lot of the slave, it had not succeeded in breaking his bonds. Gregory, therefore, could only pity the captives; and he was particularly interested by the appearance of some poor little lads, who stood trembling in the expectation of being consigned to a new master. They were beautiful children, with ruddy cheeks and blue eyes, and their fine yellow tresses flowing in long curls upon their shoulders. Long hair in those days, was a token of dignified birth. Only kings and nobles were accustomed to allow of its growth: persons of an inferior or servile class were closely shorn. Gregory must, therefore, have felt an additional motive for compassion, since he perceived that these children had sustained some great reverse of fortune—and their sufferings must be comparatively much more poignant than if they had been accustomed to privation and labour. The father of the boys had probably been killed in war; and the children brought up in ease and comfort, were now exposed to hopeless captivity, passing from the tender care of their parents to the power of a merciless task-master in a strange land.

Digitized by Google

'To what nation do these poor boys belong?' was the question which Gregory asked of the dealer. 'They are Angles, Father.'—'Well may they be so called, for they are as comely as angels; and would that, like angels, they might become Cherubim in Heaven! But from which of the many provinces of Britain do they come?'—'From Deira, Father.'—'Indeed,' continued Gregory, speaking in Latin, 'De irâ Dei liberandi sunt.'—From the wrath of God they are to be delivered. And when, on asking the name of their king, he was told it was Ella, or Alla, he added, that Alleluiah—praise ye the Lord—ought to be sung in his dominions.

TRADITION OF HOXNE.

During their invasion of the kingdom of the East Angles, the Danes displayed even more than usual ferocity. King Edmund was defeated and made captive. It is said, that this event took place at Hoxne, in Suffolk. Being hotly pursued by his foes, he fled to this town, and attempted to conceal himself by crouching beneath a bridge, now called Goldbridge. The glittering of his golden spurs discovered him to a newly-married couple, who were returning home by moonlight, and they betrayed him to the Danes. Edmund, as he was dragged from his hiding-place, pronounced a malediction upon all who should afterwards pass this bridge on their way to be married? and so much regard is paid to this tradition by the good folks of Hoxne, that now (or at least till within the last twenty years) no bride or bridegroom would venture along the forbidden path.

INVENTION OF PRINTING.

The principle of printing, the employment of a solid type or letter, for the purpose of taking an impression by means of a coloured pigment—and which is only a variation of the effect produced by the die or seal—was certainly known to the Romans. Stamps, with raised letters, exactly like our printing types, excepting that they are not moveable, and by which the Romans produced short inscriptions, are yet extant. Common tradesmen employed such stamps for printing the labels of their wares. The ancient Visigoths in Spain printed their 'paraphs' or 'signs' flourished with knots and monograms, which they affixed to their deeds and charters. These are instances upon a small scale; but we know of one entire and very important volume produced by the process of printing anterior to the fifth century. The silver letters of the 'Codex argenteus,' the volume containing the version of the Gospels, made by Ulfila, Bishop of the Mæsogoths, were produced by types employed to fix the leaf upon the purple parchment, nearly in the manner now practised by bookbinders.

From this stage of printing, for printing it was, though tedious and operose to our present mode, the transition appears most easy. Yet the discovery was not made; and in Europe there was a barrier which could not be passed. Not so in China, where block-printing came into active operation within that period, which, to us, is the darkest age. There, the practice and effects of the art must have been witnessed by the acute and ingenious Venetian traveller, Marco Polo. This individual was gifted with no ordinary powers of observation; and it might have been expected that the increasing desire for learning which prevailed in his own country, would have induced him to bring back so useful and so profitable a contrivance. Roger Bacon, who had received much information concerning China, describes the process, not in obscure and mysterious terms, but with the utmost plainness and precision of language. Yet he failed to teach the lesson which he had learnt, nor was the disclosure made till the appointed time.

OLD ENGLAND.

The 'three tribes of Germany'—the Jutes, the Angles, and the Saxons, by whom Britain was subdued, seem originally to have constituted but one nation, speaking the same language, and ruled by Monarchs who all claimed their descent from the deified Monarch of the Teutons, Woden or Odin. They frequently changed their position on the firm land of Europe, as the stream of population rolled forward, impelled by the secondary causes, prepared and destined to act in fulfilment of the decree by which the enlargement of Japhet had been foretold.

The Jutes, together with their neighbours the Angles, dwelt in the peninsula of Jutland, or the 'Cimbric Chersonesus,' and in the adjoining Holstein, where there is still a district called Anglen. That, in fact, is the real Old England; and properly speaking, our 'Old England' is New England, though now we give that name to a province in America.

EXTINCTION OF THE BRITISH LANGUAGE.

The Britons were so unmixed with their conquerors, that they kept their ancient speech until the reign of Henry VIII, when it gradually became obsolete In the reign of Queen Anne, it was known only in a few villages near the Land's End. The children as they grew up learnt English; and as the old Cornish folks died off, the language gradually expired with them; so that towards the middle of the reign of King George III, one Dolly Pentrath, an old fish wife, who resided about three miles from Mousehole, near Penzance, was the only surviving individual in the world, who could converse in the tongue of the ancient Damnonian Britons; which tongue, however, she put to a very bad use, since she principally employed it in swearing and grumbling when she could not get a good price for her fish, or in scolding when she was offended.

At this present time, the names of fields and towns, hills and rivers, in Cornwall, are the only memorials of the British language, whose extinction cannot be contemplated without sentiments approaching to regret. The most useful political virtues arise from an honest feeling of nationality; and no badge of nationality is more innocent and efficient than the cherished possession of an ancient, and, at the same time, peculiar language.

LONDON, IN THE TIME OF ETHELBERT,

Was still noted for its opulence; its fame was diffused far and wide; and the city was the resort of merchants from all parts of the world. I say, still, because it had been equally pre-eminent in the Roman times. And the great confusion consequent upon the Saxon conquest had scarcely injured the prosperity of London, which has continued increasing from the time of the Romans till the present day.—London was quite unlike the great metropolis which we now inhabit. Its extent was confined to what is now termed 'the city,' then surrounded by a wall, built, as it is supposed, about the age of Constantine, and of which a few fragments are existing. All around was open country. Towards the north-east a deep marsh,—the name is yet preserved in Moorfields,—extended to the foot of the Roman ramparts. On the western side of the city, and at the distance of nearly two miles, the branches of a small river which fell into the Thames formed an island, so overgrown with thickets and brushwood, that the Saxons called it 'Thorney,'' or the 'Isle of Thorn.' The river surrounding Thorney crept sullenly along the plashy soil; and the spot was so wild and desolate, that it is described as a fearful and terrible place, which no one could approach after night-fall without great danger. In this island there had been an ancient Roman temple, consecrated to Apollo. And Sebert, perhaps on account of the seclusion which Thorney afforded, resolved to build a church on the site, and he dedicated the fabric to St Peter the Apostle. This church is now Westminster Abbey; the busy city of Westminster is old Thorney Island, that seat of desolation; and the bones of Sebert yet rest in the structure which he founded. Another great church was built by Sebert, in the city of London, upon the ruins of the heathen temple of Diana. This church is now St Paul's Cathedral; and Mellitus being appointed the first Bishop by Ethelbert and Sebert, the succession has continued to the present day.

ROME AND ITS CLERGY.

"Their resentments," says Mr Forsyth, speaking of the Romans, "can lie brooding for years before they start out. In their quarrels, I never saw any approach to fair fighting. Boys fly to stones, and men to the clasp-knife, but the most desperate ruffian abstains from fire-arms. To shoot your enemy is held atrocious; to plunge a stiletto in his back, a proof of spirit."—"I am told," says Mr Simond, "there is now about one murder a day committed at Rome. Formerly, the average was from five to six each day, and fourteen are actually known to have taken place during one great festival. Most of these are vulgar murders, among the lowest of the people, in consequence of accidental broils when they are heated with liquor; for, notwithstanding their reputation for sobriety, Italians (the vulgar at least) often get intoxicated, and from some peculiarity of constitution, become drunk with very little wine. Among them, a first murder establishes the reputation of a young man, as among their betters, a first duel; and their idea of courage, and also of liberty, seems to consist in the free use of the stiletto! Such is the prevalent feeling, that the popular exclamation of Povero Cristiano is applied not to the bleeding man on the ground, but to the person who stabbed him."—Conder's Italy.—[This proneness to murder, and the application of the exclamation of pity, are better accounted for, and understood, when coupled with the following passage from the same work:]—No class in the Papal State can be more important than the clergy. These in general are learned, at least literary men; pretty correct in exteriors, and guarded in their debauchery. From the length and rigour of their education, most of them smell of the college, or of the convent. Yet sometimes you meet an abatino di città, a modern Rucellai, who may be fairly put in competition with our own clerical bucks. When dazzled with the splendour of the Roman clergy, through all their gradation of colour,—grey, black, purple, scarlet, up to the sovereign white; when we have admired their palaces, their liveries, their carriages wheeled out in rows to be admired; let us then reverse the medal, and view the exhaustion which this gross plethora of clerical wealth leaves below it. Let us survey all the forms of misery, the sicknesses, the sores, the deformity, the hunger, which infest the streets, where every beggar is distinguished by his own attitude, tone, and variety of the pathetic, while all together present a strange climax of wretchedness. * * * In the courts of palaces you meet with wretches gnawing the raw roots gleaned from the dunghill; and at night you will sometimes find at your gateway, a poor boy sleeping close to his dog for natural warmth. Such is the metropolis of Christ's Church visible on earth.

GEOGRAPHICAL COSTUME.—So constant are the women of this class (the peasantry) to local costume, that the female head becomes a kind of geographical index. At Macerata, they adhere to the ancient mode of plaiting and coiling the hair, which they transfix with long silver wires, tipped at both ends with large knobs. At Recanati, they hang golden bells to their ear-rings, three or four to each chime, jingling like the crotalia of the Roman matrons. At Loreto, they adjust the handkerchief to their heads, in the style of their Madonna. All the young men bind their hair in coloured nets; an ancient affectation of female attire, as appears from Juvenal's censure of the thing. Nowhere could I see that gracefulness, or even that simplicity so much admired in the rural costume. In this country, whenever the peasant is fine, he is frightful.—Conder's Italy. (From Forsyth.)

Digitized by Google

THEATRICALS AT CORUNNA.

In the evening we repaired to the opera at Corunna: a pistareen and a half, which I think is about fourteen-pence, was the price of admission to the pit. The house was not quite so large as the theatre in the Haymarket; and, like most foreign places of this kind, was kept, I believe on purpose, almost dark, or what we should call ill-lighted. The pit was divided into separate stalls with a contrivance to each, by which the seat might be folded back and locked, till the "open sesame" of a quarter of a dollar should be applied to it. There were three tears of boxes, and over all a gallery, exclusively occupied by women; at each entrance to which stood a grim-looking Cerberus, armed with a musket, and fixed bayonet, to prevent any intermixture of the sexes. England, it may be observed, is the only country where this propinquity of the men and women is not interfered with. Even the pit is appropriated in Spain exclusively to the men; but in the intermediate ranges of boxes, the natural order of things is allowed to follow its course. The first piece was one of those old Scriptural exhibitions called Mysteries, or Moralities. It represented Nebuchadnezzar, first, in all his glory, when his greatness reached unto heaven; and then in his downfall and misery, eating grass like an ox in the fields, with his hair like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. These variations in the features of the ill-advised monarch gave ample room for the display of theatrical tricks, which were much applauded. One of these led to some very irreverent mirth. Instead of casting three full-grown men, Shadrach and his companions, into the burning fiery furnace, they varied the history a little, and, by a broad enough poetical license, substituted three children, which change, on this occasion, led to an awkwardness in the unity of the piece, very provoking, I dare say, to the stage-manager, though it made the audience laugh heartily. The children, after being tossed into the fire, were exhibited in the next moment, amongst the clouds, as angels, but as it might have been inconvenient, or dangerous, to set them actually flying about, a device was hit upon, to produce the same effect, as far as could be. An upright pole being fixed in the back part of the stage; three bars were attached to it, on the ends of which the little angels being stuck, the whole apparatus was made to whirl about amongst a set of most substantial-looking clouds. For a time, all this seemed good enough fun, and the children smiled and flapped their wings as they were bid. Presently, however, one of these little urchins, becoming alarmed at her elevation, gave a squeak, so very different from the music of the spheres, that we could distinctly hear the beatified spirit getting a pretty smart lecture from the prompter's little box in the front part of the stage. I suspect the cords which bound it to the upper world, were rather too tightly drawn; for, after one of those ominous pauses during which a child when hurt, gathers all its strength, only to give a louder roar, our young friend in the ninth heaven of the theatre, set up such a bawling as I have seldom heard out of the nursery. It suited its little actions, also, to its loud sounds, by kicking and struggling, till the whole firmament of the stage-manager's invention appeared in jeopardy. The poor man, at length losing all patience, came forward and scolded the child, till the laughter of the house drowned every other noise, and the curtain fell amidst universal applause. The next piece was also a sacred drama, called "Daniel in the Lions' Den," which to our great astonishment, caused almost as much mirth as the terror of the suffering angel had done before. The natives, indeed, appeared to come prepared for this sort of thing; and although the strangers were more scandalized than they were at such impious trifling, it was totally beyond the power of human muscles to preserve an unmoved countenance during this scene. The lions, as may be supposed, mustered in great force; and odd enough figures they looked, sprawling about the stage, amongst priests, nuns, cardinals, soldiers, and all sorts of characters, brought, for what reason I know not, into the den along with Daniel, manifestly in the teeth of all history, sacred or profane. Into the midst of this goodly company a great clumsy angel descends, by aid of stout ropes, thick enough to have made topsail-haulyards for a frigate; and after performing the object of his mission, by complimenting Daniel on his good looks and courage, again took flight amongst the pasteboard clouds and copper thunders of the theatrical sky. As the celestial messenger was hoisted slowly upwards, all the monks, virgins, and other companions of Daniel, fell on their knees to the sound of music in the orchestra, so very beautiful, and played in such fine taste, that we almost forgot the absurdity of the rest of the performance. But the lions, who well knew their power over the audience, and were not to be so neglected, presently marched to the front of the stage, keeping correct time to the music. This was comical enough; but they had not done,—for they now gradually raised themselves on their nether ends, and, with the most ineffable looks of mock piety, extended their fore-paws towards the retiring angel, in the attitude of prayer. This abominable piece of burlesque was almost too much for an audience prepared, as we have seen, to swallow a good deal, for, after pausing a moment, to consider, as it appeared, whether they should hiss the lions or applaud them, they burst into a shout of outrageous mirth. The actors caught the infection, lions inclusive; and even Daniel himself, putting his hands to his sides, roared with laughter in the middle of the stage! Could it reasonably be expected, that a couple of heretics in the pit were to sit grave spectators of such a scene?—Hall's Fragments of Voyages and Travels.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Les Projets de Mariage—Malvina—La Marraine.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—And Hofer.
COVENT GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—A Day After the Wedding—And Neuha's Cave.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.—THE PATRIOTS OF POLAND. MLLE. CELESTE.

DEAR MR TATLER,—The plot of this Ballet is nothing more than the setting out of a few youths to fight the Russians, and their coming back—their ladies praying for them at their departure, and dancing for joy at their return. There may be some little bye-plot, but in a melo-drama it is almost impossible to catch it.

The piece (which I conceive was intended for nothing more than to display the admirable and graceful dancing of the two French ladies, Mlles. CELESTE and CONSTANCE) is well got up, as far as scenery and dresses go, but altogether badly supported. The gentleman who acted the father seemed totally at a loss what to do, and the corps de ballet, with the exception of one lady, are by no means effective. The ladies who were boys, in enlarging their calves evidently had frightful notions of the manly leg. Huge layers of muscle and abundant fat were their characteristics; not to mention that each gentleman had one leg half as big again as the other.

Mlle. CONSTANCE is not so graceful as her sister, nor so handsome. She is very pretty, however, and has that good-natured look from her eyes that so frequently charms us in French ladies. Talking of French people, by the bye, I witnessed a curious specimen of their attention to ladies in matters of little importance. Three or four English young men came into my box, and passing some ladies who were sitting in the third row, took possession of the second, and kept their hats on. A young Frenchman entering a short time afterwards, and observing the state of things (having taken his own hat off as he came in), intimated to the gentlemen that ladies were behind them, and requested them to uncover. Two of them did so, but the third still keeping his hat on, the French gentleman changed places with the lady who sat immediately behind him, and bore the inconvenience himself. I have often observed the brutish behaviour of gentlemen to women in English theatres, but hope that in these times of reform and unanimity, they will follow the example of their neighbours in this case, as they have done in others of greater importance.

Mlle. CELESTE was as charming as usual, only I thought her vest somewhat too long. She likewise seems to me to appear to greater advantage in lady's than in man's clothes. Her walk, elegant for a woman, is fantastic for a soldier; and the more beautiful the figure of a female, the less must it appear to advantage in masculine habiliments.

May her Benefit, fixed for Thursday next, prove a bumper, and in some degree reward her for the pleasure she has given so many hundreds, myself among the number.

It is always a pleasure to me to visit this theatre. The company, for a minor, is very good, and the snug boxes, and altogether elegant appearance of the interior, since it has been refitted, are attractions not to be found in other establishments of this sort.

Your ardent admirer,

VESTER.

I recognized little Miss JOSEPHINE, as the young lady that played Cupid so prettily at Madame VESTRIS's Theatre. Her dancing was occasionally out of time, but it was tasteful, and not unworthy the grace of Mlle. CELESTE.

TUSKER TELEGRAPH.—The establishment for the extension of the telegraph to the coast of Ireland commenced operation yesterday. It is a most extraordinary coincidence that, when the present telegraph from Liverpool to Holyhead was opened, the first vessel reported was the Napoleon; the news of her report was first taken to New York by the Josephine; and the first vessel reported by the new establishment at Tusker is again Napoleon.—Liverpool Courier.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A Curious Clock.—Over this porch (the Orologio or Clock-tower of St Mark's Place, Venice) stands that admirable clock, celebrated next to Strasburg for its many movements; among which, about twelve and six, which are the hours of Ave Maria, when all the town are on their knees, come forth the Three Kings, led by a star, and passing by the image of Christ in his Mother's arms, do their reverence, and enter into the clock by another door. —Conder's Italy. (Quoted from Evelyn.)

An Infidel Village.—It is told as a well-known jest, that a beggar woman, repulsed from door to door as she solicited quarters through a village of Annandale, asked, in her despair, if there were no Christians in the place. To which the hearers, concluding that she enquired for some persons so surnamed, answered, "Na, na, there are nae Christians here; we are a' Johnstones and Jardines." —Notes to Guy Mannering.

Highland Physicians.—The story of the bridegroom carried off by Caterans on the bridal day, is taken from one which was told to the author by the late laird of MacNab, many years since. To carry off persons from the Lowlands, and to put them to ransom, was a common practice with the wild Highlanders, as it is said to be at the present day with the banditti in the South of Italy. Upon the occasion alluded to, a party of Caterans carried off the bridegroom, and secreted him in some cave near the mountain of Schihallion. The young man caught the small-pox before his ransom could be agreed on; and whether it was the fine cool air of the place, or the want of medical attendants, MacNab did not pretend to be positive; but so it was, that the prisoner recovered, his ransom was paid, and he was restored to his friends and bride; but always considered the Highland robbers as having saved his life, by their treatment of his malady.—Notes to Waverley.

TO BLOSSOMS.

Fair pledges of a fruitful tree,
Why do ye fall so fast?
Your date is not so past,
But you may stay yet here awhile,
To blush and gently smile,
And go at last!

What, were ye born to be
An hour or half's delight,
And so to bid good night?
'Tis pity Nature brought ye forth,
Merely to shew your worth,
And lose you quite.

But your lovely leaves, where we
May read how soon things have
Their end, though ne'er so brave:
And after they have shewn their pride,
Like you awhile they glide
Into the grave.

Herrick.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, entitled

L'ULTIMO GIORNO DI POMPEI.

[By Pacini.]

Ottavia, wife of Sallustio . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Sallustio, elected to the Office of First Magistrate . . Sig. Lablache.
Menenio, son of Sallustio . . . Mme. Castelli.
Appio Diomede, tribune . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Pubblio, keeper of the public Baths . . . . . Signor Deville.
Clodio, a Youth, son of Pubblio . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Fausto, a Freeman of Sallustio . . . . Sig. De Angeli.

After which, the New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA NAYADE.

[Composed by M. Taglioni.]
The Music by M. Nadaud.

Principal Characters, Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, and Mlle. Brocard.
M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr Thompson.]
The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Sheiah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

After which an entirely New Petites Drama, entitled

CHARLIE OVER THE WATER.

The Characters by Miss Vincent, Messrs C. Hill, Gough, Maitland, Webb, and Asbury.

To conclude with the Romantic Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. Von Weber.]
Agnes, Miss Somerville.
Rodolph, Mr Edwin. Rollo, Mr Ransford. Killian, Mr Vale:

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr Knowles.]
The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maudé, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Ethelred, Miss Swift. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles.'

After which,

A DIVERTISSEMENT.

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr Planché.]
The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

On Monday, Alfred the Great; and Der Freischutz.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Comedy, in Five Acts, called

THE EXQUISITES.

[By Don Telesforo de Trueba y Cosio.]

Mrs Stockland, Mrs Gibbs. Harriet, Miss Nelson.
Lilian Evondale, Miss E. Tree. Kitty, Mrs Keeley.
Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble. Count Valmore, Mr G. Bennett.
Lord Belcourt, Mr Parry. Hon. Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott. Melton, Mr Wrench.
Gosling, Mr Keeley. Sir Benjamin Bonus, Mr Bartley.
Mr Stockland, Mr Egerton. Thornton, Mr Henry.
Timothy Oldstyle, Mr Blanchard. Col. O'Ramrod, Mr Turnour.
Strut, Mr Power.
James, Mr Mears. Robert, Mr Heath. Gentleman, Mr Irwin.
The Prologue to be spoken by Mr Abbott.

Previous to the Comedy, a Grand Overture by Louis Spohr.

To conclude with a New Operatic Melo-Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music by Mr H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss Forde. Liese, Miss E. Tree. Therèse, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs Gibbs. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. Cawse.
Adolph, Mr Wilson. General Kienwitz, Mr Bartley.
Col. Francœur, Mr Abbot. Nikel Unterland, Mr G. Penson. Moritz, Mr Blanchard.
Fritz Klaffen, Mr Keeley. Paul Richter, Miss Taylor.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; and Neuha's Cave.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

An Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'Farren.]
The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Mina, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Bertrand, Mr Munroe.
Conrad, Mr H. Cooke. Maurice, Mr Barnett. Godfrid, Mr Keppell.
Peter Pluffen, Mr J. Russell.

And a New Divertissement Ballet, entitled

THE PATRIOTS OF POLAND.

With New Music by Mr Harroway.
The principal Characters by Mlle. Celeste, Mlle. Constance, Mlle. Josephine, Mr H. Cooke, Mr Seymour, and the Corps de Ballet.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr Raymond.]
The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr Haines.]
The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mouss, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, a New Overture by Spohr, Mehul's Overture to 'Les Deux Aveugles,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

Coburg Theatre.—Devil's Ducat—Peter Bell—Red Banner.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Eber's Library, Old Bond street; W. Kennath, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court

Digitized by Google

No. 212.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MAY 9, 1831.

THE FAGGING SYSTEM.

Among the many advantages to be looked forward to from the march of liberality in the present times, are to be reckoned the improvements that must necessarily take place in the mode of tuition and general management of our public schools. When it is recollected that "the child is father to the man," it will be allowed that this is a matter deserving of more serious attention than it has hitherto met with. Bad education produces bad members of society, in every grade, from the legislator to the labourer.

In a clever article in the Edinburgh Review,* on "the Public Schools of England," some of the prominent vices of the present systems of school discipline and education are forcibly pointed out. Hitherto the sticklers for antiquated abuses have uniformly resisted all improvement in this quarter; and, with an amiable consistency in wrong, whenever the perfection of any of these various establishments has been questioned, have maintained, "that each one of all the many different systems adopted at the public schools, is the best possible."

Happily, this state of things has had its day. But what has chiefly interested us in the article referred to, is the following exposé of the evils of the Fagging System at Eton and Westminster:—

'Westminster is one of those public schools in which the practice of fagging is still maintained. The three highest forms have the privilege of commanding: the fourth form is in a sort of intermediate, or probationary state, as it neither fags nor is fagged; all boys in the under school are subject to the duty of obeying. In comparing the condition of the fags at Eton and Westminster, it appears that the former have the advantage of being more numerous in proportion to their masters; for, whereas at Eton, the lower boys outnumber the upper boys, at Westminster the lower boys are scarcely a third part of the whole. At Westminster, however, boys, on their first entrance, are not unfrequently placed in the upper school; but at Eton it is a rule, for which we know no reason, but which we believe to be universally acted upon, that no boy at his first coming shall be placed in a form where he is not liable to be fagged.

'We have heard with pleasure that the system of fagging has at Westminster been lately alleviated, and the number of menial services required of the lower boys considerably lessened. We say with pleasure; for we can see nothing useful or improving in the imposition of menial duties on the sons of persons, who, by their station in life, are not dependent for their livelihood upon bodily labour; and we abide by our former arguments and our former conviction, notwithstanding the defence which it has lately been attempted to make for the practice of fagging. We are perfectly willing to take the issue which has been offered to us, and to ask "whether, in large public schools, on the whole, much tyranny is not saved by laying down a rule for the subordination of the boys, instead of leaving them to settle the matter amongst themselves?" In the first place, it is natural to ask, how a rule which legalizes tyranny can be said to save it? Boys are capricious in their wishes and tempers, imperfectly restrained by moral principle and the sense of shame, fond of exercising power, and unscrupulous about the means by which they exercise it. It is therefore certain, that when several hundred boys live together at a large school, the strong will combine against the weak, and compel them, by bodily force, to obey the commands of their superiors in strength. Comparative strength in such cases depends chiefly upon age; and the older boys being most advanced in learning, it may be generally said that the boys in the upper part of the school will attempt to exact obedience from those in the lower part. A lower boy soon finds that if he refuses to submit, he is beaten, and that other strong boys will be unwilling to protect him, both from the natural unwillingness to interfere in the quarrels of others, and from a fear of sanctioning a principle which may be turned against themselves. Still the rule of submission is not fixed, and some bold spirits among the weaker party may attempt to set up a right of resistance. At this point the authorities of the school are supposed to step in, and say to the boys: "in order to prevent a recurrence of the unfortunate disputes which have arisen amongst you, we declare that those commands which some of you contend to be harsh and oppressive, are, if properly considered, conducive to your benefit; and that henceforth all boys beneath a certain form shall be bound to obey the orders of all above that form." We call this not mitigating oppression, but sanctioning it; not the toleration of a necessary evil, but the deliberate confirmation of an iniquitous and needless tyranny. The practice of fagging does not diminish tyranny—it authorises and multiplies it. A refusal to obey would equally entail a beating, whether, by the law of the school, the boy is bound to obey or not. Fagging has no tendency to restrain the wanton infliction of pain, to which boys are unhappily so prone. Indeed, so far from believing that fagging has been established at large schools by the masters from a deliberate and well-considered persuasion that it is beneficial to the boys, we doubt not that in most cases they have, either from indolence or ignorance how to act, tacitly sanctioned a custom which they could not conscientiously approve. We assert that no master in a public school has done his duty, so long as he has not attempted to prevent the weaker from becoming the slaves of the stronger boys, and has failed in the attempt. At Westminster, for example, there is one form in which the boys are neither fagged by those above them, nor fag those below them. If this partial exemption is successfully maintained, if there are some boys who neither order nor obey, why is no endeavour made to extend the same abstinence further? The tutor of a public school must have formed a low notion of his duties, of the vicarious functions with which he is intrusted, and of the high charge which is devolved upon him, before he can rest satisfied with remaining a patient spectator of the maltreatment, and consequent mental sufferings of his younger pupils. Ought he to be referred for the lessons of a higher morality to the heathen poet of a most corrupt and wicked age? And could he join in the beautiful exclamation:—

"Di majorum umbris tenuem et sine pondere terram,
Spirantesque crocos et in urna perfluum ver,
Qui præceptorem sancti voluere parentis
Esse loco?"

For the same reason that no parent would permit, still less compel, the younger to become the slaves of their elder brothers, the tutor of a public school ought, as far as in him lies, to protect the weak against the strong; to study the characters of his pupils; to confirm the feeble-hearted; to attempt, by instruction and admonition, to soften the fierce natures of the cruel and tyrannical; and, where advice failed, to curb, by prompt punishment, the bad dispositions of those who still maintained their authority by brute force. It is a fatal mistake, which tutors, often from inadvertence, but sometimes from incapacity and indolence, commit, to imagine that they are merely instruments for the communication of a certain quantity of knowledge. The moral part of education, if not the most important, is not at least to be wholly neglected.'

What a complete refutation of the absurdity of those who contend for the necessity of the system, is the fact, staring them in the face, of the "fourth form" neither fagging nor being fagged!

* No. CV.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.—Egypt.

PORTRAITS OF MOHAMMED ALI, THE PASHA OF EGYPT.

He is now about sixty years of age, rather short in stature, with a high forehead and aquiline nose, and altogether possessing an expression of countenance which shows him to be no ordinary man. His dress is usually very plain; the only expense which he allows himself in matters connected with his person, being lavished upon his arms, some of which are studded with diamonds. Like Buonaparte, his outward appearance seems to have changed considerably with the progress of his years; for although, when between thirty and forty, he was described by a British traveller as "of a slender make, sallow complexion, and under the middle size;" he is reported by the latest visitors to have become thickset, and somewhat full in the figure. * * * * * Sir F. Henniker remarks that the Pasha appeared to him to have a vulgar, low-born face, but a commanding, intelligent eye. * * * * * Mohammed is well spoken of by most European travellers, though in general they estimate his character by too high a standard,—the principles and habits of their own countries. There is only one author whose impression was rather unfavorable:—"I sat in the divan," says he, "with my eyes fixed on him; I wanted to examine the countenance of a man who had realised in our day one of those scenes in history, which, when we have perused it, always compels us to lay down the book and recover ourselves. There he sat,—a quick eye, features common, nose bad, a grizzled beard, looking much more than fifty, and having the worn complexion of that period of life. They tell you he is not sanguinary; men grow tired of shedding blood, as well as of other pleasures; but if the cutting off a head would drop gold into his coffers, he would not be slow to give the signal. His laugh has nothing in it of nature; how can it have? I hear it now,—a hard, sharp laugh, such as that with which strong heartless men would divide booty torn from the feeble. I leave him to his admirers."* [Rather, to those who are disposed to do him justice: for this is mere assumption. No one man can be justified in saying of another, that he would, under certain temptations, act viciously, unless he be able, at the same time, to relate facts to support his assertion. It does not follow that one man will commit murder, because another does not like his laugh, or his nose. Mohammed Ali, considered with reference to his country, to the pernicious degree of power enjoyed by him, and to other circumstances, which it is but justice to take into the account, appears more deserving of praise than blame. He has much improved his country, and the condition of his people, in the present age, and has done yet more for posterity. He is accused of taxing his subjects too heavily; but that is not an error peculiar to him;—many have done this who have wanted his excuses. In general, it seems that he is best appreciated by those whom he has most benefited—his subjects. This is not surprising, as is well accounted for in the following passage:]—It is sometimes a misfortune for a man to live in advance of his age; and we accordingly find that the Pasha is not only far from being popular, but that he is disliked by the more influential classes of his subjects, on account of his most meritorious exertions. The indulgence, for example, which he grants to religious sects of every description; the use of the vaccine discovery, as well as of other surgical practices borrowed from Europe; and, above all, the school of anatomy recently founded, which creates a necessity for human subjects even in addition to the waxen models which he has procured from Italy, are innovations highly disagreeable to the bigoted Mussulmans. In fact, they perceive that he is a Turk only to his countrymen, with whom he is rigidly strict; whilst to all others, he displays a degree of liberality, to which they are disposed to give the name of dishonesty or indifference. [The heavy taxation of his subjects, is not turned to the account of personal luxury, by the pasha; nor is the produce hoarded. He encourages commerce, printing, manufactories of various kinds; has established a number of schools, and sends many young men to Europe for education.] Several of his pupils have visited London, and other parts of Great Britain, where they endeavoured to make themselves acquainted with every mechanical pursuit, or ingenious invention, that was likely to give pleasure to their sovereign, and to benefit their native country. At the present time, besides some small colonies stationed at Genoa and Leghorn, there are about forty individuals in Paris, under the direction of Messrs Tomard and Agoub, learning various branches of science, the liberal arts, and even the outlines of European literature.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT EGYPTIAN PYRAMID.

[Mr Davison, who was British Consul at Cairo, about sixty years ago, narrowly examined the Great Pyramid, the account of his descent into the well inclosed in it, is extremely interesting:]—Conceiving it to be very deep, he provided himself with a large quantity of rope, one end of which, he tied round his waist; and letting down a lantern attached to a small cord, he resolutely prepared to follow. With no small difficulty, he prevailed on two of his servants, and three Arabs to hold the line—the latter assuring him that there were ghosts below, and that he never could hope to return. Taking with him a few sheets of paper, a compass, a measure, and another lighted candle, he commenced the descent, and soon reached the bottom of the first well or shaft. Here he found, on the south side, at the distance of about eight feet from the place where he landed, a second opening, which descended perpendicularly to the depth of five feet only; and at four feet ten inches from the bottom of this, he discovered a third shaft, the mouth of which was nearly blocked up with a large stone, leaving an opening barely sufficient to allow a man to pass. Here he dropped down his lantern, not only with the view of ascertaining to what depth he was about to proceed, but also to determine whether the air were pernicious or otherwise. The shaft, however, was so tortuous, that the candle soon became invisible; but the consul was not to be discouraged, as nothing less than a journey to the bottom would satisfy his eager curiosity. His main difficulty arose from the superstitous dread of the Arabs, who could hardly be prevailed upon to go down and hold the rope. After many prayers, and threats, and promises of money, and of all the treasure which might be found in the well, the avarice of one man so far overcame his terror, that he ventured to descend, though on reaching the bottom, he stared about him pale and trembling, and appeared more like a spectre than a human being. Mr Davison now pushed forward with the rope round his body, being convinced from the distant view of the lantern that he had let down, that this well was somewhat deeper than the first. Having proceeded a little further than half-way to the spot where the candle had rested, he came to a grotto, about fifteen feet long, four or five wide, and nearly the height of a man. From this place, the third shaft or well was sloping, and by throwing down a stone, he ascertained it to be of much greater depth than the others. But, still resolved to persevere, he pushed the lantern a little before him, and set out afresh on his journey, calling to the Arab to loosen the rope gently, and availing himself of little holes made in the rock, obviously with the purpose of aiding a descent. At length the shaft beginning to return a little more to the perpendicular, he arrived speedily at the bottom, where he found all further passage precluded, by a large accumulation of sand and rubbish. Having reached this point, our adventurer began to reflect on two circumstances which had not before occurred to him, either of which would have agitated weaker nerves. The first was, that the multitude of bats which he had disturbed, might put out the candle; and the second, that the immense stone on the mouth of the pit, might slip down and close the passage for ever. On looking about the bottom he found a rope ladder, which, though it had lain there sixteen years, was as fresh and strong as if perfectly new. It had been used, as is conjectured, by Mr Wood—the author of a work on the ruins of Balbea and Palmyra—to assist his progress downwards; but he, it is concluded, must have stopped short at the grotto. When Mr Davison, on his return, had reached the bottom of the first shaft, the candles fell, and went out; upon which the poor Arab thought himself lost. He laid hold of the rope, as his master was about to ascend, declaring that he would rather have his brains blown out than be left there alone with the devil. "I therefore permitted him to go before," says the Consul, "and though it was much more difficult to ascend than to descend, I know not how it was, but he scrambled up a hundred times more quickly than he had come down." The depth of the first shaft was 22 feet; of the second, 29; and of the third, 99; which, with the five feet between the first and second, makes the whole descent 155 feet.

MOHAMMED ALI, THE VICEROY OF EGYPT.

He (the Viceroy) then related a number of anecdotes touching the petty larcenies of the Arabs; some of which were by no means without contrivance or dexterity. But the one which seemed to amuse both himself and his friends the most was that of a traveller, who, when eating his dinner, laid down his spoon to reach for a piece of bread, and by the time he brought back his hand, the spoon was away; the knife and fork soon shared the same fate; and the unfortunate stranger was at length reduced to the sad necessity of tearing his meat, and lifting it with his fingers and thumb, like the Arabs themselves. Many persons were near, but no one saw the theft committed; and all search for the recovery of the property was in vain. He now took leave of the Viceroy, leaving him in the greatest good humour; he said we might go everywhere, and see everything we wished, and that he hoped to have the pleasure of seeing us again. * * * * * No one has attempted to conceal that there is in the temper of Mohammed Ali, intermingled with many good qualities, a deep tincture of barbarism and fierceness. Impatient of opposition, and even of delay, he occasionally gives himself up to the most violent bursts of passion; and in such moments there is hardly any cruelty that he will not perpetrate or command. For instance, some time ago he had ordered that the dollar should pass for a fixed number of piastres, and it was mentioned in his presence that the rate was not strictly followed. His Highness expressed some doubt of the fact, when the head interpreter carelessly observed, that a Jew broker, whom he named, had a few days before exchanged dollars for him at the rate asserted.—"Let him be hanged immediately," exclaimed the Pasha! The interpreter, an old and faithful servant, threw himself at his sovereign's feet, deprecating his own folly, and imploring pardon for the wretched culprit. But all intercession was vain; the Viceroy said his orders must not be disregarded, and the unfortunate Jew was instantly led to death. We find proofs of a similar sally at Djidda, where he appears to have used his own hands to inflict a punishment which he thought it inexpedient to remit. Hoseyn Aga, the agent for the East India Company, resident in that town, was, says a recent traveller,—a remarkably fine-looking man, displaying an air of dignity, mixed with hauteur, handsomely clad, too, though the heavy folds of his muslin turban, were studiously drawn over his right eye, to conceal the loss of it,—for Mohammed Ali, one day in a fit of rage, pulled it out! Yet these men are friends, great friends just at present, and will remain so as long as it may be convenient and agreeable to both parties to consider each other in that light. But the master of Egypt is not always so ferocious,—for example, when Mrs Lushington was at Alexandria, intelligence was brought to him that a small fort at the entrance of the harbour, had been taken possession of by certain Franks, and that the Turks belonging to it had been made prisoners. Some consternation prevailed among his people; but, instead of being angry, he laughed heartily, and swearing by his two eyes,—his favourite oath,—that they must be English sailors, he directed his interpreter to write to their captain, to order his men on board ship again. Upon inquiry, it proved as the Pasha had anticipated; the men had landed, got drunk, and crowned their liberty, by seizing on the fort, and confining the unfortunate Turks, who, indolently smoking their pipes, could never have anticipated such an attack, in a time of profound peace. * * * * * It is generally stated that since Mohammed Ali has felt himself secure in the Pashalic, he has ceased to be cruel. Seldom now does he take away life, and never with torture.

* Scenes and Impressions, p. 176.

JESTS.—Wanton jests make fools laugh, and wise men frown.—No time to break jests when the heart-strings are about to be broken.—He that will lose his friend for a jest, deserves to die a beggar by the bargain.—Dr Fuller.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— The father of Economical Philosophy (Adam Smith) was, when a child, actually carried off by gipsies, and remained some hours in their possession —Notes to Guy Mannering.

Liberty.—This is not the liberty we can hope, that no grievance ever should arise in the commonwealth, that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty attained that wise men look for.—Milton.

Impalpable Dust.—During the prevalence of the desert winds machinery is very liable to be disordered by the impalpable dust which then fills the air, and isso extremely penetrating that, as the natives assert, it will enter into an egg by the pores of the shell.—Egypt, Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.

— With respect to testing between salts and oxalic acid, the most simple test is by the application of a small portion of the fluid to a piece of paper which has been written on. If the writing becomes effaced, the fluid is poisonous. Oxalic acid will extract the colour from blue paper if the paper be coloured with lytmus, but some blues resist it; common writing ink, therefore, is the most convenient test.—Exeter Gazette.

Egyptian Cotton.—M. Tumel discovered one day, in the garden of a Turk named Mako, a plant of the cotton-tree, which he afterwards propagated with so much skill and success as to have changed, says Planat, the commerce and statistics of Europe. This important vegetable bears the name of the Frenchman who first made the government acquainted with its manifold uses as an article of domestic manufacture, and of foreign trade. Tumel erected at Boulak, near Cairo, a superb establishment, equal in its structure to the finest European manufactory, for spinning, weaving, dying, and printing cotton goods. The latest improvements in machinery were borrowed from Rouen or Manchester; steam is the principal moving power; and gas is employed for purposes of artificial light.—Egypt, Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.

The Festival of St Catherine of Siena.—The tutelar saint of the city, Santa Catherina di Siena, is one of the most popular divinities of the country. Born the daughter of a poor dyer, her pretended revelations and erotic mysticism raised her into such celebrity, that she was employed to solicit Pope Gregory XI to quit Avignon and restore the Papal throne to Rome. A religious society was instituted in her honour, in 1464, which enjoyed the privilege of annually redeeming two criminals and two debtors. This fraternity also annually conferred dowries on a certain number of the daughters of poor artisans, who walked in procession on the festival of the Saint. * * * * * On this occasion it was customary for the young women sometimes to make choice of their husbands. The candidates for their favour stood near the procession, and the lover presented a handkerchief to the object of his choice. If she refused him, she kissed the handkerchief and returned it. If she consented, she tied a knot on it, and then presented it to the bridegroom.—Conder's Italy.

A Scotch Mendicant.—Sir Walter Scott tells us, in the preface to the Antiquary, that the individual he had in his eye, when he drew his Edie Ochiltree, was an old mendicant named Andrew Gemmells. It was one of the peculiarities of the old man, that he was always ready to play at cards or dice with any one who desired such amusement. "The late Reverend Doctor Robert Douglas assured the author, that the last time he saw Andrew Gemmells, he was engaged in a game at brag with a gentleman of fortune, distinction, and birth. To preserve the due gradations of rank, the party was made at an open window of the chateau, the laird sitting on his chair in the inside, the beggar on a stool in the yard; and they played on the window-sill. The stake was a considerable parcel of silver. The author expressing his surprise, Dr Douglas observed, that the laird was no doubt a humorist or original, but that many decent persons in those times would, like him, have thought there was nothing extraordinary in passing an hour, either in card-playing or conversation, with Andrew Gemmells. This singular mendicant had generally, or was supposed to have, as much money about his person as would have been thought the value of his life among modern foot-pads. On one occasion a country gentleman, generally esteemed a very narrow man, happening to meet Andrew, expressed great regret that he had no silver in his pocket, or he would have given him sixpence:—"I can give you change for a note, laird," replied Andrew.—Notes to the Antiquary.

The Bow of William Tell.—Among other places pointed out to strangers as worthy of notice, (at Zurich) I visited the arsenal, where one may receive a lesson of humility, in attempting to wield the swords, and to carry the armour, borne by the warriors of other days. I, of course, handled the bow said to be the bow of William Tell; and the identical arrow that pierced the apple, is also shewn. I cannot conceive of what materials the sinews of that distinguished patriot were made; for the degenerate men of our time, are obliged to use a machine with the power of the lever, to draw the cord even half way to the point at which the arrow is discharged. There is a vast collection of ancient armour preserved, and modern equipments for more than all the able-bodied men in the canton.—Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees; by Derwent Conway.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—L'Ultimo Giorno di Pompei—La Nayade.
Drury-Lane.—Alfred the Great—A Divertissement—The Legion of Honour.
Covent Garden.—The Exquisites—The Romance of a Day.

FRENCH PLAYS—MLLE. LEONTINE FAY.

My Dear Mr Tatler,—You have taken little notice of the French Plays at the Haymarket Theatre, but to say the truth, that little, during the greater part of the season, has been as much as they deserved. This is, perhaps, yet more prone than the English theatres to throw all the responsibility of the performances upon one or two principal actors, whose merits should be very great to compensate for the deficiency; and yet the greater they are, the more conspicuous is that deficiency. The regular company is very mediocre; and this season the stars have been not of the brighest, though shining out brilliantly from the dimness around them. Madame Albert I did not see; but I am told "she was charming." Of the actresses whom I have seen at this theatre, none can bear any sort of comparison with Mademoiselle Leontine Fay, who made her first appearance on Friday evening. It is seldom that such an actress can be seen at any theatre; and now, Mr Tatler, it will be impossible for you to stay away, for on all sides you will hear the praises of Leontine Fay She is not remarkable for personal advantages. Her person is short, and mediocre, as far, at least, as I could judge from her appearance last night; but her dresses were not calculated to display it to advantage, and I was not very near to the stage. I cannot tell you whether or not she is handsome; her brows appeared to me artificially marked, but her face is lighted up with an animation that is in itself the first of beauties. I should say her greatest defect is in her walk, which has a sort of heavy swing, that I am afraid I must call masculine. I am no critic, Mr Tatler, but that is of no consequence: in speaking of Mademoiselle Leontine Fay, we have only to see and to hear; to feel and to admire. She performed in two pieces, Malvina, ou Un Mariage d'Inclination, and La Marraine. In the former, she has to sustain the part of a daughter, secretly married to a man, who had rather excited her gratitude than her love, and had already begun to treat her with indifference; while her father urges her immediate union with a young relative just returned from the army. She dares not to confess the truth to her father, and resolves to confide in the young officer himself. His generous conduct (together with a noble action she had heard of his, before his arrival) touches her heart; her husband proves a mere adventurer, who has deceived her in every point; and though she obtains pardon from her father, she remains miserable. I speak only of that part of the piece in which Mademoiselle Leontine Fay is concerned. It is a piece of slight plot, but conveying a strong moral, which will be differently read by parents and children; but I should say justly read by those who are intended to benefit by it,—the young. Mademoiselle Fay had good opportunities of display in the character of the daughter, friend, and wife, and she did not lose them; her voice, as well as her face, took the tone of every feeling, with the most animated rapidity, but without a shadow of abruptness. When first her husband shocks her by assuming the stern tone of command. "Je le veux,"—It is my will; her answer, "J'obeirai,"—I will obey,—was given with a perfection of look and manner, not easily described, her future fate seemed at once to appear before her, in all its bitterness, accompanied by a sense that it had been of her own seeking, and that she had no hope but in submission. Were I to express fully my admiration of her performance, and to dilate upon its particular beauties, I should write you a letter long enough to fill your whole paper. In La Marraine, her character was a lively, capricious, kind-hearted young widow of nineteen. Strongly contrasted as this character was with the former, she played it with equal talent. The manner in which she half unconsciously falls into a brisk game of battledore and shuttlecock, while she is giving grave counsels to a youth of her own age,—her godson,—was inimitable. In short, Mr Tatler, you must go and see her; it is but justice both to her and your readers, that you should; and you will not have reason to think the time lost, I promise you. It would be unjust, in saying so much of the lady, not to say that she had the advantage of being "acted up to" (as the phrase is) by M. PAULIN; an excellent and animated actor, who played the young officer in the first, and the godson in the second of these pieces.

Digitized by Google

I remain, Sir, your Constant Reader, and Admirer,

A. A.

QUIET GRIEF EVER THE STRONGEST.—And it hath been observed, that those greater and stormy passions do so spend the whole stock of grief, that they presently admit a comfort and contrary affection; while a sorrow that is even and temperate goes on to its period with expectation and the distances of a just time.—Jeremy Taylor.

DEATH.—The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE KEN-NO AND GROANING-MALT.—The groaning-malt was the ale brewed for the purpose of being drunk after the lady or goodwife's safe delivery. The ken-no has a more ancient source, and perhaps the custom may be derived from the secret rites of the Bona Dea. A large and rich cheese was made by the women of the family, with great affectation of secrecy, for the refreshment of the gossips who were to attend at the canny minute. This was the ken-no, so called because its existence was secret (that is, presumed to be so) from all the males of the family, but especially from the husband and master. He was, accordingly, expected to conduct himself as if he knew of no such preparation, to act as if desirous to press the female guests to refreshments, and to seem surprised at their obstinate refusal. But the instant his back was turned, the ken-no was produced, and after all had eaten their fill, with a proper accompaniment of the groaning-malt, the remainder was divided among the gossips, each carrying a large portion home, with the same affectation of great secrecy.—Notes to Guy Mannering.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and C. M. Von Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischutz.'

To conclude with the Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. VON WEBER.]

Linda, Miss Bruce. Rose, Mrs Bedford.
Bridesmaids—Miss Absolon, Miss Butline, Mrs East, &c.
Ottocar, Mr Yarnold. Bernhard, Mr Bedford. Adolph, Mr T. Cooke.
Caspar, Mr Horn.
Killian, Mr Webster. Zamiel, Mr Howell. Hermit, Mr Denning.
Principal Foresters—Mr Honner, Mr Eaton, Mr Wieland, and Mr Chikini.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; and The Legion of Honour.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Juliet, Miss F. Kemble. Lady Capulet, Mrs Loveli. Nurse, Mrs Gibbs.
Romeo, Mr Abbott. Prince Escalus, Mr Henry. Paris, Mr Durnset.
Mercutio, Mr C. Kemble. Friar Lawrence, Mr Evans.
Benvolio, Mr Holl. Tybalt, Mr Baker. Montague, Mr Turnour.
Capulet, Mr Egerton. Page, Miss Fortescue. Friar John, Mr Mears.
Apothecary, Mr Meadows. Balthazar, Mr Irwin.
Samson, Mr Fuller. Peter, Mr Keeley.

In Act I. A Masquerade and Dance.

In Act V. The Funeral Procession of Juliet, and a Solemn Dirge.

Previous to the Tragedy, Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflöte.'

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON'S Poem, 'The Island.'

[By Mr PEAKE.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.
Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Toquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ludwig Bomperts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Paulo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Locksley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; and The Highland Reel.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE DUEL ET LE DEJEUNER.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de Théâtre des Variétés.

Madame de St Léon, Mlle. St Ange.
Dugazon, M. Garnard. Desessards, M. Préval.
Le Colonel St Léon, M. Alfred. Leroy, M. Gueriée.

Suivi de

YELVA; OU, L'ORPHELINE RUSSE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Parties, par MM. SCRIBE et DEVILLENEUVE.

Yelva, Mlle. Léontine Fay. La Comtesse de Cesanne, Mlle St. Ange.
Feodora, Mlle. Eliza. Gertrude Duthleul, Mme. Préval.
Alfred, M. Paulin. Tchirichef, M. Alfred. Kalouga, M. Garnard.

On Finira par

LOUISE; OU, LA REPARATION.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.

Louise, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Barnick, Mme. Préval.
M. de Mahnen, M. Alfred. Sadler, M. Paulin.
Saldenck, M. Laporte. Fritz, M. Gueniée.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terrance Gossoon Bess Flemington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama founded on SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

MACBETH.

Lady Macbeth, Miss M. C. Poole. Gentlewoman, Miss Nichol.
Duncan, Mr Almar. Malcolm, Mr Honner. Donalbain, Miss Barker.
Macbeth, Mr Osbaldiston. Macduff, Mr C. Hill. Banquo, Mr D. Pitt.
Lenox, Mr Maitland. Rosse, Mr Rogers. Fleance, Miss Ellis.
Seyton, Mr Lee. Physician, Mr Gough.
Hecate, Mr Ransford. Three Witches, Messrs Vale, Williams, and Young.
Singing Witches, Miss Somerville, Mrs Vale, Mme. Simon, and Mr Edwin.

To conclude with the Romantic Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. VON WEBER.]

Linda, Miss Somerville. Rose, Mrs Vale.
Ottocar, Mr Almar. Bernhard, Mr Gough. Caspar, Mr D. Pitt.
Rodolph, Mr Edwin. Rollo, Mr Ransford. Killian, Mr Vale.
Christopher, Mr Hobbs. Zamiel, Mr Asbury. Witch of the Glen, Mr Boulanger.
Huntsmen, Mr Webb, Mr Tully, and Mr Collier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

Taken from Sir W. SCOTT'S celebrated Story.

Lady Ashton, Miss Wells. Lucy Ashton, Mrs Evans. Marion, Miss Ayton.
Dame Lightbody, Mrs Garrick. Sir William Ashton, Mr Munroe.
Edgar, Mr Keppell. Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr Forrester. Randolph, Mr Cooke.
Captain Craigengelt, Mr Marshall. And Caleb Balderstone, Mr J. Russell.

In the course of the Evening, a Selection of Vocal Music.

In the course of the Evening, Auber's Overture to 'Masaniello,' Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischutz,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflöte.'

A Medley Pas Seul, by Mlle. Josephine.

After which a Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtsdorf, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Vernon.
Count of Lindorf, Mr Tilbury. Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Augustus, Mr Bennett. Boltzheim, Mr Cooke.
Baron Bassonarempdorf, Mr J. Russell.

A Grand Pas de Deux, by Mlles. Celeste and Constance.

To conclude with the Farcical Entertainment, called

T A C T.

Julia, Miss Stohwasser. Biddy Phillimore, Mrs Humby.
Sir Paul Mainchance, Mr Marshall. Sir William Lightfoot, Mr Munroe.
Captain Lightfoot, Mr Spencer. John Fox, Mr Forrester. Crump, Mr Tilbury.
Dulcimer Star, Mr J. Russell, in which character he will sing a favourite Extravaganza, called 'Pasticcio,' and introduce Imitations of several Performers.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Master's Rival—The Skimmer of the Sea.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre, and all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements [illegible] at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. BUSSELL, Country Newspapers and General Advertising Office.

Nº 213.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1831.

A WALK FROM THE REGENT'S PARK TO FINCHLEY.

'I know each lane, and every alley green,
And every bosky bourn from side to side,
My daily walks and ancient neighbourhood.'
COMUS.

If there are few who have escaped wounds and disease, there are few also, who have not tasted the pleasures of convalescence. The poet has said of a person in that state, that

'The common sun, the air, the skies,
To him are opening Paradise.'

It is true this cannot be said of every convalescent. There is a restoration to perfect health, and to an imperfect one. There is some difference between that of a young lover, who is to be married next month and whose mistress comes to see him, and that of the poor thief, who is cured of a broken leg only to be hung. But the latter may well be considered an extreme case. There is a well known story of a negro boy, who was so delighted with the tickling sensation produced by the healing of his flesh after a flogging, that he anticipated the pleasure of it, even when the infliction was on his shins. "Him feel him nice," he said, "when him scratch edges of sore place,"—a sentiment, which if King James could have foreseen, might have completed his horror of the march of freedom, if it be true that he pronounced "scratching to be too great a luxury for a subject."

In whatever shade of convalescence our own is to be found (and we make no apology in these personal and autobiographical days of editorship, for vivifying an "article" with the self-reference so common to our brethren), it was with no mean pleasure that we found ourselves the other day striking into the country, from that quarter of the metropolis which leads to the most beautiful district about London, and the road through which may be reckoned among the best luxuries which the fashionable world have of late years added to their list. We little thought, a few years back, when we used to walk by those meadows and "bosky bourns" through which the road has been made, and with every foot of which, and its old aspect, we are acquainted, that in a short time the grassy silence would have been startled by the sound of gigs and barouches over gravel, and that dandy voices on horseback would be heard mingling with the thrush, and in the place of the nymphs and sylvans, which Akenside beheld in these fields, would stand the turnpike-man! We did not like the change. We hated it. We felt like the boroughmongers; and grudged that anybody should interfere with our primæval nests and vast other-men's possessions. But this was only with a corrupt silence. We have an inconvenient associate, of the name of Conscience, who forces us to approve what is for the common good: and as it is a plan with us to make the best of what we cannot help, or ought not to oppose, we set ourselves to find out that the new road was a good thing, and ought to give us pleasure. And our virtue has been rewarded; for such we have found it. The dandy voices we are glad to hear, if they express any satisfaction: the ladies, dancing on their steeds, and keeping up their stock of health and good-humour for the evening, bring a grace into any spot: the carefuller faces and manifest invalids we hail as brethren, fond of the same remedies: and even the red-faced roué, who takes his draught of fresh air purely in a medicinal light, and comes enduring himself on his saddle, and will drink more that evening because he means to drink less, comes not amiss to us. It is not fit that his riches should have left him entirely without a natural resource, any more than other men's poverty.

In short, the road is a good road for everybody. We cordially recommend those who are not acquainted with it, to become so immediately, whether by means of gig, carriage, or horse, or by what somebody facetiously called, the "ten-toe'd equipage," which has the magical advantage of carrying a man over styles and fields, of conveying him by the shortest cuts, and of putting him into possession of spots the most sequestered. A man who has earned repose by a walk, who feels that he is the stouter and blither for it, and who sits half-way up some beautiful hill, with his face against the west wind, perhaps lifting his eyes occasionally from a book, may think himself among the Gods, compared with the wealthier men in carriages on the road below, who, while they are getting health at their mouths, are, perhaps, providing a contradiction to it, in gouty legs. The fable of Ericthonius, the richest of men, who was the inventor of chariots, and had a monstrous pair of legs, ought to have meant a gentleman with the gout.

The road before us has been most judiciously contrived. It has been made to run through the pleasantest scenery (as far as we can speak to it); it is open on the left to the western breeze; on the right is defended from the east, by the natural enbankments afforded by the ascent of Hampstead, and by Hampstead itself; and that beautiful hill presents itself, both in going and coming, in its most delightful aspects, generally on one side, sometimes directly in front. The healthiness of the district is celebrated, and there are not wanting to it pleasant associations of memory.

We begin with the point emerging from the Regent's Park, at St John's Wood Chapel. A name often lets you into a history. The spot in this neighbourhood, now full of pleasant houses, with gardens, is called St John's Wood, though, with the exception of an oak or an elm here and there, judiciously incorporated into the gardens, and a small place called St John's Wood Farm, where there is really a nest of trees remaining, the district is no more entitled to the name of a wood, than one of the squares. The part of Hampstead, however, in which the church stands, is called the parish of St John; and it is more than probable that in the ancient woody district which extended several miles northward in this direction, this was one of the woodiest of the spots, and presented a thick sylvan track, from Paddington up to the hill. It is pleasant to see a remnant of its posterity in the ground belonging to the place called the Farm, which is the first object that presents itself, when you begin to get clear of the houses. We remember it when it stood at the end of a country lane, and when the erection of the Barracks a little further on, gave the first symptom of the advent of other houses. There was a pretty solitary cottage near it, beside which was the path to Hampstead, across the fields. This path, for some hundreds of yards, has now disappeared. A little beyond the barracks, you see a turnpike, which stands at the corner, where the branch of the road we are pursuing is joined by another branch, leading into the park, further eastward, and opposite to this turnpike, on the other side of the united road, you are agreeably surprised, by seeing the old field-path leading from a gate up the hill, across the beautiful sloping meadows, with the beautiful tufted trees up above you, and the church's spire issuing out of them. The carriage-road has this prospect before it for some length, with the pretty trees and houses of West End on the lower fields to the left. The hill, which accompanies you a long way, then becomes close at hand upon the right, and you see a new house, built in an old style, just under the church and trees, which is called, we believe, the Priory, and was built by a gentleman remarkable for his powers of memory. We used to have a grudge against it, because it displaced a bench of ours; that is to say, a bench made by some benevolent person, for the accommodation of those who journeyed over the fields, and loved the prospect. (We honour such persons, of whom there are too few, and rank them among the Lesser Gods). Our grudge is gone, among other grudges; and though we should have preferred the church and wood by itself, the house is not unworthy of regard, as travellers doubtless think it.

Soon after passing the Priory, the road crosses West End Lane, which unites the little hamlet of that name, with Hampstead. It is worth the passenger's while to halt at this spot, and look up the lane, which will present him with a view of the church that is in request with artists. There was one sitting the day we were there, on his portable stool, copying it. West End is so called from its being on the western boundary of the old manor of Hampstead. There used to be a fair there, which had no legal sanction, and is done away. On the ascent of the lane, near Hampstead, there was a bench which commanded a prospect towards London, over fields profuse with wild flowers, but the road having been sunk, for the accommodation of new riders, the bench has disappeared, not a little to the regret of those, who love any memorial of the past, to say nothing of the walker's "weary shanks," as Spenser calls them, which may still be weary, if they come from a distance. Benches ought to abound everywhere, instead of being so very few; and they will, as people learn to think more of one another. It has often surprised us, how some people can be so rich, and not, even for the pride's sake, do more of these things. But the truth is, the rich have to learn, as well as the poor; and to learn, among other things, a little more respect for their common nature. It is said that the vulgar love to deface any kind of public erection; and undoubtedly, among the uneducated, there is the same tendency to exercise power for its own sake, as with all conscience weakness, and among those who possess an undue share of worldly good. But we have seen benches last a long time, especially in spots where they are needed,—the one we speak of among them. With the diffusion of knowledge, a just understanding on this point has doubtless been encreasing; and it appears to us, that if we were rich, we would erect such handsome resting-places, and inscribe on them quotations from English authors, so extremely to the purpose, that nobody who could read would consent to dishonour himself by doing them any mischief.

Digitized by Google

Passing West End, and admiring every instant the pleasantness of the scenery on both sides, you notice at a distance on the left the church of Harrow-on-the-Hill. We do not remember, indeed, at what precise point you begin to see Harrow, probably sooner than this. It is a conspicuous object; and in our eyes, used always to be an attractive one, because Garth was buried there, one of the pleasantest of the wits of Queen Anne, and most generous of physicians.

The lane you now arrive at goes to Hampstead one way, and the Edgware Road the other. The ascent of it is called Child's Hill, and the road goes through a place called the Potteries. The inn which stands here by the road-side, and which is brushing up its accommodations, must have greatly benefitted by the late changes: for this lane, though leading to Hampstead Heath, used to be one of the most solitary about London, and the resort of Gypsies. We remember an encampment of them very near the present crossing. We thought they had all gone "from home," for we saw nothing but clothes and arched hurdles, till a beautiful face popped up from under some bed-clothes, and flashed at us as white a set of teeth, as her eyes were black.

The next lane you come to, crosses a part of the Hendon road, known by the name of Goulder's Green. The Green remains, and fronts a pretty farm, which stands at the corner of the crossing, with a fine elm tree at one side of it, and poplars at the other. Hendon is a proper rural village, of which we propose to give an account in a future article. The ascent towards Hampsted the other way, is dignified with the name of Goulder's Hill, but more so, by the dignification of the dignity in a poem of Akenside's. The poem is "On recovering from a Fit of Sickness." Akenside lived there in the house of his friend, Mr Dyson, a member of Parliament, whose family, we believe, are still connected with Parliamentary office. The poet, a proper cockney, (a school, which it must be confessed has had illustrious members, Milton with his sabbath excursions among them), talks of the "steep aerial way" of this hill, though Holborn might vie with it for elevation. But he had a fancy, and an asthma!

'Thy verdant scenes, O Goulder's Hill,
Once more I seek, a languid guest:
With throbbing temples and with burden'd breast,
Once more I climb thy steep aerial way,
O faithful cure of oft-returning ill,
Now call thy sprightly breezes round,
Dissolve this rigid cough profound,
And bid the springs of life with gentler movement play.'

Next to poets, are those who love and honour poets. We are glad to be told by Akenside, that his friend selected this spot as a place of refuge from town-smoke, and the cares of Parliament, and that the poet took up his abode in it with him at the same time:—

'For when within thy shady seat
First from the sultry town he chose,
And the tir'd senate cares, his wished repose
Then wast thou; to me a happier home
For social leisure: where my welcome feet
Estrang'd from all the entangling ways
In which the restless vulgar strays,
Through nature's simple path with ancient faith might roam.'

By the words in the last line, "with ancient faith," we may judge, that Akenside in his mature life, retained the best privilege of a poet, in his child-like attachment to the trees and grass.

The north-western side of Hampstead Heath, with the pines and white-house at the top of it, beautifully meets the eye along this part of the road. These pines are said to have been brought from Italy, by the gentleman who built the house. A lane to Hendon crosses the road hereabouts,—famous for its profusion of wild roses, and for a pretty country-house, with a piece of water to it,—and after a space, you come to another lane, also leading to Hendon, through Finchley; which latter village abuts upon the road. Three or four years ago, it was one of the most sequestered villages in the neighbourhood; and its pretty little castellated old church looks as if it ought to be so still. At the northern side of the church-yard, there is a neat inn, the tenants of which do not seem to have been at all improved by their late accessions of profit; but there is a waiter, whom we took for a landlord, and a maid-servant with a pleasant face, that makes amends for one of the elder visages. The other extremity of the church-yard opens upon one of the most beautiful set of meadows we ever saw.

Finchley was once almost as famous as Hounslow for its robberies, but is now as harmless as so pretty a neighbourhood ought to be. A brother of ours is supposed to have broken the arm of a footpad there, who demanded his money one night. He was young, but was of powerful arm, and had courage in proportion. He drew back, and then hit the man such a blow on the arm with his doubled fist, that he is thought to have broken it, for the poor wretch went howling away like a dog.

In this village, now upwards of forty years ago, we, gentle reader, who have fought so many battles with criminals of another description, and have miraculously lived to see our cause triumphant, lay ill of a disease which was pronounced incurable. A speculative physician, who by a singular chance was also a doctor in divinity, and was thought eccentric, undertook, among his other eccentricities, to cure us, and did so. His name was Trinder, and he lived at Mill-Hill. What a number of illnesses did he enable us to see! content if we have not suffered in vain, nor failed in making the reader partake of our pleasures.

The traveller, in returning to London by this charming road, will particularly admire the views presented of Hampstead Heath and the church, which are finer, perhaps, this way than the other.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE HOLY HOUSE OF LORETO.

This appears to be built of Apennine limestone, but it is so polished with kisses, and blackened with the smoke of the lamps, that it is difficult to tell what it is. Instead of a roof, it is covered with a vault, which is confessedly modern, the old timber work having decayed. Externally, it is encrusted with a coat of white marble, with Corinthian columns, and rich ornaments, the architecture of Bramante, and good of its kind,—but of a kind not very admirable. The history of the Virgin is the principal subject of the bas-reliefs; and there are statues of the Sibyls and the Prophets, which Addison praises as very finely wrought. The room which it encloses is about 31 feet by 13. In a niche, once fenced in with solid gold, now with gilt wood, stands the cedar image, in a dress glittering with precious stones, before which thousands bow down in abject idolatry. "On entering the church, at five in the morning," says Mr Forsyth, "I was surprised to find crowds so early in the Santa Casa, and masses at every altar. This holy house and its saint struck me as examples of that contrast which the Church of Rome affects in consecrating ugliness. The one is a mean brick-looking hovel incased in a shell of sculptured marble; the other a black, smoked, wooden figure, glittering in jewels and brocade. Seldom is the gift of miracles ascribed to an object of beauty. * * * * The riches of the treasury of this church are said to have been formerly valued at fifteen millions of crowns. Addison mentions an offering that had recently been made by the Queen Dowager of Poland, which had cost 18,000 crowns. "Silver," he says, "can scarcely find admission, and gold itself looks but poorly among such an incredible number of precious stones." Few of these treasures escaped pillage in the late revolutions; but the spirit which led to the rich accumulaton is not extinct. Among the recent benefactors, rank several of the Bonaparte family, although not Napoleon himself; and a few good paintings, some elegant gold cups, and other plate enriched with pearls and precious stones, have again been collected. * * * * * The legend respecting this clumsy imposture is, that in the year 1291, the house of the Holy Virgin at Nazareth was transported through the air by angels, and planted near Terrato in Dalmatia. Three years afterwards, it was conveyed in the same miraculous manner across the Adriatic, to a spot near Recanati; and it finally removed itself to the lands of a noble lady named Lauretta, where the present city of Loreto has since been built, and having been enclosed in a splendid church, was secured against further migration. * * * * * According to some authorities, Lady Lauretta's land was a field in the plain, which happened to be frequented by robbers. Of this circumstance, the angels were not aware when they chose the spot; and they accordingly removed it to the present eminence. Pococke was shown the spot at Nazareth, from which the holy house of Loreto was removed; and a more recent traveller, Mr Joliffe, tells us that there are indentures in the wall to designate the space the apartment occupied, about 12 or 14 feet by 8. The house has grown since its removal; its inner dimensions being now as stated above, more than 30 feet by 13 or 14, and about 18 feet in height at the sides.—Conder's Italy.—[There is something in the history of the Santa Casa very unsatisfactory to an active faith. Upon what rests the dependence of the people of Loreto, that they shall not lose the treasure so miraculously conveyed to them?—They have secured it by enclosing it in a church. —Oh ye of little faith! Could not the angels that conveyed it from Nazareth, break through those bonds of marble?—Let those interested in its stay at Loreto, beware lest they, some day, find its rich case vacant; or miss the valuable inclosure, case and all. Another strange thing is, that after the situation of the house was removed out of the haunt of robbers, by the angels, the treasures should have been so freely pillaged. There must be some error in these accounts; and it does appear that some of the said robbers of Loreto have stuck by it ever since its settlement there.]

Digitized by Google

MICHAEL LANDO.

In one of the frequent commotions, perpetually arising in Florence, from the dissensions of the nobles and the plebeians, the fury of the populace had gained such a height, that they were about to fire the city. The riot had continued three days; the government had attempted to treat with the insurgents, but their demands being too exorbitant to be complied with, the principal officers were obliged to make their escape. The populace rushed furiously to the palace, burst open the gates, and entered the hall.

At this moment, a man, ill clad, barefooted, and unshaven, made his way through the crowd, sprang up the grand staircase, leaned over the balustrade, and crying out to the people that the city and palace were now in their own hands, enquired what they intended to do. As he spoke, he unfurled the state banner, called the gonfalon, and waved it over their heads. The rioters, who had formed no plan, and did not know their own intentions, replied that he should be their gonfaloniere,* and should reform the city according to his pleasure.

This declaration, which was a mere whim of the moment, was acted upon. Michael Lando, the new magistrate, was a wool-comber, a man of low origin, but clear-headed, honest, courageous, and firm to his purpose. Raised to the supreme authority, he immediately began to restore order, called in the assistance of other magistrates, and obliged the people to return to their work. Those who had raised him to power, and who had thought, under his nominal power, to enjoy every possible license, now found their mistake; they became indignant, and shewed signs of revolt. But Lando was resolved to perform the duties of his office; he collected a large body of armed and mounted citizens, who kept the streets clear of rioters; and having established such laws as he thought best adapted for the security of peace and happiness, he laid down his authority, and returned to the humble occupation to which he was bred.

The people, with as little judgment as they had chosen Lando himself, now chose another wool-comber to succeed him; as though the virtue were not in the man, but in his trade. In this, however, they were undeceived; they had reason to know that every wool-comber was not a Michael Lando.—Stories from the History of Italy.

* Standard-bearer; the name was given originally to an officer, whose duty it was to execute the decrees of the Priors, who were at the head of the government; but he was soon raised to an equality with them, and finally placed over them.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— We find that the system of mutual instruction is spreading fast in the schools of Tuscany, Parma, and even Sicily. It is not admitted in Piedmont nor in the Roman states. In Austrian Lombardy it existed till 1822, when it was stopped, and we believe has not since been resumed.—Foreign Quarterly Review.

Creed.—I could never divide myself from any man upon the difference of an opinon; or be angry with his judgment for not agreeing with me in that from which, perhaps, within a few days, I should dissent myself.—Sir Thomas Brown.

Hope—is the most beneficial of all the affections; and doth much to the prolongation of life, if it be not too often frustrated; but entertaineth the fancy with an expectation of good: therefore they which fix, and propound to themselves some end, as the mark and scope of their life, and continually, and by degrees go forward in the same, are for the most part long-lived: insomuch, that when they are come to the top of their hope, and can go no higher therein, they commonly droop, and live not long after. So that Hope is as a leaf-joy, which may be beaten out to a great extension, like gold.—Lord Bacon's History of Life and Death.

Early Associations prolong Life.—Ficinius saith not unwisely, that old men, for the comforting of their spirits, ought often to remember and ruminate upon the acts of their childhood and youth. Certainly such a remembrance is a kind of peculiar recreation to every old man; and therefore it is a delight to men to enjoy the society of them which have been brought up together with them, and to visit the places of their education. Vespasian did attribute so much to this matter, that when he was Emperor, he would by no means be persuaded to leave his father's house, though but mean, lest he should lose the wonted object of his eyes, and the memory of his childhood. And besides, he would drink in a wooden cup, tipped with silver, which was his grandmother's, upon festival days.—Lord Bacon's History of Life and Death.

Sweetness of Odour from the Rainbow.—It hath been observed by the ancients, that where a rainbow seemeth to hang over, or to touch, that there breatheth forth a sweet smell. The cause is, for that this happeneth but in certain matters, which have in themselves some sweetness; which the gentle dew of the rainbow doth draw forth: and the like do soft showers; for they also make the ground sweet: but none are so delicate as the dew of the rainbow, where it falleth. It may be also that the water itself hath some sweetness: for the rainbow consisteth of a glomeration of small drops, which cannot possibly fall, but from the air that is very low: and therefore may hold the very sweetness of the herbs and flowers, as a distilled water: for rain and other dew that fall from high, cannot preserve the smell, being dissipated in the drawing up: neither do we know, whether some water itself may not have some degree of sweetness. It is true that we find it sensibly in no pool, river, no fountain;* but good earth, newly turned up, hath a freshness and good scent; which water, if it be not too equal (for equal objects never move the sense) may also have. Certain it is, that bay salt, which is but a kind of water congealed, will sometimes smell like violets.—Lord Bacon's Sylva Sylvarum.

* Water in violent action has an agreeable smell, as he knows who has hung over a cataract, or the rush of a mill-dam.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury-Lane.—Alfred the Great—And Der Freischuts.
Covent Garden.—Romeo and Juliet—And Neuha's Cave.

MANAGERIAL MISMANAGEMENT.

TO THE TATLER.

Dear Mr Tatler,—Perhaps, in the absence of more worthy guests, you will allow me to enjoy a short chat with you. The subject is: the principle on which the authorities at the two Great Theatres (the Minors know better) seem determined to proceed with respect to the purveyance of dramatic representations. Instead of culling a series of the many capital recently written pieces, which they have in their possession, (not, by any means, excluding former productions) they take one or two of them, sometimes good, more often one of the worst, which they regularly serve up, night after night, week after week, till not even the free people can stand it; like a man, who, having a large and varied wardrobe, selects from out it the worst coat, &c. and persists in wearing it till it is absolutely no longer wearable, nullifying by this perversity (it is nothing else) not only the credit which this one coat might have had, if produced at proper intervals, but that also of the stores at home. The public may for a night or two be blinded into a tacit, or even audible approval, by the excellence of the actors; and the house may be filled for a few more nights, by dint of orders, passes, &c., but this will not last long.

At Covent Garden, why have we not The Recruiting Officer, and Farquhar's other works? Were they not well and profitably received? Would it not be better for the proprietors to revive those capital things which they can have for nothing, than to give sums of money for the wretched entirely new (old) things which have been lately (re-)produced. Moreover, The Robber's Wife—where is that? Mr Abbott, for his own sake, should move for that: for in that one thing he acts perfectly. Where is The Irish Tutor? Why do they put Power into a Spanish dress? That Mr Green is not at Covent Garden, is the fault of the Managers. He is at Tottenham Street; why is he there?

A Reader of the Tatler, and One of the Free List.

Saturday, May 7.

[The evil complained of by our Correspondent is undoubtedly sometimes carried to an injudicious length; and we are happy to see, that the performances announced for this week include an unexceptionable variety.]

Digitized by Google

THE PRETENDED REFORMERS.—Sir Francis Burdett (talking, at Reading, of the "moderate reformers") recollected well a farce in which a man was represented as conversing with his servant; he was trying to get his servant to do something for him, and was therefore anxious to palaver him a little. "I think, John," said the gentleman, "I have been a moderate good master to you."—"Very moderate indeed, Sir," was the reply of the servant: and this reply he thought applicable enough to the moderate reformers.

— Few, if any, governments of the present day, appear capable of meeting the improved intellect of the people. Wherever we look now, the contest appears to be between the governed and their governors; between improvement of understanding and commonplace ability; between liberality of feeling and narrowness of mind; between the enlightened state of public thinking and the blindness of superstition and of bigotry. * * * * The great and real objects of governments should be the safety and happiness of the people. It is for this that governments are created. It is for this pledge of security, that millions are paid for their support; and if the object of their institution be not attained, the people, on a principle of right, the contract being broken, may refuse further contributions, until another more efficient is constituted. This is the first and fundamental law, abstractedly considered, of the relationship between the governors and the governed; and it is on this broad basis that all differences between them should be settled.—Sass's Journey to Rome and Naples, 1817.

NORTH CAROLINA.—The general features of North Carolina where I crossed it, are immense solitary pine savannas, through which the road winds among stagnant ponds, swarming with alligators, dark, sluggish creeks, of the colour of brandy, over which are thrown high wooden bridges, without railings, so crazy and rotten as not only to alarm one's horse, but also the rider, and to make it a matter of thanksgiving with both, when they get fairly over, without going through enormous cypress swamps, which to a stranger have a striking, desolate, and ruinous appearance. Picture to yourself a forest of prodigious trees, rising as thick as they can grow, from a vast, flat, and impenetrable morass, covered for ten feet from the ground with reeds. The leafless limbs of the cypresses are clothed with an extraordinary kind of moss (tillandria umerides) from two to ten feet long, in such quantities, that fifty men might conceal themselves in one tree. Nothing in this country struck me with such surprise as the prospect of several thousand acres of such timber, loaded, as it were, with many million tons of tow waving in the wind. I attempted to penetrate several of these swamps with my gun, in search of something new; but, except in some chance places, I found it altogether impracticable. I coasted along their borders, however, in many places, and was surprised at the great profusion of evergreens of numberless sorts, and a variety of berries that I knew nothing of. Here I found multitudes of birds, that never winter with us in Pennsylvania, living in abundance. From Wilmington, I rode through solitary pine savannas and cypress swamps, as before, sometimes thirty miles without seeing a single human being.—American Ornithology.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, entitled

L'ULTIMO GIORNO DI POMPEI.

[By PACINI.]

Ottavia, wife of Sallustio . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Sallustio, elected to the Office of First Magistrate . . Sig. Lablache.
Menenio, son of Sallustio . . . Mme. Castelli.
Appio Diomede, tribune . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Pubblio, keeper of the public Baths . . . . . Signor Deville.
Clodio, a Youth, son of Pubblio . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Fausto, a Freeman of Sallustio . . . . Sig. De Angeli.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

Principal Characters—Mademoiselle Brocard, Mlle Kaniel, Mlle Clara, Mlle Proche, and Mlle Zoe Beaupré.
Monsieur Lefebvre,
M. Simon, M. Gouriet, M. O'Brien, M. George, M. Bertram, M. Emile, M. Venafra, M. Edouard, M. D'Albert, M. Hunt, and M. Paul.
In the First Act, Mademoiselle Taglioni will introduce the Tyrolienne.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Patima, Lesbia, Zemira, Miss Cawse, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After which, the Musical Farce of

THE HIGHLAND REEL.

Jenny, Miss Hughes. Moggy M'Gilpin, Miss Taylor.
M'Gilpin, Mr Blanchard. Sandy, Mr Wilson. Shelty, Mr Keeley.
Charley, Mr Henry. Sergeant Jack, Mr G. Stansbury.
Captain Dash, Mr Baker. Laird of Raasay, Mr Turnour. Croudy, Mr Evans.
Apie, Mr Heath. Benin, Master Harvey.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; and The Waterman.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr SHERIDAN.]

Lady Teazle, Miss Chester. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Faucit.
Mrs Candour, Mrs Orger. Maria, Miss Faucit. Maid, Mrs Webster.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr Farren. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr Dowton.
Joseph Surface, Mr Macready. Charles Surface, Mr Wallack.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr Harley. Crabtree, Mr W. Bennett. Trip, Mr Balls.
Careless, Mr Yarnold. Rowley, Mr Younge. Moses, Mr Webster.
Snake, Mr Thompson. Sir Harry (with a Song) Mr Sinclair.

In the course of the Evening, Spontini's Overture to 'Olympia;' and A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles.'

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Listen.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.
Guillaume, Master Richardson.

To-morrow, Werner; A Day after the Wedding; and The Brigand.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of

THE STRANGER.

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. Poole. Countess Winterstein, Miss Scott.
Charlotte, Mrs Vale. Savoyard, Miss Somerville, with the original Ballad, 'I have a silent sorrow here.'
The Stranger, Mr Osbaldiston. Count Winterstein, Mr Honner. Peter, Mr Vale.
Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Solomon, Mr Williams. Francis, Mr C. Hill.
Tobias, Mr Gough. The Count's Son, Master F. Carbery.
The Stranger's Children, Misses Clarke and E. Clarke.

The Military Brigand's Dance, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which an entirely New Petite Drama, entitled

CHARLEY OVER THE WATER.

Mary Primrose, assuming the Character of The Right Hon. Miss Matilda Rosabella Florina Flitterflutter, Madame Simon.
Farmer Primrose, Mr Gough. Squire Scapegrace, Mr Maitland.
Launcelot Longface, Mr Asbury.
Charley Primrose, assuming the Characters of Paddy O'Whack, Archibald Malapropos, Fribble, Hercules Hannibal Sureshot, Mr C. Hill.

An entirely New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Mrs Vale. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

Taken from Sir W. SCOTT'S celebrated Story.

Lady Ashton, Miss Wells. Lucy Ashton, Mrs Evans. Marion, Miss Ayres.
Dame Lightbody, Mrs Garrick. Sir William Ashton, Mr Munroe.
Edgar, Mr Keppell. Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr Forrester. Randolph, Mr Cooke.
Captain Craigengelt, Mr Marshall. And Caleb Balderstone, Mr J. Russell.

A Pas de Trois, by Miss Gilbert, Miss Hatton, and Miss Cadwell.

After which a Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtzdorf, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Vernon.
Count of Lissdorf, Mr Tilbury. Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Augustus, Mr Bennett. Boltzheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassomrompdorf, Mr J. Russell.

A Russian Pas de Deux, by Miss Wood and Miss C. Foster.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

In the course of the Evening, a Solo on the Violin by Mr Love; Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischutz;' A. Romberg's Overture in D; and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Master's Rival—The Skimmer of the Sea.

NEW CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE.—Billy Taylor—The Waterman—1, 2, 3, 4, 5, by Advertisement—The Bold Dragoons.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed): sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 214.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Mythology of Ancient Greece and Italy, intended chiefly for the use of Students at the Universities, and the Higher Classes in Schools.- By Thomas Keightley, Author of the 'Fairy Mythology,' 'Outlines of History,' in the Cabinet Cyclopædia, &c. &c. With Twelve Plates etched on Steel, by W. H. Brooke, F.S.A. 8vo, pp. 491. Whittaker, Treacher, and Co.

Mr Keightley need not have enjoined us in his preface, to give his work a consecutive perusal; for if he had written four times as much, we should have read it all through, out of pure love of the subject, and respect for the new aspect he has given to it by his learning and judgment. We need not add that we have read every word of his volume; and it may not be unpleasing to him to hear, as an earnest of what other readers may do, that we have put it on the same shelf that contains our Spenser and Milton, with our old friend Natalis Comes, and the Dizionario d'ogni Mitologia.

'My design in the work,' says Mr Keightley, 'is to supply an acknowledged desideratum in our literature; to make known the advances which the knowledge of classical mythology has made in Germany, and to initiate students in what may be called its philosophy. As I profess myself to be a disciple of the rational school of Voss and Lobeck, I also wish to oppose, if possible, an effectual bar to the introduction of the wild fancies of Creutzer and the mystics, into this country. How far I have succeeded remains for competent judges to determine.'

* * * * *

'The nature of my plan has obliged me to use the Greek names of the gods and heroes; which many, I trust, will deem to be an advantage.'

The plan here spoken of is one of the best features of Mr Keightley's work. The Latin gods have been so long identified with the Greek, and made partakers of so many fables in common, that it is perhaps impossible to separate them. We do not even desire to get rid of the word 'Mercury,' or the word 'Venus,' which have been grafted upon the most beautiful productions of our own country, and become synonymous with everything that is light and lovely. The translations of Pope and others have made even scholars think of the father of gods and men as 'Jupiter,' and not 'Zeus;' and Mr Keightley himself cannot help speaking of the 'Graces,' instead of the 'Charities' (χαριτες), though the compound idea conveyed by the latter word doubles the very grace of the former. But the Latin genius was cold and servile compared with that of the Greeks,—we mean of course intellectually. Ovid himself, who has led people to suppose otherwise, did but repeat, for the most part, the Grecian fables; and besides, he was a Neapolitan or Magna-Grecian. It was a miserable mistake in Spence and others to publish books on mythology, illustrated by Roman in preference to Grecian writers. That cold Latin track of scholarship was observable till a very late period, and arose, in fact, from a want of conversancy with the Greek writers. It was little better, than if a man had gone for specimens of fruit to a poor northern garden, instead of the tropics. The native abundance, the love, the genuine mythological climate, was with the Greeks; and to these our author has very properly gone in consequence. It gave us a malicious satisfaction to find, that out of the four hundred and eighty-four pages of his text, thirty-five sufficed for the Mythology of Italy. In the rest, with the exception of two or three retained by the Latins, you seldom meet with a Roman appellation. The scholar is agreeably startled to find, that there is no such person as Jupiter in the old proper Mythology, unless he be Zeus Pater. It is always the Zeus of the Greeks. Neptune is no such person as he pretends to be: he is Poseidon. Mercury is Hermes; Cupid, Eros; Juno, Hera; and instead of Apollo, much as we love the word by itself, we have, at least at the top of the page, the "Phœbus-Apollo" of Homer, —a compound which conveys to us the idea of the God in his double capacity of the sun-god and the poet. We highly approve this plan, both as being the truth, and as giving the reader a new interest in the Greek writings. It gives them even a new gloss with their fondest lovers: and for the same reason, we like the translations that Mr Keightley has given of many of the other names, and wish he had done it to all. The channels through which scholarship is usually conveyed to the world, are too apt to chill the most beautiful imaginations; and we are glad to know the meaning as well as the sound of a god's name. The French fairy tales would not be admired as much as they are, if the original names only were retained, and Ricquet-with-the-Tuft were not naturalized among us, as well as the Princess Fair-Star, and the Lass with the Golden Locks: and for the same reason we like to hear of the White Goddess (Leucothea), of Apollo's having been in love with the Muse Fair-Voice (Calliope), of Star-Coat (Astrochiton) who entertained Bacchus in India, and of the five men who survived out of Cadmus's Sown, to wit, Viper, Groundly, Earthly, Mighty, and Monster (Echion, Udæus, Chthonius, Hyperénor, and Pelor.)

As we are not acquainted, (to our regret), with the scholars of Germany, we feared, when Mr Keightley professed himself in his Preface to be a disciple of the rational school of Voss and Lobeck, in opposition to Creutzer and the mystics, that he was going to "rationalize" the old fables, or as he justifiably expresses it, "pragmatise" them; that is to say, convert them into matters of history and probability, and thus deprive them, not only of their enchanted fruit, but of the very pith of their reasonableness; for it cannot be too often repeated, that men have imagination as well as what they exclusively understand by the term reason, and that when they launch into the unknown world, they may discover as many improbable things as they please, provided they delight us; not to mention, that there is a profounder reason for it, connected with the very best part of our well-being. But the perusal of a few pages agreeably undeceived us. Mr Keightley is at the mercy neither of allegories nor etymologies, of the mystical nor the verbal. He has the right voluntary faith, and believes just what a lover of Paganism ought to do. At the same time, he does not reject allegory, etymology, or history, where they are manifestly to be received; his work, generally speaking, is judicious throughout: the main views of it are always so. One of its best points, is his keeping in mind the modifications of the popular belief by times and manners; as where he says, for instance, that "Zeus and Hera in Homer, (Jupiter and Juno), are on all occasions described after a model presented by a Hellenic prince and his wife of the heroic ages," and takes care to point out to us the different periods at which various aspects and qualities were first ascribed to the Gods. (By the way, on what principle is it that Mr Keightley approves this gasping interval between the particle and the aspirated word, "a Hellenic," as he does in "a heroic," "a historical," &c. Surely the particle should be an, before all words which are not accented on the first syllable. In the latter case the a is right, as in "a horse," "a hero," "a history;" but would Mr Keightley, for the sake of euphony, leave out the letter n in the word anhelitus? He might omit it, we grant, for the sake of strengthening the meaning). It was in no profane spirit, but out of a pardonable resentment at the involuntary profaneness of others, that Fontenelle said, that "If God had made man in his own image, man had repaid him by making him in his." The ideas of a deity, in all ages, have been modelled upon the prevailing notions of what was most powerful and desirable. A philosopher's idea of a divinity, at the present moment, is very different from the one entertained by a cannibal chieftain. Revenge and punishment, on the part of Heaven, may, it is true, be allegorized, or more rationally made to signify the admonitory pain which ensues upon a dereliction from the right path of happiness: but these refinements were not in the thoughts of the old mythic writers, still less in those of the poets of luxurious ages. The Gods in Homer's time, as Mr Keightley has shewn, were fierce warriors and handsome women, but not ill-natured or monstrous. They had the virtues as well as vices of a healthy, robust period, little given to contemplation. As sophistication advanced, and "excitement" (to use a favourite modern word) grew in request, they became disgustingly cruel, and monsters arose among them. At all times they were as inclined to resentment as most people are, especially those in possession of authority. Leto (Latona) one of the gentlest of the goddesses, turned a parcel of clowns, for mocking her distress, into frogs; and made Niobe a childless mother, because she had dared to compete with her in rank. Demeter (Ceres), another, turned a boy into a lizard for laughing at her when she was "drinking some gruel;" and Apollo, the most good-natured of all the gods, who was lenient even to his faithless mistresses, flayed Marsuas alive for thinking himself as good a musician. This last fable, however, is traced to a "leathern bag," which hung over a cavern, from which the river Mareyas issued; so that we are indebted perhaps to some dull allegorist for this blot on the deity's scutcheon.

Digitized by Google

The following passages will afford some good specimens of the spirit in which our author has executed his task. Mr Keightley, with his usual judgment, thinks the Iliad and Odyssey written by different persons,—an opinion incidentally referred to in the beginning of the following extract. The passages, by the way, that we have selected, all contain some curious point. In the one before us we are presented with the strange notions entertained in the times of the Odyssey, respecting the state of the dead:—

'The region over which Hades presides is represented in the Iliad as being under the earth; in the Odyssey it, or the entrance to it, is placed in the dark region beyond the stream of Ocean: it is called Erebus; and the poet everywhere described it as dreary, dark, and cheerless. The dead, without distinction of good or evil, age or rank, wander about there, conversing of their former state on earth; they are unhappy, and they feel their wretched state acutely. Achilles, the son of a goddess, declares to Odysseus that he would rather be a day-labourer to the poorest cultivator on earth, than a king in those regions. They have no strength or power of mind or body. Some few, enemies of the Gods, such as Sisyphus, Tityus, Tantalus, are punished for their crimes, but not apart from the rest of the dead! Nothing can be more gloomy and comfortless than the whole aspect of the realm of Hades, as pictured in the Odyssey. It is, in fact, surprising that men who had such a dreary prospect before them should not have been more attached to life, and more averse from war and everything that might abridge the period, than the ancient Greeks were.'

* * * * * * *

'The favourite haunt of Hephæstus (Vulcan) on earth was the isle of Lemnos. It was here he fell when flung from heaven by Zeus, for attempting to aid his mother Hera, when Zeus suspended her in the air with anvils fastened to her feet. As knowledge of the earth advanced, Ætna, Lipari, and all other places where there was subterranean fire, were regarded as the forges of Hephæstus; and the Cyclops were associated with him as his assistants. In Homer, when Thetis wants Hephæstian armour for her son, she seeks Olympus, and the armour is fashioned by the artist-god with his own hand. In the Augustan age, Venus prevails on her husband, the master-smith, to furnish her son Æneas with arms, and he goes down from heaven to Lipari, and directs his men the Cyclops to execute the order. It is thus that mythology changes with modes of life.'—P. 84.

* * * * * * *

'A god so handsome and accomplished as Phœbus-Apollo could not well be supposed to be without his love adventures; yet it is observable that he was not remarkably happy in his love, either meeting with a repulse, or having his amour attended with a fatal termination.' * * * * 'The only celestial amour recorded of Apollo, is that with the Muse Calliope, of which the fruit was Orpheus.'—P. 92.

But see p. 149, where he is said to have had children by Thalia. This circumstance in Apollo's history has always struck us as remarkable. It seems wonderful how the poets could have avoided an amour between Apollo and Venus. Spenser, who was a great innovator in mythology, should have made one for him.

* * * * * * *

'Hesiod says, that the Atlantis Maia bore to Zeus "the illustrious Hermes, the herald of the immortals." In another place he speaks of him very explicitly, as the deity presiding over flocks and herds, saying that the herdsmen prayed to him and Hecate. This poet also ascribes to him the only act injurious to man with which he is charged, namely a share in the fatal Pandora, to whom he gave "a currish disposition and thievish propensity."

'In after times, Hermes became the god of commerce, of wrestling, and all the exercises of the palæstra, of eloquence, even of thieving, which some think is so closely allied with trade; in short, of everything relating to gain, or requiring art and ingenuity. A certain good-humoured roguery was at all times a trait in his character. In the pleasing tale of Ares and Aphrodite already noticed, the gallant reply of Hermes to the question of Phœbus-Apollo called forth the laughter of the Olympians.'—P. 125.

* * * * * * *

'"Zeus," says Hesiod, "was by Eurynome, the daughter of Ocean, the father of the 'three fair-cheeked Graces,' Aglaïa (Splendour), Euphrosyne (Joy), and lovely Thalia (Pleasure). "From their eyes," continues the poet, "as they gazed, distilled care-dispelling love; and they looked lovely from beneath their brows." According to Antimachus, the Graces were the daughters of Helius and Œgle (Splendour); and Hermesionax made Peitho (Persuasion) one of their number.

'Eteocles of Orchonenus is said to have been the first who established the worship of the three Graces in Greece. The Lacedemonians worshipped originally but two, whom they named Cletha and Phaënna (Sound and Brightness), and regarded as the bestowers of military fame. The Athenians adored the same number, under the names of Hegémone (Leader), and Auxo (Increaser):—a proof, as it were, of the different characters of these two nations.'—P. 152.

* * * * * * *

'"In the Homeric poems," (that is to say, poems written by various persons in the manner of the great author of the Iliad, and at an early period), "we meet the various classes of nymphs. In the Odyssey, they are the attendants of Circe, the potent daughter of Helius, also designated as a goddess and a nymph, it is said,

"They spring from fountains and from sacred groves,
And holy streams that flow into the sea."

Yet these nymphs are of divine nature; and when Zeus, the father of the Gods, calls together his council,

"None of the streams save Ocean, stayed away,
Nor of the nymphs, who dwell in beauteous groves,
And springs of streams, and verdant grassy slades."

'"We believe," adds the author in a note "there is no word in the English language which so nearly expresses the Greek αἴσυα, as this old, now provincial term. The Anglo-Saxon slaed is certainly a valley; all the sports denominated slades that we have seen, were rich, irriguous, but somewhat depressed lands.' "—P. 207.

Mr Keightley's revival of this word is acceptable. The language of modern English literature, owing, no doubt, to the concentration of all thought and action into great cities, is not half abundant enough in local and other terms. May not slade come from the same root as the word slide, and imply one of those gentle dips of land, which would often be characterised, like those which our author speaks of? There is a place on the road between Kilburn and Edgeware called The Slad, which if our memory does not greatly deceive us, is of that description.

* * * * * * *

'It is remarkable that it is only in the mythic names that the Latin form varies from the Greek; those of historical personages are nearly the same in both languages. Thus Pericles, Pindarus, Aristides, Pisander, scarcely differ from the Greek originals; while for Persephone, Heracles, Polydeukes, Odysseus,—we have Proserpine, Hercules, Pollux, and Ulysses. Does not this indicate that a knowledge of the Grecian mythology reached Latium long before the Latins had any intimacy with the Greek language? We always find, that foreign names undergo alteration in proportion to the ignorance of the language to which they belong. This is particularly to be observed in Oriental names, which are now spelt far more correctly than they were before we were become so familiar with Asia.'—P. 310.

It may be guessed from these extracts, the last of which presents us with a very scholarly and ingenious deduction, that Mr Keightley excels more in the elegance and judgment of his learning than in profoundness of thought, or even any very great relish of what he relates. The surprise he expresses at the willingness of the Greeks to hazard an abridgment of their lives because of their dreary notions of the life after death, is not founded in an intimate knowledge of human nature, to which the future is, in fact, as nothing, compared with the present, especially where excitement is to be had. Life itself is action, and the more vividly a person can live, the more he feels the principle of vitality within him, and on that very account is instinctively thoughtless of death. A very strenuous life is a kind of wine, and spins the blood into a carelessness of everything but its immediate sensation. Nor is our author's great judgment in other matters always free from oversight. In an article on Demeter he says, that because the mysteries of Eleusis were performed 'at the charge of the state, and under the superintendence of the magistrates, it follows as a necessary consequence, that the rites could have contained nothing that was grossly immoral or indecent.' Yet in a subsequent article, speaking of the emblems that were 'carried in processions at which modest virgins assisted,' he observes, that 'no ceremony more immoral or debasing is celebrated in India at the present day than polished Athens performed in the Phrygio-Grecian Dionysia.'

The want of gusto with which Mr Keightley has related the most celebrated stories of antiquity, is sometimes a little provoking; especially as we look on a portion of it as arising from a certain timidity, or rather from a want of faith in the sympathy of his reader. He doubts whether we shall participate in his enthusiasm, if he gives way to it. He should have done more honour to the beauty of his originals. If he had but believed he should have carried us with him, he would have done so. It is impossible also not to regret the golden opportunity he has lost, of introducing those divine pieces of poetry out of Milton and Spenser, in which the heathen mythology has been treated with no less learning than charmingness. But it is idle, perhaps, to lament these omissions. Mr Keightley has performed his part as a scholar with great judgment and good sense, not without a perception of the beautiful. He has supplied the desideratum he speaks of, as far as learning goes, and an "initiation" into the philosophy of his subject, which was all he undertook to do, with the exception of the curious information he has sprinkled through his book respecting the German scholars: and if it still remains for others to complete the philosophy, and to excite a fitter portion of poetical sympathy, we have only one or two books more to look forward to, and to hope that the authors will play their respective parts with equal zeal and sincerity.

Digitized by Google

Mr Keightley's work is adorned with twelve plates, abounding in figures from the antique, etched upon steel by Mr Brooke, who shewed some fancy in his designs for the 'Fairy Mythology.' We cannot praise the force of their drawing or the truth of their expressions; but designs from the antique are always welcome, especially in a work of this nature.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.—Egypt.

A JUDICIOUS CONQUEROR.

The following extract from an article in the 'Asiatic Researches,' contributed by Captain Wilford, will tend to strengthen the opinion now universally entertained by the ablest writers, that the shepherds who invaded Egypt, had migrated from a distant country in the East:—'An ancient king, called Chatara-Yona, passed a hundred years in a cavern of Crishna-giri, the Black Mountain, on the banks of the Cali, performing the most rigorous acts of devotion. At length Vishnu appeared to him, and promised him that he should have a son whom he was to name Tumovatsa. This prince, when he succeeded his father, was warlike and ambitious, but wise and devout. He prayed to Vishnu to enlarge his empire, and the god granted his request. Hearing that Misra-sthan (the land of Egypt) was governed by a powerful but unjust prince, called Nirmayada, he with a chosen army invaded that country, without any declaration of war, and began to administer justice among the people, to give them a specimen of a good king; and when Nirmayada sent to expostulate, he treated his remonstrance with disdain. This brought on a bloody battle of three days, in which the Egyptian king was killed. The conqueror, who fought like another Parasa Rama, then took possession of the kingdom of Misra, and governed with perfect equity. Babya Vatsa, his son, devoted himself to religion, and resigned his crown to his son, Rucma Vatsa, who tenderly loved his people, and so highly improved his country, that, from his just revenues, he amassed an incredible treasure. His wealth was so great, that he raised three mountains, called Rucm-adri, Rujat-adri, and Retu-adri, or the mountain of gold, of silver, and of gems.'

A CURIOUS REMARK.

The Pasha of Egypt, when visiting one of his military schools, exhorting the young officers to zeal and perseverance, the first difficulties being already overcome, said, 'If I had any influence in heaven, I should work miracles in your behalf; but I am nothing more than a man, and can only give you salaries.'

TRUE IGNOBILITY.

'On the return of the Count de Forbin from Thebes,' says Belzoni, 'I met him at Cairo, in the house of the Austrian Consul. I had begun the task of opening the pyramids, and had already discovered the false passage. The Count requested, in a sort of sarcastic manner, when I had succeeded in opening the pyramid,—which, no doubt, he supposed I never would,—that I would send him a plan of it, as he was about setting off for Alexandria the next day, and thence to France. I thought the best retaliation I could make, would be to send him the desired plan, and I did so, as soon as I opened the pyramid, which was a few days after his departure. Would any one believe that the noble Count, on his arrival in France, gave out that he had succeeded in penetrating the second pyramid of Djizeh, and brought the plan of it to Paris. Whether this be the fact or not, will appear from the following paragraph, taken from a French paper now in my possession:—"On the 24th of April, Monsieur Le Comte de Forbin, Director-general of the Royal Museum of France, landed at the lazaretto of Marseilles. He came last from Alexandria, and his passage was very stormy. He has visited Greece, Syria, and Upper Egypt. By a happy chance, some days before his departure from Cairo, he succeeded in penetrating into the second pyramid of Djizeh. Monsieur Forbin brings the plan of this important discovery, as well as much information on the labours of M. Drovetti, at Karnac, and on those which Mr Salt, the English Consul, pursues with the greatest success in the valley of Beban-el-Malook, and in the plain of Medinet Abou."'

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—L'Ultimo Giorno di Pompei—Kenilworth.
DRURY-LANE.—The School for Scandal—And The Legion of Honour.
COVENT GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—And The Highland Reel.

Our late illness makes us willing to take advantage of the non-appearance of anything new at the great theatres, and content ourselves with play-going on paper, till to-morrow night, when Madame PASTA re-appears. To see her we shall as surely go, as we would to see Truth herself; for Truth she is, with the voice of Music. Is she as true and as real as ever? Is she as great, and simple, and graceful? Is she as fat! or fatter! Shall we have to shew how that her fat is nothing (Hibernice), and her soul everything? Or rather, that her soul being so much, there cannot be too much of her in any way? These are questions that we ask of ourselves, as we should respecting a friend whom we have not seen a long time, and who is sure to be charming.

Meantime we must notice a subject of a very different nature. We are not sure that we do not owe both ourselves and our readers an apology for doing so; but we shall be as brief as possible. A few weeks ago a gentleman sent us the following old play-bill of the new piece entitled Nettlewig Hall. We did not publish it, because several other correspondents had noticed the piece, and we thought Mr CHARLES MOLLOY WESTMACOTT had had enough comment upon his production. One of them told us, that in quoting a passage from the Times in his journal respecting the singing of God save the King, before his farce, he inserted the word "popular" in it as applied to the farce. We said as little of that, as of the other communication; partly for the same reason, and partly because the very notice of miserable tricks like these seems to acquire a colour of shabbiness from their reflection. While behaving with this forbearance towards Mr MOLLOY WESTMACOTT, he thought proper to repeat his refuted nonsense about Mrs WAYLETT'S song in the Oratorios, and in return for being convicted of falsehood, to charge us with it himself. To these he added other licenses of his tongue, in the spirit of impertinent boys and such-like worthies, who having been punished after their fashion, till people are tired, think themselves below any further resentment, and therefore safe from it. It must be confessed, that for reasons well known to the public, Mr WESTMACOTT has some grounds for his conclusion; but for certain other reasons before alluded to in this paper, we had made up our mind not to suffer ourselves to be attacked with impunity; and in accordance with the plan which we have pursued to this effect, since THE TATLER was set up, we proceed to give him another word or two, since he insists upon it. The reader may remember a letter which Mr WESTMACOTT addressed to us in vindication of Nettlewig Hall, against a Correspondent. In this letter he refuted an imaginary charge against it (of its not being his own) and while he implied that it was new (by saying that since the production of Maids and Bachelors at the Surrey Theatre, he had 'perpetrated no dramatic offence,' 'up to the production of Nettlewig Hall,') endeavoured to provide for the escape of the real secret, by talking in the postscript of its being no crime to have attempted 'an improved edition of his own works.' The Correspondent in question says, that the two 'works' (Maids and Bachelors, and Nettlewig Hall) are the same, 'line for line.' We know not how this may be. Non nostrum est tantas componere lites. Mr WESTMACOTT, endeavouring to confuse matters in his shabby way, said, in his answer to the charge of the title's having been used before, 'The farce of Nettlewig Hall is entirely my own, nor do I believe the title has ever been before used.' He non-mi-ricordo'd it. In the bill of the piece, as performed at Drury Lane, the title is, Nettlewig Hall, or Ten to One; and the dramatis personæ are, Sir John Julius Nettlewig, Frederick Ramble, Tim Transit, Patrick O'Doherty, Ben Backstay, Miss Emily Constant, Mrs Deborah, Old Nancy, Coachman, Footman, Groom, &c. Now look at the play-bill of the piece as performed at the Surrey Theatre in February 1824. First comes Borrachio the Outlaw, or the Child of Mystery; after which, says the bill, 'an entirely new broad farcical Burletta, in two acts, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations, called,

Digitized by Google

MAIDS AND BACHELORS;
OR, NETTLEWIG HALL.

With original Songs and Music. The Scenery by Mr WALKER and Assistants; and the Burletta written by CHARLES WESTMACOTT, Esq.

Sir John Junius Nettlewig, Mr LOVEDAY.
Frederick Bramble, Mr ROWBOTHAM. Tim Transit, Mr VALE.
Patrick Finesse, Mr BUCKINGHAM. Ben Backstay, Mr GALLOT.
Miss Emily Constant, Miss TUNSTALL.
Maria, Mrs HEALEY. Mrs Deborah, Mrs JONES.
Old Nancy, Mrs MEARS.

With Coachman, Footman, Groom, &c. to all appearance just the same as in the Drury Lane. How far the two pieces are likely to differ in other respects, is left for the reader to determine.

It is not pleasant for us to speak of Mr WESTMACOTT, nor even against him, if he will not force us. We can bring more excuses for him, than perhaps he can for himself; though we cannot wonder that those who suffer from his scandals, find him intolerable, and are tempted to abate him as a nuisance. His recommending us to the notice of the Stamp Office was a piece of spite, of a nature calculated to give us a worse opinion of him than we would fain entertain of anybody, supposing that he was aware of the extent of the mischief it might have occasioned: though under the present liberal and discerning Government we really do not fear it. But we caution him how he indulges his tongue against us any further, or affects to give this paper the most false and revolting of all characters,—that of his own.

— MODERATION is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.—Dr Fuller.

DREAD OF DEATH.—It is the heaviest stone that melancholy can throw at a man, to tell him that he is at the end of his being.—Sir Thomas Brown.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Lord BYRON'S Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs Faucit. Ida Stralenheim, Miss Faucit.
Werner, Mr Macready. Ulric, Mr Wallack. Gabor, Mr Cooper.
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack. Frits, Mr Younge. Henric, Mr Salter.
Eric, Mr C. Jones. Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett. Rodolph, Mr Cooke.
Arnheim, Mr Fenton. Meister, Mr Eaton. Ludwig, Mr Cathie.
Herman, Mr Honner.

In the course of the Evening, Spohr's Overture to 'Jessonda,' C. M. Von Weber's Overture to 'Preciosa,' and Rossini's Overture to 'The Siege of Corinth.'

After which, the Interlude of

A DAY AFTER THE WEDDING.

Lady Elisabeth Freelove, Mrs Waylett. Mrs Davis, Mrs C. Jones.
Colonel Freelove, Mr Vining. Lord Rivers, Mr Younge.
James, Mr Hughes. John, Mr Honner.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Ottavia, Miss Faucit. Maria Grazie, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge. Nicole, Mr Webster. Fablo, Mr Hughes.
Albert, Mr H. Wallack. Theodore, Mr J. Vining.
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr Wallack.
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford. Spoletto, Mr Bland.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; The Illustrious Stranger; and Turning the Tables.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr SHERIDAN.]

Lady Teazle, Miss Fanny Kemble. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Vining.
Mrs Candour, Mrs Gibbs. Maria, Miss Taylor.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr Bartley. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr F. Matthews.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr Wrench. Crabtree, Mr Blanchard.
Charles Surface, Mr C. Kemble. Joseph Surface, Mr Warde.
Careless, Mr Duruset. Rowley, Mr Evans. Moses, Mr Farley.
Trip, Mr Parry. Sir Harry, Mr Wilson.

In the course of the Evening, Miss Inverarity will sing 'Tyrant, soon I'll burst thy chains,' and the Duet of 'When thy bosom,' with Mr Braham.

After which the Musical Entertainment of

THE WATERMAN.

[By Mr DIBDIN.]

Tom Tug, Mr Braham, in which he will introduce 'The Bay of Biscay O.'

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; and The £100 Note.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE PLUS BEAU JOUR DE LA VIE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE et VARNER.
Madame de St André, Mme. Préval.
Antonine et Estelle, Mlle. St Ange et Mme. Gamard. Jules, Mlle. Elisa.
M. Bonnemain, M. Préval. M. de St André, M. Cloup.
Frédéric, M. Alfred.

Suivi de

VALERIE: OU, LA JEUNE AVEUGLE.

Comédie en Trois Actes, du Théâtre Français, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Valérie, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Caroline de Blumfeld, Mlle. St. Ange.
Ernest, M. Pellasié. Henry Milner, M. Alfred. Ambroise, M. Laporte.

On Finira par la Première Représentation de

LE QUAKER ET LA DANSEUSE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, par MM. SCRIBE et PAUL DUPONT.
Miss Georgina Barlow, Mlle. Léontine Fay.
James Morton, M. Laporte. Arthur d'Arsie, M. Alfred. Murray, M. Paulin.
Toby, M. Gamard. Un Domestique, M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of

THE IRON CHEST.

[By G. COLMAN, the Younger.]

Helen, Miss Scott, Blanche, Mrs Vale. Judith, Madame Simon.
Barbara, Miss Somerville. Sir Edward Mortimer, Mr Osbaldiston.
Fitzharding, Mr D. Pitt. Wilford, Mr C. Hill. Adam Winterton, Mr Williams.
Rawbold, Mr Gough. Samson Rawbold, Mr Vale. Armstrong, Mr Almar.
Orson, Mr Asbury. Robber, Mr Webb. Robber's Boy, Master Pitt.
Gregory, Mr Lee. Peter, Mr Boulanger. Walter, Mr Grammer.

After which, a Dramatic Romance, in Two Acts, called

THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS.

Helena di Rosalvi, Miss M. C. Poole. Claudine, Miss Jordan.
Jacinthe, Miss Rumens. Rosa, Miss Nicol. Genevieve, Miss Somerville.
Felix, Mr Osbaldiston. Rosalvi, Mr D. Pitt. Jeronymo, Mr Young.
Marco, Mr Lee. Florio di Rosalvi, Miss Ellis. Baptista, Mr Webb.
Julio di Rosalvi, Master F. Carbery. Juan, Mr Tully.
Pietro, Mr Collier. Fabricio, Mr Fone.

To conclude with the Romantic Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. VON WEBER.]

Linda, Miss Somerville. Rose, Mrs Vale.
Ottacar, Mr Almar. Bernhard, Mr Gough. Caspar, Mr D. Pitt.
Rodolph, Mr Edwin. Rollo, Mr Ransford. Killian, Mr Vale.
Christopher, Mr Hobbs. Zamiel, Mr Asbury. Witch of the Glen, Mr Boulanger.
Huntsmen, Mr Webb, Mr Tully, and Mr Collier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

Taken from Sir W. SCOTT'S celebrated Story.

Lady Ashton, Miss Wells. Lucy Ashton, Mrs Evans. Marion, Miss Ayres.
Dame Lightbody, Mrs Garrick. Sir William Ashton, Mr Munroe.
Edgar, Mr Keppell. Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr Forrester. Randolph, Mr Cooke.
Captain Craigengelt, Mr Marshall. And Caleb Balderstone, Mr J. Russell.

After which a Grand Concert of Vocal and Instrumental Music.

To which will be added a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

Mrs Pimpernel, Mrs Glover.
Mr Theophilus Bunbury, Mr Marshall. And Mr Alexis Twisselton, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.
French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stohwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Deesaix, Mr Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cheese
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Master's Rival—The Skimmer of the Sea.

NEW CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE.—Billy Taylor—The Waterman—1, 2, 3, 4, 5, by Advertisement—The Bold Dragoons.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 215.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Alfred the Great, or The Patriot King. An Historical Play. By James Sheridan Knowles. Author of Virginius, Caius Gracchus, and William Tell. 8vo. pp. 85. Ridgway.

ALFRED was so great a man in the sense of goodness as well as of energy, and has come down to posterity with an aspect so perfect, that even his adversity appears to have been nothing, as compared with his virtues; and it is on this account that there has been a secret persuasion with dramatic people, that his history is unsuitable to the stage. His character was felt to be too sweet for terror, and too accomplished and successful to excite pity. This would not have been the case, had the public been made as familiar with the whole of his history, as they were with parts of it. This omission on the part of the numerous historians who have mentioned him, would have been unaccountable, if we did not know how much writers of all sorts were in the habit of copying from one another. In a philosophic historian like Hume it was unpardonable, and still more so in another (Sir James Macintosh) who had the benefit of Mr Turner's researches, and yet expresses his regret that we are not acquainted with the infirmities of which Alfred must have partaken in common with his fellow-creatures. Now it is to be gathered from Asser, the single-minded biographer and friend of Alfred, and if we are not greatly mistaken, has been shewn at some length by Mr Turner, the only complete historian of the Anglo-Saxon period, that Alfred in his youth partook, in no ordinary degree, of the levities and passions, and even the contemptuous confidence incidental to that time of life; and it seems probable that one of the reasons why the calamities of his country made such a profound impression upon him, was remorse for his having contributed to them by the carelessness of his government. It has often struck us, that a play which should begin with him in this point of view, and bring his subsequent lustre out of the darkness of his mistakes as well as misfortunes, would have rendered his character as dramatic as it need be; and if Mr Knowles had hit upon this view of the subject, we doubt whether his piece would have been held so long from the public, as it seems to have been. However, it has at length found a golden opportunity. Poets must sometimes wait for genial seasons, as bees do for the summer-time: a flood of sunshine has now poured upon his subject, and we trust the produce will be as abundant to him, as the stock is sweet.

Sweetness is indeed the main characteristic of this play, as it is of all Mr Knowles's that we have seen, however rough some of the personages may be that he introduces. His titles may look stern or warlike; the cocoa-nut may have a rough outside; but there is not only the usual metaphorical amount of milk within: it is full of it. Mr Knowles's plays have a right to be called "Historical," but they have a still greater right to be called "Domestic." Wherever he goes, he carries home and its affections with him. All his patriots and heroes are fathers, brothers, or husbands. In the play before us, though none of the obvious points of historical interest are omitted, three parts at least are occupied with the private affections. Is this a defect? Quite the contrary. The highest public interest is only made up at last, of what interests us all privately. We like Alfred because he tasted of our misfortunes, and our barley-cakes. We like the King now reigning, because we look upon him as a man who has mingled with, and can feel for all classes of his subjects. What would any tragedy be to us, or poetry, or 'the great globe itself,' or the whole region of the unknown and invisible, if the thoughts of it did not produce emotions connected with the consideration of our common welfare, or that of the least of little ones.

Agreeably to this character of moral sweetness, Mr Knowles's play, notwithstanding its historical and serious character, may emphatically be styled a pleasant one: the people in it are almost all pleasant. He fetches out the goodness they have in them: and tempers the bitterest things they have to undergo with some cordial drop of tenderness or generosity. The passing delirium of Alfred's Queen, and of Guthrum's daughter, are both occasioned by the noblest love; and the Chieftain himself, violent as he is, is more a father than a man of violence. Like most men, he has some passion beyond what appears on the face of his public conduct, and this passion is love for his child; nor is this unnatural, but extremely the reverse; for violent people, though they pretend otherwise, even to themselves, meet with so much opposition, as to force upon them a sense of their imperfections, and render them anxious to identify their natures somehow, with something better. Now a child is a continuation of the parent, and in an amiable child, a violent father, if he has any generosity, eagerly seizes upon this set off to the bad part of him. Even Squire Weston, though he had not the sense to know it, had at least self-love enough to value his daughter on a similar account. She was his daughter. He had done at least one graceful thing in his life, in being the father of her; and upon this he never could sufficiently congratulate himself. We like plays of this description the more, because, as we have before remarked, there is a deficiency in the world, of pleasant books. There is an abundance of painful ones, and their effect may have been salutary, supposing them to have kept the world in a state of discontent with evil, instead of acquiescence to it. But the world is now beginning to be wisely bent upon taking the 'goods the gods provide them,' and among other happy things, we might as well have some happy historical plays. Mr Knowles's women are pleasant, his heroes are pleasant; he has made the pleasure consist with truths, and we therefore thank him for the faith we can have in it.

We do not think the play equal to Virginius. There is not so strong and simple a tide in it, or continuity of action; neither, on that account, is the language so equably good and sustained. It may compete with William Tell. Caius Gracchus we are not acquainted with. The manners also are very strictly observed; and Alfred is erroneously made to have originated the Trial by Jury. But the play is very dramatic throughout. The points of the stage have evidently been as deeply as they are happily considered. Every scene tells, at least in the perusal; (for we were unfortunately too ill to see it come out); and the historical points, especially that of the burnt cakes, are given with a felicity, upon which the author may be particularly congratulated, since it is extremely difficult to avoid spoiling events so familiar and well-known, either by attempting to give them dignity on the one hand, or having too much confidence in their simplicity and homeliness on the other. The spirit of the piece has been most unjustly said to be melo-dramatic, or ostentatious. Mr Knowles, for instance, has judiciously avoided making the tart housewife relent in her shrewishness, or seize an opportunity for repentance; a common-place, upon which a vulgar melo-dramatic author would have infallibly seized. The only symptom of consideration that she gives, is of a superstitious nature (where the old man tells Alfred that he will be prosperous for his kindness to him); and if it be true, as well as highly probable, that Mr Knowles added any lines 'for the occasion,' to the passages alluding to English kings and patriotism, we will affirm, that far from giving the critics a right to consider them as 'clap-traps,' in the vulgar sense of that word, he had not only a right to add them, but was called upon to do so, by the extraordinary nature of the times, and the enthusiasm of the community.

The success of this piece, as was to be expected, was very great, and we suppose will continue so. A letter appeared in our paper the other day, objecting to the repetition of pieces at the theatres, and with justice as far as bad pieces are concerned; but surely if a play like this can run so night after night, the more nights it run the better. What do we lament on the stage, but that such pieces do not appear oftener? One of the most singular testimonies to the merits of Mr Knowles's play, was an extraordinary ebullition of spleen against it in a morning paper, amounting to the personal; a tirade apparently of so unaccountable and suffering a nature, that the severest as well as kindest rebuke to be given to it, is to say nothing about it.

Digitized by Google

The following is the scene of the cakes:

Maude. 'Tis noon, and yet
No sign of Edwin! Dost thou mind thy task?
Look to't! and when the cakes are fit to turn
Call, and I'll come!
Alfred. I'll turn them, dame.
Maude. You will?
You'll break them!—Know I not your handy ways?
I would not suffer thee put finger to them!
Call, when 'tis time! You'll turn the cakes forsooth!
As likely thou could'st make the cakes as turn them! [Exit.

Alf. So much for poverty! Adversity's
The nurse for kings;—but then the palace gates
Are shut against her!—They would else have hearts
Of mercy oft'ner—gems not always dropp'd
In fortune's golden cup. What thought hath he
How hunger warpeth honesty, whose meal
Still waited on the hour? Can he perceive
How nakedness converts the kindly milk
Of nature into ice, to whom each change
Of season—yea, each shifting of the wind,
Presents his fitting suit? Knows he the storm
That makes the valiant quail, who hears it only
Thro' the safe wall—its voice alone can pierce;
And there talks comfort to him with the tongue,
That bids without the shelterless despair?
Perhaps he marks the mountain wave, and smiles
So high it rolls!—while on its fellow hangs
The fainting seaman glaring down at death
In the deep trough below! I will extract
Riches from penury; from sufferings
Coin blessings; that if I assume again
The sceptre, I may be the more a king
By being more a man!

MAUDE re-enters, goes towards the fire, lifts the cakes, goes to ALFRED, and holds them to him.

Maude. Is this your care?
Ne'er did you dream that meal was made of corn,
Which is not grown until the earth be plough'd;
Which is not garner'd up until 'tis cut;
Which is not fit for use until 'tis ground;
Nor used then till kneaded into bread?
Ne'er knew you this? It seems you never did,
Else had you known the value of the bread;
Thought of the ploughman's toil; the reaper's sweat;
The miller's labour; and the housewife's thrift;
And not have left my barley cakes to burn
To very cinders!
Alf. I forgot, good dame.
Maude. Forgot, good dame, forsooth! You ne'er forgot
To eat my barley cakes! (knock) Open the door!

The following is very striking. Some Saxons having come into the cottage, one of them feels a mysterious interest in the look of Alfred, and addresses a question to him as he sits mending his bow:—

Egbert (to Alfred) Is it a bow
You shape?
Alf. It is.
Eg. I pray you show it me.
Alf. (rising and coming forward) Here.
Eg. (struck with the appearance of Alf.) Forgive me that I call'd you from your seat.
Alf. No wrong is done where none is meant.
Eg. You make
The wrong the greater, so excusing it.
Lodge you beneath this roof?
Alf. I do.
Eg. (aside.) I've met
With men whose faces utter histories,
That seeing them I could tell their course of life—
Whether on ocean or on land—uneven
Or smooth—almost what perils they had run,
Or incidents of happy fortune seen.
Now his is one of them,
Alf. You'd see the bow?
Eg. (mechanically taking, and almost at the same time returning it.) Your pardon.

Alfred wants a harp to go into the Danish camp with, and bethinks him of one that he has seen in the neighbourhood:—

Yes! Life and empire on this cast I'll stake!
But how provide myself! There is a place
In the glen where, of its shaggy vesture scant,
It's sides stand bare, and their huge ribs expose
Of solid rock; so giddy steep withal,
That down direct from the precipitous verge
You many fathoms look.—There have I mark'd
A lonely wight at the bottom couch'd, with harp
Playing to the idle echoes by the hour,
Admiring how they mock'd him—I will use
That harp!—will use it to expel the foe,
That thrust its master from the shining hall
To the dim cavern-cell; spill'd his heap'd dish—
O'erturn'd his cup, from all sides running o'er,
And cast him, with that golden song of his,
To roots and water.

Is this melo-dramatic writing?

Papers picked up at Sea, relating to the Currency and Banking. 8vo. pp. 52. Le Roy. Calais. 1831.

So much has been written and spoken on the subject of Currency and Banking, that if the general enlightenment has been at all in proportion to the exertions of the advocates of all sides of these questions, there must be few persons who have now much to learn. Unhappily, with regard to the Currency, there are so many collateral topics to be considered in connexion with it, that a great deal of complexity is unavoidable; and the consequence is, that no decision is ever arrived at, so unequivocally right, as to obtain the acquiescence of the contending parties. Discussion, however, has not been without its usual good effects; a great many errors, supported by sounding names, have been exploded, and certain leading principles are no longer subjected to dispute. The present pamphlet merits distinction, on account of the lively manner in which the author handles subjects, apparently so unprepossessing, at the same time that he reasons so as to entitle him to the consideration which is accorded to graver disputants. The views of the author, and the contents of the pamphlet, may be gathered from the following passage from the preface:—

'They (the papers) consist of a conversation (beginning with a fable), on the Banking and Currency Question, between delegates of the people and the king's ministers. It opens with the history of the Bank restriction and its fatal consequences to us all. The delegates make known to the ministers that they are all very much embarrassed, and that low prices, with high rents and heavy taxes, cannot much longer be borne. A question is then raised whether it would be expedient, with a view of raising prices, to dose the public with a fresh issue of assignats; that being disposed of, the ministers are then asked to bring about an equitable adjustment, in which the fundholders are particularly comprehended. At the end of this discussion, a guinea falling from Lord Bexley's pocket becomes suddenly endowed with the faculty of speech, joins in the conversation, differs from the delegates as to the remedy for their distress, warmly defends Mr Peel's Bill of 1819, and suggests various alterations in our monetary system:—1st, That Government should break up and shiver to pieces the monopoly of the Bank, and take the currency and the management of the public debt into its own hands; 2ndly, that, with a view of preventing panics, we should change the present system of compensating the London bankers; and 3rdly, that we should let loose again, under certain regulations, the imprisoned one-pound notes. Such are the contents of these shipwrecked papers.'

Paper money is treated of under the symbol of horse-chesnuts, which he represents the minister (Mr Pitt) to have discovered to be an admirable substitute for the gold and silver, which the continuance of the war had gone near to exhaust. We cannot pretend to do justice to the author's arguments, and shall therefore merely quote a passage or two, that our readers may have a taste of his quality. He is speaking of the Bank-restriction, the issue of paper money, and the effects of those measures on the country.

'Thus supplied with fresh means, the nation acquired fresh appetite for war. It again unsheathed its sword in pursuit of what it called glory: the minister never lacked means. Did he contemplate an attack on Copenhagen? He sent his compliments to these bankers, who, ringing a bell, desired Mr Triquet to go into the garden, and shake down a million of horse-chesnuts. Did he desire to send an expedition to Walcheren? The chiefs were again applied to; the bell was again rung, and Mr Hogsflesh * was desired to hie into the court, and bring in two millions of the circulating medium. In this way matters went on for several years: as the new money was doled out, the products of the earth were seen to rise in value; and the great productive interests of the country found themselves suddenly enriched. All went on merrily as at a marriage-feast, for along with the rise of prices all these classes of society changed their habits of living. They became expensive and aristocratical. The farmers, in particular, became suddenly a new race of men. Instead of rising with the lark, and breakfasting off bacon, or at best a toad in the hole, they did not rise until the dew had disappeared from the ground, and for breakfast they ate maintenon cutlets, using a silver fork of the fiddle pattern. They rode fine blood-horses; and it appears from old legends, that they

* Mr Triquet and Mr Hogsflesh were two of the clerks who signed the Bank-notes.

Digitized by Google

wore spurs of such a prodigious length, that they were obliged to walk down stairs backwards. Their children, instead of making dumplings, were taught pneumatics, hydrostatics, mathematics, vegetable physiology, and spherical trigonometry; and history relates, in proof of their effeminacy, that they travelled regularly twice a-year to the capital, to have their teeth cleaned by one Cartwright, a celebrated dentist. In short, the whole face of society underwent a total change.

'"Is there nothing unsound," exclaimed the philosophers, "in these high prices, and in this sudden prosperity? Is it not the effect of a fictitious circulation which has debased the standard, and is it not our duty to inform the people, and to warn them of the consequences, in respect of their dealings with one another, which will follow the withdrawal of this unreal measure of value, and the restoration of the precious metals?" *

'"No," said the elders of the nation; "the public need no warning at all. The prosperity of which you complain is wholesome and permanent, † and not the consequence of a vicious currency. Neither is it true that we have falsified the standard, and of this we will soon convince you." The elders then assembled in council, and having said their prayers, declared, by acclamation, that a horse-chesnut and a shilling were equal in value to a guinea. ‡

The mode of compensating the London Bankers, and the question, soon to be agitated, of the renewal of the Bank Charter, are discussed with ability; and in the concluding paragraph of his pamphlet, the author reviews his own strictures, and states the grounds on which only the Bank is entitled to ask for a continuance of their monopoly.

'In the foregoing pages I have abated nothing of the tone and manner of the different belligerents. At times there seems an asperity of feeling against the Bank, but as the battle turns upon events which took place before the present Directors were known to the public, they cannot complain of being personally flouted. It is the system, and not the men, that is here attacked; and it may be consolatory to the friends of the Bank to know that their nerves were never yet shaken by pamphlets. There is a banker in London, who, whenever this great lion is mentioned in public, is seen to prostrate himself before him, to comb his mane, wash his feet, and sprinkle him with rose-water. I desire no greater pleasure than that the lion should thus address him:—"I observe you very often chaunting complimentary ditties under my chamber-window: I am about to ask the Parliament to renew the lease of my den, and the time is now come when I require of my friends to do something else. I have been charged, by a reference to my own acts and also to public documents, with having misunderstood and largely mismanaged the trust that has been reposed in me. I am told that I have been a source of public injury and public wrong, and that my very existence is a satire upon the institutions of a free people. Now, as you love me, leave off, I implore you, these adulatory offerings to my power and beauty, and apply yourself to show,—1st, That I have not misunderstood nor mismanaged my trust; 2dly, that instead of a public wrong, the nation has always found in me a source of strength and prosperity; for on these conditions only will I consent to hold my exclusive privileges." '

* Edinburgh Reviews. 1809, 11, 12, 13
† George Rose, Lord Londonderry, Mr Perceval.
‡ Mr Vansittart's celebrated Resolution, 1811.

COLUMBUS.—The remains of Columbus were first deposited in the convent of St Francisco, at Valladolid, from whence they were removed in 1513, to the Carthusian Monastery of Santa Maria de las Cueras, at Seville. In 1536, his body and that of his son Diego were transported to Hispaniola, and buried in the cathedral of the city of St Domingo, from whence his mouldered dust, after the lapse of two centuries and a half, was again removed, and deposited in a final resting place, with great pomp, in the cathedral of the Havannah, Jan 15, 1796. Thus, like himself, his ashes were doomed to wander; and, when no longer animated by his lofty spirit, were seen buffeting amid the Atlantic waves, to seek repose on the shores of that world which had conferred so imperishable a fame on its discoverer.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

A GREAT DINNER AMONG GREAT PEOPLE.—The dinner proceeded heavily, and before the end of the third course, I was thoroughly bored. The company was unquestionably composed of persons of excellent family; and it is as certain that they were pre-eminently dull. I know not a more lamentable sight than stupidity surrounded by all the pomp and circumstance of rank and wealth. A sixpenny print in a splendid frame is an object not more contemptible to the physical eye, than an insignificant person, who derives all his importance from extrinsic advantages, is to the moral perception. It had been Lady Cuthullin's intention, that her entertainment should be distinguished by an imposing character,—and she realized her wishes. Stateliness and dullness were the order of the day. The illustrious guests felt that they were in a situation in which they received their full allowance of honour and consideration for those properties, which are less duly estimated in more miscellaneous society. They therefore abstained from conversation, because they knew that it tended to produce a relaxation of dignity; besides, it was contrary to etiquette, to start a topic in the presence of Royalty, and neither of the Princes were men of talk.—Sydenham, or the Man of the World.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

SLEEP PRODUCTIVE OF CORPULENCE.—It is well known that animals that sleep much grow fat; and this circumstance is taken advantage of by those who fatten cattle and cows for market. This seems to have given rise to the vulgar error, that animals grow fatter during their winter torpor, whilst it is forgotten that the requisite supply of nourishment is suspended. The fact, however, holds good with regard to much sleep upon man. Boerhaave relates the history of a physician who took it into his head that sleep was the natural state of man, and in compliance with his favourite theory, slept eighteen out of the twenty-four hours, till he became very corpulent, and died suddenly of apoplexy.—Reeve—On the Torpidity of Animals.

ANECDOTE OF DOCTOR FRANKLIN.—The Doctor, when he was last in England, walking up Ludgate-hill, with his spectacles on, he jostled a porter very heavily laden. The fellow, irritated at what he supposed an insult, immediately turned round, and in the peevishness of resentment, exclaimed, "Damn your spectacles!'—"Thank you, my friend," replied the Doctor, "'tis not the first time my spectacles have saved my eyes; for I suppose, if I had happened not to have them on, it would have been,—damn your eyes."—Taylor's Cabinet of Curiosities.

THE SUPPOSED USES OF THE PYRAMIDS.—Mr Wilford informs us, that on his describing the great Egyptian Pyramid to several very learned Brahmins, they declared it at once to have been a temple; and one of them asked if it had not a communication with the river Nile. When he answered that such a passage was mentioned as having existed, and that a well was at this day to be seen, they unanimously agreed that it was a place appropriated to the worship of Padna Devi, and that the supposed tomb was a trough, which, on certain festivals, her priests used to fill with the sacred water and lotus-flowers. The most probable opinion respecting the object of these vast edifices is that which combines the double use of the sepulchre and the temple,—nothing being more common in all nations than to bury distinguished men in places consecrated to divine worship.—Egypt. Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.

LENGTHENED TORPIDITY.—It has been observed that animals that remain torpid during the winter season, lose little of their size or weight, during this space of time (sometimes three or four months) in which they take no food; and that it is only when accident deprives them of food after their revival, that they are soon lean and emaciated in the spring. It seems that the torpidity may be long continued, by artificial means, without ultimate injury to the animal. "It sometimes happens that some hybernating animals kept in warm rooms, do not become torpid at the temperature which would have rendered them so, if they had been at liberty. The great processes of life, the respiration, the circulation, and the nutrition, are not interrupted in these instances; and here we may notice a remarkable difference between the viviparous and oviparous quadrupeds, since the latter become torpid in every possible situation and in all circumstances, when exposed to the proper degree of cold, and remain so as long as they are kept in that condition. Spallanzani discovered this fact by keeping some species of these quadrupeds in a temperature between 38, and 39, for three years and a half, without food; when they recovered their vital functions and original vivacity in the month of May, on being put into a reservoir of water, where they multiplied.—Reeve—on the Torpidity of Animals.

FAIRYLAND.—The Reverend Robert Kirke, author of the 'Secret Commonwealth' (a work concerning the fairy people) is believed himself to have been taken away by the fairies, in revenge, perhaps, for his having let in too much light upon the secrets of their commonwealth. We learn this catastrophe from the information of his successor, the late amiable and learned Dr Patrick Grahame, also minister of Aberfoil, who, in his Sketches of Perthshire, has not forgotten to touch upon the Daoine Shie, or men of peace. The Rev. Robert Kirke was, it seems, walking upon a little eminence to the west of the present manse, which is still held a Dun Shie, or fairy mound, when he sunk down in what seemed to mortals a fit, and was supposed to be dead. This, however, was not his real fate.—"Mr Kirke was the near relation of Graham of Duchray, the ancestor of the present General Graham Stirling. Shortly after his funeral, he appeared, in the dress in which he had sunk down, to a medical relation of his own and of Duchray. "Go," said he to him, "to my cousin Duchray, and tell him that I am not dead. I fell down in a swoon, and was carried into fairyland, where I now am. Tell him, that when he and my friends are assembled at the baptism of my child (for he had left his wife pregnant) I will appear in the room, and that if he throws the knife which he holds in his hand, over my head, I will be released, and restored to human society."—The man, it seems, neglected to deliver the message. Mr Kirke appeared to him a second time, threatening to haunt him night and day, till he executed his commission, which at length he did. The time of the baptism arrived. They were seated at table, the figure of Mr Kirke entered, but the Laird of Duchray, by some unaccountable fatality, neglected to perform the prescribed ceremony. Mr Kirke retired by another door, and was seen no more. It is firmly believed that he is, at this day, in Fairyland."—Notes to Rob Roy.

Digitized by Google

FEMALE CLAIMS ADMITTED.—In the course of the late war, and during the alarm of invasion, a fleet of transports entered the Frith of Forth, under the convoy of some ships of war that would reply to no signals. A general alarm was excited, in consequence of which all the fishers who were enrolled as sea-fencibles got on board the gun-boats, which they were to man as occasion should require, and sailed to oppose the supposed enemy. The foreigners proved to be Russians, with whom we were then at peace. The country gentlemen of Mid-Lothian, pleased with the zeal displayed by the sea-fencibles at a critical moment, passed a vote for presenting the community of fishers with a silver punch-bowl, to be used on occasions of festivity. But the fisherwomen, on hearing what was intended, put in their claim to have some separate share in the intended honorary reward. The men, they said, were their husbands; it was they who would have been the sufferers if their husbands had been killed, and it was by their permission and injunctions that they embarked on board the gun-boats for the public service. They therefore claimed to share the reward in some manner that should distinguish the female patriotism which they had shewn on the occasion. The gentlemen of the county willingly admitted the claim; and without diminishing the value of their compliment to the men, they made the females a present of a valuable brooch, to fasten the plaid of the queen of the fisherwomen for the time. It may be further remarked, that these Nereids are punctilious among themselves, and observe different ranks, according to the commodities they deal in. One experienced dame was heard to characterize a younger damsel as "a puir silly thing, who had no ambition, and would never," she prophesied "rise above the mussell-line of business."—Notes to the Antiquary.

GENEROUS SELF-DEVOTION.—Among the inmates of the house in which Mr Withering lodged (in 1764) he found an entertaining companion in an elderly lady of the name of Tulloch,—well read, and replete with family anecdote, a kind of knowledge in which the matrons of the North usually pride themselves. From her was derived an historical fact, which, probably, being little known, and affording a noble instance of devotion on the part of a gallant Scotsman to Prince Charles Edward Stuart (who, however unsuccessful in his attempts to seize the sovereignty of these kingdoms, reigned in the hearts of the faithful Highlanders) may be here inserted. The Prince, in his flight, after the battle of Culloden, sought shelter in a wood, accompanied by Daniel Tulloch, Rory Mackenzie, and a few others. The wood had been invested for some days by the King's troops, when the Duke of Cumberland received positive information that the object of pursuit was there concealed. The soldiers were divided into thirty companies, with orders to penetrate from so many different points. The refugees observing their enemies approach, and finding escape impracticable, resolved to die like heroes; but Mackenzie prepared for a still more generous sacrifice. Having prevailed upon his companions to ascend a large tree, he himself remained below, pretending to be the young Chevalier. He was discovered stretched on the ground, and instantly commanded to surrender; when, starting up and drawing his claymore, "What!" he exclaimed, "do you not know your Prince?" at the same moment rushing forward with desperation, he cut down two of his opponents before he fell, overpowered by numbers. His head was severed from his body, and having been declared to be that of the unhappy Charles, even by the barber who had shaved his head in Edinburgh, was conveyed to London, where the mortifying mistake was detected.—Memoirs of Dr Withering.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Werner—A Day After the Wedding—The Brigand.
COVENT GARDEN.—The School for Scandal—The Waterman.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

The principal Characters by Madame Pasta, Miss F. Ayton, Mlle. Feliani, Signor Rubini, Signor Curioni, Signor Deville, and Signor Lablache.

After which, the New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA NAYADE.

[Composed by M. TAGLIONI.]
The Music by M. Nadaud.

Principal Characters, Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, and Mlle. Brocard.
M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.
[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Lesbia, Zemira, Miss Cawse, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE £100 NOTE.

Lady Pedigree, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Arlington, Miss Taylor, in which she will sing 'My Father Land,' and The Bavarian Broom Girl's Song.
Mrs Arlington, Miss Lawrence. Nurse, Mrs Daly. Janus, Mr F. Matthews.
Montmorency, Mr Wrench. Morgan, Mr Blanchard. O'Shockneesy, Mr Power.
Billy Black, Mr Keeley. Paperfund, Mr Turnour. Bilker, Mr Evans.

To-morrow, The Merchant of Venice; The Romance of a Day.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]
The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'The Law of Java,' and Rossini's Overture to 'La Cenerentola.'

After which, a Musical Farce, in Two Acts, called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Fatima, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Irza, Miss Faucit. Aboulifar, Mr Thompson. Arzan, Mr Bland.
Alibajou, Mr Webster. Bowbell, Mr Liston. Gimbo, Mr Harley.

To conclude with a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To-morrow, The Emissary; or, the Revolt of Moscow; Popping the Question; and The Jenkinses.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, in Five Acts, entitled

VIRGINIUS! THE ROMAN FATHER.

Virginia, Miss Scott. Servia, Miss M. C. Poole.
Appius Claudius, Mr Dibdin Pitt. Caius Claudius, Mr Honner.
Marcus, Mr Almar. Virginius, Mr Osbaldiston.
Dentatus, Mr Williams. Icilius, Mr C. Hill. Numitorius, Mr Gough.
Lucius, Mr Lee. Titus, Mr Webb.
Servius, Mr Rogers. Cneius, Mr Maitland. Publius, Mr Asbury.

The Military Brigand Dance, by Mlle. Rosier.

After which a New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]
The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Mrs Vale. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Enniscore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama, entitled

THE INCHCAPE BELL.

[By E. FITZBALL, Esq.]

The Dumb Sailor Boy, Miss Scott. Becky Butterfly, Mrs Vale.
Hans Hattock, Mr D. Pitt. Guy Ruthven, Mr C. Hill. Capt. Taffrail, Mr Honner.
Sir John Trevanley, Mr Gough. Samson Sawdust, Mr Vale.
Jupiter Seabreeze, Mr Rogers.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Drama, called

THE MOUNTAIN DEVIL.

Julitte Corvenio, Mlle. Celeste.
Count Corvenio, Mr Spencer. Strapado, Mr Marshall.
Justine, Mr Tilbury. Moco, Mr Bennet. Antonio, Mr Munro.
Desperetto, Mr Cooke.

After which a Variety of National Dances.

To which will be added a Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtzdorf, Miss Stobwasser. Victorine, Miss Vernon.
Count of Linsdorf, Mr Tilbury. Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Augustus, Mr Bennett. Boltzheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassomrompdorf, Mr J. Russell.

And a New Divertissement Ballet, entitled

THE PATRIOTS OF POLAND.

With New Music by Mr Harroway.
The principal Characters by Mlle. Celeste, Mlle. Constance, Mlle. Josephine, Mr H. Cooke, Mr Seymour, and the Corps de Ballet.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]
The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Loudon, Miss Stobwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessaix, Mr Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cheese.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

COBURG THEATRE. — Guy Fawkes — Reform — Oh Crikey! What a Shocking Bad Hat—Devil's Ducat.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE.—Idiot Witness—Les Villageurs—Miller's Maid.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reed.

Nº 216.]

[Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1831.

THE EAST-WIND.

Our readers, it seems, are not unwilling that we should occasionally vary our paper with articles of the same sort as those we put forth in a periodical published some years ago under the title of the Indicator; and as we are glad to know their pleasure, and the plan is very agreeable to us, especially when the book season is not very stirring, we shall from time to time act accordingly. Here follows then an assault upon that common enemy, the East-Wind.

Did anybody ever hear of the East-Wind when he was a boy? We remember no such thing. We never heard a word about it, all the time we were at school. There was the schoolmaster with his ferula, but there was no East-Wind. Our elders might have talked about it, but their calamities are inaudible in the ears of the juvenile. A fine day was a fine day, let the wind be in what quarter it might. At present, we hear everybody complaining, that the fine weather is polluted by the presence of the East-Wind. It has lasted so long as to force itself upon people's attention. The ladies confess their exasperation with it, for making free without being agreeable; and as ladies' quarrels are to be taken up, and there is no other way of grappling with this invisible enemy, we have put ourselves in a state of Editorial resentment, and have resolved to write an article against it.

The winds are among the most mysterious of the operations of the elements. We know not whence they come, or whither they go,—how they spring up, or how fall,—why they prevail so long, after such and such a fashion in certain quarters; nor, above all, why some of them should be at once so lasting and apparently so pernicious. We know some of their uses; but there is a great deal about them we do not know, and it is difficult to put them to the question. As the sailor said of the ghosts, "we do not understand their tackle." What is very curious is, there seems to be one of them which prevails in some particular quarter, and has a character for malignity. In the South there is the Scirocco, an ugly customer, dark, close, suffocating, making melancholy; which blots the sky, and dejects the spirits of the most lively. In the Oriental parts of the Earth, there is the Tifoon, supposed by some to be the Typhon, or Evil Principle of the ancients; and in Europe we have the East-Wind, whom the ancients reckoned among the Sons of Typhon. The winds, Mr Keightley tells us, were divided by the Greeks into wholesome and noxious; the former of which, Boreas (North-Wind), Zephyrus (West-Wind), and Notus (South-Wind), were, according to Hesiod, the children of Astræus (Starry) and Eos (Dawn). The other winds, he says (probably meaning only those [who blow from the East), are the race of Typhoëus, whom he describes as the last and most terrible child of Earth. In Greece, as over the rest of Europe, the East-Wind was pernicious.'

In England, the East-Wind is accounted pernicious if it last long, and it is calculated, we believe, that it blows during three parts even of our fine weather. We have known a single blast of it blight a long row of plants in a green-house. Its effects upon the vegetable creation are sure to be visible if it last any time; and it puts invalids into a very unpleasant state, by drying the pores of the skin, and thus giving activity to those numerous internal disorders, of which none are more painful than what the moderns call nervousness, and our fathers understood by the name of the Vapours or the "Spleen," which, as Shenstone observed, is often little else than obstructed perspiration. An irritable poet exclaimed—

> "Scarce in a showerless day the heavens indulge
> Our melting clime, except the baleful East
> Withers the tender spring, and sourly checks
> The fancy of the year. Our fathers talk'd
> Of summers, balmy airs, and skies serene:
> Good Heav'n! for what unexpiated crimes
> This dismal change?———

This terrible question we shall answer presently. Meantime, the suffering poet may be allowed to have been a little irritated. It is certainly provoking to have this invisible enemy invading a whole nation at his will, and sending among us, for weeks together, his impertinent and cutting influence, drying up our skins, blowing dust in our eyes, contradicting our sunshine, smoking our suburbs, behaving boisterously to our women, aggravating our scolds, withering up our old gentlemen and ladies, nullifying the respite from smoke at Bow, perplexing our rooms between hot and cold, closing up our windows, exasperating our rheumatisms, basely treating the wounds of our old soldiers, spoiling our gardens, preventing our voyages, assisting thereby our Bow Street runners, hurting our tempers, increasing our melancholies, deteriorating our night-airs, shewing our wives' ancles, disordering our little children, not being good for our beasts, perplexing our pantaloons (to know which to put on), deranging our ringlets, scarifying our eyes, thinning our apple-tarts, endangering our dances, getting damned our weathercocks, barbarizing our creditors, incapacitating our debtors, obstructing all moist processes in the arts, hindering our astronomers,* tiring our editors, and endangering our sales.

The poet asks what crimes could have brought upon us the evils of our climate? He should ask the school-boy that runs about, the gipsy who laughs at the climate, or the ghost of some old English yeoman, before taxes and sedentary living abounded. An East-Wind, like every other evil, except folly and ill intention, is found, when properly grappled with, to be not only no evil, but a good, at least a negative one, sometimes a positive; and even folly and ill intention are but the mistakes of a community in its progress from bad to good. How evil comes at all, we cannot say. It suffices us to believe, that it is in its nature fugitive; and that it is the nature of good, when good returns, to outlast it beyond all calculation. If we led the natural lives to which we hope and believe that the advance of knowledge and comfort will bring us round, we should feel the East-Wind as little as the gypsies do: it would be the same refreshment to us, that it is to the glowing school-boy, after his exercise; and as to nipping our fruits and flowers, some living creature makes a dish of them, if we do not. With these considerations, we should be well content to recognise the concordia discors that harmonizes the inanimate creation. If it were not for the East-Wind in this country, we should probably have too much wet. Our winters would not dry up; our June fields would be impassable: we should not be able to enjoy the West-Wind itself, the Zephyr with his lap full of flowers. And upon the supposition that there is no peril in the East-Wind that may not ultimately be nullified, we need not trouble ourselves with the question, why the danger of excessive moisture must be counteracted by a wind full of dryness? All the excesses of the elements will one day be pastime, for the healthy arms and discerning faculties of discovering man.

And so we finish our vituperations in the way in which such things ought generally to be finished, with a discovery that the fault objected to is in ourselves, and renewed admiration of the abundance of promise in all the works of nature.

* During East-Winds astronomers are unable to pursue their observations, on account of a certain hazy motion in the air.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Mlle. Celeste.—This lady took her benefit at the Queen's Theatre last night, previous to her leaving London. For the sakes of those gentlemen who admire her as I do, I can inform them that she is engaged for the Adelphi in October, and will appear there in a piece founded on one of Cooper's novels. She will succeed, make happy (and I hope be happy herself) wherever she goes, for she has a soul, and eyes that tell you so.—This theatre closes on Monday, but re-opens on the Monday following, after having made some alteration in the establishment.—Vester.

Progress of Reason and Life.—But as when the sun approaching towards the gates of the morning, he first opens a little eye of heaven, and sends away the spirits of darkness, and gives light to a cock, and calls up the lark to matins, and by and by gilds the fringes of a cloud, and peeps over the Eastern hills, thrusting out his golden horns like those which decked the brows of Moses when he was forced to wear a veil because himself had seen the face of God; and still, while a man tells the story, the sun gets up higher, till he shews a fair face and a full light, and then he shines one whole day, under a cloud often, and sometimes weeping great and little showers, and sets quickly.—Jeremy Taylor.—[We could not forbear putting the above passages in italics, though their own exceeding beauty could scarcely have failed making them shine forth to the eye of the reader like the glorious object they describe.—M. V. C.]

How to Keep Fruit through the Winter.—At a recent meeting of the Horticultural Society, a paper was read, entitled "An Account of the different Modes of Keeping Fruit which have been tried at the Society's Garden for the Season 1831." The statement was drawn up at the garden, and enumerated eight different modes; the three best and most practicable of which were, the covering of the fruit in pure and perfectly dry sand, dry fern, or in a deal box buried in the earth. By any of these modes it was preserved, free from shrivelling and any disagreeable flavour: in all it must be deposited in a cold situation. By the other five modes, although the fruit was preserved in a pretty sound state, a musty flavour was found to be communicated; this was especially the case where oat-chaff was the medium.

— Dean Swift, one day travelling in England, asked a farmer which was the road to such a place. The farmer answered, it lay straight before him; he could not miss it. Swift riding a little way, observed a bye-road on the left, and turned into it. The farmer called out to him that he was wrong. "Why," said Swift, "did you not tell me I could not miss it?"—"No more you could," said the farmer, "if you had not been a fool."

Anecdote of the Death of John Hunter.—Reason alone is a very unsafe test to try any man's conduct by; his passions, his impulses, and his caprice are often active, while his reason is asleep. So much are we under the influence of sensation, that John Hunter, the great surgeon and physiologist, died in a fit of enraged passion, although he often said that such an excitement would certainly prove fatal to him. He died in St George's Hospital, October 16, 1793, under these circumstances:—Being there in the exercise of his official duty as a surgeon, he had a warm dispute with Dr Pierson on a professional subject, upon which he said, "I must retire, for I feel an agitation which will be fatal to me if I increase it;" and he immediately withdrew into an adjoining room; but Dr Pierson, not willing to give up his argument, followed him, which so enraged Hunter, that he vehemently exclaimed, "You have followed me on purpose to be the death of me!—you have murdered me!" and instantly fell and expired.—(R. D., a correspondent to the Athenæum.)

Jerome Stone.—Jerome Stone was left an orphan at three years old. His father, a sea-faring man, left him and several other helpless little ones, to the care of the mother, in great poverty. Jerome soon betook himself to selling buckles, garters, buttons, pins, thimbles, needles, &c. as a means of subsistence. A taste for reading at length led him to prefer attending at fairs as an itinerant bookseller; through dealing in books, his passion for literary pursuits increased, and, with little assistance, he made himself acquainted first with the Hebrew, and next the Greek authors; but of the Latin language he was altogether ignorant. He applied himself to the acquisition of this language, however, with so much diligence, as, in a short time, to be able to prosecute his studies at the University of St Andrews. By the patronage and munificence of a learned divine, a man of property near Leven, our young scholar was enabled to go through the usual academic course with ease and comfort. He made great progress in every department of science, but before he had finished his third session, he was appointed assistant to the rector of Dunkeld school, and a few years after succeeded to the rectorship. Although quite ignorant of the Gaelic when he went to Dunkeld, he soon acquired such a knowledge of it, as to enable him to collect and translate several of our ancient poems which he published in the Scots Magazine; in which are also to be seen several of his original pieces. But in 1757, when in the thirtieth year of his age, he breathed his last; and thus the fond hopes of all who knew his worth and uncommon attainments were at once blighted. The kind and dutiful attention which Stone paid to his aged mother, who survived him but two years, is noticed with peculiar satisfaction by the author from whom this slight sketch is borrowed.—Campbell's Tour in Scotland.

The Editor of the Age has been much moved, we understand, with what has been said of him in this journal. and has been remonstrating in a ridiculous way with our Publisher. If he is moved with that exordium, he will have much more cause to be moved with what will be said further, in case he does not behave himself.

Election Query.—Why did Mr Ward resign?—Because the Livery were so backward in coming for-Ward.—Daily Paper.

Modest Item in an Attorney's Bill.—Among the persons opposing the discharge of Sir John Ignatius Burt, who lately applied for relief under the Insolvent Debtor's Act, were several agents. Rather a curious item was introduced into the bill of one of them, which was the following:—"To coming from Dublin to Holyhead in a storm for you; in fact, Sir John, for doing impossibilities for you, 500*l.*"—Legal Observer.

English Enterprise.—Young, inexperienced, and enthusiastic travellers, must frequently be liable to fall into ludicrous situations; more peculiarly the English, who are noted for their enquiry into everything, at all hazards; and who are not to be turned from their purpose, either by height, or depth, distance, or danger. In Conder's Italy, a passage is quoted from 'Rome in the Nineteenth Century,' which gives an instance of this kind:—'In the last of these halls (of the Baths of Cavacalla), there is a deep draw-well; and in one of our many visits to these ruins, we found a young Englishman of our acquaintance, who, in his ardour for antiquities, was on the point of descending in the bucket to the bottom of it. We could not succeed in stopping him, till we called in the testimony of the old woman who opens the door, in corroboration of our own, to prove that the well was not antico, but was made for the use of the pigs that now revel undisturbed in all the luxuries of these imperial halls.'

Condition of the Streets in some Parts of America.—I mentioned to you, in my last, that the streets of Norfolk were in a most disagreeable state, but I am informed that, some time before, they had been much worse; that at one time, the news-carrier delivered his papers from a boat which he poled along through the mire; and that a party of sailors, having nothing better to do, actually launched a ship's long boat into the streets, rowing along with four oars through the mud, while one stood at the bow, heaving the lead, and singing out the depth.—Memoirs of Wilson, prefixed to the American Ornithology.—[The American ornithologist died in a very characteristic manner:—While he was sitting in the house of one of his friends, enjoying the pleasures of conversation, he chanced to see a bird of a rare species, for one of which he had long been in search. With his usual enthusiasm, he ran out, followed it, swam across a river over which it had flown, fired at, killed, and obtained the object of his eager pursuit; but caught a cold which ended in his death.]

Ill-timed Etiquette.—The custom of keeping the door of a house or chateau locked during the time of dinner, probably arose from the family being anciently assembled in the hall at that meal, and liable to surprise. But it was in many instances continued as a point of high etiquette, of which the following is an example:—A considerable landed proprietor in Dumfriesshire, being a bachelor, without near relations, and determined to make his will, resolved previously to visit his two nearest kinsmen, and decide which should be his heir, according to the degree of kindness with which he should be received. Like a good clansman, he first visited his own chief, a baronet in rank, descendant and representative of one of the oldest families in Scotland. Unhappily, the dinner-bell had rung, and the door of the castle had been locked before his arrival. The visitor in vain announced his name and requested admittance; his chief adhered to the ancient etiquette, and would on no account suffer the doors to be unbarred. Irritated at this cold reception, the old laird rode on to Sanquhar Castle, then the residence of the Duke of Queensberry, who no sooner heard his name than, knowing well he had a will to make, the drawbridge dropped, and the gates flew open,—the table was covered anew—his grace's bachelor and intestate kinsman was received with the utmost attention and respect; and it is scarcely necessary to add that, upon his death some years after, the visitor's considerable landed property went to augment the domains of the ducal house of Queensberry. This happened about the end of the seventeenth century.—Notes to Old Mortality.

The Princess Victoria.—A Correspondent (Medicus) of a Sunday paper, speaking of the weakness in the young Princess's legs, says—"Through the whole winter, the Heiress Presumptive has had a similar affection in her knees and ankles to that from which the Landgravine of Hesse Homburg and the Princess Sophia have long suffered; and that the tendency of such attacks has been so enfeebling, that an opinion has been expressed, that in case the young Princess should grow stout and heavy, like the rest of her family, the idea of her walking must be given up. I perceive, with great pleasure, that her Royal Highness has been walking in the park this week; and I have myself seen her alight from her carriage with a tolerably firm step; but from her wearing her slippers down at the heel, I should guess she is still rather tender-footed. These observations I make merely in consequence of the flat contradiction which has been given to the facts; for no one can wish more sincerely than myself that the Princess Victoria's succession to the throne may not be defeated by any circumstance whatever. The nation is, in fact, unanimous in that wish; and it is on this very account that the most trifling circumstance relating to her Royal Highness is noticed with anxiety and attention."

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea—La Nayade.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—The Illustrious Stranger—Turning the Tables
COVENT GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—The £100 Note.

KING'S THEATRE.

MADAME PASTA was received last night in the manner to be expected. MILTON speaks of 'raining influence.' The moment she was recognized, the clapping of hands came down in a perfect hail-storm of approbation: and she stood bending in her graceful fashion under the shower. We looked with some anxiety to know whether our love was to be put to the test by her having grown fatter; but she is not at all so. We think she has altered in that respect for the better.

The part she appeared in was Medea, which is reckoned her finest. We know not how that may be, for we have seen her but in few of her characters; but that it is one of the finest things on the stage, we can bear testimony.—[By the way, the subject and conduct of this Italian opera of Medea, its altars and hymns, and its chorusses of spectators, who bring victorious or agitating news, give as good an idea of the Greek drama as is likely to be had in modern times; perhaps a better one than we should suppose from its being all set to music; for there was a great deal of music in the Greek tragedies; nor is the Italian recitative unlikely to have borne a much nearer resemblance to the recitation of their actors, than the style of our northern speech might lead us to conceive. Recitative is nearer to the speech of the modern Italians than most people imagine.]

The charm of Madame PASTA's style consists in the wonderful truth of it, invested with moral beauty; that is to say, she never minces what she feels, or goes aside of it, or affects anything as superior to it, or has any doubt about it; but is as full of faith as a child, and being child-like in her faith, she is rewarded by having as much grace in her exposition of it, as a child has in its movements. We do not mean that she is as unconscious as a child. The stage itself, as well as her knowledge, would prevent that; nor would it be natural, if she were. What we mean is, that grace in her is always subordinate to the truth, and moulded by it. She knows as truly the best attitudes in which she can put herself, as she knows what passion she is to express, and she knows the one, because of the other. The tree bends with the fruit. She carries so much beauty and truth in her, that she must carry it in the most beautiful manner.

This is the reason why a little superfluity of person never stood in the way of the effect produced by this divine actress,—at least with those who had any perception of the morally beautiful themselves. And for the same reason, her voice, which though excellent, is not of the very finest order, does not stand in the way of what it expresses. It is the vehicle, as all voices should be, of emotion. Those who value no singer except their voice or execution be perfect, and are contented if it is, mistake the means for the end. Madame PASTA's execution can be extraordinary when she pleases; but in general she restrains it, agreeably to what nature requires. In every respect, the means with her are subordinate to the end; and hence it is, that with less means than some, there is no singer or actress upon the stage who attains her end so perfectly.

Madame PASTA's style is epic. She hits the great points, and leaves you to feel the rest. Her gestures are voluminous; the tender ones are full of the last soul of love, her threatening or calamitous ones, appalling; there is catastrophe in them,—the certainty of doom. Thus when Jason tells her she is to look for his love no longer, and she feels the first dim movements in her soul of all that is about to happen, she walks away, laying her hands over her eyes, as if she did not dare to look upon the mournful and dreadful things that must happen. Afterwards, when she threatens Jason, she holds out to him a hand, trembling as if it held misery for both of them: and when she is to express a passionate resolution, by suddenly leaping to a high note, she dares, with a noble confidence, to make almost a shriek of it. It is as if a Pythian priestess were crying from her tripod.—Her classical dresses and attitudes are known to everybody. They are fine, not merely because they are classical, but because the ancients, in the height and purity of their perceptions, hit upon the finest attitudes, and she and the ancients think in this matter alike. In only one point could we conceive that EURIPIDES would have desired a finer Medea than she (supposing that he had the luck to have so good a one); and that is, when she relents a while from her murderous impulses against her children, and fondles them with love. We think (with submission) that Madame PASTA is somewhat too much absorbed in the love, and that it makes her look a little too happy. We would have had her look at them as if there were tears in her eyes.

We have not time to say more, or to speak of TAGLIONI, whom we must notice at a future opportunity. We can only add, that the music of this opera, by MAYER, though you do not carry any passages away from it, is good and expressive; that LABLACHE, in Creonte, looked like a king of the old heroic times, when kings were great stalwart fellows, a head and shoulders taller than their subjects; that his voice was worthy of such a royalty, and as easy as it was powerful; that Miss FANNY AYTON, though weak in her voice for this stage, and not always in tune, is a clever little opera person, who has more feeling than she appears to have from her ambitious theatrical style, and might reasonably get a little more applause now and then: that the merit of CURIONI is perhaps just upon a par with Mr MEYER's Jason; and that Signor RUBINI is spoiled by his execution, much about in the same manner, and with the same amount of wit, as some men are by a good set of teeth. He is always for shewing it. He is one of your greatest mistakers of the means for the end; and all the mistaken people in the house applaud him; which is a pity, for with a voice at once powerful and sweet, he ought to do better. But we are afraid he errs for want of ideas. He seems to think at present, that there are but three things in the world:—to be full of demisemiquavers, to be loud, and to be soft. He thunders on one half of a bar, and languishes through the rest. He snaps a pistol at your head, and then falls to scratching it.

A VISIT TO COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL STREET.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—To connoisseurs in horses, and those gentlemen of the West End, who indulge in equestrianism, the Theatre, or rather Circus, lately established in Windmill street by Mr Cooke, will offer great amusement. I should imagine that it were a formidable rival to Astley's; and indeed it must be, for I have been there twice, and it has each time had a crowded house. The boxes (of which there are private and public) are very snug and comfortable, and the pit and gallery are no less so. I should conceive that the latter division of the house was larger than the same division in any other theatre; it is at any rate as noisy and as enjoying.

I will not, my dear Mr T., give your readers the cramp, by a "full, true, and particular account" of the distortions of the extraordinary Positionist (with the Chinese-Latin name) Quang-Cœlis. His genius consists in being devoid of bone, having double knees, being able to put his head into his waistcoat pocket, and shake hands with his tendon Achilles. These are odd things to be told of; but the process is of the most painful nature; and what with the number of real wonders in the world, to say nothing of the ease with which people make them, I do think exhibitions of this nature might be dispensed with, and ought not to be encouraged, when we consider the harm he does himself, and the ricketty children he means to have. He is surely the least interesting of Mr COOKE's performers, and the skill of his sons and daughters, and one or two others, would be amply rewarded without the introduction of this misguided boy. He gets more pity than applause, and gives people more pain than pleasure.

Digitized by Google

Messrs EDWINS and WILLIAMS are two very active and powerful men; and next to the DIAVOLO himself, the most enterprising of enterprisers. The leap the former gave us over the horses was truly wonderful; and no less so was Mr WILLIAMS on the Corde Volante. I did not clap him much, as I was fearful of putting him out of time, which, by unsettling the swing, might have been dangerous. He got great applause, however, from less prudent people, as did also his compeer, Mr EDWINS.

The horse Hare-Bell is a beautiful little animal, about two feet high. It is sagacious (that is to say, eats beef-steaks), and though not entirely smooth, it has a beautiful mane and tail, and frisks about like a fawn. I do not care for horses or horsemanship myself, but the Circus is well worthy the attention of those who do, and gave altogether great amusement to

Your ardent admirer,

VESTER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Correspondents must excuse us till to-morrow.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Grand Opera, entitled

THE EMISSARY; OR, THE REVOLT OF MOSCOW.

The Music chiefly selected from the Opera of 'Le Colporteur' of Onslow. The whole adapted (with additional Music) by Barham Livius.

Lisinka, Miss Pearson. Mina, Miss Bruce. Katherine, Mrs Broad.
Alexis, Mr Sinclair. Oscar, Mr T. Cooke.
Lorinski, Mr Horn. Orloff, Mr Phillips. Knoutski, Mr Bedford.
Stephanoff, Mr Latham. Koli, Mr Harley.

In the course of the Evening, the Band will perform Onslow's Overture to 'Le Colporteur;' Winter's Overture to 'Calypso;' and Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi.'

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

POPPING THE QUESTION.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

Ellen Murray, Mrs Newcombe. Miss Biffin, Mrs C. Jones. Bobbin, Mrs Orger.
Miss Winterblossom, Mrs Broad.
Mr Primrose, Mr Farren. Henry Thornton, Mr Howard.

To conclude with a Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

THE JENKINSES.

Mrs John Jenkins, Mrs Orger. Miss Georgiana Jenkins, Miss Crawford.
Martha, Mrs Broad. Mr Carraway, Mr Farren.
Augustus Gingham, Mr J. Vining. Mr John Jenkins, Mr Cooper.
Master John Jenkins, Master Fenton.

To-morrow, A New Grand Opera; Deaf as a Post; The Portrait of Cervantes.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

SHAKSPEARE'S Comedy of

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.

Portia, Miss F. Kemble. Nerissa, Miss Nelson. Jessica, Miss Forde.
The Duke of Venice, Mr Evans. Shylock, Mr C. Kemble. Antonio, Mr Warde.
Bassanio, Mr Abbott. Lorenzo, Mr Duruset. Gratiano, Mr Farley.
Salanio, Mr Henry. Solarino, Mr Baker. Tubal, Mr Turnour.
Gobbo, Mr Blanchard. Launcelot, Mr Meadows.
Balthasar, Mr Irwin. Servant, Mr Addison.

Previous to the Comedy, Bishop's Overture to 'Fazio.'

After which, Mr Thompson will pourtray his living representation of the celebrated

GRECIAN STATUES!

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music by Mr H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss Cawse. Liese, Miss E. Tree. Thertse, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs Gibbs. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. Cawse.
Adolph, Mr Wilson. General Kienwitz, Mr Bartley.
Col. Francoeur, Mr Abbot. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. Penson. Moritz, Mr Blanchard.
Fritz Klaffen, Mr Keeley. Paul Richter, Miss Taylor.

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; Hide and Seek; Teddy the Tiler.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—

'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—

Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gosscon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

Published this Day.

NOW READY.—MR KENNEY'S NEW TRAGIC DRAMA.

THE PLEDGE; OR CASTILIAN HONOR:

A Tragic Drama, in Five Acts, with an illuminative Preface. By JAMES KENNEY, Esq. 8vo. price 2s.

 The Character of ZANTHE, as Miss PHILLIPS represented it, seemed full of grace and dignity, and the Play altogether has many noble and novel attractions; it is in no instance feeble or common-place, but in all graceful, vigorous, and condensed. The success of it has realised the expectations which had been excited.

The TOUCHSTONE; OR, THE WORLD AS IT GOES: a Comedy, in Five Acts, 8vo. price 3s. By the same Author.

The HOUSE OUT AT WINDOWS; a Farce, in Two Acts, 8vo. price 2s. By the same Author. Also any of his former Works may be had.

C. CHAPPLE, the King's appointed Bookseller, Royal Library, Pall-mall.

FRENCH PLAYS,

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE PROCUREUR ET L'AVOUE.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. SCRIBE et DUPIN.

Auguste, Mlle. Eliza. Victor, Mlle. Corra. Piedléger, Mlle. St. Angé.
Rose, Mme. Gamard. Jolivet, M. Brunet. Derville, M. Alfred.
Franval, M. St Aubert. Dubelair, M. Paulin.

Suivi de

LA REINE DE 16 ANS.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. BAYARD.

Reine, Mlle. L. Fay. Emma, Mlle. St. Ange.
Le Comte de Rantzoff, M. St. Albert. Frédéric de Bury, M. Alfred.
M. de Vaderg, M. Gamard. Un Officier du Palais, M. Guenée.

Suivi de

LA SECONDE ANNEE; OU, A QUI LA FAUTE?

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.

Madame Denneville, Mlle. Léontine Fay.
Denneville, M. Alfred. Edmond, M. Paulin. Gervault, M. Gamard.

On finira, à la demande des Souscripteurs. par

LES HABITANS DES LANDES.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, du Théâtre des Variétés.

Madame de St. Léon, Mlle. Eliza. Madame Dax, Mme. Préval.
Zoé, Mme. Gamard. Pierette, Mlle. Florval. Claireine, Mlle. St Ange.
Tremblin, M. Brunet. Boucaut, M. Préval. M. de St. Léon, M. Pelissié.
Eustache, M. Gamard. Rustique, M. Arnaud.
Le Tabellion, M. Granville. Un Paysan, M. Guenée.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comedy of

THE HEIR AT LAW.

[By G. COLMAN.]

Lady Duberly, Madame Simon. Cicely Homespun, Miss Somerville.
Caroline, Miss Scott. Daniel Dowlas, Mr Williams. Dick Dowlas, Mr C. Hill.
Doctor Pangloss, Mr Elliston. Henry Moreland, Mr Honner.
Steadfast, Mr D. Pitt. Zekiel Homespun, Mr Vale. Kenrick, Mr Gough.
John, Mr Rogers. Waiter at Hotel, Mr Collier.
Waiter at Blue Boar, Mr Lee.

The Highland Fling, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which,

A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.

[By MASSINGER.]

Lady Allworth, Miss M. C. Poole. Margaret, Miss Scott.
Froth, Miss Nicol. Tabitha, Miss Rumens. Abigal, Miss Jordan.
Sir Giles Overreach, Mr Osbaldiston. Lord Lovel, Mr Gough.
Wellborn, Mr C. Hill. Allworth, Mr Honner. Justice Greedy, Mr Vale.
Marrall, Mr Williams. Welldo, Mr Young. Tapwell, Mr Hobbs.
Order, Mr Lee. Amble, Mr Rogers. Vintner, Mr Collier. Watchall, Mr Maitland.
Furnace, Mr Webb. Tailor, Mr Asbury.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

With Handel's celebrated Music, newly arranged by Mr C. Potter.

Galatea, Miss Vernon. Endora, Mrs Humby. Doris, Mrs Garrick.
Acis, Mr Bennett. Damon, Mr J. Russel. Ulysses, Mr Spencer.
Lysander, Mr G. Lejeune. Telemon, Mr Munroe. Faunus, Mr G. Smith.
Polyphemus, the Fiend of Mount Etna, Mr E. Seguin.

To be succeeded by a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[By Mr BARNETT.]

Mrs Properly, Mrs Glover. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Stohwasser. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
Thomas, Mr Barnett. Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

After which, the favourite Divertissement Ballet of

THE TROUBADOUR.

With new and selected Music by Mr Harroway.

Donna Clara, Mademoiselle Constance. Florio, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Spanish Peasants, by the Corps de Ballet.

To conclude with a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

COBURG THEATRE. — Guy Fawkes — Reform — Oh Crikey! What a Shocking Bad Hat—Devil's Ducat.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE.—Idiot Witness—Les Villageurs—Miller's Maid.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —Rob Roy M'Gregor—Lilliputian Bonaparte—Gymnastics by Quang-Cœlis—Performances by the Lilliputian Ponies—Cupid and Zephyr—The Hunted Tailor.

Pblished by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER's Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street. Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 217.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1831.

ENGLISH POLITENESS.

Good manners are well defined by Swift. They are 'the art,' he says, 'of making those people easy with whom we converse. Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy, is the best bred in the company.'

Observe, that conversation is not to be understood here in its restricted sense of dialogue; but as including mixed intercourse of any sort, however large the assembly.

To judge from this definition (and we believe nobody will dispute the correctness of it), the audience at the Opera the other night consisted of some of the worst-bred people in Europe. The standing room in the pit was crowded, and there was no getting a seat without putting people to a shame of which you were ashamed yourself; though in the middle of the pit they were evidently sitting as wide as possible, and might have accommodated all those who stood. It might be said that the standing place would have been crowded still, because others would have remained who went away. But if it had been their pleasure to do so, this only shows that more persons might have been gratified. Those who stood as it was, would have been seated; and those who were obliged to stand, would have had the comfort of observing that they were not selfishly excluded. It may be said again that those who were excluded, would have excluded the others, and therefore had no reason to complain. Probably they might; but this does not mend the matter for our character as a 'polite people.' It is an awkward defence of the 'circles' to argue, that three parts of a polite assembly shew themselves ill-mannered, because the fourth would do so, if it could.

In vain we may be told, that the circumstance might have happened on that night exclusively. We know that it happens too often. In vain some Exclusive may assure us, that the pit of the Opera contains many very unpolite people; that anybody can get there, who can pay his half-guinea; and that their betters are to be found in the stalls and the boxes. Exclusiveness is itself a vulgarity. There should be no such things as stalls. Those who wish to keep aloof, might leave the pit to men of a larger good breeding; that is to say, of a humaner spirit of intercourse; and as to the boxes, the bad manners are conspicuous there. Nay, there is reason to believe that they are in direct proportion to the 'quality' of the parties; for as most of the privileges of that class exist upon no real grounds, they seem to take a delight in defying the uneasiness caused by an instinctive consciousness to that effect, and in seeing how many privileges they can assume. The men, therefore, who come in from their wine, and the hardfaced dowagers, take a pleasure in talking loud; particularly the latter, because as women, they are expected to be more decent. We were often reminded the other night, by one of these ill-looking personages (whose husband must delight in his separate bed), of the story of the gentleman at the theatre, who upon hissing a beautiful singer, and being asked by a neighbour why he did it, replied, 'Because she hinders me, sir, from hearing you.'

Here again the Exclusive may interfere, and say, 'You must not judge of the best circles by that woman, whatever may have been her quality. The question is,—Is she one of us? We are a very small and select body, and mere rank is not a passport to us, we assure you. Even genius cannot get among us, if its behaviour be not of the most perfect description.' Very likely: and the perfection must be something on which you are all agreed. O wise Exclusives! O sage corporate body, as sage as all other corporate bodies! and O the sage Exclusives that have existed in times the most barbarous, and of course have anticipated the wisdom of ages! Fashionable politeness has not even the liberality of a stone. The circles it makes grow smaller and smaller. And this forsooth is to exalt our character as a polite nation! We are not to raise others to our level, or to make them partake of our graces, but to keep them off, and despise them, and then value ourselves for being their superiors! To what are we superior, if only to persons whom we despise?

The other night, when some persons almost at the very edge of the benches were requested to make room for some ladies (which they could manifestly have done with ease), they did not hesitate to reply that it would greatly inconvenience them, and they would rather not. Some alleged that there was no room, meaning the spaces on each side of them; some, that they would move if others did, though they took no pains to bring it about; and one man said, that his legs were very long; which would have been a pleasant impudent joke enough, if he had not had a stupid face, and said it in the desperation of his dullness.

Bonaparte called us a 'shop-keeping nation;' but he was hardly aware that the sarcasm applied to our polite circles. Ben Jonson is reported to have said to a messenger, who brought him some small and tardy gratuity as poet laureate, from King James, 'I suppose he sends me this, because I live in an alley. Tell him, his soul lives in an alley.' The fashionable world have shops in their souls, where they sit amidst their jewels and millinery, in as narrow a stall as any in a bazaar, and make as great a 'number one' with their luxurious selfishness, as others do with their niggardly. It is amazing, and an evidence of the semi-barbarism of countries in a state of false refinement, to see how little it enters people's heads, that the including of others in their satisfactions is an addition to them, and not only to be recognized in books, but to be daily and hourly enjoyed. A late eminent writer left a treatise to prove, that children were not enough taught this in their infancy; and that if they were, they would be as much in the habit of looking to two numbers, as to 'number one.' Supposing that the pit, the other night, had been a little crowded, if they had admitted the standers among them, and that the heat might have been increased in proportion, and the comfort diminished, it is not to be denied that there are individuals who can derive a real pleasure from so accommodating their neighbours; otherwise, according to the reasoning of the selfish themselves, they would not prefer doing it. It is nothing to the purpose to argue, that they do it from vanity, or ostentation, or inability to say nay, or any other weakness, or out of a theory (a fine word for helping the selfish out of an argument.) People will naturally give the behaviour of others a good or ill construction, according to what they have reason to think of themselves. At all events, prefer it the others do, and so reap a greater pleasure from the inconvenience than they would have done by approving the conduct, and not pursuing it; and it is no reply to this, that they are as selfish as anybody else, on account of the pleasure they derive; for we are selfish in proportion as we think of ourselves only, and can dispense with any attention to our fellow-creatures; otherwise mere self would mean something different from self. Ego would mean two persons instead of one. That we cannot get rid entirely of ourselves, is to be granted. We should reduce everything to an absurdity if we could, and receive no sensations. But we are more or less selfish, in proportion as we think of anybody besides. No matter if we reap a great joy from it: far greater than any which mere selfishness can bestow. That is in the nature of things, and not a dry calculation. A man, to be able to be entirely selfish, should unite the two characters of a hog and a hermit. As long as the most selfish of men finds it necessary to him to give some sort of pleasure to others, granting even that he may calculate upon it, his very enormities have something at the root of them that is not unconnected with a better principle; and if he did but know this, he would mend; or at least make the very best of his bad habits.—But we shall be getting into a train of ethics. As to the charge of weakness, it is weakness to make it. It is a sorry resource, and likely to be resorted to by none so much as those who have no strength of any kind to go upon. It is fit only for the bully or the 'Lord Mayor's Fool.' He that will never do a good-natured action, for fear of being imposed upon, is inferior in energy of nature to the very vagabonds he fears. The best and wisest of men have been imposed upon, because they were such:—because they had qualities in themselves, which, without being ignorant of any folly or inferiority existing in the world, have led them too often to suppose them in others. Would we be better than the best and wisest, and shew ourselves utterly unworthy of sharing their chances with them?

Digitized by Google

To conclude this mixed paper of great and small, what we meant to say was, that as everybody after all has his excuses, and mistake may be pleaded on all hands, so we are bound to take thought when occasion offers it; and therefore, by virtue of the classical title of this our paper, and not in our own unworthy persons, we do hereby give notice to such of our play-going readers as have not thought upon the matter agreeably to their genial impulses, that they will commence doing so from this fourteenth day of May 1831, and never take up a seat and a half when they can share it, much less with a woman, and particularly if she is not pretty nor young. And so doing, we shall think them worthy readers of the paper with the aforesaid title; and do furthermore privilege and empower them to report all and every offender whom they may catch with too great an appropriation of bench, especially if a woman be standing by, and there is reason to believe that the criminal had a mother.

THE WINE VAULTS OF XERES.

Nothing at Xeres so much surprises the stranger, and nothing indeed is more worthy of inspection, than the bodegas or wine vaults. The vintage itself, though interesting, has nothing particularly striking or picturesque in it; and after having walked through the broiling vineyards, and seen the process of picking and pressing the grapes, the curiosity of the traveller will be satisfied. There are few, however, who would not feel inclined, I think, to repeat their visits more than once to the bodega. The term wine vaults is ill-suited to convey an idea of these really splendid and extraordinary establishments, which I should class among the things best worth seeing in Spain. Instead of descending into a dark, low, grovelling, and musty magazine, like the London Dock wine vaults, spacious as they are, you first pass through a street, one entire side of which, for the extent of a quarter of a mile, is occupied by one of these bodegas; and entering through large folding doors, you find yourself, to your astonishment, in what at first sight appears to be a church of considerable dimensions, with a lofty roof, and divided into spacious aisles. In the centre you see in large characters, "Bodega of Jesus;" and at the sides, "Nave of St Andrew, St Pedro, St Jago." Your eye soon runs along the lower part of the building, and you see some thousand butts of wine ranged along the aisles, and against the arched pillars. A delicious fragrance, which you easily recognise, soon convinces you, notwithstanding the pious inscriptions you have been reading, that you are in a place exclusively dedicated to the enjoyments of the body. On entering, you are waited upon by the superintendant of the bodega, who accompanies you through the different aisles, and who explains to you, on passing each barrel, the name, quality, age, and peculiar flavour of the wine within it; and in order that you may understand it practically as well as theoretically, his observations are rendered clear and intelligible by a full glass of the delicious liquor. You proceed thus slowly through the whole range of the bodega, occasionally reposing, like Bacchus, astride of a large butt, and sipping bumpers of delicious Paxareti, fragrant Muscatel, or dark creamy Sherry, half a century old. While on the outside everything is blazing with the intenseness of the noontide heat, within, a delightful coolness and a soft mellow light prevail, and you fancy you should like to pass the remainder of your days in this pleasant retreat. In this manner, you keep on quaffing the nectar which is so liberally supplied you, until your senses become not quite so cool and collected as when you first entered, and you think it high time to make your retreat into the hot and dusty streets of Xeres. Each wine establishment is conducted by an overseer, who is called the Capataz, and to whom is intrusted the purchasing the different wines from the grower, the selection, and the mixing of them, as also the proving and tasting of the brandies required; in all of which considerable judgment, skill, and experience are required. These men, who, with nearly all employed in the bodegas, come from the mountains of Asturia,—the Andalusians being too indolent,—generally amass large fortunes by their care and frugality, and afterwards retire to their native province, with the fruit of their industry. The interior of one of these large bodegas may be compared to an immense hospital filled with patients,—and the capataz to the visiting physician. The former goes his daily round, accompanied by one of the superintendants of the bodega, whom we will call the apothecary. As he passes each butt, he begins his inquiry into the state of his patient, not by feeling his pulse, but by tapping, which is immediately performed by his attendant, who runs a spike into it, and presents him with a bumper of the contents. On tasting it, he may probably find that the wine is sick, as it is called by merchants, being usually the case with young wines; a jar or two of brandy is therefore prescribed for the invalid, and the dose is forthwith administered. A second butt may be found to be equally qualmish, and is relieved in the same manner. The body or constitution of a third may probably be found to be naturally weak and delicate; this is strengthened and improved by being mixed with wine which is sounder and stronger; while a fourth may be at the last extremity, so as to require the application of musk. Speaking, however, more seriously, the bodega requires a great deal of skill, constant attention, a nice taste, and a discriminating judgment, in the selection not only of the wines, but of the brandies; in the improving the delicacy and flavour of the former, increasing or diminishing the body, dryness, and colour, and finally giving such a variety of shades and differences in flavour and price, as may best suit the particular market, and gratify the taste and caprice of John Bull.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. Vol. I, pp. 89—92.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE DISINTERRED WARRIOR.

Gather him to his grave again,
And solemnly and softly lay
Beneath the verdure of the plain
The warrior's scattered bones away.
Pay the deep reverence taught of old,
The homage of man's heart to death;
Nor trifle even with the mould
Once quickened by the Almighty's breath.

The soul hath hallowed every part:
That remnant of a martial brow,
Those ribs that held a mighty heart,
That strong arm—Ah! 'tis strengthless now:
Spare them,—each mouldering fragment spare
Of God's own image; let them rest
Till not a trace shall speak of where
The awful likeness was impressed. H.

A Mountain Guide.—One of them (the well-known guides noted for their boldness in attending travellers who ascend Mont Blanc) Jacques Balma, dit des dames, on account of his particular attention to ladies climbing under his guidance, gave us, on our return in the evening, after so many hours of hard labour, a proof of his undiminished strength, spirit, and perhaps rashness, at the age of sixty. A party of young men, on a botanizing excursion, spied a very fine plant (saxifraga pyramidalis) blooming in apparent safety out of reach, on the top of an innacccessible rock. Jacques Balma considered a few minutes, then took off his shoes, and securing a foot here, a hand there, holding once by his teeth to a twig, springing from one shelving place to another, like a chamois, or writhing, like a snake, among stones and bushes out of sight, without once hesitating or looking back, worked himself up to the pyramidal bunch of flowers, and threw it down to the wondering spectators. This was not enough. Another bunch of flowers bloomed over his head, in a still more difficult and hazardous situation: he sprang for it. We joined our entreaties to those of the other guides, who wared nhim of his danger, and then turned away, not to appear to encourage the mad attempt. A general exclamation induced us soon after to look back again. We beheld him in equilibrium on his breast, plucking the flower with the toes of an outstretched leg! How he came down, I know not, but in a few minutes we saw him again by our side, not even out of breath.—Note to Conder's Italy (quoted from Simond).

Venice.—Venice was always an unintelligible place, and is still unintelligible. I knew before, that it was situated on many islands; that its highways were canals; that gondolas were its hackney-coaches; that it had St Mark, and the Rialto, and the Doge's Palace; and I know no more now. It was always a dream, and will continue a dream for ever. A man must be born or live long enough in it to become endeared to it, before he will either understand or feel at home at Venice. It is a glorious place for cripples; for I know of no use that a gentleman has for his limbs. * * * You step out of your gondola into an hotel, and out of your hotel into a gondola; and this is all the exertion that is becoming. The Piazza di S. Marco, and the adjoining quay, are the only places where you can stretch a limb, and if you desire to do so, they carry you there, and bring you home again. To walk, requires predetermination, and you order your gondola, and go on purpose. To come to Venice, is to come on board; and it only differs from ship-board, that there is no danger of sea-sickness. The Canal Grande is nearly three hundred feet wide. Other canals are wide enough, but the widest street in the city is not more than ten or twelve feet from house to house, and the majority do not exceed six or eight. To wind and jostle through these irregularities, is intolerable, and all but impossible; no one thinks of doing so; and who would, that had a gondola at command? The gondola is all that is dreamy and delightful; its black funereal look in high imaginative contrast with its internal luxury. You float on without sensible motion; its cushions were stolen from Mammon's chambers, "blown up, not stuffed;" you seat yourself upon one of them, and sink, sink, sink, as if it were all air; you throw your leg upon another, and if you have occasion for it, which is rare at Venice, must hunt after it,—lost, sunk.—Conder's Italy.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— The term Boroughmonger was first applied by Sir Francis Burdett, about twenty years ago, to the Parliamentary phalanx, or Regiment, as he called it. When first broached, it was laughed at, but at length it is an epithet which makes its objects laugh on the other side of their mouths.

— A lawyer, engaged in a cause before Judge Peters, tormented a poor German witness so much with questions, that the old man declared that he was so exhausted, that he must have a drink of water before he could say anything more. Upon this the Judge called out to the teasing lawyer, 'I think, Sir, you must have done with the witness now, for you have pumped him dry.'—New York Gazette.

— A second-rate player, who was also a teacher of elocution, never could conquer in himself the inability to pronounce the letter R. The celebrated passage in Pierre he would pronounce thus—'Yats die in holes and coyneys—dogs yun mad;—man has a nobley yemedy—yevenge!'

— In most of the South-Sea Islands a prejudice exists against a woman eating in the presence of her husband; in the Archipelago, her doing so is a crime punishable by death.

Charity Prevalent.—Between two persons of liberal education, like opinions, and common feelings, oftentimes subsists a vanity of sentiment, which disposes each to look upon the other as the only being in the universe worthy of friendship, or capable of understanding it,—themselves they consider as the solitary receptacles of all that is delicate in feeling, or stable in attachment; when the odds are, that under every green hill, and in every crowded street, people of equal worth are to be found, who do more good in their generation, and make less noise in the doing of it.—Charles Lamb's 'Rosamund Gray.'

Italian Soprani.—The unnatural invention for giving artificial longevity to the voice of youth is the greatest, perhaps the only crime with which music can be reproached. And even this is not in fairness to be attributed either to the art or its professors; it was those from whose ranks the afflicted of Providence are carefully excluded—a priesthood which refuses to number amongst its brethren any one labouring under a natural infirmity—that first entertained the monstrous idea of swelling the pomp around the altars of God with beings whom the act of man, tyrannic or mercenary man, had excluded from the fair sympathies of their kind. The barbaric jealousy of the Eastern nations had from the earliest times sought for its security in the same enormous outrage, but it was reserved for the envious convents and chapels of Catholic Italy to make mutilation subservient to emulative vanity, and to insult the Deity by offering up their supplications, or uttering their praises, through the voices of their own victims.—Harmonicon.

Privilege of High Blood.—The pride of ancient descent is nowhere carried to so ludicrous an extent as in Spain. If a man can boast of having the sangre azula, or blue blood, as it is called, although this blue blood may have been reduced ages ago to bodily labour for its own support, on no account would he disgrace it by mixing it with the inferior blood of a family of whatever rank and eminence, and however wealthy it might happen to be. Among the lower orders in Spain, particularly in Andalusia, there are great numbers who, poor and illiterate as they are, boast the sangre azula, and who are sometimes compelled, by the sad reverse of fortune, to transmit this inestimable treasure into the hands of the common hangman. When this happens, which is not unfrequently the case, a great parade is made by the relations, who, as well as the unfortunate criminal, are equally ambitious and desirous that his exit should take place in a manner worthy of the blue blood which still flows in his veins. A silken rope, as is always the custom, agreeable to ancient privilege, is accordingly procured, and the unlucky representative of a long line of ancestors thus winds up his family pedigree by a sudden and final descent.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. Vol. I. p. 70.

A Coptic Christening.—Mr Hume relates that, when at Rosetta, he and a friend were invited by a Coptic merchant, to witness the christening of a child. On entering, they were received by the lady of the house with great civility. She poured a little perfumed rose-water into their hands, from a bottle covered with silver filagree, of very fine work; and as they passed into the room they were sprinkled over with rose-water. This was found to be a common custom in all Coptic and Levantine houses, when a person makes a visit of ceremony. The apartment into which they were introduced, was on the highest floor, where there was a table covered with all kinds of sweetmeats and fruits. The mistress of the family, and her sister, also a married lady, with her husband and other guests, soon made their appearance. The infant was completely swathed. The ceremony was performed by a Coptic priest, according to a service which he read from a manuscript ritual; which, if we may trust to the description given by Pococke, consists in plunging the child three times into water, after which it is confirmed, and receives the other sacrament;—that is, the minister dips his finger in consecrated wine, and puts it to the infant's mouth. —Egypt, Edinburgh Cabinet Library. Vol. III.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury-Lane.—The Emissary—Popping the Question—The Jenkinses.
Covent Garden.—The Merchant of Venice—The Romance of a Day.

Drury Lane.

A new opera, called The Emissary, was produced here last night with doubtful success. We feel unaffected pain whenever we have to record the failure, or probable failure, of a new piece: for if the author is rich enough to afford it, the mortification is still likely to be a great one; and if he is not, the anxieties he may suffer are not to be lightly thought of. We know there is a short way, among the critics, of dismissing these inconvenient sympathies, by saying that a man has no right to attempt to earn his bread in a department for which he is not fit. But when we consider all the chances that determine men's modes of existence, how many earn a living, a very substantial one too, in a way for which they are not at all fitted, and how many of the very critics would be badly off if they were paid according to their merits, we confess the bread-argument on such occasions has little weight with us. Would they like it to be turned against themselves?

The plot of the new piece, it must be confessed, is not very new; nor is the dialogue, or the characters; yet there are some pleasantries here and there that made us laugh right out (which is not always the case with new operas); there is at least one good scene, that where the pedlar treats the peasants to wine; and we were agreeably surprised to meet with some pleasing passages among the verses,—a specimen of which we shall give presently. The plot, which is founded upon one of the usurpations in the barbarous history of Russia, is soon told. Alexis, the rightful prince (Mr Sinclair) has been saved from death when an infant, in the hut of a woodman, and in due time is discovered. A party is formed in his favour. Orloff, an Emissary of the Usurper's (Mr H. Phillips), is sent to contrive his destruction, before he can make head against the tyrant; but just when he thinks himself on the point of succeeding, and is about to kill one of the Prince's friends, is shot; and all ends happily for the right side. There is a cowardly buffoon, as usual (Mr Harley), and a variety of peasants, soldiers, &c.

The last line of the following stanza appears to us to be beautiful, with a fine tone in the vowels:—

'To love is woman's first desire,
To be loved next succeeds it;
And mutual once the holy fire,
Each moment deeper feeds it.
Her life is then the land of dreams,
Her heart fond cares encumber:
And aye with restless fancy teems,
Till calm in bridal slumber.'

The music, the principal part of which is by Mr Onslow (a gentleman of family, we believe, residing on the Continent, and well known to the professional world as an accomplished amateur) is of the modern German cast, more scientific, and numerous in its harmonies, than remarkable for expression and invention, yet not deficient in the one, as far as the literal style of illustration is concerned: and there are some pleasing passages of melody too. Mr Barham Livius's share of the composition is lively and tasteful. Indeed a more than usual degree of movement prevails in the music throughout; and as the whole strength of the theatre's vocal corps was brought forward, with the exception of Mrs Waylett, the audience heard the piece throughout with an attention and occasional applause, which, notwithstanding some hisses directed against proposed encores, did not prepare us for the violent opposition made to the applauders, when the curtain fell. Mr H. Phillips, who sang with great good taste, and gave us some fine relishing sustained notes in his bass, was encored in a Russian melody, the burden of which had a pleasing quaintness.

Digitized by Google

There is a most beautiful scene of a bridge, with a distant prospect, painted, we suppose, by Mr STANFIELD.

Miss PEARSON is improved: but why will she not look a little more smiling, and encourage us to encourage her?

NEW CITY THEATRE.—MR REEVE.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—REEVE has been giving some capital imitations in a trifling piece, called 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, by Advertisement, at the New City Theatre. He first assumes the character of Sir Peter Teazle, and gives you a most exact idea of the voice, gait, and manner of FARREN, even to the taking a pinch of snuff,—he, but for his fatness, might have been taken for the man himself. Next, one Dr Endall, an excellent imitation of the queer, bobbing, restless style of Harley. Thirdly, MUNDEN as Sam Dabbs, the apothecary's man. This was supreme: he hit to a nicety the peculiar causticity of expression and astonishing impudence which characterised MUNDEN's performance of that character. And lastly, MATHEWS as himself. KEAN is to play there in the course of a fortnight. Miss ELLEN TREE and POWER are also said to be engaged.

Your admirer and constant reader,

S. W. H.

Wednesday, May 11, 1831.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our friend S. W. H. will see that we have availed ourselves of his communication.

The subject of PHILO-TATLER's letter, we think, is hardly important enough for notice.

OMEGA is received.

Thanks to H. We have always observed that when a Correspondent offers us anything worth acceptance, it is sure to be modestly put.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two Children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

After which, the New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA NAYADE.

[Composed by M. TAGLIONI.]
The Music by M. Nadaud.

Principal Characters, Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, and Mlle. Brocard.
M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Grand Opera, entitled

THE EMISSARY; OR, THE REVOLT OF MOSCOW.

[By G. DANCE.]

The Music chiefly selected from the Opera of 'Le Colporteur' of Onslow. The whole adapted (with additional Music) by Barham Livius.

Lisinka, Miss Pearson. Mina, Miss Bruce. Katherine, Mrs Broad.
Alexis, Mr Sinclair. Oscar, Mr T. Cooke.
Lovinski, Mr Horn. Orloff, Mr Phillips. Knoutzki, Mr Bedford.
Stephanoff, Mr Latham. Koli, Mr Harley.

In the course of the Evening, the Band will perform Onslow's Overture to 'Le Colporteur;' Boieldieu's Overture to 'La Dame Blanche;' and Cherubini's Overture to 'Les Deux Journees.'

To which will be added,

DEAF AS A POST.

Sophy Walton, Mrs Newcombe. Amy Templeton, Miss E. Absolon.
Sally Maggs, Mrs Orger. Mrs Plumpley, Mrs C. Jones.
Old Walton, Mr W. Bennet. Captain Templeton, Mr Cooper.
Tristram Sappy, Mr Liston. Crupper, Mr Hughes. Gallop, Mr Salter.

After which, the Exhibition of the New and Splendid DIORAMA, designed and painted by Mr STANFIELD.

To conclude with

THE PORTRAIT OF CERVANTES.

Isabella, Mrs Newcombe. Lucetta, Mrs Orger.
Murillo, Mr Farren. Don Guzman, Mr C. Jones. Don Carlos, Mr J. Vining.
Father Benito, Mr W. Bennett. Scipio, Mr Webster.
Sancho, Mr Liston.

On Monday, Alfred the Great, and Timour the Tartar.

THE EXHIBITION OF LODGE'S PORTRAITS
Of the MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONAGES of GREAT BRITAIN, from the Galleries of HIS MAJESTY, the Nobility, and from public Collections, will open on MONDAY next, May 16th, at Messrs HARDING and LEPARD'S, 4 Pallmall East.
Admittance, by Tickets only, which may be had free of expense, on application to Messrs Harding and Lepard.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.
[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Miss Cawse. Leshia, Miss H. Cawse. Zemira, Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After the Opera, Mozart's Overture to 'Le Clemenza di Tito;' previous to Teddy the Tiler, Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflote.'

After which, an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. Tree. Charlotte, Miss Lawrence.
Moses, Mr Keeley.
Mordaunt, Mr Baker. Bertrand, Mr Duruset. Merton, Mr Henry.

To conclude with the Farce of

TEDDY THE TILER.

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly. Oriel, Miss Lawrence. Flora, Miss Nelson.
Julia, Mrs Brown. Ladies, Mesds. Perry and Appleton.
Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans. Henry, Mr Perry. Frederick, Mr Baker.
Bombardine, Mr Henry. Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour. Tim, Mr Addison.
Teddy Mulowney, Mr Power. Stiff, Mr Mears.
Apewell, Mr Irwin. Constable, Mr Fuller. Richard, Mr Heath.

On Monday, Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Historical Drama of

WILLIAM TELL.

Austrians—Anneli, Miss Nicol. Agnes, Miss Scott.
Gesler, Mr D. Pitt. Sarnam, Mr Almar. Struth, Mr Hobbs. Braun, Mr Rogers.
Rudolph, Mr Lee. Lutold, Mr Richards.
Swiss—Emma, Miss M. C. Poole. William Tell, Mr Osbaldiston.
Albert, Miss Ellis. Waldman, Mr Webb. Michael, Mr C. Hill.
Meletal, Mr Gough. Erni, Mr Nelson. Verner, Mr Maitland.
Furst, Mr Young. Jaghelli, Mr Honner. Pierre, Mr Ransford.
Theodore, Mr Asbury.
Tyrolienne Dance, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, a Dramatic Romance, in Two Acts, called

THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS.

Helena di Rosalvi, Miss M. C. Poole. Claudine, Miss Jordan.
Jacinthe, Miss Rumens. Rosa, Miss Nicol. Genevieve, Miss Somerville.
Felix, Mr Osbaldiston. Rosalvi, Mr D. Pitt. Jeronymo, Mr Young.
Marco, Mr Lee. Florio di Rosalvi, Miss Ellis. Baptista, Mr Webb.
Julio di Rosalvi, Master F. Carbery. Juan, Mr Tully.
Pietro, Mr Collier. Fabricio, Mr Fone.

After which a New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]
The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Emden Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

Taken from Sir W. SCOTT's celebrated Story.

Lady Ashton, Miss Wells. Lucy Ashton, Mrs Evans. Marion, Miss Ayres.
Dame Lightbody, Mrs Garrick. Sir William Ashton, Mr Munroe.
Edgar, Mr Keppell. Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr Forrester. Randolph, Mr Cooke.
Captain Craigengelt, Mr Marshall. And Caleb Balderstone, Mr J. Russell.

Alexander's Feast, or the Power of Music, to be spoken by Mrs Glover
After which, a Concert on the Stage.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflote,' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

To which will be added a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

Mrs Pimpernel, Mrs Glover.
Mr Theophilus Bunbury, Mr Marshall. And Mr Alexis Twisselton, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Grand Melo-dramatic Military Spectacle, called

THE FRENCH SPY.

[By Mr HAINES.]
The Music composed and selected by Mr Harroway.

French—Mathilde de Grammont, the dumb lady, assuming the Characters of Pierre Graziot, a Cadet of the Lancers, and Omar Almorid, an Houah, or inspired Arab boy, Mademoiselle Celeste.
Madame Beauvine, Mrs Garrick. Louison, Miss Stolwasser.
The General, Mr Tilbury. Major Lafont, Mr Spencer.
Captain Dessain, Mr G. Lejeune. Serjeant Beauvine, Mr Marshall.
Colin Coquinard, Mr Wilkinson.
Algerines—Zitta, Mademoiselle Constance.
The Dey, Mr Munroe. Ali Ben Al Hamed, Mr H. Cooke.
Ben Mousa, Mr Keppell.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The White and the Black Bear.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.—Feats of Horsemanship—Rob Roy M'Gregor—Lilliputian Bonaparte—Gymnastics by Quang-Cœlis—Performances by the Lilliputian Ponies—Cupid and Zephyr—The Hunted Tailor.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER's Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 32 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell.

Nº 218.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MAY 16, 1831.

REVOLUTIONS IN THE SWISS CANTONS.

As our visits to the theatre try our health not a little, and sometimes render it difficult to write the first part of the paper in the manner we like, we prefer on these occasions giving an interesting extract by itself, to making sleepy remarks upon it. The following, from the second volume, just published, of the 'Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs,' is one upon a set of events that ought to be better known, and presents the reader with a very complete idea of them:—

'While the population of Portugal was below the level of being touched by the events of the French revolution, it was generally supposed that the free republics of Switzerland, whose constitutions have been praised by Montesquieu and the historian Müller, would be equally exempt from agitation, being raised above them. No idea could be more erroneous. The political state and civil government of the Swiss cantons, as settled by the congress of Vienna, and watched with jealousy by the holy alliance, have been to the great body of the people a source of uneasiness and dissatisfaction. Though republics, nothing could be less republican than many of their laws, customs, and institutions. Privileges of orders, privileges of corporations, privileges of localities, and privileges of family, almost universally interfered with the equal rights and free action of the majority of the citizens. A narrow oligarchy engrossed the offices and advantages which belonged to all, prevented the development of talent and intelligence, and restrained the enjoyment of industry and civil liberty. The holy alliance domineered over the diet or federal directory; the diet tyrannised over the cantons; the chief towns of the cantons tyrannised over the country districts; and trades or families tyrannised over the chief towns. The taxes were not imposed according to the abilities of the tax-payers; and several exemptions were enjoyed by particular classes.

'The people in most of the cantons complained that all the powers of the state were monopolized by the minority. In some of them, places of trust and emolument were concentrated in a small junta in the cities, and had become the patrimony of a few families. The representation of the republic was often so unjustly distributed, that the towns, though the minority, enjoyed the privilege of returning two-thirds of the supreme council, while the country could only send one-third. Thus, in Fribourg, for instance, the capital sent 108 members to the canton legislature, while the country only sent 36. In Zurich the grand council consisted of 212 members, of whom the capital elected 130, and the rest of the canton only 82. The small council at Fribourg engrossed all the executive, administrative, and judicial appointments of the state. It nominated the parish clergy, appointed the judges, and directed public instruction. In discharge of the latter duty, it afforded an asylum to the Jesuits when expelled from France, encouraged them by their patronage, and protected them against their enemies. In other cantons, such as that of Berne, the government was entirely in the hands of a privileged nobility, who not only robbed the people of their equal rights, but insulted them by their aristocratic haughtiness. At Bâle and several of the other cantons, patrician insolence and patrician oppression were the subjects of as heavy complaints as with the people of Rome before they retired to the Mons Sacer. In cantons where no nobility existed, the town inhabitants enjoyed advantages of trade and immunities from duties which were denied to the peasantry or the inhabitants of the country. Sometimes those Swiss officers, who had returned with some fortune and consideration from waiting in the ante-chambers of foreign despots, insulted their countrymen by the enjoyment of political immunities to which they could not aspire.

'But domestic oppression and injustice were not the only evils that resulted from these oligarchical powers and institutions. The parties thus exercising authority, exempt from the control of their fellow-citizens, leagued themselves with foreign potentates, and often surrendered from complaisance the just rights and independence of their confederation. Hence they sent away the refugees from Piedmont at the request of the King of Sardinia, and the German students on the demand of the German princes. Hence they allowed the press to be enslaved by the holy alliance. Hence they permitted the discussions in the Diet to be bridled, and the character and movements of strangers who visited their mountains to be reported upon at Paris, Vienna, and St Petersburg. If an article of too liberal a tendency was published in a journal, or a speech of too bold a spirit was delivered in a cantonal assembly, the diplomatic spies of absolute monarchs censured the former, and remonstrated against the latter. The authorities, not always sympathising with their fellow-citizens, submitted to these indignities; and the liberty of discussion was as much restrained on the mountains of Switzerland as in the heart of the Germanic confederation. Since the Helvetians have ceased to migrate in a body, like their ancestors of Cæsar's day, in quest of new settlements, they have ceased to be formidable to neighbouring states by their ambition of conquest, and therefore might have been allowed to discuss their own interests, and enjoy their own franchises, without molestation from the absolute sovereigns of Europe.

'These evils, whether less or more severely felt, might have been endured much longer, or have been gradually removed without an explosion, had it not been for the occurrence of the French revolution. This event acted upon the Swiss as upon the Belgians, with the compound effect of vicinage and similarity of institutions, multiplied by political sympathy, identity of language, and certainty of protection. While the inhabitants of each canton had their attention called to this opportunity of rapidly bettering their condition, without interference from neighbouring absolute governments, the attention of the whole confederation was roused to the means of preserving its neutrality in the midst of the conflict which the convulsion in France might provoke. Thus it was impossible either for the separate cantons or the general government to remain inactive spectators of the events on their frontiers.

'Towards the middle of October, symptoms of popular effervescence began to appear, which an exhortation from the directing canton could not allay; and by the end of November or middle of December, eleven out of the twenty-two members of the confederation had either risen against their executive and supreme councils, to demand a popular change in their constitution, or had been promised a revision of their constitutional act without an insurrectionary movement. The cantons which thus demanded fundamental reforms were Zurich, Bâle, Berne, Vaux, Lucerne, Soleure, Fribourg, St Gall, Argovie, Thurgovie, and Schwitz. The diet, or general government, did not interfere, and in the midst of such a general agitation could not have been heard. As the grievances of all were nearly the same, redress was demanded by nearly the same class of persons, enforced by the same kind of means, and extended to nearly the same articles of reform.

'The usual mode of proceeding was for the reformers of each canton to meet in smaller bodies in their separate districts, or in large masses, and petition the government for a revision of the constitution or fundamentul law of the republic on certain bases, of a more enlarged electoral system and a more equal representation,—of the abolition of privileges, and the equal partition of political power between the town and the country. On receiving these petitions, the administration referred them to the grand councils, who usually appointed a commission, of a smaller or a greater number of members, to draw up a reformed constitutional law, to be submitted, first to the council, and then to the people. The petitioners, in the mean time, kept their eye closely fixed on the work preparing in the council, and either stimulated the commission to activity in its undertaking, or prepared to resist its propositions if they were not sufficiently liberal. Sometimes the people and their rulers agreed without any demonstration of physical force on the part of the former; sometimes, on the contrary, the petitioners found it necessary to assemble in great bands, to proceed armed to the chief town, and to dictate to the council both the time of completing its labours, and the principles of its intended work. In some instances these petitionary assemblies were of a very formidable and tumultuous nature. They had learned from the civic sharpshooters and political clubs of Paris the doctrines of popular sovereignty, and could practise the lesson as well as their masters. Excited by agitators, who assured them that they were oppressed, and that now was the time for redress, they gathered from hill and dale, and formed themselves into troops, to invade the towns and overawe the councils; proclaiming a war of the country or villages against the capital,—of the peasantry against oligarchical privileges,—of the body of the citizens against corporations and monopolies.

'It may be enough to state what occurred in two or three cases, to give the reader some idea of the singular manner in which they effect a revolution in Switzerland. The people in Zurich demanded a revision of their constitution. The work was entrusted to a commission of the grand council, which made its report on the 25th of November. This council consisted of 212 members, 130 of whom belonged to the chief town of the canton. The commission reduced the representatives of this town to 82, and gave 118 to the country. Still this popular change did not satisfy the rural inhabitants of the canton, who imagined that their share of influence was left too small. Discontent spread; meetings took place, speeches were made, and petitions were drawn up against the new project. At last, to give more effect to their representations, a meeting consisting of more than 10,000 men assembled at Uster, a village about three leagues from the capital. This meeting was harangued by several patriotic orators, who agreed to a petition, which was signed by thousands of names, appointed a deputation to carry it to the government, and resolved to remain in permanent insurrection till an answer should be received. The petition insisted on the principle, that in all free countries the people are the sovereign; it represented that the revision of the constitution ought to be submitted to the majority of the citizens as well as to the grand council; that the decision of the grand council in this case was not conformable to the will of the people; that the due representation of the canton would give two thirds of the deputies to the country, and only one third to the capital; that a better system of election should be introduced; that the privileges of trades should be suppressed, the duration of military service shortened, the rights of parishes to choose their pastors established, and other grievances redressed too tedious to be enumerated. The deputation arrived in Zurich when in a state of alarm at hearing of the great assemblage in its neighbourhood. It had an interview with the chief magistrate; it was called to the grand council, and represented the state of ferment in which it had left the meeting. The council met at eight o'clock in the morning, and sat till six in the evening, having been addressed by eighty speakers. It then came to an agreement to adopt the principle laid down by the assembly at Uster, giving two thirds of the representation to the country, instead of one third as then existed; and the effervescence ceased.

Digitized by Google

'On the 5th of December the canton of Berne, comprising nearly a third of the confederation, held a grand council, consisting of 217 members, in which, after an address by the chief magistrate on the state of Europe, and the dangers which beset the confederation, he showed, that in case of a war the independence of the cantons could only be maintained by unanimous councils and firm resolutions. The turbulence which had appeared in some cantons it was supposed would end by timely concessions to the popular will. In their turn, the council appointed a commission of eleven to examine all propositions for a change in the constitution, either emanating from the government or from other parties. This was reckoned a victory by the petitioners for a change, and was celebrated with every token of joy.

'On the 5th of December a popular movement was directed on Arau, in the canton of Argovie, at the head of which was an innkeeper and a physician. The government prepared to oppose them by a corps of militia, some gensdarmes, and four pieces of cannon, on Monday the 6th, and ranged them in order of battle near Stansberg. The innkeeper and his party, being reinforced by the inhabitants of the towns through which they passed, formed themselves in order of battle, and prepared to attack the government force. Some shots were fired, and the militia fled; the malcontents got the cannon, which had been abandoned by the artillerymen, and, having made some prisoners, entered Arau. The government offered to resign in their favour; but the insurgents declared that they were not desirous of power, and that they only wished the prayers of the people to be granted. On this the government retained its authority, and convoked the great council for the 9th. This council named a constituent committee, with orders to present its project to the grand council in fifteen days. The insurgents then dispersed quietly, leaving the town with a garrison of 600 men. The innkeeper Fisher maintained strict discipline: the arsenal, the town house, and all public property were guarded and respected.

'Lausanne, or the Pays de Vaud, was among the last of the cantons to raise the standard of insurrection; but when it declared itself for reform, its resolution was decided and effectual. At the request and earnest entreaty of a great body of the country population, a commission was appointed to revise the constitutional act, and to propose such changes as would render it consistent with the more enlargened notions of liberty which time and knowledge had introduced. The movements of this commission were too slow for public impatience, or its dispositions too narrow for public confidence. The patriots, therefore, who had compelled its formation, soon began to clamour against its delay, and to mingle rumours of intrigues and treachery with their expressions of dissatisfaction. The popular mind became greatly irritated against the council; and on the 17th of December, about 300 or 400 armed petitioners arrived in the town to urge more expeditious measures. They addressed themselves to the council, and believed their prayer rejected. On this they conceived that a display of force was necessary; and force was ready at their command. They had previously placed bonfires at proper distances, to be kindled in case of need, as gathering signals for their friends. The one above the town was lighted, and almost immediately a line of revolutionary beacons blazed along the lake. The people gathered at the signal, and 8000 petitioners were soon assembled at Lauzanne. The tree of liberty was planted in the middle of the town; and the insurgents, without arms or violence, engrossed all the powers of the state. They sent a deputation to the grand council in the name of the people; but the council had suspended their sittings, and nothing could be done. All resistance to the assembled villagers of the canton was vain; and no violence being offered, no excess was committed. On an assurance of redress from the most respectable people of the canton, this crowd dispersed, and its chief demands were complied with.

'In only one case was there any continued resistance or bloodshed, and that was at Bâle, where the authorities, supported by the town's people, resolved not to yield to the demands of the country districts. In this canton, therefore, hostilities were kept up for some time. The peasantry surrounded and besieged the town. Collected from their farms or their flocks, from their cottages in the mountains or the fastnesses of their rocky land, with fowling-pieces, pistols, pitchforks, or any kind of weapon which they could lay hold of, they followed the banner of liberty to the seat of government, to demand a change in their constitution. The drifting snows of winter did not interrupt their campaign, or arrest their attempts to storm the ramparts of oligarchical privilege. For a whole fortnight they bivouacked on the wintry ground in the neighbourhood of the town, which was regularly defended with artillery. As they approached, the citizens flew to arms,—the tocsin sounded, and the walls were mounted with soldiers as against a foreign enemy. As many of the Swiss officers who had returned from foreign service took part with the government, and as Bâle is a defensible position, the number of undisciplined peasants were unable to make any impression, and dispersed after being repulsed with some discharges of artillery. The council, notwithstanding its success, resolved to revise the constitution, and to grant those fundamental reforms promised by the other cantons.

'Such was the position of this interesting assemblage of republics at the end of the year. The people had everywhere demanded a change in the distribution of political power, to which the constituted authorities had consented, on the basis fixed by the majority of the citizens; and a constitutional reform, amounting to a revolution, was everywhere in progress.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Genuine Homage.—Rude and savage natures, who seem born with a propensity to express contempt for anything that looks like prosperity, yet felt respect for its declining lustre.—Charles Lamb's 'Rosamund Gray.'

Strange Instance of Vanity.—Sir Godfrey Kneller was remarkably vain. On one occasion, when he heard a low man damning himself,—'God damn you, indeed!' cried the indignant artist; 'God may damn the Duke of Marlborough or Sir Godfrey Kneller; but do you suppose he would take the trouble to damn such a low fellow as you?'—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

The Stirrup-cup.—When the landlord of an inn presented his guests with deoch-an-dorais, that is the drink at the door, or the stirrup-cup, the draught was not charged in the reckoning. On this point, a learned bailie of the town of Forfar pronounced a very sound judgment:—A., an ale-wife in Forfar, had brewed her "peck of malt," and set the liquor out of doors to cool; the cow of B., a neighbour of A., chanced to come by, and seeing the good beverage, was allured to taste it, and finally to drink it up. When A. came to take in her liquor, she found her tub empty, and from the cow's staggering and staring so as to betray her intemperance, she easily divined the mode in which her "browst" had disappeared. To take vengeance on Crummie's ribs with a stick was her first effort. The roaring of the cow brought B., her master, who remonstrated with his angry neighbour, and received in reply a demand for the value of the ale which Crummie had drunk up. B. refused payment, and was conveyed before C. the bailie, or sitting magistrate. He heard the case patiently, and then demanded of the plaintiff A. whether the cow had sat down to her potation, or taken it standing. The plaintiff answered she had not seen the deed committed, but she supposed the cow drank the ale while standing on her feet; adding, that had she been near, she would have made her use them to some purpose. The bailie, on this admission, solemnly adjudged the cow's drink to be a stirrup-cup, for which no charge could be made, without violating the ancient hospitality of Scotland.—Notes to Waverley.

English and Continental Meals.—I have almost always found the utmost variety, and in general, good cookery, in the Swiss bill of fare, with the exception of Zurich and its neighbourhood, where certain spices are used in too great abundance. At the inn at Glarus, where one might scarcely expect the handsomest entertainment, my dinner consisted of soup, fish, and five dishes of meat, two dishes of vegetables, and seven of a dessert. It has often occurred to me when dining at one of the best served tables, at the inns on the Continent, how great must be the surprise of a foreigner, when, having asked for dinner, in England, for the first time, a beef-steak perhaps, and a few potatoes, are placed before him. A Swiss gentleman, whom I met at Wesen, informed me that the first evening he landed at Brighton, he asked for supper; and a huge piece of cold beef being soon after placed upon the table, he supposed that the company at supper would consist of at least twenty persons; for abroad, he had been accustomed to see little more of one dish served up, than would suffice for the company. In the expectation that the company would arrive, he waited long; and at length, being told that the beef was intended for no one but himself, he cut one thin slice, marvelling much at the extraordinary appetites of Englishmen, and expecting six or eight as ponderous dishes to follow; the sequel needs no telling.—Conway's Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees.—(Constable's Miscellany. Vol. LXVI.)

Digitized by Google

A Church-Yard in Switzerland.—I left Basil for Zurich soon after sunrise. The road for at least ten miles lies along the southern bank of the Rhine, and passes through a country rich in grain, and thickly studded with cherry, apple, and walnut-trees. The north bank of the Rhine, exposed to the sun, being covered with vineyards. I stopped to breakfast at a small inn by the river-side, and while breakfast was preparing, I walked into a small church-yard close by, where I found not only the usual crosses and the complement of fresh flowers, but also a small wooden vessel upon each grave, half full of water, which, upon enquiry, I found to be holy water.—Conway's Switzerland.

A Dramatic Incident in Real Life.—His Lordship's (the Marquis of Exeter) first marriage had been unfortunate, and his second was at least singular. Disturbed in mind at the unhappy result of his first union, he had retired to a farm-house near Shrewsbury, where he lived incog. and solaced himself in rural musings. His command of money and his want of employment at last set the busy gossips of the neighbourhood at conjecture, and inferences were drawn not very favourable to his character and sources of indolent support. At last, his host thought of cutting acquaintance, partly on this score, and partly because the neighbourhood began to think him attached to his daughter. "But," replied the noble recluse, "what would you say, if I really loved Sarah Hoggins, and married her?" This altered the case. The wedding was agreed upon, the parties repaired to Burghley, and until they arrived at the splendid place of the Cecils, Sarah Hoggins had no idea that she was to be the Marchioness of Exeter.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence. [The word Marchioness, seems to have been written by mistake, since the damsel of Shrewsbury was the second wife of the Earl, who, as the author himself tells us, was created a Marquis while Sir Thomas Lawrence was engaged in painting the portrait of the third wife.]

Value of Musical Notes.—Stephen Storace had a remarkably good head for figures. When a boy, his passion for calculation was beyond all belief. Michael Kelly says he has been known to multiply four figures by four figures, by memory, in three minutes. When young, Kelly tells us Storace was so astonished that fifty guineas should be paid for singing a song, that he counted the notes in it, and calculated the amount of each at 4*s.* 10*d.* This passion for calculating the value of notes (musical ones) has seized a Parisian dilettante, who, according to the Furet de Londres, has been fixing the price of every note and rest in certain pieces played by Paganini recently, at a concert given at the Opera at Paris, which produced him 16,500 francs. This may be play to Paganini, but destruction to less fortunate musicians, for he swallows up all that would otherwise be distributed among many. An English violinist must work many long laborious days and nights before he can scrape together six hundred and eighty-seven pounds sterling, the sum, it seems, which the lucky Italian gets by a single concert!—Dilettante in Harmonicon for May.

Diet to Procure a Grateful Old Age.—One thing above all is grateful to the spirits: that there be a continual progress to the more benign. Therefore, we should lead such a youth and manhood, that our old age should find new solaces; whereof the chief is moderate ease. And, therefore, old men in honourable places lay violent hands upon themselves, who retire not to their ease: whereof may be found an eminent example in Cassiodorus; who was of that reputation among the Gothish Kings of Italy, that he was as the soul of their affairs. Afterwards, being eighty years of age, he betook himself to a monastery, where he ended not his days before he was a hundred years old. But this thing doth require two cautions; one, that they drive not off till their bodies be utterly worn out and diseased; for in such bodies, all mutation, though to the more benign, hasteneth death: the other, that they surrender not themselves to a sluggish ease; but that they embrace something, which may entertain the thoughts and mind with contentation. In which kind, the chief delights are, reading and contemplation; and then the desires of building and planting.—Lord Bacon—History of Life and Death.

Glees and Madrigals v. Mozart.—In the mean time I had made the acquaintance of some young Germans, whose mercantile pursuits, and the passion for youthful travelling, which more or less governs every German, from the mechanic to the merchant, had led to London and its counting-houses. Conversation with them opened a new field to me—and what a field! Haydn, Mozart, Paer, and even the early works of Beethoven, were spread before my eyes, and poured into my ears. 'Get thee behind me,' said I forthwith to the whole school of glee-writers and madrigal composers, past, present, or to come. Here is a grace and power beyond the reach of art. Music here is dealing not with the abstract ideas alone, but with the passions and business of life. Listen to the amorous boy, Cherubino, languishing his youthful aspirations in 'Voi che sapete,' or expressing all their precocious fervour in 'Non so più cosa son;' weigh in an equal balance the tender regrets of the neglected wife, when the Countess sings 'Dove sono;' and the equally tender anticipations of the bride's 'Deh vieni, non tardar.' Compare the lofty and aristocratic, but depraved jealousy of the Count Almaviva in the 'Vedro mentr' io sospiro,' with that of the crafty Figaro in 'Se vuol ballare' and 'Aprite un po quegl' occhi,' and confess with me, that the glee-writer may be elegant, erudite even, and sometimes touching; but that to have your sensations awakened as music can awake them, you must quit the glee-school, and listen to the dramatic.—Harmonicon.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—Medea—La Nayade.
Drury-Lane.—The Emissary—Deaf as a Post—The Portrait of Cervantes.
Covent Garden.—Azor and Zemira—Hide and Seek—Teddy the Tiler.

FRENCH PLAYS AT THE HAYMARKET.

TO THE TATLER.

Saturday, May 14, 1831.

Dear Mr Tatler,—I was at the Haymarket Theatre last night, and as you, being on duty at Drury Lane, could not possibly have been present, I may as well tell you what was going on at the smaller house. To begin with the beginning:—My companion and myself could only obtain seats on the third row; these, however, would have well pleased us, had it not happened that, at the sudden announcement of "First and second company," a train of ladies entered, one of whom had her head so built upon with a profusion of gauzes, ribbons, and flowers, that the stage was entirely hidden from our sight. Even to this we could have been reconciled, Mr Tatler, had we considered only the first piece, which is generally comparatively, if not positively, poor; but these tremendous towers were to conceal from us the delightful actress we went purposely to see. We kept our feelings to ourselves, and endeavoured to make the best of it, and our patience was rewarded; for the whole party removed to one of the private boxes, and we advanced to the front row. I begin to suspect, Sir, that ladies are fee'd by the box-keepers, to wear these screens upon their heads, by which front rows are rendered objects of so much importance, that people will give a handsome sum to obtain them. The second piece was La Reine de Seize Ans, which is the same subject, and indeed the same piece, though in another language, as that which was lately acted at the greater theatres, under the title of the Youthful Queen.

It represents Christina of Sweden, in her youth, patronising and rapidly promoting a young officer, with whom she, at last, resolves to share her throne. Her prime minister, who discovers this design, effectually frustrates it, by bestowing his own niece upon the young officer, who had long loved her;—at the very moment when the Queen is waiting for him to declare her intentions. Mademoiselle Leontine Fay did not act, she was Christina,—Christina in her youth, with all her fervency and self-will; but before she was hardened by power. The last scene was inimitable. Having learned, from Frederic's own lips, that he is married, and listened, with conflicting passions, to a manly and pathetic appeal to her feelings, from the prime minister,—she addresses the bridegroom, whom she dispatches as her ambassador to Denmark; bidding him depart immediately, and remember that he has friends in Sweden, who will watch over his fortunes. This speech is uttered with a suppressed emotion that at once shows the strength of her feelings, and her endeavour to preserve the dignity of her station. As Nature taught her, Mademoiselle Leontine suffered the woman rather to predominate over the Queen, but it was only by the unconquerable failure of the voice, which modified the tones, and compelled her frequently to hesitate, while she endeavoured to gain the mastery of them. Her last action is to return to the prime minister, the order, of which, in her anger, she had deprived him,—with these simple and eloquent words,—"Etes vous content?" There was in the expression of these few words, such an union of regret for her former harshness to her old friend, mingled with the consciousness that she had acted nobly, under trying circumstances, that the whole audience, after one moment's pause, broke forth into one—nay, into repeated bursts of applause. I actually began to doubt whether they did not mean to encore the piece; but I presume the persevering plaudits that seemed continually to gain new vigour after fainting, were intended to bring the actress forward. She did not, however, appear; she was to act in the next piece, and was probably dressing for it. At the conclusion of that piece, La Seconde Année; ou, A Qui La Faute?—though admirably acted, the enthusiasm of the audience was not called forth in so striking a manner. I do not think Paulin appeared to advantage in Edmonde. Denville would have suited him better, but ALFRED acts this part so well, that it would be an injustice to take it from him. It is surprising how this actor and Mademoiselle St ANGE have improved since they first played in London! I have neither space nor inclination to say much of M. BRUNET. I believe last night was his last, and perhaps it would be unjust to speak from one performance; but I own to you, Mr TATLER, that to me his chief merit appeared to lie in the extraordinary manner in which he could feign death, and preserve the appearance of total inanimation, in the various positions in which he is placed, in the "Habitans des Landes." And I can scarcely think this a great or a pleasing accomplishment. Hoping that your health will allow you to see Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY before she leaves us,

Digitized by Google

I remain, Mr TATLER, your sincerely,

A. A.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Sinclair. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Arnold, Mr Cathie.

Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr T. Blanchard. Sanballat, Mr Howell.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, The Emissary; with Comfortable Lodgings; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, to be called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Ward. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Johnson.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Ward. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr G. Mears. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Waldor, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (In France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Shegog.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Wills.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Watson.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

BERTRAND ET SUZETTE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. SCRIBE.
Suzette, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Pinchon, Mlle. St. Ange.
M. de Brémont, M. St. Aubert. Edouard, M. Alfred.
Bertrand, M. Pelissié. Pinchon, M. Laporte.

Suivi de

VALERIE: OU, LA JEUNE AVEUGLE.

Comédie en Trois Actes, du Théâtre Français de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Valérie, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Caroline de Blumfeld, Mlle. St. Ange.
Ernest, M. Pelissié. Henry Milner, M. Alfred. Ambroise, M. Laporte.

On finira par

LA DEMOISELLE A MARIER.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Camille, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Dumesnil, Mme. Préval.
M. Dumesnil, M. Cloup. Alphonse de Laceval, M. Alfred.
Ducoudrai, M. Gamard. Baptiste, M. Guenée.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—

'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—

Madame Pompeydour; Lord Phibbis Crachstone; Signor Tommaso Jackassini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, founded on SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

KING RICHARD III.

Queen, Miss M. C. Poole. Lady Anne, Miss Scott. Duchess of York, Madame Simon.
King Henry VI., Mr Gough. Prince of Wales, Miss Ellis.
Duke of York, Master Frank Carbery. Duke of Buckingham, Mr Honner.
Richard, Duke of Gloucester, Mr Osbaldiston.
Duke of Norfolk, Mr Maitland. Tressel, Mr C. Hill.
Earl of Richmond, Mr D. Pitt. Earl of Oxford, Mr Ransford.
Lord Stanley, Mr Almar. Lord Mayor, Mr Webb.
Sir William Catesby, Mr Rogers. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr Lee.
Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr Asbury. Sir William Brandon, Mr Tully.
Sir James Tyrrel, Mr Hobbs. Sir James Blunt, Mr Collier.

The Highland Reel (in Character) by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with the admired Melodrama of

THE MILLER AND HIS MEN.

[By Mr POCOCK.]

Ravina, Miss M. C. Poole. Claudine, Miss Vincent. Lauretta, Miss Jordan.
Grindoff, Mr D. Pitt. Count Frederic Friberg, Mr Honner.
Lothair, Mr C. Hill. Karl, Mr Vale. Krauts, Miss Barker.
Kelmar, Mr Gough. Zingra, Mr Ransford. Riber, Mr Asbury.
Golotz, Mr Lee. Spado, Mr Jones. Sanguino, Mr White.
Spalatro, Mr Boulanger. Schampt, Mr Fone. Michello, Mr Tully.
Margio, Mr Webb. Rolpho, Mr Allcroft. Maurice, Mr Young.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtzdorf, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Vernon.
Count of Lissdorf, Mr Tilbury. Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Augustus, Mr Bennett. Boltzheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassecarompdorf, Mr J. Russell.

Immediately after the Farcetta, the Curtain will rise to

A GRAND CONCERT ON THE STAGE.

Immediately after the Concert, the admired Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

DELUSIONS.

[By Mr BARNARD.]

Ellen Mowbray, Miss Stohwasser. Mary, Miss Wells.
Mrs Jenkins, Mrs Garrick. Frank, Mr Marshall. Charles Easton, Mr Green.

At the End of the Comedietta, 'True Courage,' (Dibdin) by Mr J. Russell.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Vernon. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Pansa, Mr Green.

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

Mrs Pimpernel, Miss Glover.
Mr Theophilus Bunbury, Mr Marshall. And Mr Alexis Twisselton, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Stud of Burmese Ponies—Lilliputian Countess—Master H. Cooke's Riding Act—Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

PAVILION THEATRE.—Black-Eyed Susan—Performances of Michel Boai—Fifteen years of a British Seaman's Life.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Cupid and the Classics—The Miser Outwitted—Raymond and Agnes.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine st., Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL. Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office
12 Chancery lane, and in Wine Office Court, Fleet street.

Nº 219.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MAY 17, 1831.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S MAGAZINE.

We remember no Magazine, the first numbers of which have pleased us so much as those of the present. And the reasons are clear enough. It is the most unfettered in its opinions we have yet met with, and the writers appear to be more in earnest. The number for April we had in our hands but for a short time; and can only say from recollection, that we were pleased with the vivacity of the outset, and the Rambles in the Footsteps of Don Quixote. The second number, if we mistake not, is superior to the first; but before we speak more particularly of it, we must not forget to observe, that what gave us a highly favourable idea of the work, and spoke volumes in its favour before we read a word of it, was the engraving of De Foe's head on the wrapper. There appeared to us a very unequivocal honesty in this; the more so, as De Foe, however celebrated as the author of 'Robinson Crusoe,' was never admitted into 'the circles;' and therefore, in setting him up as the symbol of their political honesty, and their determination to abide by it, the writers began by waiving that kind of dandyism in literature, and that dependence upon the good word of the frivolous, which, in the very best of their brethren not capable of so doing, argues but a half-strength and a half-sincerity. There is the more grace in it, because De Foe was not an educated man, at least not a scholar; and there seems to be no want, among the writers of the 'Englishman,' either of scholarship or 'good birth.' To be content to be thus introduced into company by a mere man of genius and worth—argued, we thought, a strain of spirit, aye, and of gentility, far higher than common. We looked at De Foe's resolute face (the same that was advertised by the Jacobite government), and being fresh from the perusal of his 'Memoirs' by Walter Wilson, said to ourselves, 'Thou wert an honest fellow; and we'll be sworn those who come with thee are of the right heart.'

Besides this earnest of its being in earnest, the Magazine has hitherto presented us with an engraving of a scene in Italy, and is to do so (if we remember the Prospectus), for some time, as a series of illustrations of that beautiful country. Fault has been found with this, as being something foreign to the work. Foreign it is (Punicè); but it is an Englishman's business now-a-days to consider nothing foreign to his notice that concerns the good or pleasure of mankind, and the diffusion of knowledge. For our parts, we are particularly pleased with this notion of a series of Italian views. It agreeably varies the track of thought, and shews that the writers, besides being sturdy Britons, are cultivators of the graces. We accordingly hailed, in the first number, our old friends the Italian peasants, dancing, as we hope English peasants will dance some day, con permesso, in the Villa of a great Signor; and by the favour of the second number, we have already taken several walks with those ladies and gentlemen who are expatiating in the gardens of the Villa d'Este at Tivoli. Those cypress trees (poplars with the levity taken out of them, and a solemn grandeur superadded)—we sit within their dark girdle, and hear the plashing of the fountain. Those pine-trees,—we see how auburn their tops will be in the setting sun.

Another engraving in the second number is a Map of the progress of Indian Cholera. Fault has been found with the introduction of articles on this disease. But if a magazine is to notice contemporaneous events, especially such as concern the general welfare, it appears to us that nothing could be more proper than an account of this tremendous stranger, which has awed a considerable part of the east, and brought his deadly shadow to the door of Europe. Government have thought proper to take precautions against it, and we know that on such occasions, governments are not apt to move for nothing. The map points out the different places at which it has successively made its appearance, since the year 1817. We confess we inspected it with no ordinary interest. It looks as if death had descended on the earth visibly, and mankind were tracking his steps. It makes one fancy that the old fable of Gog and Magog, was the history of a disease; or that the dreadful stranger was coming, designated to an acquaintance of ours by a poor woman, by a name not unlike in sound to those frightful cognomina. "What has come to your poor child?" said the gentleman. "Oh, Sir," said she, "the Doctor tells me it's the Hawcus Mawcus." This turned out to be nothing less than the subject of our present remarks. Gog and Magog, who in spite of their gigantic incarnations in Guildhall, are described as having been a swarm of little men, have been sometimes explained to mean a visitation of locusts. The Cholera Morbus made its first appearance at Moscow, under the guidance of "dense masses of small green flies, which in Asia are the forerunners of pestilence." Now Pope or Gay, we know not which, has evidently foretold the Hawcus Mawcus, in his account of the Hawcubites, who he says are the same as the Mohawks, and he concludes that these Mohawks and Hawcubites are Gog and Magog. In the confidence that Government is taking care of us, and with the same sensations with which little children "snatch a fearful joy" before the den of a lion locked up, we have therefore suffered ourselves to diverge into this learned speculation.* To return to our gravity, the article in the Englishman's Magazine contains a frightful specimen of the progress of the disease to a termination, in the case of a gentleman at Calcutta. The following are specimens of the account of its travels and ravages:—

'Epidemic cholera has in general rigidly followed the great highways of human intercourse. Pursuing the line of navigable waters, and the route of caravans, it entered or traversed the different countries. Through India it extended along the rivers Ganges, Hooghley, Jumna, and Nerbudda. Arabia, Persia, and Syria were penetrated by the Persian Gulf, the Tigris, and the Euphrates. Moscow received the disease by the route of the Volga. China, other parts of Eastern Asia, and the various islands, were infected over sea, as appears from the cholera making its earliest ravages in the port towns and maritime districts. Agreeing with the disposition of contagious diseases, the cholera has been most virulent wherever human beings were numerous and concentrated,—in densely peopled cities, in armies encamped, or upon the march, in localities unfavourable to free ventilation,—as low sheltered grounds, narrow streets, close dirty houses. The slow rate of progression at which the epidemic advanced from place to place in succession, and the temporary halts which it occasionally made, perfectly agree with a contagious origin; but they cannot be reconciled to an atmospheric. It travels, on an average, at a rate varying between ten and eighteen miles a day. But often, in particular instances, much less. Within the Zillah of Nellore, it proceeded thirty-two miles in twelve days, in the next twenty-seven days, eighty miles.'—P. 157.

* * * * *

'It is calculated that four millions of the natives of India have been swept away by this scourge since 1817. A share of the mortality, however, may be fairly attributed to partial or total want, in a multitude of instances, of medical assistance. In one district, the population of which is about 200,000 souls, the cases of cholera amounted to 15,945; of these, 1294 had been without medicine or medical aid, and there is reason to believe, that of the number, every individual perished. When proper remedial means could be supplied at an early period, and their use continued, the result was gratifying to the friends of humanity, and creditable to the profession, if the intractable nature of the malady be taken into account. The Madras army consisted of 83,336 men, European and native. During 1818, and the four succeeding years, there died 5¼ per cent. of the whole force, or 23¾ per cent. of those who had been attacked by the epidemic.

'The laws of cholera bear the impress of that presiding Intelligence who has described a circle, beyond which every species of physical evil must cease to mar the harmony of life. Were the disease to continue its ravages in the same place uninterruptedly for a series of years, it would depopulate the world. Few localities

* See an admirable banter on the Prophecies of the Almanacs, in one of the miscellaneous volumes of Swift, written by his friends. It is entitled "A Wonderful Prophecy taken from the mouth of the Spirit of a Person, who was barbarously slain by the Mohawks" (the bucks and street-bullies of those times); "proving also that the said Mohawks and Hawcubites, are the Gog and Magog mentioned in the Revelations." It is most likely by Gay. Among his poems, are some verses on the Mohawks, exquisitely ludicrous.

Digitized by Google

have suffered longer than four or six weeks at a time, under the worst form of the distemper, and to this succeed long intervals of safety more or less complete. It does not, moreover, promise to be a plague that will descend a miserable inheritance to many generations. Some countries, formerly afflicted, are even now returning thanks for permanent relief; and in most the destroyer has relaxed its severity. Wherever it may next direct its course, the principal danger is to be apprehended. May its footsteps be averted from the dwellings of the poor in Great Britain and Ireland!'

If we have been surprised to hear an objection made to this article, it seems still more unaccountable that any should have been made to the excellent one on the "Slavery Question," a question of the greatest importance, the discussion of which is most becoming to the character of an Englishman, and has been just this moment revived by a seasonable advantage taken of the question of Reform. The article traces the history of the question, and of the noble Society that first organized themselves in its behalf;—we ought rather to say the divine-minded Society; for noble is a term of equivocal import. It is due to the honesty of the drawer-up of it, and of the author upon whom he has drawn, to say, that he speaks of having availed himself freely of a pamphlet published in January last, at the Cape of Good Hope, entitled "Considerations on the Exact Position of the Slave Question, by Thomas Miller, Esq." Good God! What have such wretched coteries as the Boroughmongers to hope for, when the interests of mankind are advocated by means of the Press, at the southern extremity of Africa!

The pleasant article on the same subject, entitled "Black and White," which supposes the Blacks uppermost in the world, and the Whites their slaves, very well turns the tables upon the West Indian Interest. The argument with which the "Interest" begins and ends, to wit, that there is a "Divine Providence" in these matters, a "Will of Heaven," is easily answered in the style of Zeno's slave, who, when he appealed to his master's doctrine of fatality, and said he could not help stealing, was allowed to have made a valid remark, "but then," answered Zeno, "neither can I help flogging you for it!" The Divine Providence may for its inscrutable purposes suffer the Rev. Mr Bridges of Jamaica; but it surely would be rash to argue, that the abolition of the power of Bridges would not be equally providential. For our parts, we can freely suppose that all the past events of the world, and even the miseries combined with them may have been necessary to the amount of final good; but this opinion does not give us the less right to suppose, that the moment good and wise men rise up in opposition to a misery, the time is come that it ought to cease. Who shall say, that their voice is not the Divine signal for its destruction?

We have not read all the articles in this second number of the Englishman's Magazine, but what we have read we like very much, with the exception of the banter on an article which appeared in the Spectator, entitled "Trustees of the Nation." We grant that the Spectator's talk of its being "the best Family Newspaper" is a cant; but the article in question appeared to us to unite much that was personally interesting, with what was undoubtedly interesting to the public at a moment like the present; and we can bear our testimony, in many respects, to the soundness of its recommendations. It is true, it was superfluous to mention the names of several of the parties,—that of Sir John Swinburne for instance, who was one of the Society of Friends of the People that mooted the Question of Reform, as proposed by Lord Grey, and is as distinguished for his public as beloved for his private beneficence. But if there was any mistake in the article, this surely was it; for it is a strange doctrine to us, and unworthy of being put forth in De Foe's Englishman, that the names of other excellent men should not have been brought forward, because they were obscure. De Foe was obscure for a long while, yet he was not the less a desirable coadjutor to the freemen of his time; and it would have been well for the cause of liberty, had his worth and abilities been made better known.

One of the articles that has pleased us most in this Magazine is the Rambles in the Footsteps of Don Quixote. La Mancha, it seems, is a poor district. It has produced however Don Quixote, and all the world make pilgrimages to it in imagination, if they have not the luck, like the Rambler, to see it personally. A man of genius descends like an angel upon the barrenest spot of earth, and laying his hand upon it, says, "Let this be different hereafter.' We need not tell the readers of Don Quixote, that the gallant Knight, who has interested us so much, is a more real person than the myriads of men, whom we never think about; and that any illustration of a fact in his history hig ly concerns us.

'As we entered Puerto Lapiche,' says the writer, 'I noticed that all the women of the lower orders wore the skirts of their petticoats thrown over their heads; this is the universal custom in La Mancha, the mantilla being used only by the upper classes: it explains a passage in Don Quixote, which would otherwise be obscure. Sancho, when upon one occasion he returns home, endeavours to persuade his wife Theresa, to accept with a good grace the honours in store for her, when he shall have obtained the government of the island: he tells her how great a lady she will then be, and that she must make up her mind to the transformation. But Theresa replies, 'Neither will I put it in the power of those who see me dressed like a countess or governor's lady, to say, "Mind Mrs Pork-feeder, how proud she looks! it was but yesterday she toiled hard at the distaff; and went to mass with the tail of her own gown about her head, instead of a veil."'

At the beginning of the number, there are some pretty verses to May; and a certain Pilgrimage to Glen Ora, in a style of which the enthusiasm does not seem to be as much in earnest in some parts as the others. But there is some striking natural painting in it, and the story affected us.

The scenes in Poland are spirited and interesting; and there is an account of the extraordinary School of St Simon, which has interested us so much, that we must make a separate article of it to-morrow. We must not omit to mention 'Bird-Nesting' by a Field-Naturalist,—a mode of pursuing the sport which we can heartily recommend to our readers, whether young or old, since it appears to leave the birds where it finds them, and only brings away the most pleasing descriptions of their nidification and manners.

The new Magazine 'reports progress,' as it ought to do, on the Reform Question; and is altogether to be distinguished from its contemporaries, by the independence and fervour of its tone. We doubt, however, whether those who like it best will not require more theatricals in it. We pardon its mention of this our painstaking, and most play-going TATLER, in a list of publications, which, however respectable, are devoted, we believe, to mere compilation.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

WANT OF 'THE BALLOT.'—A lady, who had for the last two years received her rent ten pounds short, wrote to her tenant that if he would vote for her friend, the same reduction should be made at the end of the present year, but if he refused to do so, the full rent and all arrears would be insisted upon!

VICAR OF BRAY.—The celebrated Vicar of Bray was Simon Symonds, who held that benefice during the reigns of four successive monarchs. Twice a Protestant and twice a Papist, he had always governed himself by what he thought a very laudable principle, which was, never on any terms to part with his vicarage.

AN HONEST MAN.—An anecdote is given from 'Oldfield's History of Boroughs,' of a Mr Taylor, of the Isle of Wight. The object was to change the influence under which the voters acted. The corporation was exactly divided, and the deciding vote was in Mr Taylor, who held back. Two thousand pounds were offered for his vote by the party he was inclined to favour. He rejected the bribe, and because of the insult implied in such an offer, he determined to give his vote to the opposite party. They attempted to bribe him with a still higher sum; and finding, as he said, that both parties were seeking illegally an object of ambition, he laid down his gown, and declined voting for either.

THE GREAT CORRAL OF SEVILLE.—As I am here giving a list of the objects best worthy the traveller's notice, let me add that among them the great Corrall ought not to be omitted, as it is really a curiosity. It is a building inhabited by the very lowest classes; the form of its construction being quadrangular, with a large court-yard, from which successive flights of open galleries rise one above the other, to the top of the building, along which are ranged the doors of the innumerable small apartments, each of which is inhabited by a family. The one which I visited at Seville contained, as I was informed, 368 families, being the population of a small town crowded into this confined spot. There was a good deal of activity and industry visible; the only idle persons being the few men visible, the other sex being busily engaged in washing. The sight was altogether very singular, the court-yard being literally quite crowded with some hundreds of young and old women, mules, and scores of children, many of them by no means infants, and who were moving about without a rag on. On looking at the old ladies, I was almost induced to alter my opinion of the beauty of the Andalusian women, for I never saw a scantier display of charms. On leaving the place, these poor people, who seemed happy and contented, pressed me to see their small altar, which was on one side of the entrance door, and, unlocking a kind of closet, brought out for my inspection, a large doll, miserably dressed out with flowers and tawdry-like finery, and intended to represent the Virgin. For the sight of this, they received with gratitude a small sum which I dropped into the poor-box.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. Vol. I, pp. 58, 59.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Bertrand et Suzette—Valerie—Le Demoiselle à Marier.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—Timour the Tartar.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE great, or to use an unequivocal term, the large theatres., which every now and then exhibit a strong tendency to fulfil the lot for which they are destined, and become houses of spectacle, have suddenly announced their intention of making some grand assaults upon us in that way, with horse as well as foot. Drury Lane has revived Timour the Tartar (of which we shall give an account to-morrow); and Covent Garden, following in military as in naval respects the example set them by the stirring minors, produced last night a very singular kind of drama, in seven acts, called, 'Napoleon Bonaparte, Captain of Artillery, General, First Consul, Emperor, and Exile.'

This title, and the qualification of 'Historical Spectacle,' explain the nature of the piece, which consists of a rapid sketch of Bonaparte's rise, power, and downfall; or rather of some leading points, sufficient to indicate those events. The first act presents us, for instance, with his conduct at the siege of Toulon, as Captain of Artillery; the second, with his passage of Mount St Bernard, as General of the Army of Italy; the third, his behaviour at Vienna after the battle of Austerlitz; the fourth, his attempt to rally against the Allied Forces in France; the fifth, his taking leave of his guard at Fontainebleau; sixth, the dream of a woman, who sees the principal events of his life in a series of visions; and seventh, his exile and death at St Helena. Politics are ingeniously and almost entirely excluded: there is not a word of the battle of Waterloo:—yes, the word itself was once uttered, and a dead silence ensued, but nothing was founded on it. We missed the first act; but in all the rest, not a syllable did we hear in allusion to politics, but twice; and one of these could hardly be called such. It was where Napoleon, after defeating the Emperor Francis, and while he was lodging in the palace at Schoenbrunn is asked by one of his ministers,—

'Will your Majesty be pleased to receive an envoy from the Emperor of Austria?'

Napol. (hastily). 'Let him wait.'

The audience enjoyed this nihilification of an Allied Monarch extremely. The other allusion, however, was the thing. His exile to St Helena was designated a 'cruel policy;' and indeed the whole of the last act went to shew it one. The words were received with loud approbation. A few hisses mixed in; but they were drowned with reiterated applause.

We expected to be disappointed in WARDE's personation of Napoleon. We could not contrive to associate the two ideas. But he disappointed us agreeably, especially in the latter part of the piece, when he grew fatter and staider. In the others, out of a desire to present us with a literal portrait, we cannot help thinking he must have exaggerated the restlessness and abruptness of Bonaparte's movements. It is with difficulty we can suppose so great a man to have been so eternally on the fidget. At intervals the effect was excellent, and received its due applause. We had everything ad vivum,—the short and hasty though firm step, the snuff-taking, the clasping the hands behind the back, &c. And Mr WARDE succeeded for the most part in modulating his voice into something lighter and more various than it is in general. The likeness improved as the scenes advanced. From the commencement of Bonaparte's downfall and corpulence (for they seem to have gone together) the illusion would sometimes have almost been complete, had the actor been shorter: and even his greater height was hardly in the way. The corpulence, the wide shaven side of the face, and the little hat, were exact to the portraits; and the white breeches and jack boots finished the resemblance. The hearts of the audience could not help opening to the man thus brought so vividly before them, and they repeatedly expressed their sympathy and admiration. Some of the scenes assisted the portraiture. In going over the Alps, the actor mounted a real horse, a very beautiful one; and riding it up an ascent, presented us with the famous portrait by David. Sometimes he stood with his back toward the spectators, reviewing his soldiers with his arms folded; sometimes wrote a dispatch on a drum-head, &c. The Alpine scenery is very fine: so was the burning of Moscow, in one of the scenes of the vision; and several others. The only fault of the piece was one which will doubtless be remedied in the performance of this evening, but which gave occasion to an opposition, which we suspect would not otherwise have ventured to shew itself. This was the length of the last act. Bonaparte is kept too long at St Helena, and in a dying state, considering the rapidity and energetic interest of the rest of the scenes; and there is an adventure, a fanciful one to the best of our remembrance, of a pretended seaman who attempts his rescue and induces him to resume his sword and talk of succeeding or perishing; a melo-dramatic incident which did the piece no good. We think also, that instead of making a sort of prefatory death in his chair, and being fairly put to bed after it before the spectators, to make another, his dying scene ought to present him in bed at once, if bed there must be. We doubt whether it is not a little too real. There is too much also about the attempt of the German student to assassinate himself, especially, if we are not much mistaken, as the event is misrepresented, and Bonaparte made to pardon the youth. Bonaparte could pardon well enough, as the Polignacs know; but surely in this instance the event was otherwise.

We were strongly impressed, during the performance, with the reasonableness of accompanying spectacles of this nature with music. Music acts the part of the ideal, which throws a grace over splendid actions, and the contemplation of great characters. It represents also, as it were, the bloom of our own admiration, and keeps us in a tone to admire, aloof from our common-places. Finally, in a piece like the present, it sounds as if an everlasting march of victory were going forward.

One of the most curious things was to see British soldiers performing the characters of French,—doubtless too with all due respect for their gallant enemies, now enemies too no longer. There are no real enemies in the world but Boroughmongers (whatever be their denomination) and those who would see justice done to their fellow-creatures.

The piece, greatly owing to the circumstance we have mentioned, was opposed a good deal at the end, but the applause unquestionably and highly predominated. There was a call for WARDE, and a great waving of hats in the pit; nor have we any doubt that the performance will have a run; but the last act must be materially shortened.

Upon the whole, we look upon the production and good reception of this piece as a curious sign of the times, and a great credit to them. Studiously as politics were for the most part avoided, you could plainly gather from the conduct of the audience, that the Holy Allies are looked upon in a very different light from that in which they were regarded during their visit to this country. If Sir Hudson Lowe had been in one of the boxes, he would have made but a short stay of it. The Castlereagh times are evidently clean gone out of favour, to the very last spark. It was plainly enough signified last night, that the audience had no sort of respect for legitimate despots of any sort, or for any of their footmen, high or low. Justice was done to King William, at the end of the piece, by a call for 'God Save the King;' and justice was done, during the piece, to what was really admirable, or pardonable, or pitiable, in the life and adventures of the wonderful man who was the subject it,—with this special memento by the way,—that when somebody in the dialogue said, that if he had fought for liberty always as he did at first, he would never have been conquered, there was an enthusiastic reception of this sentiment;—a circumstance which completed the interest of the performance, which shewed that the audience took it all in the right light, and made us look round upon the faces of our countrymen with respect and joy.

☞

Digitized by Google

— Nothing is so intolerable to Superstition as a rival absurdity.— Forster on the Atmosphere.

SAINTS IN DISGRACE.—In old almanacks, St Paul's day is mentioned as a very critical one. If the weather was clear on that day, the peasants expected a fruitful year. Schenck, in his 'Treatise on Images,' says that in Germany they used to drag St Paul and St Urban in effigy through the streets, down to the rivers, if their respective feasts happened to occur in foul weather. It is well known that many of the saints who have been devoutly worshipped by the ignorant, when their aid was required, have been threatened, and even knocked down and beaten, if that aid was not granted, or was thought too slow in coming.

CURIOUS PROFESSION OF FAITH.—The salvation of Catholics and Protestants being discussed in a company, of which Kneller was one, he rose, and said, "I think God is merciful, and at the last day will say to the Protestants, You go to that part of heaven, and to the Catholics, You go to that,—then, turning to me, he will say, But you, Sir Godfrey Kneller, are at liberty to go wherever you please."—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

CELSUS ON PHYSICAL CONDUCT.—The direction of Celsus, who was not only a learned physician, but a wise man, is not to be omitted: who adviseth interchanging, and alternation of the diet, but still with an inclination to the more benign. As that a man should sometimes accustom himself to watching, sometimes to sleep; but to sleep oftenest; again that he should sometimes give himself to fasting, sometimes to feasting; but to feasting oftenest: that he should sometimes enure himself to great labours of the mind, sometimes to relaxations of the same; but to relaxation oftenest. Certainly, this is without all question; that diet, well ordered, bears the greatest part in the prolongation of life. Neither did I ever meet an extreme long-lived man, but being asked of his course, he observed something peculiar: some one thing, some another. I remember an old man, above a hundred years of age, who was produced as a witness, touching an ancient prescription. When he had finished his testimony, the Judge familiarly asked him, "How he came to live so long?" He answered beside expectation, and not without the laughter of the hearers; "By eating before I was hungry, and drinking before I was dry."—Lord Bacon's Natural History of Life and Death.—[Bacon has repeated the above instructions in one of his essays. The old proverb says; "Every man is a physician at 40;" and it was the usual expression of Tiberius, that, "He was a fool, who after 30 years of age took advice of a physician." General rules of conduct may be laid down, and in the majority of cases with success; but every one who desires to attain an unburthened maturity of years, must narrowly observe his own temperament of body, for no one is without some peculiarity of conformation, and that should not be perplexed or thwarted.] C.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two Children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

Between the Acts,

A FAVORITE DIVERTISSEMENT.

Principal Dancers: Mlle. Taglioni, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Brocard, M. Emile, and M. Lefebvre.

After the Opera will be presented the Second Act of

GUILLAUME TELL.

In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance the Tyrollienne.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Grand Opera, entitled

THE EMISSARY; OR, THE REVOLT OF MOSCOW.

[By G. DANCE.]

The Music chiefly selected from the Opera of 'Le Colporteur' of Onslow. The whole adapted (with additional Music) by Barham Livius.

Lisinka, Miss Pearson. Mina, Miss Bruce. Katherine, Mrs Broad.
Alexis, Mr Sinclair. Oscar, Mr T. Cooke.
Lovinski, Mr Horn. Orloff, Mr Phillips. Knoutzki, Mr Bedford.
Stephanoff, Mr Latham. Koli, Mr Harley.

In the course of the Evening, Onslow's Overture to 'Le Colporteur;' Auber's Overture to 'Leocadie;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortes.'

After which,

COMFORTABLE LODGINGS.

Antoinette, Miss Chikini. Madame Pelagie Bonassus, Mrs C. Jones.
Sir Hippington Miff, Mr Liston. Captain Bonassus, Mr W. Bennett.
Bombardier Babillard, Mr Tayleure. Rigmarole, Mr Harley.
Monsieur de Caché, Mr Andrews. Roué, Mr Webster.
Durville, Mr Hooper. Gregory, Mr Hughes.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett,
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, The Legion of Honour; Turning the Tables; The Illustrious Stranger; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, to be called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Johnson.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr G. Mears. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stappe, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Bellhard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Shegog.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgand, Mr Wills.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Watson.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of

THE STRANGER.

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. Poole. Countess Winterstein, Miss Scott.
Charlotte, Mrs Vale. Savoyard, Miss Somerville, with the original Ballad, 'I have a silent sorrow here.'
The Stranger, Mr Osbaldiston. Count Winterstein, Mr Honner. Peter, Mr Vale
Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Solomon, Mr Williams. Francis, Mr C. Hill.
Tobias, Mr Gough. The Count's Son, Master F. Carbery.
The Stranger's Children, Misses Clark and E. Clarke.

After which an entirely New Petite Drama, entitled

CHARLEY OVER THE WATER.

Mary Primrose, assuming the Character of The Right Hon. Miss Matilda Rosabella Florina Flitterflutter, Madame Simon.
Farmer Primrose, Mr Gough. Squire Scapegrace, Mr Maitland.
Launcelot Longface, Mr Asbury.
Charley Primrose, assuming the Characters of Paddy O'Whack, Archibald Malapropos, Fribble, Hercules Hannibal Sureshot, Mr C. Hill.

To conclude with a New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]
The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Mrs Vale. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Osbaldiston. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Executioner of Voorn—Basket Maker — Shocking Bad Hat—Bleeding Nun.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Catherine and Petruchio—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Man and the Marquis.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —The Stud of Burmese Ponies — Lilliputian Countess — Master H. Cooke's Riding Act— Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

PAVILION THEATRE. — Clarissa Harlowe — Who's to Have Him?—The Hut of the Burning Wood.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE.—Napoleon Buonaparte — Cupid and the Classics — The Miser Outwitted—Raymond and Agnes.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Picadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 220.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1831.

SCHOOL OF ST SIMON.

We proceed to extract the greater part of the interesting article on this subject, in the Englishman's Magazine; but it takes up so much room in our pages, and we are tempted to make so many remarks upon it, that we must reserve what we had to say for our to-morrow's Number:—

'Within these two years past, an entirely new system of political doctrines, embodied in the form of a religious creed, has been gaining ground so rapidly on the continent, especially in France, where it first had its birth, and has taken firm hold on the minds of so many reflecting men, that there can be little doubt it is destined to occupy a very conspicuous place in the intellectual, if not in the political history, of the nineteenth century.

* * * * *

'The founder of this school of political philosophy, the Count de St Simon, was born on the 17th of April 1760. In conformity with the custom generally prevalent among the French nobility, previous to the revolution, he was sent into the army at the age of seventeen, and the following year embarked with the French troops for America, where he served, during the greater part of the war, under Bouillé and Washington. He returned to France in time to witness the first outbreak of the revolution, but took no active part in the great struggle that ensued. In 1790, he had entered into a commercial partnership with another nobleman; and notwithstanding the circumstances of the times, or perhaps on account of them, the affairs of the firm went on so prosperously, that at the end of seven years, when a separation took place, St Simon's share of the profits amounted to a tolerably large fortune. This he resolved to devote to the fulfilment of the plans he had, even at that early period, conceived, for the amelioration of the condition and prospects of his fellow-beings. In pursuance of his benevolent object, he began in the first place by applying himself to the acquisition of the knowledge he considered necessary for its full and satisfactory accomplishment. For this purpose, he took up his residence opposite the Ecole Polytechnique, at Paris, and regulated his hospitality on such a scale, that during the three years he remained there, he never lacked the society of some of his neighbours, the professors over the way. From their conversation he gathered valuable assistance, in the course of his studies in mathematics and natural philosophy, with which, inasmuch as a part of his early education had been conducted under the superintendence of D'Alembert, it is to be supposed he was in some degree familiar beforehand. This achieved, his next step was to initiate himself into the mysteries of physiological science; and accordingly shifting his quarters to the immediate neighbourhood of the School of Medicine, he made companions of several of the most eminent of the professors in that institution. Soon after, the peace of Amiens gave him an opportunity of paying a short visit to England, and he subsequently travelled into Switzerland and Germany. It was not till he had thus devoted nearly ten years to the acquirement of a fund of scientific and practical knowledge, that he appeared before the world in the character of an author. His first publication was a work in two quarto volumes, bearing the title of 'An Introduction to the Scientific Labours of the Nineteenth Century,' which was printed at Paris in 1807. From this period, up to the time of his death, which occurred on the 19th of May 1825, he was constantly employed, either in maturing his ideas into a system, or in communicating them to the public. The catalogue alone of his works would go near to fill a page. But numerous as they are, and various as are the subjects on which they profess to treat, they are all conceived in the same spirit, all have equally in view the object to which every thought and every wish of this enthusiastic philanthropist were directed,—the amelioration of the condition of mankind. His last and most celebrated work, Le Nouveau Christianisme, was published but a very short time before his death.

'The laborious duties of the great task St Simon had imposed upon himself, were performed for the most part in the midst of poverty and distress. His fortune had been entirely exhausted in the course of his search after knowledge; and before he began to make a direct application of the mental stores he had laid up, his pecuniary means were reduced to a slender allowance, made him by his relations. Even this he rarely appropriated to his own personal use. He would often deprive himself of all but the bare necessaries of life, take no other food than a scanty pittance of bread and water, consume no fuel, nay, sell his very clothes, to provide for the expense of printing and distributing his works. He even went further than this. He laid aside the pride of rank, of station, of former independence. The coldness, the insolence, the rebuffs that await a man who makes frequent demands upon the purses of his acquaintance,—all this he consented to endure, rather than want the means of propagating opinions which he felt convinced were calculated to further the best interests of the human species. Once only his spirit rebelled against the indignities he was thus called on to put up with. Oppressed and worn down as he was with long privation and with physical suffering, the insults of the wealthy and the proud man's contumely added so keen a sting to the consciousness of his misery, that existence became insupportable to him, and in a moment of despair he raised his hand against his life. The ball, however, did not take mortal effect; and he afterwards found resources in his own mind to bear him up against the spurns and the contempts of the world. He died at length in poverty and in obscurity; his genius unappreciated, his motives mistaken or misrepresented, and his enthusiastic devotion to the principles he had discovered, ridiculed as the obstinacy of a crazy dreamer.

'But though such was the general impression as to the character of St Simon and his opinions, yet among the few disciples whom he had attached to his person and his doctrines, he had left as much enthusiasm for the common cause as had animated himself.

* * * * *

'The first direct attempt made by the Saint-Simonists, after the death of their master, to disseminate his doctrines, was the publication of a weekly periodical, under the title of Le Producteur.

* * * * *

'It was supported wholly by the gratuitous contributions of six of the most active disciples of the school; and so earnestly did they labour in furtherance of the object they had at heart, giving to it every moment they could snatch from their usual avocations, that, according to their own account, by the time their pecuniary fund was exhausted, and the refusal of their monied acquaintance to furnish a fresh one had reduced them to the necessity of discontinuing the publication, they had all injured their health by overexertion, in a degree that would have rendered a similar termination of their work in any case inevitable. Four volumes of it in all had been published. * * * * * In 1829 they, the leaders of the school, found it necessary to appeal once more to the press for correct explanation of their system, both because their followers had then become too numerous, and were scattered in too many places, to be in the way of oral instruction, and because, the system having taken too firm root to be shaken by mere sarcasm, their opponents had had recourse to misrepresentation; and had accused them of professing opinions which it was important to shew formed no part of their creed. A weekly paper, L'Organisateur, was therefore established, and it continues in organization at this moment. An exposition of the leading points of their doctrine, which had been orally communicated to a congregation of the school, was published during the same year. This work, an octavo of more than four hundred pages, speedily arrived at a second edition, and has since been followed by another. Besides all these efforts for the propagation of the Saint Simonean doctrine, several literary and political journals have also contributed more or less to the same object by occasional notices; and there is one daily paper of considerable repute, Le Globe, which professes to be the direct organ of the school, bearing emblazoned on it the title of Journal de la Doctrine de Saint Simon. The doctrine is also regularly preached and explained twice a week in Paris, and some of the principal towns of France. The number of the disciples increases daily; and they include many of the foreigners always to be found in Paris, who spare no pains to propagate their creed throughout Europe. England is not omitted in this zealous search after proselytes. We could name a dozen persons among our own private acquaintance, to whom copies of the two volumes mentioned have been sent from Paris in the name of the school.

* * * * *

'The fundamental principle on which the whole system of St Simon rests is, that the condition of the human race is susceptible of amelioration in an indefinite degree,—that it is, and always has been making, and will continue to make, nearer approaches to a state of absolute perfection. So far as regards the matter of future perfectibility, this doctrine is by no means new; but the peculiarity of St Simon's conception is, that we are warranted by the experience of the past, in pronouncing a future progression to such a state to be necessary and inevitable. He considers the whole human race as one collective being, subject to settled laws, by which it is governed with the same certainty and the same regularity as the material world. And as in physics, when from a multitude of observations of particular facts of phenomena, we find them to have succeeded one another in a constant and uniform order, we are justified in concluding that the same law or principle which has hitherto regulated this order, will continue to regulate it for the future; so, with regard to the human race, if experience gives us the certainty that its condition has undergone any regular series of changes, from this certainty we are authorised to deduce the inference, that changes will continue to take place in it, according to the same law or principle as that which has governed the series already accomplished. * * * * *

Digitized by Google

'This state of perfection, towards which the human race has hitherto been constantly approaching, and will constantly continue to approach in the same ratio, is one of association and community of interests among mankind. It is not pretended that the progress towards such a state of things has hitherto been uninterrupted and invariable. On the contrary, society has always presented two alternate phases, or has passed alternately through two distinct conditions, which may be termed the organic, and the critical. The organic is one in which men feel that their existence has a definite end and object; and towards the attainment of this, education, legislation, and all the other engines of the social machine direct their efforts. The character of such an epoch is decidedly religious. The critical æra is distinguished by characteristics of an opposite tendency. It is unsettled and irreligious, having in fact no other end to accomplish than to break up one organic state of society, and prepare the way for the foundation of another. Thus the time when polytheism flourished in full vigour was an organic epoch, and the æra of philosophy was the critical one which followed it, preparing mankind for entering a different organic condition, which was that of Christianity. Since the days of Luther, society has been placed in the critical condition; and appearances at present seem to indicate that the time is arrived, or at least is near at hand, for the foundation of a new organic period.

* * * * * * *

'History proves that not only antagonism, but also the direct exercise of power by one man over another, has shewn a constant tendency to decrease. For example, in the earliest and most imperfect stage of society, a prisoner taken in war was either actually devoured, as among the Anthropophagi, or at all events put to death by his captors. It was a great step towards perfection, when the custom of converting captives into slaves put an end to this practice. The next amelioration of the lot of humanity, was the institution of modified states of servitude, such as were introduced during the middle ages. At present, in the more civilized states of Europe, there exists no other direct exercise of power by one man over another, than that which takes place in the different relations of master and servant, or, in a word, that which derives its being from the unequal distribution of wealth. This state of things is to give place, in its turn, to a more improved condition of mankind, in which every one shall be rewarded according to his works. The necessary preliminary to the constitution of the social fabric, is the entire abolition of the privilege of inheritance.

'The impious prerogative, as the Saint Simonists term it, of idleness, or the privilege of living on the labour of others, being wholly done away with,—neither wealth nor poverty, neither high rank nor inferiority of station, being transmissable from father to son,—the amount of riches possessed by every individual will be the exact measure of his talents and industry. But, in order that the principle of rewards proportionate to merit be effectually acted upon, it is necessary that every one be placed in a situation wherein he, as well as the great association of which he is a member, may derive the greatest possible benefit from the peculiar capabilities nature has endowed him with. Now these capabilities are either physical or intellectual. The intellectual, however, are of two very distinct kinds, namely, those which have relation, or may be more advantageously applied, to reason, or what is the same thing, to science, and those to sentiment, or to the fine arts; including under the latter head poetry, fictitious literature, in short all that addresses itself to the imagination or the sympathies. All men, therefore, may be said to reason, to sympathise, or to act; and every man is in future to have his path in life allotted to him, according to his fitness for exerting himself with success, in any of the occupations comprehended in these great classifications of human industry. To call out and develope the peculiar faculties of every individual in the new association of mankind, will be the business of education; and after the first moral instruction, which will be common to all alike, each youth will have his place assigned him in one of the three classes of special or professional schools, according to the natural disposition he evinces either for reasoning, for sympathizing, or for acting. Legislation and government in general, will be regulated according to the same classification; that is, the legislators who will frame, and the judges who will administer, the special laws designed for each class of persons, will be themselves chosen from among that class. Laws will be simple, for they will be divested of that great element of complexity, the hereditary transmission of property. There will be a remunerative as well as a penal legislation, that is, encouragement and reward for virtue, as well as prohibition and punishment for vice.

'The universal association of mankind, thus foretold and provided for, would be incomplete, and indeed impossible, did there not also exist a perfect unanimity in devotion to one religious faith. This faith will form, to use the somewhat obscure expression of the Saint Simonian school, the synthesis of all the conceptions and all the modes of being, of humanity. It will therefore furnish the best if not the only means of government, and the whole frame of society will in fact be a religious institution.' * * *

'We will content ourselves with merely indicating that the priesthood is to be constituted with regard to the triple classification already mentioned; it is to consist of as many gradations as there are degrees of capability, the highest dignity and power belonging to one sovereign hierarch, whose spiritual and temporal authority will of course be as much greater than that of the Popes, as the priesthood generally is to have greater power than was ever pretended to, even by the clergy of the Church of Rome. The same reason which prevents us from entering into any details on this and other topics of more general interest, discussed in the two volumes before us, (namely, the brevity of space allotted to this article), must also be our excuse if we refrain at present from attempting a refutation of any of the numerous propositions contained in them, which are in our estimation partly or wholly erroneous. Whether true or false, they are maintained sometimes with strong and always with plausible arguments; it would therefore be equally unjust and useless, even should they appear absolutely ridiculous, to attack them merely with passing cavils, or sneers and raillery. Did our limits permit, we should desire nothing better than to grapple with some of the doctrines we dissent from; but since this for the present cannot be, we leave the whole untouched, recommending those who are fond of such reading as furnishes matter for thought and reflection, to set about the perusal of the two volumes.'

THE BITE OF THE TARANTULA.

Of the numerous superstitions prevalent in Calabria, few are more extraordinary than the popular delusion respecting the tarantula, a large spider common in the vicinity of Brindisi, of which the bite is supposed to infect its victims with an unconquerable passion for dancing. In the neighbourhood of Taranto, the peasants assert that the influence of the venom on the person bitten produces the same slow effect on the system as hydrophobia. A black spot is discernible round the part affected, and the patient becomes afflicted with languor, stupor, and melancholy, at which stage of the disorder, music being called in to the relief of the sufferers, they never fail to break out into a paroxysm of leaping and dancing, which usually terminates in a perfect cure. The paroxysm is immediately followed by a total muscular exhaustion, succeeded by temporary relief; and when the experiment has been repeated for several successive days, the sufferings of the patient are relieved. The spider itself is very rarely seen, but the symptoms of its venomous sting are very frequent. By other persons, the disorder called tarantismo is supposed to be produced by the bite of the common scorpion, which abounds in the fields of that country; while the more enlightened believe that the disorder is wilfully affected by the young women of the country; as a motive for diversion and festivity. The ceremonies observed in the cure of a tarantata form a recreation for the whole village in which the person resides. The friends and relations of the party being invited to assist in the superstitious rite, array themselves in their holiday clothes; and, on repairing to the appointed spot, they find a collection of the musicians of the country, who perform on this occasion the part of the physician. The patient, attired in white robes adorned with a variety of colored ribbons, interlaced with vine leaves and golden ornaments, is now led out upon a terrace, bearing in her hand a drawn sword. She assumes a pensive or distracted air, while the musicians try the effect of successive pieces of music, and different chords, upon her disordered nerves. At length one of these wild preludes appears to touch her feelings; and the tarantata rises and comes forward. It has been observed that minor keys, and slow or mournful pieces of music, generally produce the strongest effect in these instances. But when the attention of the patient is once engaged, the successful musician displays his further skill in the art, by gradually accelerating the measure, till it acquires the velocity of the pizzica, or that to which the tarantella, the national dance of the Calabrese, is usually performed. The patient, now excited to a paroxysm of her mysterious disorder, continues to dance to a succession of these animated tunes; occasionally selecting one of the spectators as her partner, and refreshing herself by sprinkling her own face with cold water, from a large vessel placed within her reach. During the intervals of her performance, the guests invited to witness the ceremony, amuse themselves by taking her place; and when at length, overcome by lassitude, the tarantata resolves to put an end to the exhibition of the day, she seizes the vessel of water, and pours the contents entirely on her own head; after which, she is conveyed by her friends to bed, and the remainder of the company sit down to supper. Several learned travellers in Calabria have expressed an opinion that these superstitious practices are derived from the orgies used in the celebration of the worship of Bacchus, in times of antiquity; while many suppose that the tarantismo was originally confounded with St Vitus's dance;—San Vito being a saint especially revered and worshipped on the shores of the Bay of Taranto. A small town near Ostuni, and a cape and ruined monastery near Taranto, still bear his name; as well as a convent near Polignano. This disease or imposture is strictly confined to Calabria.—Historical Traveller. Vol. II.—[By this account, it would seem that dancing was the mode of cure resorted to, rather than that a passion for that exercise was the necessary result of the venomous bite. It appears that the patient must be excited by music, not that the exertion is a voluntary or an uncontrollable one. As a remedy it would be absurd to doubt its efficacy; and it is not unlikely that it might prove beneficial in other disorders of the nerves, than that produced by the bite of the tarantula.]

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THE DANGER OF PROSPERITY.—As long as the waters of persecution are upon the earth, so long we dwell in the ark; but where the land is dry, the dove itself will be tempted to a wandering course of life, and never to return to the house of her safety.—Jeremy Taylor.

PROMPT JUSTICE.—A cachief who had not long been accustomed to the government of the Viceroy, punished one of his own servants with death. He was called before Mahommed, who asked him by what authority he had committed this outrage. He thought it enough to urge in his defence that the man was his own servant. 'True,' retorted the pasha, 'but he was my subject;' and in the same breath, he passed sentence that the culprit should be immediately beheaded.—Egypt. Edinburgh Cabinet Library. Vol. III.

— The term Husting, or Hustings, as applied to the scaffold erected at elections, from which candidates address the electors, is derived from the Court of Husting, of Saxon origin, and the most ancient in the kingdom. Its name is a compound of hers and ding; the former implying a house, and the latter a thing, cause, suit, or plea; whereby 'tis manifest that husting imports a house or hall, wherein causes are heard and determined; which is farther evinced by the Saxon dingere, or thingere, an advocate, or lawyer. [Hus and thing (thong) a place enclosed, a building roped round.]—Atlas.

IDIOTS.—In detailing a recent case of the horrible murder of a child by an idiot, the Atlas makes the following sensible observations:—'Rich idiots are the wards of Chancery, and the most important legislation is now proceeding in their behalf. The idiot or maniac poor must commit crime before the law is called on to secure him, or must be the victim of guilt before it will protect him. Society and the individual call loudly for some national asylum for this unfortunate class—where their vices might be restrained, their slight capacities improved, their protection ensured, and the public secured from the not unfrequent outrage of the irresponsible. Might not the fortune of the wealthy idiot, useless to society, be taken to support his wretched brother?'

THE HORRORS OF WAR.—This day's march disclosed a horrible calamity. A large house, situated in an obscure part of the mountains, was discovered, filled with starving people. Above thirty women and children had sunk, and, sitting by the bodies, were fifteen or sixteen survivors, of whom one only was a man, but all so enfeebled as to be unable to eat the little food we had to offer them. The youngest had fallen first; all the children were dead; none were emaciated in the bodies; but the muscles of the face were invariably drawn transversely, giving the appearance of laughing, and presenting the most ghastly sight imaginable. The man seemed most eager for life; the women appeared patient and resigned, and, even in this distress, had arranged the bodies of those who first died, with decency and care.—Colonel Napier's History of the Peninsular War. Vol. III.

GARRICK AT DEVIZES.—Garrick was very much amused by the singularities of the father of Sir Thomas Lawrence, who was an innkeeper at Devizes. He and Mrs Garrick generally passed and repassed through that town once a year, and always stopped at Mr Lawrence's house. No sooner had the inkeeper brought forward his bill of fare, and given an account of the accommodation which he could afford them, than he always addressed Garrick in these words,—"Tommy, sir, has learned one or two speeches since you were here;" and he prevailed upon them to adjourn to a summer-house in the garden, to hear him recite them. Garrick, at this time, considered that the future walk in life of the boy was poised between the pencil and the stage, for he then showed talents for the former: fortunately, he directed his efforts to the pencil.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence, Vol. 1. pp. 53—54.

THE ANCIENT FUNERAL CEREMONIES OF EGYPT.—We shall confine ourselves to a single extract from Diodorus Siculus, relative to the funeral ceremonies which were observed in the days of the Pharaonic dynasty. He tells us that a talent of silver,—450*l.*—was sometimes expended in performing the last offices to a distinguished individual. The relatives of the deceased, says he, announce to the judges, and to all the connexions of the family, the time appointed for the ceremony, which includes the passage of the defunct over the lake or canal of the Nome to which he belonged. Two-and-forty judges are then collected, and arranged on a semi-circular bench, which is situated on the banks of the canal; the boat is prepared, and the pilot, who is called by the Egyptians Charon, is ready to perform his office; whence it is said that Orpheus borrowed the mythological character of this personage. But before the coffin is put into the boat, the law permits any one, who chooses, to bring forward his accusations against the dead person; and if it is proved that his life was criminal, the funeral rites are prohibited; while, on the other hand, if the charges are not substantiated, the accuser is subjected to a severe punishment. If there are no insinuations against the deceased, or if they have been satisfactorily repelled, the relations cease to give any further expression of their grief, and proceed to pronounce suitable encomiums on his good principles and humane actions, asserting that he is about to pass a happy eternity with the pious, in the regions of Hades. The body is then deposited in the catacomb prepared for it, with becoming solemnity.—Egypt. Edinburgh Cabinet Library. Vol. III.

HUMAN YEARNINGS.—It is not medicine, it is not broths and coarse meats, served up at a stated hour with all the hard formalities of a prison,—it is not the scanty dole of a bed to die on,—which a dying man requires from his species. Looks, attentions, consolations,—in a word, sympathies, are what a man most needs in this awful close of mortal sufferings. A kind look, a smile, a drop of cold water to the parched lip,—for these things a man shall bless you in death.—Charles Lamb's 'Rosamund Gray.'

THE WELCH CURATE AND HIS GOAT.—About two hundred years ago, Sir Philip, the curate of Aberystwith (for in the days of Popery all curates had that title of honour, as being the Pope's knights) had a he-goat which he had brought up from a kid, which slept in his chamber at night, and followed him wherever he went by day. When the goat attended his master to church, he was left in the porch, where, as he heard his voice, the animal remained contented. It was then the custom for the people to go directly from the church to the ale-house, as soon as the service was over; and the curate sometimes accompanied them. One day, the company forced the goat to drink so much ale as made him drunk, so that in passing over the bridge, on his return, he fell into the river, which so much intimidated him, that from that time he would never enter the ale-house.—Taylor's Cabinet of Curiosities.—[Many animals have this power of benefiting by experience. A somewhat similar accident happened to a parrot: the bird was very fond of port wine; upon one occasion it drunk too much, reeled and tumbled about, and shewed every symptom of intoxication. From that time the parrot would never taste wine. His fear of the consequence overcame his relish for it.]

THE EARLY PROMISE OF SIR T. LAWRENCE.—The Honourable Daines Barrington makes the following mention of young Lawrence in his 'Miscellanies:'—'As I have mentioned so many other proofs of early genius in children, I here cannot pass unnoticed a Master Lawrence, son of an innkeeper at Devizes, in Wiltshire. This boy is now (Feb. 1780) nearly ten years and a half old; but at the age of nine, without the most distant instruction from any one, he was capable of copying historical pictures in a masterly style, and also succeeded amazingly in compositions of his own, particularly that of 'Peter denying Christ.' In about seven minutes he scarcely ever failed of drawing a strong likeness of any person present, which had generally much freedom and grace, if the subject permitted. He is likewise an excellent reader of blank verse, and will immediately convince any one that he both understands and feels the striking passages of Milton and Shakspeare.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence, Vol. I, p. 65.—[The boyhood of Sir Thomas Lawrence, like that of the Young Roscius, seems to have given larger promise than his manhood could redeem. His biographer seems to measure his merits as an artist by the prices he received for his labours: rather a doubtful criterion, more especially as Sir Thomas was employed at Court.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea—A Favorite Divertissement.—Guillaume Tell.
DRURY-LANE.—The Emissary—Comfortable Lodgings—Timour the Tartar.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

DRURY LANE.

As a set-off to the attractions of the once excommunicated 'Corsican,' they have brought out here the revived spectacle of Timour the Tartar, and give us two other pieces besides! Thus we have three pieces at Drury Lane, to one at Covent Garden. It is a strong appeal to that side of our beloved countrymen's hearts, which love to have 'enough for their money.' What a pity, while the managers were about it, that they did not add a bit of cold dumpling a-piece for us, or a ticket for soup!

For our parts, we must protest against this substitution of quantity for quality, or rather this heaping dish upon dish, and keeping us up to surfeit upon a huge supper. Last night the performances were not over till half-past twelve, probably till nearer one. At Drury Lane, if we are not mistaken, they were over on Monday night at a quarter past eleven, and they must now (we conclude) be shorter. Now eleven is a very good hour to finish, in default of there being any hope of finishing at ten. The case is hard upon the critics, who have to notice the new pieces, and to wait to the last possible moment, in order to see what is said to them when the curtain has fallen. On Monday night, or morning rather, we were not home till three, and we shall have gone nigh to be as late on the occasion before us,—unless we cut our criticism very short. As people hum and sing tunes in their misery, it makes us parody the poet:

Digitized by Google

'Now came still morning on, and two o'clock
Had in its fast embraces all things held.
The audience at the theatres, and the watchmen,
These to their several homes, those to their box,
Had slunk,—all but the writer of critiques.
He all night long his 'article' pursued,
Sole, or responsive to damn'd author's fears.'

Che sarà sarà, quoth the Duke of Bedford's motto on the market-place;—What will be, will be.

Timour the Tartar will hardly divide the town with Napoleon Buonaparte, even by the help of the lumps of pudding. The story, which is well known to play-goers, is not without interest, and (if we may judge others by ourselves) the announcement of horses on a stage is no mean attraction. But there are two or three horses in the spectacle of Napoleon Buonaparte: he himself rides on a handsome one, cream-coloured or white; and it is with regret that we must confess our disappointment at the pye-balled stud of Mr COOKE, which is introduced at the other house. We prefer the common-coloured sumpter horses that climb the Alps with the 'Army of Italy.' Pye-balled horses always look to us unnatural; and Mr COOKE's stud, with their singular spots, and their peculiar training (contrived so as to suit the narrow circle of a stage) have the appearance (at least in our eyes) of a sort of live rocking-horses, or toy animals. They are no doubt ingeniously managed; but besides this artificial look, they are not very numerous, some half-dozen, we believe, rank and file, with one or two others for the leaders. There is however a white horse too, for one of the latter; and a very handsome black one, which we admired above all the rest. One of these performers had to be killed on the stage; but he did not seem disposed to be dead above a minute or so, till an acquaintance went and sat at his head, and persuaded him to be deceased. ☞

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]
The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

In the course of the Evening, A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles;' Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

After which, a Musical Piece, in Two Acts, called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Fatima, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Irza, Miss Faucit. Aboulifar, Mr Thompson. Arzan, Mr Bland.
Alibajou, Mr Webster. Bowbell, Mr Liston. Gimbo, Mr Harley.

To which will be added, a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Samballat, Mr Bartlett,
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, The Emissary; Popping the Question; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gosscon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Ledger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Rooney, Mr Power.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comedy of

THE HEIR AT LAW.

[By G. COLMAN.]

Lady Duberly, Madame Simon. Cicely Homespun, Miss Vincent.
Caroline, Miss Scott. Daniel Dowlas, Mr Williams. Dick Dowlas, Mr C. Hill.
Doctor Pangloss, Mr Elliston. Henry Moreland, Mr Horner.
Steadfast, Mr D. Pitt. Zekiel Homespun, Mr Vale. Kenrick, Mr Gough.
John, Mr Rogers. Waiter at Hotel, Mr Collier.
Waiter at Blue Boar, Mr Lee.

The Highland Fling, in Character, by Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which an entirely New Petite Drama, entitled

CHARLEY OVER THE WATER.

Mary Primrose, assuming the Character of The Right Hon. Miss Matilda Rosabella Florina Flitterflutter, Madame Simon.
Farmer Primrose, Mr Gough. Squire Scapegrace, Mr Maitland.
Launcelot Longface, Mr Asbury.
Charley Primrose, assuming the Characters of Paddy O'Whack, Archibald Malapropos, Fribble, Hercules Hannibal Sureshot, Mr C. Hill.

To conclude with an Historical Musical Drama, entitled

THE BEGGAR OF CRIPPLEGATE.

Marian, Miss Somerville, in which she will introduce 'Tell me my heart.'
Millicent, Miss Vincent. Mother Milldoll, Mrs Rogers. Alison, Miss Perry
Annot, Miss Nicol. Kate, Miss Rumens.
Henry VIII, Mr D. Pitt. Godfrey Osgood, Mr Gough.
Vincent Lorimer, Mr Honner. Sir Piers Maltravers, Mr Almar.
The Beggar of Cripplegate, Mr C. Hill. Barnaby, Mr Williams.
Cocke Lorell, Mr Vale. Father Ignatius, Mr Ransford. Fabian, Mr Asbury.
Valentine, Mr Rogers. Wynkin Cross-eye, Mr Webb. Ambrose, Mr Young.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Executioner of Voorn—Basket Maker—Shocking Bad Hat—Bleeding Nun.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Catherine and Petruchio—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Man and the Marquis.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Stud of Burmese Ponies—Lilliputian Countess—Master H. Cooke's Riding Act—Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

PAVILION THEATRE. — Clarissa Harlowe — Who's to Have Him?—The Hut of the Burning Wood.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Cupid and the Classics—The Miser Outwitted—Raymond and Agnes.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL. Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office

Nº 221.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1831.

We are obliged to postpone our remarks on the 'School of St Simon' till to-morrow, and to apologize to our readers for presenting them with two papers in succession, consisting of little but extracts. The passages extracted require, in themselves, no apology, nor should we say anything about the absence of remarks, too often, we fear, of minor interest, were it not that we are anxious to shew a proper sense of our duty, and that a correspondent, now and then, pays us the painful compliment of remonstrating against their non-appearance. We trust, that in the course of a few days, arrangements will have taken place, that will both prevent the necessity of these excuses in future, and be otherwise advantageous to our journal; and meantime, we must request the correspondents alluded to, to bear in mind the excuses already made, and attribute them to the same causes, of ill-health and late hours. It is much in us, if the truth were known, to go to the theatre at all at this moment, even though recovering from an illness; and our friend T. S. H. must be told, that of all men in this state of health, critics are those who may the most reasonably be allowed to be sleepy on Saturdays, even if it had been for something that made them yawn on the Monday. Furthermore, our lively correspondent (with whom we should be willing enough to 'blow the cloud' he speaks of, if our heads could bear to be smoked as much as his), must be informed, that we suffer ourselves to be doubted by nobody but Mr Molloy Westmacott and such worthies, who naturally enough do what they can to disbelieve others, out of an instinct of apology for their own falsehood.

A word more to Mr Westmacott. We did not hear of his reply, or rather non-reply, or non-pretence even of a reply, to our exposition of him, till yesterday; for we live at a distance from the town gossip, and no more think of taking in the Age, than we should of making a guest of the pot-boy. Mr Molloy Westmacott, with the lustre of nine beatings upon him (for we know of two, and conclude there must have been another seven) has the modesty and bewitching valour, in case we say anything more about him, to threaten us with the visitation of his spotless hand. Perhaps he thinks we are invalided,—old soldiers of reform, whose crutch he may safely threaten to trip up. It does not become us to say what we should do against the dreadful Westmacott; but observe the advantages which this fellow takes. He puts himself out of the pale of being treated as a gentleman; his only modesty consists in not even pretending to it: he provokes people to beat him, by intolerable calumnies against the women; he cries out for mercy when they do: and then he gets behind the wall of his infamy, and calls names, and threatens! If he had never done this in any other style than that of his last Sunday's paper, the thing would have been innocent enough. Had we foreseen that the cause of reform had been so triumphant as it is, we mean at such an early season, we own that we should not have adopted the plan we thought fit, when we again commenced public writers, of taking notice of attacks upon us. It was in pursuance of this plan that we spoke of Mr Molloy Westmacott, not without a due sense of that unpleasant part of the necessity, which a gentleman who writes in the Morning Herald has, it seems, been good enough to regret for us. We are obliged to him, and confess the nuisance. We have never been so wanting in self-respect as not to shew ourselves sensible of it. But we had suffered so much, partly from a contemptuous, and partly, we will venture to say, from a good-natured silence towards calumniators, that we had made up our minds to suffer no longer; and if a just quarrel is taken up, it must be properly concluded. If Mr Westmacott is not desirous, we will not say of being beaten at the corner of every street (though there are lively young gentlemen, of his own height, whom it may be difficult under some circumstances to restrain), but of being received in a way we shall not mention at present, in every mixed company he enters, he will continue to take our advice, and abstain from those kinds of attack, which may not be considered quite so harmless, as his threats of another nature. We know that there are persons waiting only for somebody to give them the cue to that effect: their example would unquestionably be followed: and this, we trust, will be a second warning to Mr Westmacott, not only with respect to ourselves, but as hinting to him the policy of keeping his attacks upon everybody else within some little bounds of indecency.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

A ROYAL PRIVILEGE.

The following day was rainy, and as it would not have been prudent to have appeared in the street with an umbrella, I remained within doors. The privilege of making use of an umbrella is very different from what it is in Europe, where every one keeps his head dry, without asking leave so to do. In Morocco, the umbrella is the privilege of royalty alone: no one but the Sultan can carry one; and should any of his subject slaves dare to make use of one, it would be an act of high treason, for which his head would be the forfeit.—[It is curious, the not only different, but opposite customs of nations. A few months since, the King of the French made as great a sensation by appearing in public with an umbrella under his arm, as could possibly have been made by an assumption of the royal privilege by the meanest slave in Morocco.]

TRAVELLING IN BARBARY.

In Barbary, no Christian is allowed to stir a step without a guard. * * * * The alcaid or officer into whose care you are committed considers you in the light of a mere parcel, for the loss of which his own head would be answerable. * * * * * Supper being concluded, I was left to myself to enjoy the luxury of a cigar, and some most excellent punch, which the care of my friend, Colonel Ehrinhoff, the Swedish Consul-General, had kindly provided me with. I began to think that journeying in Barbary was no bad thing, and almost fancied, as I lay stretched on my couch, and surrounded by luxuries, and my guards keeping watch at the door of my tent, that I was some Eastern Prince on his travels. It was now late, and I retired to bed. The alcaid of Zinat had furnished an additional guard, who, with Suse and Abdallah, sat round the fire, which had been replenished, and conversed together during the night. I was soon lulled asleep by the drowsy beatings of the Moorish drum from the distant huts, a simple method of rejoicing which denoted the celebration of a wedding.—[So can imagination give colour to circumstances: the author, who might in some measure be looked upon as a prisoner (for the attendance of the guard is enforced no less from suspicion of a traveller's designs, than anxiety for his personal safety) and who had been much annoyed by this constant espionage, takes a little wine, gives himself up to imagination and association, and he becomes an Eastern Prince. In a fit of indigestion, he would have been a prisoner under close guard; in a moment of health and gaiety, he is a prince with guards attending. He wisely avoided putting his power to the test, by attempting to dismiss them; and his dreams, no doubt, had the benefit of his prudence.]

THE JEWISH FESTIVAL, AND JEWISH WOMEN.

The Moorish festival was closely followed by one peculiar to the Jewish nation, and intended to commemorate the sojourn of that people in tents in the wilderness, which is kept by them for the space of eight days. During the whole of this period no Jew ought to sleep in his habitation, but should take up his abode in the open air, or nearly so, the only cover allowed during this period being what is afforded by a kind of hut composed of canes, or reeds, erected for this purpose, during this festival, in the court-yard of every house. These, arising from the interior of the habitations, present a singular appearance; the lofty tops of the canes, while fresh and green, contrasting with the brilliant white of the town in general. Among the wealthier Jews, the interior of the house is prettily ornamented, each room being thickly interwoven with shrubs, evergreens and flowers, producing a cool and pretty effect. The females of the family, during this festival, receive the visits of their friends in their best robes, decorated with their finest ornaments. In no part of the world, perhaps, are more beautiful women to be seen than among the Jewesses at Tangier. Their complexions are generally rather dark, but not swarthy, and mixed frequently with the most beautiful and inviting red possible: their eyes are brilliant, black and sparkling; and if to the above be added a fine contour of countenance, and hair like shining jet, it will be seen that this place, miserable as it is, is not entirely destitute of objects of attraction. The iron claw of despotism, however different may be the case with regard to the other sex, has passed lightly over the countenances of these captivating females; for who would imagine, on looking at them, that they were the daughters of slaves? of slaves as degraded and persecuted, as in any part of the globe subject to the tyranny of man? The costume of the Barbary Jewesses, and particularly that which is worn on Sabbaths and festivals, is splendid in the highest degree; and the effect is remarkably rich, dignified, and becoming. Their robes, which fold over, and are girt round with a silk sash worked in gold, are usually of superfine scarlet or dark-green cloth, richly embroidered in gold at the bosom, as also at the corners, which are likewise worked in crimson silk on the reverse side. On holidays, they wear splendid ear-rings, and a magnificent tiara of pearls, emeralds, and other precious stones, with numerous rings on their fingers of considerable value: the trinkets that are then worn by a young Jewess of the middle classes, amount frequently, in value, to more than a hundred pounds. The unmarried Jewesses live in a state of perfect seclusion; they by no means enjoy the same degree of liberty as the young Moorish women; on the contrary, they are not allowed to stir out; and a young Jewess will attain the age of eighteen or twenty without having been seen in the streets, or without having crossed the threshold of her house, except perhaps by stealth, in the evening, to pay a visit to her nearest neighbours. Notwithstanding this kind of imprisonment, which must be rendered more severe by the very confined size of the houses, and their being destitute of gardens, these poor things seem always happy and cheerful, and never idle; which, after all, is the great secret of content. It must be observed, at the same time, that the communication which the Moorish houses have with each other, by means of the flat roof or terrace, and which is appropriated exclusively to the sex, renders this restraint somewhat more bearable. After marriage, the Jewesses enjoy a considerably greater degree of liberty, though even then they appear less frequently out of doors than the Moorish women, whom the better classes imitate in some measure, by affecting a partial concealment of the face with the scarf which is thrown over the head. The beauty of the Jewish females renders them not unfrequently objects of attraction to the Moors, who are debarred from seeing or having any intercourse at all with their women previous to marriage, and instances on this account are not uncommon, of the former abjuring their religion, and becoming the wives of the Moors.—Vol. I, pp. 145—148.

Digitized by Google

A RUSE DE GUERRE.

A Sultan of Morocco, of the first race of the Moorish Sovereigns, is said in former times to have headed an expedition of five thousand men for Fez, and to have led it into the territories of Negroland and Guinea. Upon its arrival, however, it is related that the blacks mustered together so overwhelming a force, that the small daring Moorish army was surrounded on all sides. The chief, seeing the danger he had brought himself and troops into, and fearful of encountering the enemy, from their being so very superior in numbers, not knowing what to do, disguised himself as a common soldier, and went into the different tents of his own people, with a view of learning their opinion, secretly, as to the best method of effecting his retreat, and getting out of the scrape. It chanced that in his rounds he found in one of the tents two officers playing at chess; and hearing one say to the other, 'Your king is now in check, and you do not know how to get him out,' he, fancying that it was an allusion to his situation, and that he was discovered, stole away. The next day, however, he sent for the officer, told him what he had heard him say, and begged that he would give him his advice how to get clear off. The officer replied, that he thought the best plan would be, to select one of the handsomest of his women (the sex, whether in peace or war, always forming part of the Sultan's camp equipage), and dressing her up as handsomely as possible, to send her off to the Negro monarch. His Majesty was to be informed that such preparations for war were needless, as the King of Morocco had come, not with the least intention of invading his country, but of courting his friendship; and that in order to cement it the more firmly, he had actually brought with him one of his own daughters, whose fair hand he designed for his sable Majesty. The lady was accordingly dispatched in a handsome litter, decked out in all her best, to the Negro King, accompanied by splendid presents. On the arrrival of this friendly message, the princess, and the gifts, the poor man, taking it all for gospel, was both delighted and astonished at the honour intended him; and returned, on his part, a splendid present of gold and black slaves, for the use of the Sultan. It may be easily imagined that the latter was not a little rejoiced at the success of his artifice, and made the best of his way back to Morocco, determining, after the escape he had had, never to think of invading Negro-land again.

SIR T. LAWRENCE'S PENCHANT FOR THE STAGE.

[Mr Williams quotes a passage from Bernard's 'Reminiscences of the Stage,' shewing that Sir Thomas Lawrence, when about sixteen years of age, was much inclined to make the stage his profession. He asked Bernard's advice. The actor did not consider his theatrical talent upon a par with his powers as an artist, and no less in conformity with his own judgment than in compliance with the entreaties of Mr Lawrence senior, he, with the aid of Mr Palmer, dissuaded him from giving up the flattering prospects before him, for a profession in which his success was very doubtful. A letter addressed to his sister, nearly twenty years afterwards, shews that he still preserved his taste for the stage, and conveys an impression that his family were even then anxious for the consequences of it:]—'You have seen in the papers an account of a theatrical fête at the Marquis of Abercorn's. Shall I give you a little account of it? It was projected by a woman of great cleverness and beauty, Lady Caher—very young, and full of talent; with Lady Abercorn, and the rest of the female party; and of course it was acceded to by Lord Abercorn, who, whatever character of pride the world may have given him, is just as pleasant and kind and gentlemanly with his family and friends as man can be. It was determined to do it in a quiet way, and more as an odd experiment of the talents of the party than anything else;—but this and that friend would be offended;—and at last it swelled up to a perfect theatre (in a room) and a London audience. The Prince, the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, Lord and Lady Melbourne (their sons of the party), Lord and Lady Essex, Lord and Lady Amherst, with a long et cetera, and amongst the rest, Sheridan, were present! A play was first thought of, and I was for Miss Bailey's comedy, The Trial. * * * * * At last, however, the pieces fixed upon were The Wedding Day and Who's the Dupe? In the first, the characters were thus:—Sir A. Contest, Mr J. Madox; Mr Milden, Mr Madox; Lord Rakeland, your brother; Mr Contest, Mr G. Lamb; Lady Contest, Lady Caher; Hannah, Hon. Miss Butler; Mrs ——, Mrs J. Kemble; Lady Autumn, Lady C. Lindsey. * * * * * I was obliged to be in town, and at first neglected my parts, but not being coxcomb enough to do it wholly, I made good sail at the last, and was perfect. The day at last came, and was very pleasant from all its distractions and inconveniences. The Prince was to dine at six, and in the same room that the performers dined in, who of course had an earlier hour—half-past three. We all sat down like a Rugby school party, but rather more vociferous, huzzaed our Manager, and hissed our Hostess off, for talking of the Prince and hours. At last, the dressing, &c. ended. The orchestra, behind the scenes, sat down. * * * * * The Prince then came in, and of course the orchestra struck up 'God save the King;' then a little terrifying bell rang, the curtain drew up, and The Wedding Day began. At first, I will own to you that Sheridan's face, the grave Duke of Devonshire, and two or three staunch critics, made me feel unpleasantly; for I opened the piece. However, this soon wore off. Our set all played extremely well, like persons of good sense, without extravagance or buffoonery, and yet with sufficient spirit. Lady Caher, Mr I. Madox, and G. Lamb were the most conspicuous; the first so beautiful, that I felt love-making very easy. A splendid supper closed the business, and the Prince, &c. slept at the Priory. Wednesday it was determined to act it again, but I have unfortunately prevented it by my illness, and they knew of it only on the morning; so that I have occasioned great inconvenience, and have just been of consequence enough to frustrate a pleasant scheme. At Easter, if not before, it will be done again. You know me too well, dear Anne, to believe that I should be of such a scheme, under any but very flattering circumstances; as it is, I was right to join it. Lord Abercorn is an old Jermyn street friend, a staunch and honourable one, and particularly kind to me in real services, and very gratifying distinctions. These all formed one strong reason for joining in the thing; and another secret one was, that whatever tends to heighten a character for general talent (when kept in prudent bounds) is of use to that particular direction of it which forms the pursuit of life. I have gained then, and not lost, by this, to you, singular step. I am not going to be a performer in other families. I stick to Lord Abercorn's; and, for the rest, I pursue my profession as quietly, and more steadily than ever.'—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence. Vol. I. p. 229—233.

THE TRIUMPH OF MERCY.

While others are hoarding up their bags of money, without the power of enjoying it, I am collecting, without injuring my conscience, or wounding my peace of mind, those beautiful specimens of Nature's works, that are for ever pleasing. I have had live crows, hawks, and owls, opossums, squirrels, snakes, lizards, &c., so that my room has sometimes reminded me of Noah's ark; but Noah had a wife in one corner of it, and, in this particular, our parallel does not altogether tally. I receive every subject of natural history that is brought to me; and, though they do not march into my ark from all quarters, as they did into that of our great ancestor, yet I find means, by the distribution of a few fivepenny bits, to make them find the way fast enough. A boy not long ago brought me a large basketful of crows! I expect his next load, if I don't soon issue orders to the contrary, will be bull-frogs. One of my boys caught a mouse in school a few days ago, and directly marched up to me with his prisoner. I set about drawing it that same evening, and all the while, the pantings of its little heart shewed it to be in the most extreme agonies of fear. I had intended to kill it, in order to fix it in the claws of a stuffed owl; but, happening to spill a few drops of water near where it was tied, it lapped it up with such eagerness, and looked in my face with such an eye of supplicating terror, as perfectly overcame me. I immediately untied it, and restored it to life and liberty. The agonies of a prisoner at the stake, while the fire and instruments of torment are preparing, could not be more severe than the sufferings of that poor mouse; and, insignificant as the object was, I felt at that moment the sweet sensation that mercy leaves on the mind, when she triumphs over cruelty.—[From the interesting memoir of Alexander Wilson, prefixed to a delightful little work, entitled American Ornithology, which forms the 68th and 69th volumes of Constable's Miscellany.—A. A.]

Digitized by Google

MOUNT PILATE.

The form of its three peaks is singularly striking; and rising immediately from the lake to the height of more than seven thousand feet, it presents a grand, and seemingly very elevated front. It was upon this mountain that, many years ago, a great and useful work was constructed, for the purpose of facilitating the descent of timber. It was a kind of groove nearly eight miles in length;—a most gigantic work, and worthy of a more enduring fate. A trunk of a tree, ninety feet long, and two feet in diameter, committed to this groove, accomplished its journey in the inconceivably short space of two minutes and a half. [By a quotation from Playfair's works, in the appendix, it appears that trees descend quicker in proportion to their weight, the lighter ones being about six minutes on the way; the heavier, seldom more than three.] There is a tradition connected with this mountain, which I must not omit noticing. There is a small lake, very high up in the mountain, into which Pontius Pilate, stung with remorse, is said to have plunged, and this event in the popular belief of by-gone days, was of course looked upon as the cause of all the storms that assailed the mountain, and of every misfortune that befell those who lived within its precincts. The superstition, I believe, has now passed away.—Conway's Switzerland, &c.

THE DREADFUL DANGERS OF READING.

[Translated from VOLTAIRE.]

We, Jousouf Cherebi, by the grace of God, Mufti of the Holy Ottoman Empire, light of lights, elect among the elect, to all the faithful who shall see these presents, folly and benediction. Whereas Said Effendi, heretofore Ambassador of the Sublime Porte, to a little state, called Frankrom, situated between Spain and Italy, has introduced among us the pernicious use of printing; we, having consulted on this novelty our venerable brethren the cadis and imans of the imperial city of Stamboul, and more especially, the faquirs known for their zeal against all mental advancement, it has seemed good unto Mahomet and to us to condemn, proscribe, and anathematise the said infernal invention of printing, for the causes hereunto annexed.

1st. This facility of communicating thoughts, evidently tends to the dissipation of ignorance, which is the guardian and safe-guard of polished states.

2nd. It is to be feared that among the books brought from the West, there may be some which treat of agriculture, and the means of perfecting the mechanic arts, which works may at length, in opposition to the will of God, awaken the intellect of our cultivators and manufacturers, excite them to industry, increase their possessions, and, in the end, inspire them with some elevation of mind, some interest in the public good, with sentiments directly in opposition to sound doctrine.

3rd. It may happen, in the course of time, that we may have books of history freed from the marvels which now keep the nation in a happy state of stupidity. The authors of these books, may have the imprudence to do justice to good and bad actions, and to recommend equity and the love of one's country, which is visibly contrary to our rights.

4th. It may be that some miserable philosophers, under the specious but criminal pretence of enlightening and improving mankind, may come to instruct us in dangerous virtues, with which the people ought never to have any acquaintance.

5th. They may, by increasing the people's respect for God, and scandalously asserting in print that his power is the same in all places, diminish the number of pilgrims to Mecca, to the great detriment of the salvation of souls.

6th. It would undoubtedly come to pass, that by reading those ancient authors who have treated of contagious disorders, and of the manner of preventing them, we should be so unfortunate as to be freed from the plague; which would be manifestly flying in the face of Providence.

For these and other reasons, for the edification of the faithful, and the benefit of their souls, we forbid them ever to read any book, upon pain of eternal damnation; and lest they should be overcome by the diabolical temptation to gain knowledge, we forbid all fathers and mothers to teach their children to read. And, to prevent any opposition to this our ordinance, we expressly forbid them to think; under the same penalties. We enjoin all true believers to denounce to our tribunal, whomsoever shall have been heard to utter four connected phrases, expressive of a clear and distinct meaning. We ordain that, in conversation, no terms shall be used, but those which mean nothing, according to the ancient and long established usage of the Sublime Porte.

And, to prevent the entrance of any contraband thought into the sacred imperial city, we especially charge the first physician of his Highness* (born in a marsh in the South-west; which said physician having already killed four august members of the Ottoman family, is more interested than any other person in preventing the introduction of knowledge into the country), and empowers him, by these presents, to seize every idea that shall present itself, whether in writing or by word of mouth, at the gates of the city, and to bring before us the said idea, bound hand and foot, that we may inflict upon it such chastisement as may seem good unto us.

Given in our Palace of Stupidity, on the seventh of the month of Muharem, in the year 1143 of the Hegira.

[The Mufti has proved a true prophet. In countries where these wise precautions have not been taken, the threatened evils have happened; evils which admit of no remedy, for no opiate will set to sleep again the spirit that has been awakened among mankind.]

* This is intended for Van Swieten, first physician to the Empress, who had obtained the office of preventing the introduction of French books into the city of Vienna. He had a particular objection to the works of Voltaire, and, hating inoculation yet more than philosophy, had lost several of his royal patients by the small-pox, from his obstinacy on that point.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— 'Comparisons are odious' because they are impertinent, and lead only to the discovery of defects, by making one thing the standard of another which has no real relation to it.—Hazlitt.

A SCORPION SUICIDE.—A scorpion which was caught at Morocco by Dr Brown, of Gibralter, with a fork, in such a manner as not to kill the reptile, first bit the fork with extreme violence, and then, finding it could not extricate itself, darted its venomous fangs into its own body, and immediately died.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

AN EXTRAORDINARY RECORD.—There is a singular work, entitled 'Memoirs of Prince William Henry, Duke of Gloucester (son of Queen Anne) from his Birth to his Ninth Year,' in which Jenkin Lewis, an honest Welshman in attendance on the royal infant's person, is pleased to record that his Royal Highness cried, crowed, and said Gig, and Dy, very like a babe of plebeian descent.—Notes to Old Mortality.—[Sir Walter does not say whether he credits this assertion; he merely mentions that it is so recorded. On such an important point, it would be rash to give any opinion that was not grounded on industrious research.]

ZEAL.—The river that runs slow and creeps by the banks, and begs leave of every turf to let it pass, is drawn into little hollownesses, and spreads itself in smaller portions, and dies with diversion; but when it runs with vigorousness and a full stream, and breaks down every obstacle, making it even as its own brow, it stays not to be tempted with little avocations, and to creep into holes, but runs into the sea through full and useful channels: so is a man's prayer; if it moves upon the feet of an abated appetite, it wanders into the society of every trifling accident, and stays at the corners of the fancy, and talks with every object it meets, and cannot arrive at heaven; but when it is carried upon the wings of passion and strong desires, a swift motion and a hungry appetite, it passes on through all the intermedial regions of clouds, and stays not till it dwells at the foot of the throne, where mercy sits, and thence sends holy showers of refreshments.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE CELEBRATED STRASBURG CLOCK.—At Strasburg, in Germany, there is a clock, invented and made by Conradus Dasipodius, in 1571, before which on the ground stands a celestial globe, demonstrating the daily and annual motions of the heavens, stars, and planets, with great exactness. In the clock, the eclipses of the sun and moon are shown on two tables. On a third table, which is subdivided into three parts, is seen, on the first the statues of Apollo and Diana, and the annual revolution of the heavens; on the second, the year of the world, the year of our Lord, the hour and minutes of the day, the great festivals and the dominical letter; the third consists of a plan of Germany, and more especially of the city of Strasburg. In the middle frame of the clock, is an astrolabe, representing the twelve signs of the zodiac, and the planets posited in those houses, as they appear every day. There is likewise a terrestial globe, where the quarters, the half-hour, and the sixty minutes are delineated. There are the statues of Spring, Summer, and Winter. In the higher frame of the clock, are four very old men, who strike the quarters of the hour, when also appears a statue of death attempting to strike each quarter; it is forced back by a statue of Christ with a spear in his right hand, for three quarters; but at the end of each hour, the statue of Christ disappears, and that of death strikes the hour with a dead man's bone in his hand, and then the chimes play. On the top of the clock, is a cock which, every twelve hours, claps his wings, and crows audibly.—Taylor's Cabinet of Curiosities.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Legion of Honour—The Illustrious Stranger—Turning the Tables—Timour the Tartar.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Omnibus.

THE FRENCH PLAYS.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—It is a general complaint with the visitors at the Haymarket Theatre, that the intervals between the pieces are so long, that none but first-rate actors can compensate to them for the tedious waiting they have to undergo. There is no doubt but the thin houses that have been lately seen there have been in some measure owing to this delay; and it is very desirable that M. LA PORTE should be aware of the circumstance. It is not improbable that to French people this delay is rather agreeable than otherwise. It gives them an opportunity of stretching their limbs a little; and even should they not be disposed to leave their seats, a Frenchman will commence a conversation with his neighbours, and forget the delay. With the English it is otherwise; they are more reserved; they do not talk with strangers, and with friends they can converse more freely at home.—The performances are long, and the long intervals make the conclusion later, and consequently, the entertainment altogether more fatiguing. This is perhaps the reason why the audiences have of late been not only smaller, but almost entirely composed of French visitors. The intervals did not alarm the French, and they would rather see poor acting, than none, in their own tongue. Since Mlle. LEONTINE FAY has appeared, the audiences have been fuller, and more English. The attraction overcame the ennui. This is rather against the chance of any immediate remedy of the objection. Empty benches have failed to admonish M. LA PORTE, and surely full ones will not do it; but it were well that he should know that such delay between the pieces keeps many persons from his theatre, who would otherwise attend it. It must always be the Manager's interest to keep an audience in good humour; more especially when the majority of the actors are mediocre; and as Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY'S engagement is a short one, it will be necessary to supply her place by equal talent (which may not be easy); or if that cannot be done, to contrive that the pieces shall more quickly succeed each other. Good acting is the great desideratum;—continuous entertainment of some kind is the next thing required. Let M. LA PORTE unite the two, and his audiences will again be, as at the English Opera House, full, and fashionable; but if both be neglected, as during the greater part of this season they have been, he will best promote his own interest, by closing the doors altogether; an alternative which would be regretted by others, as well as by his countrymen in London.

I remain, Mr Tatler,

Your respectful admirer,

A. A.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Romantic Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. VON WEBER.]

Linda, Miss Bruce. Rose, Mrs Bedford.
Bridesmaids—Miss Absolon, Miss Butline, Mrs East, &c.
Ottocar, Mr Yarnold. Bernhard, Mr Bedford. Adolph, Mr T. Cooke.
Caspar, Mr Horn.
Kilian, Mr Webster. Zamiel, Mr Howell. Hermit, Mr Downing.
Principal Foresters—Mr Honner, Mr Eaton, Mr Wieland, and Mr Chikini.

In the course of the Evening, Onslow's Overture to 'Le Colporteur;' Rossini's Overture to 'Eduardo e Christina;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

After which a Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

THE JENKINSES.

Mrs John Jenkins, Mrs Orger. Miss Georgiana Jenkins, Miss Crawford.
Martha, Mrs Broad. Mr Carraway, Mr Farren.
Augustus Gingham, Mr J. Vining. Mr John Jenkins, Mr Cooper.
Master John Jenkins, Master Fenton.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; Popping the Question; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Monterean (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Viala.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgand, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. Tree. Charlotte, Miss Lawrence.
Mordaunt, Mr Baker. Merton, Mr Henry. Moses, Mr Keeley.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte; and Two Strings to Your Bow.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, entitled

DAMON AND PYTHIAS.

Hermion, Miss M. C. Poole. Calanthe, Miss Scott. Phygenia, Miss Vincent.
Eudosia, Miss Somerville. Arria, Miss Rumsey.
Rygcia, Madame Simon. Lyphrasia, Mrs Vale. Listea, Miss Nicol.
Damon, Mr Osbaldiston. Philistrius, Mr Almar. Damocles, Mr Gough.
Procles, Mr Honner. Dionysius, Mr D. Pitt. Pythias, Mr C. Hill.
Lucullus, Mr Lee. Fabius, Mr Webb. Pellagus, Mr Young.
Arcas, Mr Hobbs. Melchton, Mr Edwin. Aranthon, Mr Ransford.

After which,

THE MOUNTAINEERS.

[By COLMAN, the Younger.]

Floranthe, Miss Blanche Kemble. Zorayda, Miss Scott. Agnes, Miss Somerville.
Octavian, Mr H. Kemble. Bulcasin Muley, Mr D. Pitt.
Count Virolet, Mr Honner. Killmalloch, Mr Young. Sadi, Mr Vale.
Lopo Tocho, Mr Williams. Ganem, Mr Almar. Perequillo, Mr T. Hill.
Roque, Mr Gough. Old Man, Mr Hobbs. Yusif, Mr Webb.
Muleteer, Mr Asbery. Boy, Miss Ellis.
Muleteers, (with a Glee) Messrs Ransford, Maitland, and Tully.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Georgiana Dorio, Miss M. C. Poole. Babbla, Miss Vincent.
Arabella, Mlle. Rosier. Rosa, Miss Somerville.
Count di Dorio, Mr Gough. The Marquis Sapparino, Mr C. Hill.
Count Fernando, Mr Edwin. Sancho, Mr Vale.
Ladroni, Mr Rogers. Old Jessmo, Mr Webb.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Executioner of Voorn—Basket Maker — Shocking Bad Hat—Bleeding Nun.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Catherine and Petruchio—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Man and the Marquis.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —The Stud of Burmese Ponies — Lilliputian Countess — Master H. Cooke's Riding Act—Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 105 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Bennell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office,

Nº 222.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MAY 20, 1831.

QUARTERLY REVIEW. No. LXXXIX.

'Here Lethargy, with deadly sleep oppressed,
Stretched on his back, a mighty lubbard, lay
Heaving his sides, and snored night and day;
To stir him from his traunce it was not eath,
And his half-opened eyne he shut straightway;
He led, I wot, the softest way to death.'—THOMSON.

'Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas:
Magnus ab integro sæclorum nascitur ordo.'—VIRGIL.

If it is interesting to man to contemplate the progress of the human mind, to sympathise with those who stand foremost in its career, who are engaged in redeeming it from the errors of the present and the past, who identify themselves with its redemption, and esteem its progress and perfection as far greater objects in their search after happiness, than the trifling joys of time and sense;—if it form one of our greatest pleasures to love and reverence such men as these, to call their nature ours, to catch a spark of their enthusiasm, and kindle in our breasts a like flame of noble virtue and philanthropy; if we have so much at heart, the essential integrity and ultimate perfection of human nature, of how much melancholy interest, and with what serious and deep regret must be to us the consideration of those causes which operate to the demolition of our dearest hopes, which would destroy our only foundation for pleasure in existence, and poison the atmosphere in which 'we live and move, and have our being.'

A subject like this, involving 'everything which is valuable to the existence of man,' calls forth, indeed, during its discussion, other feelings than those which reason contributes. Singularly interesting, absorbing, and passionate, will be the reflections of the man, who, with the nature and causes of the present crisis before him, throws down the last number of the Quarterly Review. Astonishment, incredulity, resentment, and scorn, will be expressed on his countenance. Let us endeavour to trace the sources of these various feelings. History and experience are null to the men of whom we are speaking. Who is not astonished at beholding their audacity, with the fate of Charles I before their eyes, in menacing to uphold by force, doctrines, equally revolting to the spirit of the age, as those to which he was a martyr;—and are their circumstances so propitious as his were? Have they an equal strength of association amongst the people in their favour? Have they assistance from Ireland, Holland, and France? Have they to head their armies, such men as Hopton, Newcastle, or Rupert, aided by the unequalled chivalry of the daring Montrose, by the patriotism of Falkland, the abilities of Davenant or Clarendon, or the deceiving diplomacy of Charles and his statesmen? Have they to fight against an enemy obstinately divided, one party of whom not scrupling to affirm that it prefers them to the other? In short do they doubt the records of history, and refuse to believe that 'the vigour, and energy of the living principle of the body politic,' has not made good its cause against 'mere human nature?' On all hands, there is room here for incredulity and astonishment.

Again, these men cannot conceive, that there is growing up amongst the youth of the present age, those who are independent of personal considerations, as well as amongst those who have suffered directly by the effects of their principles, a deep, fervent, and unextinguishable hatred of them and their cause. To all rules there are certainly exceptions. It would be unjust, we know, to charge their creed upon the character of all of them; but this does not prevent us from branding them, as a class, with base deception. We know, and hate them, as those who, to serve their own purposes, would blacken the nature of man, and, of consequence, its creator. We remember that they have made deceit and dissimulation essential parts of the social system, have lorded it over young hearts, and crushed the hopes of innocence in the bud. We know them as the poisoners of the fountain of truth, and the hoary calumniators of genuine virtue, as 'men who are incapable of comprehending lofty principles of action,' as ignorant of those impulses 'which the unwearied spirit of the universe is for ever suggesting to young and enthusiastic hearts.' They call themselves Christians, but their own creed condemns them to a deeper hell than that to which the infidel is doomed. We know them as the venders of right and wrong, who sell absolution for slavery, and whilst declaring their principles immutable and universal, conferring a charter of sole interpretation upon themselves, whose privilege is their own exception. When men cause others to believe that faith is virtue, we cannot but expect that the first article should be in their own divinity. We know them as the champions of Negro Slavery, as making its debasement a necessary consequence, an argument against emancipation. What must be the responsibility of those men who have sunk their fellows to a degree in the scale of despotism, whence the mental spirit which we think restless and ceaseless seems to be frozen, and its place to be usurped by the spirit of slavery, where the heart seems to beat mechanically, and the blood to burn no more, and the conscience to be seared 'with a red-hot iron,' and the brain to sleep the sleep of death, and the man to become part of the soil on which he crawls, and live and die a slave, and cease to be. We know them as heartless persecutors, as enemies to improvement and change, thus mocking the very nature and object of all religion.

Finally, we know them as charging on liberty itself, those blots and defections from its cause, which their own overbearing influence has produced.* Yes, of how many noble minds have they been the perversion? How many who now truckle to the parasites of princes, would, but for them, have burned with the 'sacred flame of liberty?'† How many a soul which might 'have plucked bright honour from the pale-faced moon' now 'meditates amidst decay, and stands a ruin amidst ruins?' To conclude, it is peculiarly striking to behold, in the moral landscape, amidst the freshness and verdure which is now springing up, the withered and blighted leaves put forth by the plants which grow on the arid and unwatered soil of despotism; they remind one of the 'girdled' trees in America,‡ whose stems, and blackened, and leafless branches, are left to darken by their unrefreshing shade, and frown, and creak, amidst the rich and smiling corn fields.

AGIS.

* If, Mr Tatler, amidst the partizans of the great cause of mankind, now that it prospers, we find men who fought the good fight 'in less propitious times,'—men, who for a good name and pure conscience, have undergone slander, scorn, and poverty, with an uncompromising front, and, that too, with the interests of those around them, which can form a better defence for concession than all the sophistry of selfish time-servers; surely, surely, now the sun is brightening, the friends of freedom will not forget the veterans in their cause—of whom, if neglected, 'the world is not worthy.'

† Godwin has some interesting remarks on this subject in his 'Commonwealth,' vol. ii, pp. 32, 219.

‡ See Hall's 'America,' Vol. I, where he describes some of them, as popping their black snouts above the young grain like a shoal of seals.—Ah! Captain Hall, why did they not figure forth to thee the desolate condition of a 'girdled' Quarterly Reviewer?

Digitized by Google

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

[From Conder's Italy.]

SENSELESS PRODIGALITY.

Many of the nobles of Siena, who had ruined their fortunes in the Crusades and other wars, renounced the name and arms of their family, and entered into commerce. On rising into merchants, some of those patricians branched off into foreign countries. The Buonsignori established in France 'the Bank of the Great Table,' which flourished for a century, and was then pillaged by Philip the Fair. The Chigi opened a bank of equal celebrity at Rome, where the vain Agostino made as stupid a sacrifice to his sovereign as that of Gresham. Not satisfied with the magnificence usual on such occasions, when he invited Leo the Tenth to a banquet at the Farnesina, he served the whole Papal court with a succession of silver plate, and ordered the removes, as they went from table, to be tossed into the river. By what contagion is it that merchants, so prudent while at home, lose their senses when they approach sovereigns? * * * * Dante refers to a club of young prodigals at Siena, called La Brigata Godereccia, who could club a purse of 200,000 ducats, and spend it in a few months. Their pheasants were roasted with burning cloves, and their horses were shod with silver, to ape, it may be presumed, the nuptial extravagance of the great Marquis of Tuscany. The scene of their debauchery is now a chapel.

THE ARCHITECTURE OF NAPLES.

They delight in the crooked, the piebald, the gaudy, and push irregularity to its furthest bourn. Alfonzo's arch in Castel-Nuova, though a mixed composition of the fifteenth century, is purity itself, compared with those abominable heaps of sculpture called guglias, which were raised in the last reign. Some of the modern churches are striking to the eye; but so is every monster. Within, they are spotted things, mere harlequins in marble, quite ugly with decoration. Carving is tormented, and gold-leaf laid on wherever it can find room. A rage for gilding runs through the nation. It disfigures walls, furniture, carriages,—even the hackney calash must have its coat of gold; the collar-maker gilds his harness; the apothecary gilds his pills; the butcher sticks gold-leaf on his mutton.

THE DOGE AND ANTI-DOGE OF VENICE.

Venice is built on two great collections of shoals, which are divided from each other by a serpentine channel, called the Canalozo or Grand Canal, which is bestrid by the bridge of the Rialto (rio alto or deep stream). It follows that the city may be divided into two great parts made up of small islands, and each part separated from the other, except at this bridge. * * * * * This division of the ancient city into distinct parts or quarters, appears to have given rise to the two rival factions of Castellani and Nicoloti, whose distinguishing colours, manifested in their caps and sashes, were black and red. Even in the present day, a Castellano detests black as much as a chameleon, and a Nicoloto, in his abhorrence of red, could scarcely be surpassed by a turkey-cock. These factions are now going out. In former times the Doge, in whatever quarter born, was, from his residence at St Marks, always looked upon as a Castellano; the Nicoloti, therefore, annually elected some clever waterman of their own party, as a sort of anti-Doge, who was allowed a bark, place, and some sort of authority in the procession on Ascension-day, for the yearly espousals of the Adriatic.

THE UNIVERSITY OF BOLOGNA.

The celebrated Abate Mezzofanti, Professor of Greek and Oriental Literature in the University, is an example of a faculty for acquiring languages probably unequalled. At thirty-six years of age, in 1817, he read twenty, and conversed with fluency and accuracy in eighteen languages. An Italian gentleman having introduced to him two Russians and a Pole, who were passing through Bologna, Mezzofanti entered at once into conversation with them in their own languages. One of the Russians then addressed him in Turkish, and was answered in the same tongue, although Mezzofanti informed them it was only the second time of his having conversed in that language. The Pole now addressed him in a language which he supposed it impossible he should be able to understand, that of the Bohemians or Gipsies. To his great astonishment, Mezzofanti promptly answered him in that dialect, and produced some sheets of a grammar and vocabulary of the Gipsy tongue, compiled from information he had obtained from some Zingari confined at Bologna. His Greek master, a Spaniard, had taught him Spanish, French, and English; and German, Polish, and Hungarian, he had acquired by reading and conversation with travellers. Yet he had never wandered above thirty miles from Bologna, and spoke only Bolognese in his own family. * * * * * Not many years before Mrs Piozzi visited Bologna, la dotteressa, Laura Bassi, gave lectures upon the mathematics and natural philosophy till she grew very old and infirm, and her pupils always handed her very respectfully to and from the doctor's chair. A marble tablet has been erected to her memory. Many learned ladies were at that time members of the University. Madonna Manzolina was about the same time Professor of Anatomy. Still more recently, the Professorship of Greek was held by Signora Clotilda Tambroni, whose severity, we are told, is still remembered by her pupils. * * * * * The Signora, Lady Morgan says, had vacated her chair by death only, a short time before she visited Bologna; and it was pleasant to hear her learned coadjutor, the Abate Mezzofanti, do ample justice to her profound learning, which had raised her to an equality in collegiate rank with himself.

SABLE HUNTING.

The sable hunters form themselves into troops, from five to forty each, the last subdivide into lesser parties, and each chooses a leader, but there is one that directs the whole: a small covered boat is provided for each party, laden with provision, a dog and net for every two men, and a vessel to bake their bread in: each party also has an interpreter for the country they penetrate into. Every party then sets out according to the course their leader points out. They go against the stream of the rivers, drawing their boats up, till they arrive in the hunting country; there they stop, build huts, and wait till the waters are frozen and the season commences. Before they begin the chace, their leader assembles them, they unite in a prayer to the Almighty for success, and then separate. The first sable they take is called God's sable, and is dedicated to the church. They then penetrate into the woods, mark the trees as they advance, that they may know their way back, and in their hunting quarters, form huts of trees, and bank up the snow round them. Near these, they lay their traps, then advance farther, and lay more traps, still building new huts in every quarter, and return successively to every old one, to visit the traps, and take out the game to skin it, which none but the chief of the party may do. During this time, they are supplied with provisions by persons who are employed to bring it on sledges, from the places on the road where they are obliged to form magazines, by reasou of the impracticability of bringing quantities through the rough country they must pass. The traps are a sort of pit-fall with a loose board placed over it, baited with fish or flesh. When sables grow scarce, the hunters trace them in the new-fallen snow, to their holes, place their nets at the entrance, and watch two or three days for the coming out of the animal. It has happened that these poor people have, by the failure of their provisions, been so pinched with hunger, that, to still the cravings of appetite, they have been reduced to take two thin boards, one of which they apply to the pit of the stomach, the other to the back, drawing them tight together, by ropes placed at the ends. The season of chace being finished, the hunters re-assemble, make a report to their leader of the number of sables each has taken; make complaints of offenders against their regulations; punish delinquents; share the booty; then continue at the head-quarters, till the rivers are clear of ice; return home, and give to every church the dedicated furs. * * * * * The character of the sable fur is, that notwithstanding the hair naturally lies from the head towards the tail, yet will it lie equally in any direction, as you strike your hand over it.—Pennant's History of Quadrupeds.

THE ORIGINAL OLD MORTALITY.

The old man was at one time following his wonted occupation of repairing the tombs of the martyrs in the church-yard of Girthon, and the sexton of the parish was plying his kindred task at no small distance. Some roguish urchins were sporting near them, and by their noisy gambols disturbing the old men in their serious occupation. The most petulant of the juvenile party were two or three boys, grand-children of a person well known by the name of Cooper Climent. This artist enjoyed almost a monopoly in Girthon and the neighbouring parishes, for making and selling ladles, caups, bickers, bowls, spoons, cogues, and trenchers formed of wood, for the use of the country people. It must be noticed, that notwithstanding the excellence of the cooper's vessels, they were apt, when new, to impart a reddish tinge to whatever liquor was put into them, a circumstance not uncommon in like cases. The grand-children of this dealer in wooden work took it into their heads to ask the sexton what use he could possibly make of the numerous fragments of old coffins which were thrown up in opening new graves. 'Do you not know,' said Old Mortality, 'that he sells them to your grandfather, who makes them into spoons, trenchers, bickers, bowls, and so forth?' At this assertion, the youthful group broke up in great confusion and disgust, on reflecting how many meals they had eaten out of dishes which, by Old Mortality's account, were only fit to be used at a banquet of ghouls or witches. They carried the tidings home, when many a dinner was spoiled by the loathing which the intelligence imparted; for the account of the materials was supposed to explain the tinge which, even in the days of the cooper's fame, had seemed somewhat suspicious. The ware of Cooper Climent was rejected in horror, much to the benefit of his rivals the muggers, who dealt in earthenware. The man of cutty-spoon and ladle saw his trade interrupted, and learned the reason by his quondam customers coming upon him in wrath to return the goods which were composed of such unhallowed materials, and demanded repayment of their money. In this disagreeable predicament, the forlorn artist cited Old Mortality into a court of justice, where he proved that the wood he used in his trade, was that of the staves of old wine-pipes bought from smugglers, with whom the country then abounded, a circumstance which fully accounted for their imparting a colour to their contents. Old Mortality himself made the fullest declaration, that he had no other purpose in making the assertion, than to check the petulance of the children. But it is easier to take away a good name than to restore it. Cooper Climent's business continued to languish, and he died in a state of poverty.—Notes to Old Mortality.

Digitized by Google

THE EARLY CHILDHOOD OF SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

[Mr Lawrence, who kept the Black Bear Inn at Devizes, was very proud of his young son Thomas, and would sometimes expose himself to a degree of ridicule by the display of paternal vanity before persons wholly uninterested in him or his family.]—In 1775, Mr ——, subsequently Lord Kenyon, arrived with his lady, late in the evening, at the Black Bear Inn, at Devizes. They were on their way to Bath, and had felt the inconvenience of the heavy style of travelling in those 'good old times;' and, as they confessed, they were not in the best possible humour, when Mr Lawrence, senior, entered their sitting-room, and proposed to show them his wonderful child. 'The boy,' he said, 'was only five years old, but he could take their likenesses, or repeat to them any speech in Milton's Pandemonium.' To that place the offended guests were on the eve of commending their host to go, and the lawyer's lips were just opened to pronounce the sentence, when the child rushed in; and, as Lady Kenyon used to relate, her vexation and anger were suddenly changed into admiration. He was riding on a stick, and went round and round the room, in the height of infantile joyousness. Mrs Kenyon, as soon as she could get him to stand, asked him if he could take the likeness of that gentleman, pointing to her husband. 'That I can,' said the little Lawrence, 'and very like too.' A high chair was placed at the table, pencils and paper were brought, and the infant artist soon produced an astonishingly striking likeness. Mr Kenyon now coaxed the child, who had got tired by the half-hour's labour, and asked him if he could take a likeness of the lady. 'Yes, that I can,' was his reply once more, 'if she will turn her side to me, for her face is not straight.' Our artist learned in good time not to speak so bluntly before ladies; but his remark produced a laugh, as it happened to be true. He accordingly took a side likeness of Mrs Kenyon. About the year 1799, an intimate friend of Lady Kenyon's saw this portrait, and could distinctly trace a very strong resemblance to what her ladyship had been at the period when the likeness was taken. The drawing was about five inches broad, and delicately shaded, but exhibited an indecision or feebleness of contour, that might have been expected from a childish artist.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence. Vol. I. pp. 40, 41.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Hope and Envy.—Sanazzaro being present one day when several persons, and among others, some medical men, were discussing which was the most general disease, he offered to decide the dispute; and, on being asked to do so, he replied that the fever of hope killed more persons than any other. On a similar occasion, when some physicians were consulting as to what remedy was the best for weakness of sight, he observed that envy was more likely than anything else to quicken the power of vision.—Stebbing's Lives of the Italian Poets.—[Few persons would acquiesce in this libel upon Hope, who is more prone to save than to kill. Sanazzaro had, perhaps, suffered too little, to know her value. Nor is it every one who would think Envy more likely to quicken the vision, than some other passions, more especially Love; and though the young archer is represented as blind, it is much to be suspected that he has himself a quicker eye than most passions, which are generally a blind race.]

Sale of Winds.—It is well known that the Laplanders derive a profitable trade in selling winds; but it is perhaps less notorious, that within these few years such a commodity might be purchased on British ground, where it was likely to be in great request. At the village of Stromness, on the Orkney main island, called Pomona, lived, in 1814, an aged dame called Bessie Millie, who helped out her subsistence by selling favourable winds to mariners. He was a venturous master of a vessel, who left the roadstead of Stromness, without paying his offering to propitiate Bessie Millie; her fee was extremely moderate, being exactly sixpence, for which, as she explained herself, she boiled her kettle, and gave the bark advantage of her prayers; for she disclaimed all unlawful arts. The wind thus petitioned for was sure, she said, to arrive, though occasionally the mariners had to wait some time for it. The woman's dwelling and appearance were not unbecoming her pretensions; her house, which was on the brow of the steep hill on which Stromness is founded, was only accessible by a series of dirty and precipitous lanes, and for exposure, might have been the abode of Æolus himself, in whose commodities the inhabitant dealt. She herself was, as she told us, nearly one hundred years old, withered and dried up, like a mummy. A clay-coloured kerchief folded round her head, corresponded in colour to her corpse-like complexion. Two light blue eyes, that gleamed with a lustre like that of insanity, an utterance of astonishing rapidity, a nose and chin that almost met together, and a ghastly expression of cunning, gave her the effect of Hecate. She remembered Gow the pirate, who had been a native of those islands, in which he closed his career. Such was Bessie Millie, to whom the mariners paid a sort of tribute, with a feeling betwixt jest and earnest.—Notes to the Pirate.—[It would be curious to know how the old lady contrived to satisfy voyagers in different directions, who required opposing winds at the same time.]

An English Death.—Among the ships lying in the harbour, was the wreck of one of the Pacha's own vessels. The Captain had committed some crime, which was represented by his crew to the Viceroy, who ordered him immediately ashore, to answer his accusers. Knowing his guilt, he pretended sickness, till a second message from the same quarter, left him no alternative; and unable longer to evade his fate, he sent all his crew ashore, and calling to an old and faithful servant, the only person on board, he bade him jump out of the port into the sea; at the same time, having loaded two pistols, he fired into the magazine, and blew up the ship and himself together. When the story was related to the Pacha, he said, 'These are Frank customs; this is dying like an Englishman!'—Egypt. Edinburgh Cabinet Library. Vol. III.

Knox and Claverhouse.—It is said by tradition, that he (John Graham of Claverhouse) was very desirous to see, and be introduced to a certain Lady Elphinstoun, who had reached the advanced age of an hundred years and upwards. The noble matron being a stanch Whig, was rather unwilling to receive Claver'se (as he was called from his title) but at length consented. After the usual compliments, the officer observed to the lady, that having lived so much beyond the usual term of humanity, she must, in her time, have seen many strange changes. 'Hout na, Sir,' said Lady Elphinstoun, 'the world is just to end with me as it began. When I was entering life, there was ane Knox deaving us a' wi' his clavers; and now I am ganging out, there is ane Claver'se deaving us a' wi' his knocks.' Clavers signifying, in common parlance, idle chat, the double pun does credit to the ingenuity of a lady of an hundred years old.—Notes to Old Mortality.

Laws that Die of Their Own Absurdity.—The laws peculiar to this canton (Glarus) respecting marriage, &c. are unusually strict, and somewhat curious. Whatever may be the age of persons desirous of marrying, they cannot accomplish their wish without the consent of their respective parents. A man of fifty must still remain a bachelor, if his father of seventy-five should so determine. The absurdity of this law has given rise to a laxity in morals, unknown in any other part of Switzerland; and this again has produced another, and a very wholesome law, which in part neutralizes the absurdity of the other. If it should so happen that a young woman becomes enceinte, the person in fault is obliged to marry her; and, in case of a refusal, he is declared incapable of being elected to a seat in the Council; his evidence is inadmissible in a court of justice, and, in short, he is deprived of civil rights. It is quite consistent with all this, that, if the marriage take place, which, with such penalties in case of non-compliance, is almost always the case, the female should be received into society, and that no stain should be supposed to attach to her. All laws whose tendency is to defeat, and not merely to regulate the laws of nature, must fail in their object; and accordingly, other laws, equally or more absurd, are required to remedy the evils that arise.—Conway's Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees.

Superstitious Interpretation of a Natural Accident.—The concluding circumstance of Elspeth's death is taken from an incident said to have happened at the funeral of John, Duke of Roxburgh. All who were acquainted with that accomplished Nobleman must remember that he was not more remarkable for creating and possessing a most curious and splendid library, than for his acquaintance with the literary treasures it contained. In arranging his books, fetching and replacing the volumes he wanted, and carrying on all the necessary intercourse which a man of letters holds with his library, it was the Duke's custom to employ, not a secretary or librarian, but a livery servant called Archie, whom habit had made so perfectly acquainted with the library, that he knew every book, as a shepherd does the individuals of his flock, by what is called head-mark, and could bring his master whatever volume he wanted, and afford all the mechanical aid the Duke required in his literary researches. To secure the attendance of Archie, there was a bell hung in his room, which was used on no occasion except to call him individually to the Duke's study. His Grace died in St James's square, in London, in the year 1804; the body was to be conveyed to Scotland, to lie in state at his mansion of Fleurs, and to be removed from thence to the family burial-place at Bowden. At this time, Archie, who had been long attacked by a liver complaint, was in the very last stage of that disease. Yet he prepared himself to accompany the body of his master, whom he had so long and so faithfully waited upon. The medical persons assured him he could not survive the journey. It signified nothing, he said, whether he died in England or in Scotland; he was resolved to assist in rendering the last honours to the kind master from whom he had been inseparable for so many years,—even if he should expire in the attempt. The poor invalid was permitted to attend the Duke's body to Scotland; but when they reached Fleurs, he was totally exhausted, and obliged to keep his bed, in a sort of stupor that announced speedy dissolution. On the morning of the day fixed for removing the dead body of the Duke to the place of burial, the private bell by which he was wont to summon his attendant to his study was rung violently. This might easily happen in the confusion of such a scene, although the people of the neighbourhood prefer believing that the bell sounded of its own accord. Ring, however, it did; and Archie, roused by the well-known summons, rose up in his bed, and faltered in broken accents, 'Yes, my Lord Duke, yes,—I will wait on your Grace immediately;' and, with these words on his lips, he is said to have fallen back and expired.—Notes to the Antiquary.

Digitized by Google

JEWISH BRANDY.—The Jews here make brandy from the following articles:—

From 150lb. of pears, which when in season cost about tenpence, they make about two gallons.

From 150lb. of figs, which cost about sixpence, they make about eight gallons.

From 150lb. of raisins, which cost about tenpence, eight and a half or nine gallons are extracted.

From 150lb. of dates, costing from twenty-five to twenty-eight pence, about seven gallons are obtained.

The brandy from dates is considered the best, and is sold for three shillings and sixpence per gallon.

The brandy from raisins and figs sells for about two and sixpence a gallon.

The brandy from pears fetches about three shillings and sixpence a gallon.

From 150lb. of grapes about eight gallons of tolerable wine is made, and four of brandy.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

[This spirit, moderate as the price is compared with even the British brandy in this country, appears very highly charged when compared with the cost of the fruit, that of the figs more especially, which, according to this statement, are sold at the rate of about six pounds for a farthing.]

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Der Freischutz—The Jenkinses—Timour the Tartar.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Hide and Seek.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two Children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance the Tyrolienne.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Yarnold. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Dane—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); Lindpaintner's Overture to 'Der Borgkonig;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortes.'

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

POPPING THE QUESTION.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

Ellen Murray, Mrs Newcombe. Miss Biffin, Mrs C. Jones.
Miss Winterblossom, Mrs Broad. Bobbin, Mrs Orger.
Mr Primrose, Mr Farren. Henry Thornton, Mr Howard.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LA REINE DE 16 ANS.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. BAYARD.
Reine, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Emma, Mlle. St. Ange.
Le Comte de Rantzoff, M. St. Albert. Frédéric de Bury, M. Alfred.
M. de Vaderg, M. Gamard. Un Officier du Palais, M. Guenée.

Suivi de

MALVINA; OU, UN MARIAGE D'INCLINATION.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. SCRIBE.
Malvina, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Marie, Mlle. Florval. Catherine, Mme. Baudin.
M. Dubreuil, M. St. Aubert. Arved Dubreuil, M. Paulin.
M. de Barentin, M. Alfred.

On finira par

LE QUAKER ET LA DANSEUSE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, par MM. SCRIBE et PAUL DUPONT.
Miss Georgina Barlow, Mlle. Léontine Fay.
James Morton, M. Laporte. Arthur D'Arsie, M. Alfred. Murray, M. Paulin.
Toby, M. Gamard. Un Domestique, M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs A. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with the Farce of

TWO STRINGS TO YOUR BOW.

Donna Clara, Miss Taylor. Leonora, Miss Lawrence. Maid, Mrs Brown.
Lazarillo, Mr Keeley. Don Pedro, Mr F. Matthews.
Don Sancho, Mr Barnes. Ferdinand, Mr Duruset. Borachio, Mr Evans.
Octavio, Mr Parry. Porter, Mr Fuller. Waiters, Messrs. Heath and Mears.

To-morrow, a Grand Performance of Sacred Music.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of

THE STRANGER.

[By KOTZEBUE.]

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. Poole. Countess Winterstein, Miss Scott.
Charlotte, Miss Vincent. Savoyard, Miss Somerville, with the original Ballad, 'I have a silent sorrow here.'
The Stranger, Mr Osbaldiston. Count Winterstein, Mr Honner. Peter, Mr Vale
Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Solomon, Mr Williams. Francis, Mr C. Hill.
Tobias, Mr Gough. The Count's Son, Master F. Carbery.
The Stranger's Children, Misses Clark and E. Clarke.

After which a New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Honner. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

To conclude with a new Petite Drama, entitled

THE COBLER OF MUNICH.

Liska, Miss Vincent.
Claus Kellerman, Mr C. Hill. Wynkin Plaus, Mr Vale. Franz, Mr Rogers.
Steibelt, Mr Lee. Soldiers, &c.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Executioner of Voorn—Basket Maker—Shocking Bad Hat—Bleeding Nun.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Stud of Burmese Ponies—Lilliputian Countess—Master H. Cooke's Riding Act—Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements for THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office,

Nº 223.] Price Twopence.]

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1831.

SOCIETY AS IT IS, AND AS IT MAY BE.

I DO not profess myself a Millenarian, but I have, nevertheless, a pleasure in imagining that a time will come, when mankind generally shall entertain juster opinions upon most subjects than they do at present, or have done hitherto; when the ordinary tone of thinking shall have been raised to a higher pitch; and when assumptions which will not bear the test of reason and reflection shall be no longer tolerated. In such a state of things, the objects of men's ambition will be changed. The rich man, no longer regarded for his riches, will learn to consider mere accumulation as folly, and study rather to employ his wealth usefully, conscious that only by so doing he can hope to derive respect from his fellow-creatures, or permanent satisfaction for himself. So also power, of whatever description, will be estimated according to the manner of its exercise; for the eyes of observers will be directed to its use rather than to its possession, and will measure its title to consideration, not by its extent, but by its productiveness in human happiness. I am no enemy to an Aristocracy, considered as persons who, without their own agency, find themselves in possession of distinctions, which, if they were to be conferred again, it is probable few of their actual possessors would receive; but I confess, that in a more advanced stage of thinking, I believe such distinctions will be but lightly appreciated by any; and I cannot conceive that the anomalies arising from them will find countenance from reasonable beings; nor that men will bear to hear such palpable absurdities, as that 'the crooked policy and mean disguise of the Noble Lord's conduct, is only to be paralleled by the treacherous proceeding of the Honourable Gentleman.' Such things are now said, and excite no particular wonder; they are even quite consistent with that laxity in the application of terms, which runs more or less through the general system of society. But other distinctions may with advantage undergo investigation. Those arising from acquirements in intellectual pursuits, may be expected to be submitted to various modifications; and the degrees of skill and capacity necessary to attain eminence in the diversified paths of literary occupation being more generally understood and appreciated, the merit ascribable to industry, patience, and perseverance, will not be confounded with that other and higher attribute which will be seen to belong to original talent or genius.

I will hazard a conjecture, that as moral qualities shall become, of all qualities, the most influential, and held in highest consideration, there will accordingly be many alterations in the present classification of the different grades of society, and that our arrangements with respect to the server and the served will assume altogether a new, or at least a revived and primitive character. At present, everybody is sensible, at times, of an unnatural alienation: an important service rendered by an inferior (the term in use) is acknowledged frequently, not as the heart prompts, but as the supposed dignity of the superior dictates as befitting. Much of this alienation is the result of the inequality of education; even the most free from the pride of rank or station may be excused for feeling some reluctance to treat as companions persons distinguished by habits of vulgarity or ignorance. When there is little to produce sympathy, there will easily be found something repulsive. But when the excrescences consequent on the neglect of the interests of the lower orders, as they are called, have been smoothed away by the hand of the instructor, the repulsiveness will be no longer felt, and the title of fellow-creature will be recognised as a full warrant to all who bear it, to claim a free participation in all the means of friendship. The abuse of the term Equality during the French Revolution has blinded the world to its natural propriety; and yet such are the present habits of society, that from the peasant to the peer, the generality are in slavish awe of some one they acknowledge as their superior, and whose superiority they, at the same time feel to be a grievance. Is there nothing which requires correction here? Is it a necessary consequence of human society, that the individuals which compose it should submit to regulations which they dislike, and yet can change? Surely not: but it is possible that a craving after things erroneously supposed to be necessary to human happiness may generate a disposition to acquiesce, for private purposes, in much which a clear judgment would not sanction; but when men learn to regulate their avidity after objects by truer estimates of their value, a consistency more creditable to human nature will ensue, and the homage which the lip now too often pays, without the concurrence of the understanding or the heart, will then be neither sought nor yielded.

SAINT-MAKING.

[Translated from VOLTAIRE.]

IT is well known that all civilized countries have worshipped a God, the creator of the world. Some have composed for this God, a court, of which he has no need; and in this court they have placed their great men, that they might have friends and protectors near their master. Divus Trajanus, and Divus Antoninus, literally mean nothing more than St Trajan, and St Antoninus. These saints were proposed as models to the emperors,—models but little copied. If we had St Bertrand du Guesclin, St Bayard, St Montmorency, and especially St Henry the Fourth, I do not see that such an apotheosis would be misplaced. Why should we not have St l'Hôpital? The Chancellor was moderate in a violent age, and made wise laws, notwithstanding the horrible extravagances of the court. I would willingly address an orison to St Thou, the most just of magistrates, and the best of historians.

The Marshal de Turenne is certainly in paradise, since he became a catholic, and there can be no doubt but the Marshal de Catinat is there too. The one died for his country, the other, after gaining its battles, suffered disgrace and poverty, without complaining. If altars should be raised to them, I promise to invoke them.

'Oh! oh!' say the bankers of the court of Rome, 'but saints are not to be made at will. It is a very expensive process. Here you propose eight at a time;—that would cost eight hundred thousand crowns, to be paid to the apostolic chamber,—at three hundred thousand francs a piece, which is quite a bargain.' • • • I reply to these gentlemen, that I do not design to obtain these saintships in exchange for money: that I wish to revere Henry the Fourth, Turenne, Catinat, de Thou, and the Chancellor de l'Hôpital, as saints, without going to any expense about it, and that I will never purchase paradise, either for myself or for any one else.

Who were the first saints of Christianity?—Charitable men, martyrs. How did they become so venerated?—By the general consent of the people, without cost. Now I maintain that Henry the Fourth is a true martyr. He was engaged in promoting the happiness of Europe, when he fell a martyr to fanaticism. And as to the consent of the people, it is already given. When the Bishop of Puy en Vélai pronounced his funeral oration, in St Denis, those who could not hear him, whether from distance or hardness of hearing, left their places, went to the tomb of Henry the Fourth, threw themselves on their knees, watered it with their tears, and offered up the most touching prayers. What is wanting to such a consecration? He was canonized by the hearts of his people,—by the voice of their love. It is now thought necessary that a hundred years should pass away before a man can be canonized, that the witnesses of his earthly follies may have time to die. More than a hundred and fifty have elapsed since the martyrdom of Henry the Fourth. But let the witnesses and the objects of his weaknesses re-appear;—let them depose against him,—I will adore him still. I will say to Corisande d'Andouin, to Charlotte des Essarts, to La Belle Gabrielle, and to the rest,—'It is true, ladies, that he caressed you, but he saved France at the battles of Arques and Ivry; he was just, merciful, and beneficent; he had the goodness of Titus, and the valour of Cæsar: this is my saint.' They will tell me, that we must have female saints also. I fully admit this. Who shall hinder me from glorifying Margaret of Anjou, who fought in person, in twelve battles against the English, to deliver from prison her imbecile husband? I will invoke our Maid of Orleans, for whom the service has already been composed, in decasyllabic verse. We have a score of noble women, who deserve to have prayers addressed to them. To whom, indeed, should we give festivals, if not to them? Most assuredly they ought to have their festivals.—[However readily it may be admitted that Voltaire's choice of saints was an improvement upon that of the priests, the philosophers of the present day would make a better.]

Digitized by Google

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

THE COHENS IN BARBARY.

The Jews who bear the name of Cohen, are held in great respect in Barbary. When in the synagogue, they are placed higher than the rest of the congregation, and one of them reads a chapter from the Bible to the congregation every sabbath day. On the birth of the first born child in every family, it is customary for one of the Cohens, at the same synagogue as that to which the father of the child belongs, to be introduced to the mother when in bed, whom he interrogates as to the real father of the infant. After this, the child being placed in his hands, he advances towards the door, pretending that he is going to carry it away in order to adopt is as his own, and to dedicate it to the Lord, by bringing it up as a priest. When he reaches the door, however, the relations of the infant get round him, and a kind of bargain is made, with a good deal of mock ceremony, by which on the payment of a few dollars, he agrees to give back the child to the parents. The money thus obtained, should he be rich, is distributed among the poor; if needy himself, which is usually the case, care is taken that his charity begins at home.—[This strange piece of flummery seems about as useless, and absurd, as the affectedly mysterious preparation of the kenno and groaning-malt, described by Sir Walter Scott.]

MOORISH WEDDINGS AT TANGIER.

Nothing appears more extraordinary to a European on his first arrival in the country, or impresses him more forcibly with a conviction that he is among a barbarous race, than the marriage ceremonies. The Moor marries when corn is plentiful. This was now the case, the harvest having been most abundant; and the number of weddings that were celebrated every night, according to the custom, kept the town in a state of continual rejoicing and uproar. As soon as it was dark, the narrow streets of Tangier were literally blocked up by moving crowds, whose steps were illuminated by numberless lanterns, while their ears were regaled with irregular discharge of guns, relieved, if it could so be called, by the barbarous notes of the Moorish instruments. To give, however, a more detailed account of this curious ceremony, which is divided into several acts:—The first part of it that I had an opportunity of witnessing, was the bearing of the present from the future bridegroom to the parents of his intended. The former walked at the head of a numerous procession, in the midst of which three black female slaves bore on their heads vessels containing cloth, muslin, and other stuffs, tied up in silk bands; an enormous dish of kouskous then followed; the rear being brought up by two horses, and a mule laden with wheat and barley. Previous to the wedding, a procession is formed at night by the bridegroom, who is conducted by his friends, arm in arm, through the different parts of the town, accompanied by music and firing. The concluding and most singular part of the whole ceremony is the bridal night. On this occasion, the bridegroom on leaving his own house, attired in his white salham, or cloak, and with his sword girded before him, proceeds on horseback towards the quarter where his intended resides; he is accompanied by large bodies of his friends and connexions on foot, bearing lanterns in their hands, and is attended by two boys, who keep throwing handkerchiefs towards him, as if in the act of fanning him; the procession being headed by a band of music, consisting of the Moorish tambour or drum, and two or three hautboys, from which the most detestable sounds proceed. The approach of the procession is announced by loud discharges of guns; and it having arrived at the house of the bride, it stays there until she is ready, the bridegroom remaining on horseback, and the whole length of the street being thronged by the accompanying crowds. The door of the house is now thrown open, and a kind of wooden cage with a conical top, and not unlike a small pulpit, is brought out, containing the fair bird. This is hoisted on the back of a horse, stationed ready to receive its precious burden and led by a slave. This part of the operation is not accomplished frequently without some difficulty, on account of the weight of the cage, but more particularly of that of its fair inhabitant, who, according to the Moorish taste in this respect, not unfrequently weighs as much as the animal who has the felicity of bearing her. Should the bridegroom have been married before, the wedding is not near so brilliant, as he remains at home to receive his bride; and should the latter be a widow, she does not ride, but is conducted on foot by the women to the house of the bridegroom. The bride being on horseback, the whole procession, which by this time, has been very considerably swelled, proceeds at a slow pace through all parts of the town, winding along the numerous dark alleys and streets, which are scarcely wide enough to admit a person on horseback. The strangeness of the spectacle is such that a Christian observing it for the first time, would scarcely suppose that he beheld human beings. Fancy the procession in motion, and a concourse of people attired wholly in white, proceeding at nearly midnight perhaps, at a slow funeral pace; in the rear, numbers of men armed with guns of an enormous length, deafen you with repeated irregular discharges of powder, firing at the feet and faces of the spectators, dancing at the same time, and making use of the most extravagant gestures. The music now advances, and your ears are greeted with sounds as diabolical as any savages ever made, which are produced by the instruments before mentioned. A confused crowd of persons now approach with lanterns in their hands, in the midst of which is seen the bridegroom on horseback, his face muffled up, and his sword now girded behind him, and followed by another horse, bearing the strange machine already described. The rear of the cavalcade is brought up by several women, who accompany the bride to her new habitation, while an indiscriminate crowd of persons follow. The procession does not proceed direct to the house of the bridegroom, if it did, the ceremony would be all over in a few minutes, and the effect lost; on which account, it is first conducted through all parts of the town, and from the slowness of the pace at which it proceeds, and the crowds that accompany it, it is frequently an hour or more before it reaches its final destination. On arriving at the house, a general halt is made, the bridegroom dismounts and enters his habitation, and the box which contains his better half is carried in at the same time; the door is then shut, and this terminates the ceremony. Large dishes of kouskous are afterwards brought out and distributed to the crowd, and the firing and rejoicing is often kept up a great part of the night. Among the poorer classes, the whole affair lasts only two or three days, but is prolonged should the bridegroom be wealthy, it being usual for him to invite his friends and acquaintance to an entertainment: and thus the rejoicings conclude.—Vol. I. pp. 165—169.

THE AUTHOR'S RECEPTION IN TETUAN.

I had not been very long at my new quarters at Mr Hassan's, when an officer came, on the part of the governor, to congratulate me on my arrival at Tetuan; and having dismissed him with a present, and intrusted to him the letters I had brought, I received a second communication to say that the governor would receive me at four in the afternoon; and accordingly, at that hour, I proceeded to the palace or house which belongs to the Sultan, accompanied by my interpreter, Mr Hassan, and two superior alkaids or officers, who had been sent to conduct me, and whose rapacious looks were already devouring the dollars that it would be necessary to give them. I had previously arranged my present of tea and sugar, to soften the countenance and gladden the heart of the great man I was about to visit. As we passed through the filthy streets of the Jews' town, we were followed as usual by troops of Jew boys, who were, however, kept at a respectful distance by a venerable looking old Moor with a white flowing beard, who had joined our party, and evinced so much attention, which was evidently never intended to be gratuitous,—that I inquired who he was; and learnt that he was the Moorish alkaid of the quarter in which the Jews resided. On entering the palace, I was not a little surprised to find myself received with all the state of an eastern prince. A long file of soldiers attired in milk-white hayks and turbans, with swords and dirks, were ranged in a kind of lofty entrance-hall; from whence we passed into an open court where the governor's horses were drawn up, handsomely accoutred, with an attendant to each in his best robes. Among them, I remarked a chesnut and a gray not far short of the height of an English horse, and displaying very fine shape and bone. We now proceeded through a garden, along a trellis-walk covered with vines loaded with grapes, on each side of which was drawn up a line of troops, who were remarkably fine fierce-looking well-dressed fellows. Passing through them, we reached an open kind of alcove, in which the governor was sitting in state in an arm-chair worked in silk, and which was apparently of old French manufacture. No one was with him but a Moor, who was seated cross-legged on a small stuffed kind of cushion, and who, I was informed, was the second collector of the customs, the governor discharging the duties of the first himself. There were some chairs ready placed at a short distance from him; and with the dignity of manner which in particular distinguishes the Moor, on my appearance, he desired me to be seated. Addressing him then, through my interpreter, I spoke shortly but forcibly to his best feelings, by saying that, although I intended to make only a short stay, I was unwilling to present myself empty-handed; and begged to offer him my profound respects, accompanied with some tea and sugar: this, my interpreter, suiting the action to the speech, and advancing immediately, delivered to one of his attendants, who placed the present on the ground near his master. At the sight of the tea and sugar, his countenance assumed a look of complacency; and, addressing me, he told me that I was welcome, and that he was glad to see me; that as to my present, there was no occasion for my having brought it, for that it was his duty to attend to all my wants; that he was always glad to see the English, and liked them better than any other nation. Having ceased speaking, the attendants now brought in a large tea-tray, with a handsome set of English china, which they placed upon the ground, together with a smaller tray, filled with fine lump-sugar, and a variety of almond-cakes. The latter were very delicious, and had been prepared, as I was afterwards told, in expectation of the Sultan's coming. Green tea of an exceedingly good flavour, was now poured out, ready sweetened, in small cups. The governor, whose name was Mohamed Ashash, and whose father was said to have been once a common muleteer, was attired in a fine white sulham. He was a good-looking man, about forty years of age, with a round fairish face, and a sensible penetrating expression of countenance. Few questions were asked by him during the interview; and when I was about to take my leave, he asked me if there was anything he could do for me, and said he would send an officer to show me the Sultan's garden at Kitan, a short distance from the town. I was well aware that I should have to pay for all the attention and honours shewn to me, and the hour of reckoning now arrived; for, with the exception of the governor himself, there was not a person that it was not necessary to give a present of money to,—from the alkaids who were in attendance, down to the grooms, including the whole of the soldiers. Altogether, as may be supposed, the fees amounted to a good round sum. This would have been all very well, if they had been satisfied with what had certainly been liberally bestowed; but having previously heard that I was a great man and very rich, they were determined to get as much out of me as possible; and such a clamour was set up by these mean wretches for more money, even within the hearing of the governor himself, and such a scene of altercation and wrangling ensued as to the division of what had been received, that I was glad to make my escape as quickly as possible.

Digitized by Google

JEWISH VALUATION OF PRESENTS.

No one who looks at a Moor, can do so without paying for it in some shape or other; but the stranger who is ambitious to be presented to the sultan,—or in other words, to behold his face, as the Moorish expression is—must purchase the gratification on pretty dear terms, no one being admitted to his royal presence, without carrying something, and the very lowest present that a European could offer would cost him, together with the numerous fees and other expenses, scarcely less than a hundred pounds. The presents usually made, and which are most acceptable to the descendant of the Prophet, are, besides those already mentioned, velvets, china, fire-arms, gun-powder,—all of which are considered, as it is termed, good articles. When a present is received of a consul, it is generally valued immediately afterwards by a Jew; and should his valuation pretty nearly equal what it is stated to have cost, the sultan prizes it, says it is good, and keeps it. This, however is not often the case, as the Jew usually fixes a value upon it, which is about a third of the original price; because, if, to please the sultan, he should value it highly, it is ten to one but he is compelled to take it himself; whereas, should he fix a low price upon it, he has a chance of getting something by it, by purchasing it himself. When a present is made—with the exception of what the sultan keeps for his own use, or that of his harem—it generally finds its way into the hands of the Jews a few days after it has been made; and instances have sometimes occurred of a magnificent and costly service of china having been presented by a European consul on the part of his sovereign, and which, having been disposed of by the sultan for a mere trifle, and dispersed piecemeal among the Jews, has afterwards been actually collected and bought up for a tenth part of what it had originally cost, by the very person who had given it as a present.—Vol. I. pp. 221—223.

THE PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT.

In those golden days,—and for aught I know it may still be practised,—it was a frequent custom for an individual to buy another of the Sultan, if he fancied he was rich, and that he could make anything by this humane speculation. The way in which it was managed was this: the person wishing to make the purchase went before the bashaw or governor of the district, and bargained with him for such or such a person; and when at last they had agreed between themselves as to the price, each party trying to cheat the other, in enhancing the probability of gain or loss by the transaction, the money was paid, and a receipt given, which entitled the buyer to the body of the individual bought, whoever he might be, and who was accordingly delivered into his hands. The latter part I cannot better explain than by inserting part of a letter on this horrible system, written by an English merchant who resided at Tetuan in the reign of Muley Ishmael, and which I find inserted in a curious account of a journey to Mequinez in 1721, written during Commodore Stewart's embassy to that city. 'Yesterday, Mr Noble and I were passing by the prison, where we saw a man hanged by the heels, with irons upon his legs, pincers upon his nose, his flesh cut with scissors, and two men perpetually drubbing him, and demanding money. When the fellow was not able to speak, they renewed their blows; and this was a bought man, that they gave 500 ducats for, and expected by the tortures to force out of him 500 ducats more.' It is related of Muley Ishmael, in the same account, that being on an expedition, and coming to a river, which his army could not pass, he ordered all his prisoners to be killed, and interwoven with rushes to form a bridge. It may easily be imagined, when Christian slavery was in full force, in what way the unfortunate wretches were treated who fell into his clutches, when so little regard was paid to the lives of his own subjects. No person appeared before him without trembling and uncertainty of going out of his presence alive. When he had killed a favourite through caprice or passion, he would sometimes forget what he had done, and make enquiry for the murdered person; and on being told he was dead, he would ask who killed him; to which his attendants would reply, trembling, that they did not know, but supposed it was God's doing. When he chanced, in his haste, to kill any one in mistake for another, as was frequently the case, he would civilly beg his pardon, saying he did not intend to kill the poor man; and whenever he beat a person soundly, and put him in chains, he was considered in the high road to preferment, as he would generally call on him a few days afterwards, and finding him in prison, affect to be surprised, and, calling him 'his dear friend,' would enquire how he came in that unfortunate plight, and sending him a suit of his own clothes, would place him in some high and lucrative post, which having entered upon in a pennyless state, it could be calculated with the greater certainty how much he would be worth at the expiration of a certain term, when he was sure of being again stripped of everything by his royal patron.—Vol. I, pp. 228—230.—[It is understood that laws and governments originated in the general necessity of obtaining protection from brute force; yet, great as the mistake has proved, in many instances, in allowing so much power to their governors, men have for ages submitted to their tyranny, and thus subjected themselves to greater evils than they had originally sought to avoid. It is less strange that unlimited power should thus brutalize the few who enjoy it, than that myriads should consent to be thus enslaved, and to tremble before the meanest of their species.]

JEWISH CEREMONIES.

April 4th.—At night the Jewish ceremonies commenced, to commemorate the deliverance of the Israelites from their captivity in Egypt, and I went to the house of one of the principal Jews for the purpose of witnessing them. They were introduced by all present singing part of the Bible in a loud voice, the company afterwards drinking each a glass of wine and eating some celery dipped in vinegar, and every one taking a small portion of unleavened bread in his hands. A verse was then sung, and the supper being ready prepared, the principal dish was waved by the master of the house over the heads of the family and the rest of the company assembled, the dish being afterwards placed in the centre of the table, while he continued to read from the Bible: a basin was now brought in, containing water, and while each person washed his hands, wine was added drop by drop, certain words being pronounced on the falling of each drop. A glass of wine was then handed round to all, and held up, and on the reading of a certain passage in the holy book, all drank, children as well as grown-up people. Water was now again brought in, and every one washed his hands; two small pieces of unleavened bread being also given to each person. A small ball, resembling a good-sized pill, was then put into a saucer of vinegar to dissolve, and each person dipping his piece of celery in it, carried it to his mouth, some words of Hebrew being pronounced at the same time. The ball was composed, I was told, of almonds, walnuts, figs, apples, honey, and all kinds of spices, pounded together. More unleavened bread and a piece of celery were afterwards distributed to all, and eaten, some words being repeated as before; after which the company proceeded to supper. During the repast, two more glasses of wine were drunk, making four glasses altogether, which quantity every Jew is obliged to drink that night: after the last glass is finished, no one can eat or drink anything more until the next morning. During the above, the master of the house was seated higher than the rest of the company, leaning on his right arm. While this ceremony, which is called the Pasqua, continues, there is a general feasting; bread, or anything containing leaven, as porter, &c. must be removed: even wafers cannot be kept in the house at this period. Numbers of articles of this kind were now sent me as presents: every dish and utensil must also be new at the time of this feast. This ceremony of the Pasqua is practised, I believe, by the Jews in all countries.

April 6th.—This was the last day of the Pasqua, and in the evening I repaired to the house of the principal Jewish merchant of the town, Isaac Benzeatreati, to witness the conclusion of the ceremonies, which latter part is peculiar, as I was told, to Barbary. On my entrance, I was conducted by the master of the house to the principal room, and seated beside him. The apartment was highly illuminated by about twenty lamps, suspended by handsome brass chains from the ceiling; there being likewise silver candlesticks with wax candles. Over the lamps were placed ears of new wheat, which at this season was of course quite green; in the middle of the room, a large table was laid out, covered with silk, and containing the following things: namely, a handsome glass vessel filled with milk, china dishes containing salad, fish (a kind of river mullet or trout, as I was told) honey, cakes, and all sorts of sweetmeats. This being the grand night, I had not arrived long before numerous visitors came in, each person on his entrance saluting the master and mistress of the house, by kissing their hands. As each person entered, he was presented with a small piece of the salad dipped in the honey; on receiving this, the visitor blessed the house, wishing it all kind of prosperity and good fortune. The mistress of the house, to whom the whole management of everything appeared to be left (the master chatting and laughing all the time along with his guests), offered the company sweetmeats, which some accepted, others not, according to their inclinations. The salad dipped in honey, was, I observed, taken, as a matter of course, by all. Some of the visitors remained but a short time, taking their departure for the houses of their other friends, the same kind of ceremony being general throughout the town, and being continued from eight o'clock until midnight. I observed no wine or other liquors in use this evening. In Barbary, no Jew is allowed to shave his head for forty days, from the commencement of the feast of the Pasqua.

A Royal Pun.—His Majesty, it is well known, has a great aversion to unnecessary ceremonies. A correspondent of a daily paper says, he has been frequently heard to observe to the Lords in Waiting, 'I hate all form, unless it be Re-form.'

—Previous to the threatened contest in Devonshire, a noble Tory lord was heard to declare that he had the election in his pocket. On this being told to Lord Ebrington, he is said to have rejoined, 'That may be; but what Lord R. has got in his pocket he likes to keep there.'

Digitized by Google

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE FORSAKEN HEARTH.

"Without hearts there is no home."—BYRON.

He sat beside his forsaken hearth,
And mute were the gladsome tones of mirth
That once from the lips of the loved and young
Gladden'd his heart with the songs they sung,
The songs of his youthful years.

His thin grey hairs o'er his high brow fell,
Whiten'd by griefs which he might not tell;
Wan were his cheeks, and his eyes' dim light
Shone weak as the faintest star of night
Through its misty world of tears.

He sighs for the songs and the burst of glee
From their young hearts flowing in gladness free,
And the sunset hours, when their steps were heard
In the shadowy grove by the leaves they stirr'd;
As the leaves their hearts were light.

They meet not now in the evening hour,
'Neath the golden bloom of their cottage bower,
Where the rose-tree breathes, and the violet's breast,
So bright with the dews that have there sought rest
Through the dreary hours of night.

He deems they may yet return to their home,
With the joy of childhood they all may come;
For his spirit oft calls the wanderers back
To his cheerless hearth, from the stormy track
Where their weary feet have trode.

They may all return, but the light will be dead
In the cottage hearth which their fathers fed;
A dark green mound, where no mourner weeps,
Will tell where his broken spirit sleeps,
In death's sad silent abode. H.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THE MINORS.—The little theatres are thriving most gloriously. Some of our best actors or now on their boards. Kean appears at the City Subscription on Monday next; Mrs Glover is engaged at the Pavilion; Wilkinson, Russell, and Mrs Humby, and Mr Green are at the Queen's (which re-opens on Monday); and Elliston is playing at the Surrey. Covent Garden and Drury Lane may well look about them after this. When Warde, Abbott, and Egerton leave Covent Garden, which it is said they are about to do, and take with them some of the best performers of the two large houses to the new theatre now building at Knightsbridge, the Patent Theatres will be in a poor plight indeed! Had they not better revive some of the good old comedies, and not depend for their success on one or two clever new ones?—VESTER.

PAGANINI.—Our friend Sir Charles, who, by the the bye, never wears creaking shoes, consequently has no music in his sole, perpetrated the following, on learning the moderate charge to witness the performance of this modern Orpheus, at the Opera-house:—

What are they who pay three guineas
To hear a tune of Paganini's?
Echo—'Pac o'ninnies!' Times.

NOVEL CORPS DRAMATIQUE.—A drama of a singular kind has been brought out at the Cirque Olympique in Paris, entitled Les Lions de Mysore, in which real lions perform their parts to the great delight of crowded houses—even kangaroos, boas, and other wild animals have been tamed, and taught to bear their parts comme des personnes raisonnables.—Globe.

— It is said that the elephant just placed in the Zoological Gardens took a great liking, when on board of ship, to articles of female apparel: while at Blackwall he took from her head, and devoured without ceremony, a lady's bonnet; and took from another her reticule, containing half-a-dozen nonpareils, which he swallowed, bag and all!

WEIGHTY REASONS FOR AN IDLE LIFE.—A Highland laird, whose peculiarities live still in the recollection of his countrymen, used to regulate his residence at Edinburgh in the following manner:—Every day he visited the Water-gate, as it is called, of the Canongate, over which is extended a wooden arch. Specie being then the general currency, he threw his purse over the gate, and so long as it was heavy enough to be thrown over, he continued his round of pleasure in the metropolis; when it was too light, he thought it time to retire to the Highlands.—Query—How often would he have repeated this experiment at Temple-bar?—Notes to Old Mortality.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Mr MACREADY respectfully announces to his Friends and the Public, that his Benefit is fixed for FRIDAY, May 27, 1831, when will be revived Shakspeare's Historical Tragedy of CORIOLANUS. Menenius Agrippa, Mr DOWTON; Tullus Aufidius, Mr COOPER; Caius Marcius, Mr MACREADY; Volumnia, Miss HUDDART; Virgilia, Miss PHILLIPS. After which, in One Act, Sheridan's Entertainment of THE CRITIC, OR A TRAGEDY REHEARSED. Don Ferdinando Whiskerandos, Mr LISTON; Beefeater, Mr HARLEY; Sneer, Mr COOPER; Puff, (for that night only) Mr MACREADY. To conclude with a Grand Dramatic Spectacle.

Tickets and Places to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and of Mr MACREADY, 31 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea—Kenilworth.
DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great—Popping the Question—Timour the Tartar.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Two Strings to Your Bow.
FRENCH PLAYS.—La Reine de 16 Ans—Malvina—Le Quaker et la Danseuse.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Grand Miscellaneous and Popular Selection of VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.
Conductor, Mr H. R. Bishop.
Principal Vocal Performers:
Miss Inverarity, Miss Hughes, Miss Pearson, Miss Riviere, Miss Bruce, Miss S. Phillips, Miss Byfeld, Miss Russell, Mrs Bedford, Miss Harrington, Miss Crawford, Miss Levoi, Mrs Mapleson, and Mrs Waylett. Mr Braham, Mr Sinclair, Mr T. Cooke, Mr Horn, Mr Bedford, Mr Robinson, Mr G. Smith, and Mr Phillips.

Instrumental Solo Performers:

Mr Oury	Violin.
Mr Lindley	Violoncello.
Mr Nicholson	Flute.
Signor Puzzi	Horn.
Mr Harper	Trumpet.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.
New Entertainment.
Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his
COMIC ANNUAL.
In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'
PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.
After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called
YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.
In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Historical, Allegorical and Pictorial Drama, in Six Parts, entitled
NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.
The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.
French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol. Panchon, Mlle. Rosier. Friska, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan. Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon. Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede. Marmont, Mr Almar. Lauriston, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young. Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford. Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill. Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Harris. Eau de vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery. Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs. François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.
Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.
English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville. General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Halcombe, Mr Young. Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Ap Griffiths, Mr Honner. Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Ambition, Mr Almar. Justice, Miss Scott.

To conclude with the Burletta, entitled
THE SPOIL'D CHILD.
Little Pickle, (with the original Songs and a Sailor's Hornpipe) Miss Vincent. Miss Pickle, Mme. Simon. Maria, Miss Nicol. Margery, Mrs Rogers. Susan, Miss Rumens. Old Pickle, Mr D. Pitt. John, Mr Rogers. Thomas, Mr Tully. Tag, Mr Vale.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Executioner of Voorn—Basket Maker—Shocking Bad Hat—Bleeding Nun.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Stud of Burmese Ponies—Lilliputian Countess—Master H. Cooke's Riding Act—Vaulting Act—Xenocles the Greek Warrior.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPELL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Flalong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 224.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MAY 23, 1831.

PROGRESSIVE CHANGES IN ENGLISH PROSE WRITING.

[About thirteen years ago, Mr Coleridge delivered a series of Lectures on various subjects, at the room of the Philosophical Society in Fetter lane. The following are recollections of one of them, from a few notes made at the time, by one of his auditors, who felt too highly gratified with what he heard, not to be desirous of preserving something for future reflection. This sketch conveys a very inadequate idea of the Lecture itself, and is offered to the reader as the crude and imperfect attempt of an unprofessional and unpractised hand. It is to be regretted that the series has never been published by the author.]

The influence of national character on language is exemplified in the literature of the eastern nations, in that of the Greeks, of our own, and of the northern nations.

The Greek writings are distinguished by long sentences, formed, as it were, architecturally; each part is built on the preceding; and the whole sentence would lose by changing the arrangement. The modern construction among ourselves is more simple. The sentences are short, but preserve a consistency with each other. Such is the prose writing of Chaucer.

A more popular style followed; but the confusion resulting from the civil wars prevents us from seeing the transition. In Luther we have a striking example of the popular style, popular in the highest sense of the term, addressing the intellect of the reader, and readily understood wherever good sense is the habit of the mind. A similar style, with less genius, may be found in Latimer and other writers of Edward the Sixth's time and the preceding reign.

After the restoration came the classic style. A true relish of this style presupposed a taste and cultivation in the reader somewhat corresponding to it; for it was too learned to be popular. Boccaccio, it is true, was popular; but we can account for the exception in him, by the fascination of his subjects. Hooker, Bacon, Milton, and Jeremy Taylor are distinguished ornaments of the classic style.

[The Lecturer here read an extract from Sir Francis Walsingham, Minister in Queen Elizabeth's time. He characterized it as plain, sober language, but distinguished by talent; void of affectation, and of clear meaning. It bore evidence that the writer had thought before he attempted to communicate. The subject was Honesty.]

Jeremy Taylor reconciles the architectural and the classic styles. His sentences are of great length, yet do not require review in order to understand them; the words are judiciously chosen, and the sentence grows with the importance of the subject. [Two admirable extracts were read in illustration,—the first on Original Sin, the other on the Progress of Disputes.]

The style next in succession was of a very different nature. The new stylists resembled a person who tries to recollect all the good things he has heard during the last three months, that he may give utterance to them all together. They strung together sparkling points, unrelieved by intermediate plainness. Their writings bear marks of recollection, not of reflection. In the writings of Taylor, &c. uncommon and foreign words are not unfrequently used; but they are used only when no others could be found so expressive of the author's meaning. Sir Thomas Browne appears to be the first who used uncommon words for their own sake. Mr C. confessed that Sir Thomas, with all his imperfections, was a favourite of his. He described him as a sublime and quiet enthusiast; as bearing some resemblance to Montaigne, but entering into his speculations with more intenseness of purpose than the French writer. His writings bear the stamp of an original and amiable mind. The only imitable quality of them is their entireness, or plenitude of illustration. [A passage from Sir T. B.'s 'Treatise on Urn-Burial' was read.

Barrow and his contemporaries next come under consideration. Their predecessors offended by pedantry. It now became a mark of loyalty to pass into the other extreme, and everything must appear free and unlaboured. Hence proceeded occasional quaintness, and sometimes even ludicrousness. For instance, in Barrow's 'Sermon on Spiritual Monarchy,' the action of St Peter, in cutting off the ear of the High Priest's servant, is thus stated,—'Up rose his blood, and out popped his sword.' Sir Roger L'Estrange and Jeremy Collier carried this plainness to excess. The style of this period was infected with a sort of slang or blackguardism. Notwithstanding these defects, there is much to approve in the writers in question. Their style is purely English, full of idioms, and partakes of the passions of man in general. An extract from Roger North's 'Life of his Brother, the Lord Keeper,' followed in illustration. The liveliness of the thoughts were well conveyed by the words. It was the opinion of some, that the first perfect models of good writing were produced [after the Revolution. We had,' however, perfect models before,—of the architectural style in Hooker, of the impetuous in Taylor, of elegant simplicity in Cowley: with some abatement, Algernon Sydney and Dryden were also good models. [Here Cowley's account of Oliver Cromwell's funeral was in part extracted.] The style of Cowley is most fitted for imitation; it is distinguished by variety of excellence.

Our great poets, Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, Dryden, &c. were all good prose-writers: they seemed to have kept their thoughts on separate shelves, so as to avoid that injudicious mixture of poetry with prose which disgusts us in less skilful writers. The style of Swift may be considered perfect: by no defects it reminds us of itself.

After the Revolution, we became commercial; and our style suffered considerably. It was not learned, nor plain, nor popular; the thoughts were common-place, but the manner was strange. The first object seemed to be,—not to speak naturally. [Mr C. illustrated this part of his subject by extracts from Mr Phillips's speech, in the case of Guthrie v. Sterne, and exposed the absurdities and false eloquence contained in it. The instances he selected were of false antithesis, confusion of metaphor, bathos and sheer nonsense.]

Mr Coleridge then gave a few instructions which he conceived might be usefully adopted in order to write and talk respectably.—We should not express ourselves till we feel that we know clearly what we mean to express. The want of previous reflection is the cause of much incoherent and unconnected writing and talking.

Adverting to the opinion of a Greek writer (Strabo, I believe), that none but a good man could be a great poet, the Lecturer concurred with him, and thought, moreover, that moral excellence was necessary to the perfection of the understanding and the taste. The good writer should be a lover of what is common to all his fellow-creatures, rather than of what makes them unequal; he should desire the esteem of good men; he should look to fame rather than to reputation. Fame is the approbation of the wise of successive generations; reputation is often no more than the echo of hastily-formed opinions. Many contemptible works have had great reputation; few works greatly reputed at first, have afterwards ripened into fame.

We should use no words nor sentences which can be translated into simpler words with the same meaning.

Shakspeare and Milton are distinguished by their appropriate use of words. You cannot change a word without injury to the effect. The first two lines of Dryden's translation of Juvenal's Tenth Satire were contrasted with Johnson's imitation of the same passage. Johnson takes up six lines, and does not well express his meaning after all.

Dryden's two lines are,—

> 'Look round the habitable globe: how few
> Know their own good, or knowing it, pursue.'

Johnson's six are,—

> 'Let observation, with extensive view,
> Survey mankind, from China to Peru;
> Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
> And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
> Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate,
> O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
> Where wavering man,' &c.

Digitized by Google

The great source of bad writing is a desire in the writers to be thought something more than men of sense. Language is made a sort of leap-frog. Our poetry runs after something more than human; our prose runs after our poetry; and even our conversation follows in the pursuit. At a dinner of twenty persons, when your health is proposed, you are expected to return thanks in a set speech. Metaphors are used, not to illustrate, but as substitutes for plain speaking. The frequent rendering of abstractions into persons is also a growing evil, as in the following line:—

'Come, I shed compassion's tear.'

which is the same as saying that Mrs A. sheds Mrs B's tear.

Sound sense and sound feeling are necessary to a good writer. Accuracy is akin to veracity. They who are accustomed to weigh the meaning of words before they utter them are much less likely to disregard truth in greater matters, than those who, from neglecting accuracy, lose the sense of its importance. We should habituate ourselves to see the relation of our thoughts to each other; we should consider pleasure derived without any effort as enervating, and therefore undesirable. That only is permanent which appeals to something permanent in our natures.—[A few brief observations concluded the Lecture.]—From a Correspondent.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER FROM SIR GEORGE OUSLEY TO THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ.

In consequence of the Persian ambassador, Mina Abul Hassun Khan's limited sojourn in England in 1810, and I am proud to think, from a kindly feeling to myself, Sir Thomas Lawrence contrived, in the short space of seventy-four days, to finish a beautiful portrait of his Excellency, that is generally considered, not only an excellent likeness, but one of the best pictures he ever painted. Indeed he was himself so proud of it, that on my return from Persia in 1815, he made me promise never to let any one but himself clean or varnish it. His Excellency Mirza Shefi, prime minister of the King of Persia, called upon me one morning at Tehran, so unexpectedly that I had not time to remove the Persian ambassador's portrait from the sofa on which I had placed it, the moment before, from out of its packing-case. I hastened to the door of the drawing-room to receive the minister, and taking him by the hand, was leading him to the sofa, when he unaccountably drew back. It is necessary to premise that in Persian houses (and I was then living in a palace lent me by the king, while my own was building) the apartments have frequently open windows, as well as doors of communication to other rooms on the same floor, and that Mirza Shefi may have possibly mistaken the frame of the picture, erect against the wall, for that of a window. At all events, it did not injure the illusion. On looking back to learn the cause of the hesitation, I perceived the minister's countenance inflamed with anger, which, before I could enquire the cause of it, burst forth in an apostrophe to the portrait. "I think," said he, "that when the representative of the King of England does me the honour of standing up to receive me, in due respect to him, you should not be seated." I could not resist laughing at this delightful mistake, and before I could explain, he said to me, "Yes, it is your Excellency's kindness to that impertinent fellow that encourages such disrespect, but with your permission, I'll soon teach him to know his distance." Shaking his cane at the picture, he uttered a volley of abuse at poor Mirza Abul Hassan, and said that if he had forgotten all proper respect to Sir Gore Ouseley, he must at least show it to the representative of his own sovereign. His rage was most violent, and I was obliged to bring him close to the picture, before he was undeceived. In the course of my life, I think I never met with such a flattering, natural, and unsophisticated tribute to superior talents! On approaching the picture, he passed his hand over the canvass, and with a look of unaffected surprise exclaimed, "Why, it has a flat surface!! Yet, at a little distance, I could have sworn by the Koran, that it was a projecting substance—in truth, that it was Abul Hassan Khan himself. — Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence. Vol. II. pp. 55—57.

FISH, FLESH, AND FALLIBILITY.

It happened upon a time that Ralph, Abbot of Kinloss, was on a journey, along some brother Abbots of the Cistertian order, who were summoned to attend a general chapter. Their cook travelled along with them, and one day observing the Abbots to be much tired and worn out, having zeal, but not according to knowledge, he mixed a quantity of flesh with the fish stews which he was preparing for his superiors, and by the cunning of his art, so cooked it up, that it became exquisitely savoury, but yet seemed only to be fish fried in butter. The Abbots eat largely, but asked no questions for conscience' sake; and then, as was their wont after meals, retired to bed. Deep sleep fell upon all except the Abbot of Kinloss, who, as he lay awake, gazing on a high window in his dormitory, saw, to his horror, a black Ethiop, of a grim and terrible aspect, enter through the casement into the chamber, comporting himself as if he felt an excellent odour. This horrid guest then walked slowly up to each bed, and drawing the curtains, gazed in with a smile of triumph upon the sleeping brethren. At last, coming to the cook's bed, he could not conceal his joy, but embracing the sleeping and unconscious delinquent, kissed him with much affection. He next looked fiercely at the Abbot, who sat upright in his bed, staring with dismay on such proceedings, and then dissolving into a cloud of smoke, he vanished from his eyes. In the morning, the pious Ralph sent for the traitor of the kitchen, and recounted to him the horrid vision of the night, upon which the cook fell down at the feet of his superior, confessed the fraud he had practised upon the fish-stew, and promised, for the future, to conduct his culinary mystery with more attention to the spiritual than the carnal wants of his brethren.—Fordun.—[How graphically ludicrous is this story, if it did not bring along with it a melancholy reflection upon that thick and hopeless moral twilight which must have overcast the mind of the people, when the clergy did not hesitate to recount, and the multitude to believe, such absurd fables.]—Family Library, No. XXII. Lives of Scottish Worthies.

THE BENI ESSA SECT.

[It is not in Europe only, that fanatics impose upon the ignorant and credulous, by a species of jugglery which is confounded with religious zeal. Travellers are continually telling us of men, who in the fervour of their pious frenzy, pretend to foretell great events, as well as the fortunes of individuals; to eat snakes, or endure their bite with impunity, &c. &c. and who are considered as saints, by the deluded people. In Morocco, it seems there is a large sect of these raving hypocrites, called the Beni Essa Sect, who do considerable mischief, more especially to the Jews, whom they sometimes actually kill, in their fits of frenzy. The more extravagant the conduct, the less is their responsibility, for madness itself being respected as a kind of sanctity, these fanatical sectarians are looked up to with a religious veneration, very ill bestowed upon them.]—An extraordinary circumstance was related to-day to my Moorish interpreter, which I shall give as I received it, leaving it to others to believe it; all that I can say is, that I was not an eye-witness of the thing, although the account proceeded from a Moor of respectability, who was entitled to credit. One of the mad sectarians before mentioned, whose name was Tyer Symock, and who, before he became converted, was a good, quiet, honest baker, rambling about one day by himself, came to a shop kept by a Moor named Salem Ben Joseph, and proceeded to exhibit some of the pranks of his sect. Upon this, the shopman began to remonstrate with the disciple, by telling him that none but bad men would act so, and speaking, at the same time, in no very respectful terms of the followers of Ben Essa. During the time the altercation was going on, the follower had worked himself up to a tolerable degree of frenzy, which was greatly increased, when he heard his holy sect thus reviled. The revenge he bethought himself of was whimsical enough, for he proceeded forthwith to devour every article in the poor man's shop, soap, oil, butter, figs, raisins, walnuts, the whole of which proceeded down his throat, to the astonishment and horror of the shop-keeper, occasioning him a loss of a hundred and fifty dollars. After he made this singular clearing of the poor man's goods, the latter posted away to the governor, to complain of the severe loss he had sustained, through the gormandizing and revengeful appetite of the fanatic. The governor accordingly sent soldiers to bring him before him, which was done, as soon as the fellow was in a fit state to make his appearance. Upon his being asked the reason of his behaviour, in eating up the whole of the poor man's stock in trade, the man replied, it was to avenge the injury the saint had sustained from the impious language of the shopkeeper. The bashaw, upon this, wishing to put to a further trial his supernatural power of swallowing, ordered his attendants to prepare an enormous dish of kouskousou; and, accordingly, a tub containing a hundred pounds weight of kouskousou, and a whole sheep, was brought smoking hot before the monster. The bashaw told him it was necessary that he should offer an ocular proof to all present of the power of his saint, by devouring instanter the mouthful of victuals he saw before him,—if so,—all well and good, and his saint would be a great man. Should he, however, fail in this performance, he would not only be obliged to pay for the loss he had occasioned the shopkeeper, but would receive the additional punishment of the bastinado, as a warning for the future. The hungry fanatic, upon hearing this, began to work himself up in the same manner which had before been attended with so fatal a result to the poor man's stock in trade; his countenance turned black, and his eyes looked like blood, and vowing that, if necessary, he would not only eat what was placed before him, but the bashaw and his attendant into the bargain, to work he went at the loaves and fishes, and in a short time cleared up everything before him, to the astonishment of all present, and the satisfaction of every one except the poor shopkeeper, who was now convinced that the devil himself had borrowed the man's inside for his wicked purposes. The story goes, that the fanatic afterwards ate up all the grass about the bashaw's door, as a salad after his meal, and was dismissed with honour and credit. My interpreter, on whom I can rely, informed me that he actually saw the same fellow, when under the influence of one of these fits of religious frenzy, go into a heated oven, and that he came out à la Chabert, as if nothing had happened—in short, as cool as a cucumber, and with not even a hair curled.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

Digitized by Google

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—In looking over a volume of Voltaire's Melanges Litteraires, I was struck by an article entitled Conseils à un Journaliste, which might have been supposed to describe the plan of your own delightful paper. It is much too long for extraction (occupying nearly forty closely-printed pages) or I should have been tempted to translate the whole of it, so very excellent, and so peculiarly applicable, did it appear to me. I have contented myself with selecting a few passages, which may give some little idea to those who are not familiar with the volume, how singularly Voltaire's idea of what a journal should be coincides with your own. It will appear yet more striking to those who may be disposed to turn to the volume, and read the whole paper.

Believe me, Mr Tatler,

An Admirer, almost as old as I am aged.

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

[Translated and Abridged from Voltaire.]

The periodical work which you design to establish, Sir, may well expect success, though there are already too many of this nature. You ask me what methods you should pursue to render such a journal agreeable both to the present age, and to posterity; I will answer you in two words:—Be impartial. You have knowledge and taste; if, with these, you are just, I predict for you a durable success. Our nation loves literature of all kinds,—from mathematics to epigram. None of the journals speak much of the most brilliant part of belles lettres, which is the drama; nor of the many agreeable poetical works which daily sustain the amiable character of our nation. These may well enter into the plan of your journal; even down to a well-written song;—which is not to be disdained. Greece, which boasts of giving birth to Plato, is proud also of Anacreon; and Cicero does not cast Catullus into oblivion. * * * * To come to the belles lettres, which will form one of the principal features of your journal:—You intend to speak much of the theatres. This project is so much the more reasonable, as our theatre is refined, and the stage has become a school of manners. You will, doubtless, avoid the example of some periodical writers, who endeavour to cry down all their contemporaries, and to discourage the arts, of which a good journalist should be the support. It is just to give the preference to Molière, over the comic writers of all times and countries, but not to admire him exclusively. Imitate the judicious Italians, who place Raphael in the first rank, but admire also the Paul Veroneses, the Caracci, &c. Molière is the first, but it would be unjust and ridiculous not to rank Le Joueur among the best pieces. Not to admire the Menechmes, or to find amusement in Legataire Universelle, would be to want justice and taste; and he who cannot derive pleasure from Regnard is unworthy to admire Molière. * * * * * There is an art in giving an account of a new piece. I have always recognised the talent of young people, by the account they gave of a piece they had seen at the theatre; and I have remarked that those who have acquitted themselves the best, have been those who have afterwards acquired the most reputation in their profession. So true is it that real talent, whether for business or belles lettres, is one and the same things. To explain in clear and elegant terms a plot which is often intricate; and without attending to the division of the acts, to unravel the intrigue and the denouement; to relate them as an interesting narrative, to give an idea of the characters, to say what parts have appeared more or less probable,—well or ill brought about; to point out the best passages, and the beauty or defect of the general style, is what I have sometimes seen done, but it is very rare even among men of letters who make a study of it. For it is much easier to most minds to follow their own ideas, than to explain those of others. * * * * * It is necesary that a good journalist should be acquainted at least with the English and Italian languages, for there are many works of genius in both, and genius is seldom translated. They are, I think, the two European languages most necessary to a Frenchman. The Italians are the first who have rescued the arts from barbarism, and there is so much grandeur, so much force of imagination, even in the faults of the English, that the study of their language cannot be recommended too strongly.

A Name Exchanged for a Title.—An amusing anecdote has been told, to shew how artists live, in a world of their own, indifferent to all objects but their professional occupations. Several of our eminent artists at Rome, at a social meeting, were discussing the great men of the days of their youth. Among the 'palmaque nobilis terrarum dominos evehit Deos,' was of course the late J. S. Copley. 'Ah!' said one of the company, 'I remember him well; and he had a son, a fine promising lad: I wonder what became of him?' Nobody had heard anything of him, and of course nobody had heard of his paintings—his works—and therefore the general impression was, 'that he had come to no good.' About the period of this confabulation over the Falernian at Rome, the son in question was presiding over the House of Lords, being raised to the woolsack by the title of Lord Lyndhurst.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.—[This might appear somewhat remarkable had the Chancellor still retained his name, but when his station made him conspicuous, his name was lost in the obscurity of a title. Had he been a man of first-rate talent, he would scarcely have been unknown to the artists at Rome.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Number of Contemporary Authors.—A reader acts with regard to books, as a citizen does with regard to men; he does not live on intimate terms with all his contemporaries, but selects a few friends. There is no more reason to be disconcerted at the sight of 150,000 volumes in the king's library, than that there are 700,000 men at Paris.—Voltaire.

New Fashions and Old Truths.—It is said that the French love novelty;—so they do in matters of fashion, and cookery; but for truths, they are not well received, until they grow old.—Voltaire. [This objection to new truths, is not peculiar to France; but happily nothing can better stand the test of time, and age does not deprive them of their beauty.]

The Fruit of the Italian Oak.—In the market-place (at Larache) I saw large quantities of the sweet acorn exposed for sale, and made a purchase of a basket-full. This nut, the produce of the Quercus Esculus, is considerably larger and longer than the common acorn; its taste being sweet and pleasant, aud a good deal like that of the Spanish chesnut. It is found in abundance in Spain, I believe, as well as Barbary.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. [In the south of Europe, these acorns are brought to table, as a part of the dessert. Garcilasso, in one of his poems, describes a young Spanish lover climbing the tree, to shake down the sweet acorns in his mistress's lap.]

The Village and Inn of Suss.—In the village of Suss, which contains about 600 inhabitants, there is not a single individual who has not wherewithal to live comfortably—not a single individual who is indebted to others for the morsel he eats. This is a fine state of things, and may well render the inhabitants proud; but alas! it is a state of things incompatible with those many wants, and that division of labour, which are inseparable from an opulent and a great country. In this remote village there are many rich, and some who would not be looked upon as poor, even in England. I was informed that two peasants of Suss possessed, each, as much as 20,000*l.* sterling! * * * * * The habit so prevalent, of seeking fortunes in other countries, and of returning to invest it in their own, has sprinkled these vallies with men of considerable information and acquirements; and in the little ale-house—for it was nothing better—in this remote corner of the Grisons, a conversation was carried on, far superior in tone to any that I have ever heard in any of the commercial rooms in an English inn. I was somewhat surprised, upon being conducted to my chamber, which was but a garret, to find the pillow with an inner covering of blue satin, and the pillow-case, as well as the counterpane, set off with rich lace, at least nine inches broad.—Conway's Switzerland, &c.

A Town in one of the Oases of the Deserts.—The external appearance of the town of Siwah (in the oases of that name) is striking and singular as well as its internal arrangements. It is built on a steep conical rock of testacious lime-stone, and, both in its form and its crowded population, bears a resemblance to a beehive. The streets, narrow and crooked, are like staircases, and so dark, from the overhanging stories, that the inhabitants use a lamp at noon day. In the centre of the town, the streets are generally five feet broad, and about eleven feet high; but some are so low that you must stoop to pass through them. Each house has several floors, the upper communicating with the lower by galleries and chambers which cover the streets. The number of stories visible is three or four, but there are in fact five or six. On every marriage, the father builds a lodgment for his son above his own, so that the town is continually rising higher. The houses and walls are for the most part built of natron or mineral soda, and rock salt mixed with sand, coated with a gypseous earth, which preserves the salt from melting. The town is divided into two quarters: the upper is inhabited only by married people, women, and children; the lower, by widowers and youths; who, though allowed to go into the other quarter by day, must retire at dusk under penalty of a fine. The total population of the town is between 2,000 and 2,500; that of the oasis at large is supposed to amount to 8,000 souls.—Egypt, Edinburgh Cabinet Library, Vol. III.

An Inconvenient Compliment.—In the usages of the table, says Mr Carne,* Mohammed Ali is still an Osmanli; knives, forks, and other useful appendages never make their appearance at his meals. About five years ago, some English travellers were graciously received by him, and pressingly invited to dine. But not even in compliance with the taste of his guests, would he depart from his own habits; for, wishing to show a noble lady particular attention, he took a large piece of meat in his hand, and politely placed it before her. Perfectly dismayed at the compliment, and the sight of the savoury morsel that rested on her plate, she turned to her companion, who was more used to oriental manners, and earnestly asked what she was to do. 'Eat it to be sure,' was the reply. She looked at the pasha; his fine dark eye seemed to rest on her with a most kind and complacent expression; and there was no help for it, but to follow the excellent advice given her by her more experienced friend.—Egypt, Edinburgh Cabinet Library. Vol. III.

* Carne's Recollections of the East

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Vocal and Instrumental Music.

THEATRICAL LATE HOURS.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—Covent Garden is, as you see, no longer exemplary. They had last night, Two Strings to Their Bow, and the consequence was, that when they had shot it, a great portion of the audience was left half dead, and obliged to be conveyed to bed with all expedition. This making a toil of a pleasure, is a serious evil, Sir, and I do heartily wish that you would vehemently and pertinaciously attack this conspiracy against his Majesty's liege subjects. Entreating you to do which, I remain, Mr Tatler,

Your most obedient humble servant,

A SUFFERER.

May 21st.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Historical Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss Huddart. Anneli, Miss Russell. Agnes, Miss Faucit.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnam, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lufold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr Macready. Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge.
Erni, Mr Cathie. Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke.
Waldman, Mr Hughes. Michael, Mr Cooper. Jaghell, Mr J. Vining.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford, Mr Robinson, Mr Price, and Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, the Band will perform, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell;" Onslow's Overture to "L'Alcade de la Vega;" and H. R. Bishop's Overture to "Cortes."

To which will be added, a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, Virginius; The Jenkinses; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—

Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gosson; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Historical, Allegorical and Pictorial Drama, in Six Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier. Friska, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Lauriston, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Rilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Harris.
Eau de vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.
Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.
English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Halcombe, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Ap Griffiths, Mr Honner. Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Ambition, Mr Almar. Justice, Miss Scott.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama, entitled

THE INCHCAPE BELL.

[By E. FITZBALL, Esq.]

The Dumb Sailor Boy, Miss Scott. Becky Butterfly, Mrs Vale.
Hans Hattock, Mr D. Pitt. Guy Ruthven, Mr C. Hill. Capt. Taffrail, Mr Honner.
Sir John Trevanley, Mr Gough. Samson Sawdust, Mr Vale.
Jupiter Seabreese, Mr Rogers.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.
Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Miss Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Viala.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with the Farce of

TEDDY THE TILER.

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly. Oriel, Miss Lawrence. Flora, Miss Nelson.
Julia, Mrs Brown. Ladies, Meeds. Perry and Appleton.
Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans. Henry, Mr Duruset. Frederick, Mr Baker.
Bombardine, Mr Henry. Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour. Tim, Mr Addison.
Teddy Mulowney, Mr Power. Stiff, Mr Mears.
Apewell, Mr Irwin. Constable, Mr Fuller. Richard, Mr Heath.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte, and The Highland Reel.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Pescara, Mr Marshall. Foscari, Mr Munroe. Alberto, Mr Davis.
Julio, Mr Willing. Gerald, Master Smith. Pietro, Mr Young.
High Priest, Mr Jones. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson. Nixonomed, Mr Spencer.

After which a New Comic Operetta, called,

PECCADILLOES.

[By Mr RAYMOND.]

The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.

Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Ayres. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

To conclude with an Original Serious Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE DANISH WIFE.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

The Overture and Music by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Gertrude, Mrs Evans. Minna, Mrs Humby.
Ernest, Mr Forrester. Kalmark, Mr Spencer. Gedfrid, Mr Keppell.

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Comedy of

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.

Shylock, Mr Kean.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Shepherd of Derwent Vale —Martha Willis, the Maid Servant—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

No. 225.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MAY 24, 1831.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ANOTHER OF MR COLERIDGE'S LECTURES;

NAMELY, ON RABELAIS, SWIFT, STERNE, &c.

NO ACCOUNT OF WHICH HAS BEEN PUBLISHED.

In a few prefatory observations on the nature of wit, the Lecturer stated that surprise in the hearers was one of its most common effects. He proceeded to illustrate his meaning by some remarkable sayings of the ancients:—for example, the answer made to one who complained of the shortness of his sword,—'It is but to advance a step further;' and the remark of Cato, 'That he would rather be asked, Why no statue of him was erected, than why there was one.' These instances may with propriety come under the denomination of wit, from the deep meaning which they involve, and the surprise they occasion.

The character of Falstaff, as drawn by Shakspeare, may be described as one of wit, rather than of humour. The speeches of Falstaff and Prince Henry would, for the most part, be equally proper in the mouth of either, and might indeed, with undiminished effect, proceed from any person. This is owing to their being composed almost wholly of wit, which is impersonal, and not of humour, which always more or less partakes of the character of the speaker. The character of Parson Evans, on the other hand, is one of humour throughout.

The wit of the Italians is of a mixed kind, something mid-way between what we understand by wit and humour. It is generally tinged with irony, and partakes of the character of the speaker. There is something sardonic about it. The three instances following are illustrative of French wit. 'An old man reading a romance was asked the reason of his partiality for that species of writing. He answered,—In my younger days I read a great deal of History; but to confess the truth I was obliged to discontinue it, I found it so very improbable.' The second is the address of a suitor to a French minister, from whom he had received many promises, and as many disappointments:—'I entreat you, sir, to grant me the favour although you have promised me so many times.' The third is of two Gascons, one of whom related an incredible story, of which the other shewed his disbelief by his gestures. The relator perceiving this indignantly demands, 'Do you not believe me, sir?' The other answers, 'Certainly, I believe you; but you'll excuse my repeating the story, lest I should injure it by my provincial accent.'

It may be remarked, that real wit always appeals to the understanding, and does not necessarily produce laughter. Error and idiotcy are not proper subjects of laughter.

The satires of Young are witty, but they are little productive of pleasure. Even Butler, when describing Hudibras as a sectary and a persecutor, ceases to give that pleasure which is afforded by his representations of his hero in love.

The origin of the word humour may be traced to the science of Pathology. The ancients were unacquainted with its present meaning. They considered the human body as the repository of four humours, viz. blood, phlegm, bile or gall, and the black bile, and according to the predominance of either of these they believed the character to be sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric, or melancholy. When these distinctions ceased to be regarded, the word was still retained, and one of its applications was to persons engaged in pursuits of no abstract utility, but which had the limited effect of making happy those engaged in them. Sterne's Uncle Toby is of this kind. The fortifications on which he employed himself in his garden are represented as a source of unceasing delight to him, totally abstracted from the remotest idea of utility. Humour is also displayed in the comparison of finite things with those which our imaginations cannot bound; such as make our great appear little and our little great; or, rather, which reduces to a common littleness both the great and the little, when compared with infinity.

Plato, in his dialogues, gives the first true idea of humour in theory, when describing the effects at times produced on us by Tragedy and Comedy.

Humour and pathos are generally found together. In Sterne, they are admirably blended, so as to serve as reliefs to each other.

Mr Coleridge next considered separately the humourist and the man of humour.

The humourist is one who erroneously supposes himself calculated for certain things which occupy his mind, and whose deficiencies, in the very particulars on which he prides himself, are obvious to all about him. I knew, said Mr C., a man of this description. He was fond of giving advice as to the best way of addressing the great, and of escaping the arts of the designing. He was one of the most simple-hearted men in the world, one of the most undesigning and disinterested, and much less fitted to contend with the subtleties of mankind than to become himself their dupe. The man of humour is one skilled in the representation of the peculiarities of others.

Rabelais next engaged the Lecturer's notice. He considered it unaccountable how a man of genius should disfigure his works by so much sheer ribaldry. He conjectured that the ribaldry of Rabelais was merely a disguise, like the idiotcy of Brutus. Under this disguise he attacked boldly, but still with great peril, the vices of the priesthood and of the court of Francis the First. In perusing his writings therefore (an occupation perhaps only proper to scholars) his remarks should be considered, beyond a certain point, as so many words of no meaning, such as are made use of in those cyphers which pass between governments and their agents, to deceive those who are not in possession of the explanatory key. Mr C. here read two extracts from the character of Panurge. One of them related to the adventure of the sheep and Dingdong. Rabelais loses by the attempts made to particularize his characters. Their beauty consist in their truth to general nature. The writings of Swift and Rochefoucauld do not evince an accurate knowledge of mankind; they contain representations only of the dark side of things. The writings of Swift are also censurable for the vast quantity of physical dirt with which they abound; and not merely on that account, but for their moral dirt.

Gulliver's Travels is Swift's greatest work. The unimportance of mere exterior is well illustrated in the adventures of Gulliver among the great and little people. Adverting to absurd reports which are suffered to remain uncontradicted because they excite only the contempt of the parties attacked, but, owing to their circumstantiality, are believed by some, who ask—If these reports are unfounded, why are they not contradicted?—Mr C. quoted the following passage from Gulliver's Voyage to Lilliput, relative to the Lilliputian sheep:—

'I shall not trouble the reader with a particular account of this voyage, which was very prosperous for the most part. We arrived in the Downs on the 13th of April 1702. I had only one misfortune, that the rats on board carried away one of my sheep; I found her bones in a hole, picked clean from the flesh. The rest of my cattle I got safe ashore, and set them a-grazing in a bowling-green at Greenwich, where the fineness of the grass made them feed very heartily, though I had always feared the contrary: neither could I possibly have preserved them in so long a voyage, if the captain had not allowed me some of his best biscuit, which, rubbed to powder, and mingled with water, was their constant food. The short time I continued in England, I made a considerable profit by showing my cattle to many persons of quality and others: and before I began my second voyage, I sold them for six hundred pounds. Since my last return, I find the breed is considerably increased, especially the sheep, which I hope will prove much to the advantage of the woollen manufacture, by the fineness of the fleeces.'

In further illustration of Sterne, Mr C. adduced as a happy specimen of his talents, Mr Shandy's address to a friend on the importance of Christian names.

'My father's opinion in this matter, was, that there was a strange kind of magic bias, which good or bad names, as he called them, irresistibly impressed upon our characters and conduct.

'The hero of Cervantes argued not the point with more seriousness,—nor had he more faith,—or more to say on the powers of necromancy in dishonouring his deeds, or on Dulcinea's name, in shedding lustre upon them, than my father had on those of Trismegistus or Archimedes, on the one hand—or of Nyky and Simpkin on the other. How many Cæsars and Pompeys, he would say, by mere inspiration of the names, have been rendered worthy of them? And how many, he would add, are there, who might have done exceeding well in the world, had not their characters and spirits been totally depressed and Nicodemus'd into nothing?

Digitized by Google

'I see plainly, Sir, by your looks, (or as the case happened) my father would say,—that you do not heartily subscribe to this opinion of mine,—which, to those, he would add, who have not carefully sifted it to the bottom,—I own has an air more of fancy than of solid reasoning in it; and yet, my dear Sir, if I may presume to know your character, I am morally assured, I should hazard little in stating a case to you, not as a party in the dispute,—but as a judge, and trusting my appeal upon it to your own good sense and candid disquisition in this matter;—you are a person free from as many narrow prejudices of education as most men;—and, if I may presume to penetrate farther into you—of a liberality of genius above bearing down an opinion merely because it wants friends. Your son—your dear son,—from whose sweet and open temper you have so much to expect;—your Billy, Sir!—would you for the world have called him Judas?—Would you, my dear Sir, he would say, laying his hand upon his breast, with the genteelest address,—and in that soft irresistible piano of voice, which the nature of the argumentum ad hominem absolutely requires;—Would you, Sir, if a Jew of a god-father had proposed the name of your child, had offered you his purse along with it, would you have consented to such a desecration of him?—O my God!—he would say, looking up,—if I know your temper right, Sir, you are incapable of it;—you would have trampled upon the offer;—you would have thrown the temptation at the tempter's head with abhorrence.

'Your greatness of mind in this action, which I admire, with that generous contempt of money which you shew me in the whole transaction, is really noble;—and what renders it more so, is the principle of it;—the workings of a parent's love upon the truth and conviction of this very hypothesis, namely, that was your son called Judas, the sordid and treacherous idea, so inseparable from the name, would have accompanied him through life like his shadow, and, in the end, made a miser and a rascal of him,—in spite, Sir, of your example.'

He next passed to the faults of Sterne, whom he severely censured for his indecency, his degradation of the passion of Love, and his affected sensibility. In conclusion, he expressed his opinion that the works of Sterne had been productive of much more evil than good.

[In laying before the reader the above sketches, with which a friend has favoured us, it is not to be concluded that we agree with all the opinions they advance; but our friend justly thought that the least fragments of the Sybilline Leaves of their author would be regarded as valuable.]

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE SAINT AND THE TEA-POT.

We were now close to the town of Arzilla, and entered by a lofty massive tower, under the gateway of which some Moors were sitting, and among them a venerable-looking old man meanly clad. On approaching him, I was surprised to see the alkaid, and the rest of the Moors alight, and running up to him to kiss his garments. I was soon informed, in answer to my enquiries, that this was the great saint of Arzilla, Sidi Mohammed Ben Marzoug, of whom I had previously heard a good deal. The old man, on being informed I was a Christian, bade me welcome with more kindness of manner than I could have expected, and promised to pay me a visit. We advanced into the town, and after passing through many narrow winding streets, the wretched appearance of which was not a little increased by the torrents that were falling, we reached the house of a Jew to whom I had a letter;—men, beasts, and baggage, deluged with the storm. * * * * * * * I was hardly established in my new quarters, and was occupied in unpacking my things, being wet through,—when the saint himself did me the honor of a visit, and accompanied by a large concourse of his followers, entered the yard, which was completely filled with them. Having had no expectation of so early a call, I was quite unprepared for it, and in the state I was, I felt a good deal inclined to reverse the order of things, and instead of receiving a blessing from the holy man, to give him one, for the trouble he had put himself to in coming so soon. When I considered, however, that I was a good deal indebted to him, and that his power was very great over the people, I endeavoured to appear as pleased as I could at seeing him. On entering my little chamber, which was immediately filled with a crowd of Moors, the old man asked after my health, and said I was welcome to Arzilla. He then seated himself on the ground, his attendants remaining standing around him. After a short time had elapsed in conversation, my host, beckoning me aside, told me it would be necessary to entertain the saint and his party with tea, upon which the canteen being opened, and the tea-things produced, the pot was filled, and we all sat down to tea, although I felt much more inclined for my dinner, having fasted since an early hour in the morning. The countenances of the saint and his disciples showed evident marks of satisfaction at the sight of my green tea, which I made very strong to please their taste; and on the appearance of a plentiful supply of fine loaf-sugar, their eyes glistened like its sparkling lumps, in anticipation of the expected treat. To work we now set in good earnest, and when it is considered that I had to supply a party of a dozen thirsty Mahometans, who only respect a Christian for his tea and sugar, it may readily be supposed that the pot was kept turned continually downwards. A pretty constant fire was kept up for near an hour, until hot water itself began to fail, and fresh ammunition of tea as well as sugar became necessary, from the number of cups drunken and the quantity of sugar consumed, which the good saint, in his joy, distributed plentifully round to his followers, telling me at the same time that my tea was good, and that I was a good man. Among the old man's hangers-on, who, I could plainly see, were all a set of arrant rogues, was one in particular who seemed to be his chief disciple, and who, I was informed, lived entirely with him, studying the saintly trade, in which he hoped to succeed him at his death. He was a sanctified, demure-looking fellow, young and healthy, and doubtless found his account in paying the implicit respect and veneration to his master which he did, for he took care to find an opportunity of informing me that the saint always expected a present of money from every one, and in particular from a Christian; upon which I thought it politic to loose my purse-strings, and do as I was told. The old man received my offering with complacency, and immediately distributed it among his followers, among whom I observed that the personage who had kindly given me the advice, so disinterested on his part, did not receive the smallest share. The things were now about to be taken away. After many marks of admiration being bestowed on the cups and saucers, which were not very agreeable to my ears, the old man requested me to give him one of the tea-spoons, which I accordingly did, thinking myself lucky, at the time, to escape so well. I was, however, mistaken, for as I was slily conveying the tea-pot out of sight, the old man, who kept the eye of a hawk on it, desired he might look at it. It was of queen's metal, and such an one had never been seen before by any of them. Its shape was first discussed, and its good qualities for pouring, drawing, and making tea were so loudly praised, that I began to tremble; and the saint concluded, to my horror, by begging me to give him the tea-pot. At the same moment his cunning coadjutor gave me a most significant look on no account to refuse the saint what he asked for. I had now to get out of the scrape as well as I could. It was impossible I could part with the tea-pot; it was the comfort, nay, the very existence of us all; I had but this one; and besides all this, it was not mine own, having been lent me, as well as the contents of the canteen, by my friend Mr Duguid, of Gibraltar. All these excuses I enforced, as I thought, with such seeming reasonableness, that the saint appeared satisfied, and said no more. * * * * * It appeared to be now my turn to receive something; for thinking, perhaps, it would have great weight with me, he took it into his head to present me with a piece of his dirty robe, which he had cut off, and which he assured me would be a passport of safety and protection, not only in Morocco, but in all parts of the world inhabited by Musselmen. * * * * * He did not take his departure without making another most direct attack upon the tea-pot, which I parried as well as I could. * * * * * * In the course of the evening, a servant came from the saint, with a present of two small loaves of coarse black bread; which attention I returned by sending him some tea and sugar. A gift of the former kind, is considered by the Moors, as the greatest possible pledge of friendship, and is made by the sultan himself, whenever he wishes to testify sentiments of particular esteem and regard for a person. Although I was up at an early hour the following morning, the saint was beforehand with me; for, on putting my head out of my chamber door, to examine the state of the weather, I found his disciple patiently sitting on the steps, and learned that he had been there some time. On enquiring the reason of this early visit, he merely replied that he was come for my tea-pot. I now saw that the saint was determined not to give up his point, and as from his power, he could annoy me in a more serious manner, and even prevent my proceeding on my journey, I thought it prudent to comply with his wishes, and therefore sent word back that if he would lend me one, I would make him a present of mine. The messenger was not long in returning, and carried away my poor tea-pot in triumph leaving in its place an old earthenware one not worth a sixpence, but, singular enough, of English manufacture. * * * * * * I was told that the good saint was very curious in his tea-pots, of which he had a very large collection, of all sorts and sizes; but that he had never possessed, or seen, one of metal like mine, which was the reason he so much coveted it. I was now determined to be off as quickly as possible, to get out of the reach of this troublesome old saint, and to prevent my goods and chattels affording any further temptation.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. Vol. II. pp. 104—114.

NATIONAL DISHES.

The word Kouskousou has occured so frequently in the foregoing pages, that I shall now explain the composition of what is to the Moor the same as the olla is to the Spaniard, or maccaroni to the Italian,—namely, a standing dish. The kouskousou, or the finely granulated paste which is the principal ingredient of the dish called by the Moors kouskous, is made from the sencola or heart of the Barbary wheat, which is both the finest and hardest part of the grain. The sencola is obtained by the grain being passed loosely through the mill. [The author describes the process of forming this sencola into a granulated paste, in a more particular manner than is necessary to extract. It will suffice to say, that it is done by mixing it with water in small successive portions, and passing it many times through sieves of different degrees of fineness. The grains are then dried, and used as they are wanted. They will keep a long time.] A very fine kind of koukousou is made by mixing sugar with the sencola, which is eaten boiled up with milk and butter, forming a very good kind of hasty-pudding: it is at other times simply boiled, and eaten with a little cinnamon mixed with it. The sieves made use of by the Moors in the preparation of the kouskousou, are of parchment, pierced with small holes. The dish called kouskous is a stew surrounded by the kouskousou. [For this purpose the kouskousou is dressed by steam.] When sufficiently stewed, it is put into the kouskousou-dish, which is a kind of high bowl on a stand, with a cover at top. It is then mixed with a small quantity of the gravy from the stew, a little fresh butter is added, and it is raised high around the dish, leaving only a cavity in the centre, in which the stew is placed. The kouskousou is then heaped about so as to fill the dish, and three or four hard boiled eggs are placed whole at the top, sprinkled with powdered cinnamon, and it is ready for the table. The stew is made of fowls, pigeons, or mutton, but generally the first, dressed in a saucepan with sliced onions, pepper, salt and a little saffron.—[In another part of the volume the author gives the following description of the Spanish olla.] Of fresh and tender beef, 3lbs.; of leg or neck of mutton, 7lbs.; a fine fat fowl; of ham 1lb.; of bacon, 1lb.; a few sausages or chorizos (a sort of dried sausages); of water to make broth, quantum suf. These are to be quickly boiled, and the scum carefully removed as long as any arises. The fowl, the bacon, the ham, and the chorizos should then be taken out of the pot, or they would be overdone. Add now the heart of a fine cabbage cut into eight parts, and a fine large Spanish onion whole, (or a tomata) with half a pint of garbanzos (a large kind of pea). Those additions will have cooled the liquor in the pot below 212 of Fahrenheit, and ebullition being restored, it must be kept up for the space of fifteen minutes. The former appendages are then to be returned to the pot, and the compound is to be allowed to simmer only till the broth be perfected. The whole process requires at least four hours. [The broth is sometimes thickened into soup, with bread and vermicelli]. The cabbage and onion being spread in the dish, the beef, mutton, fowl, ham, bacon, and chorizos, are to be laid in negligent disorder on the vegetables, with such garbanzos as may be unmixed with them.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.—[Sir Arthur Brooke describes the preparation of these dishes as he himself went through every part of the process, even of granulating the kouskousou. These Moorish kouskous, the Spanish olla, and the Italian maccaroni, are, by the accounts of travellers, much more generally eaten in their respective countries, than our national dish—roast beef,—is here. Great numbers in this country do not taste roast beef throughout the year; whereas, the dishes before mentioned seem indispensable among all classes; differently prepared, no doubt. The Italian dish appears very spare diet in comparison with the others. The maccaroni paste, which is well known in this country, is commonly eaten, in Italy, boiled in water, sometimes enriched with a little olive oil. The richer classes dress it more luxuriously; but in any state, it must be a poorer, though probably not a less wholesome diet, than the compound stews above mentioned. It is remarkable, that the Italians are by far the livelier people of the three.]

Digitized by Google

A Pious Fraud; or the Forsaken Demon.—It is said that El Mahedy (who was in arms against the sultan), after having been beaten during the two first days, called his chiefs together, and told them not to be daunted, as his guardian angel had assured him that he should be successful the next day. To convince, and also to encourage them at the same time, he requested they would follow him to a certain place within the castle, where he had previously concealed a black man, named Embark, in a deep pit, artfully covered over. This they did, and having arrived at the spot, he began to mutter some incantations, intreating the assistance of the counterfeit spirit on the following day. Upon this he was immediately answered by the concealed demon beneath, that he need only have patience and fight bravely, and he would infallibly conquer his imperial antagonist. This being heard by all the chiefs, inspired them with renewed courage, and they certainly fought with the greatest bravery the following day, but unfortunately, contrary to the predictions of their guardian spirit, they were again beaten, and the castle itself taken. Very shortly after this event, some of the victorious troops happening to pass by the spot where poor Blacky was immured, heard a voice from beneath, calling lustily for help. This extraordinary circumstance caused them to look about them, and the entrance to the pit being found out, its unfortunate inmate was discovered, and having been hauled up almost starved to death, the whole mystery was revealed, as well as the treachery of his master, who had thus left him to perish.—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

'Virtual Representation.'—The view of the Scots of the duties of an M.P. is well illustrated by the following real dialogue:—'Why does Mr ——— no longer stand for ———shire?' —'Oh, he has no occasion now to go to Parliament;—he has got appointments for all his relations.'—Glasgow Chronicle.

CHARACTERISTIC EPITHETS.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Will you be good enough to take care (among the other innumerable cares which you find it impossible to attend to,) that no more epithets are given to great men, not applicable to their qualities, or not rightly understood?

Many names of celebrity, like the states of Italy, have characteristic epithets, prefixed or annexed to them, which, in many instances, have been confirmed by time, perhaps somewhat in disregard of judgment. The most vague, the most common, and generally the least merited, is the epithet 'great,' which has been bestowed on so many persons who have had nothing great in them but their great littleness, that, when we speak of Alfred, we are well pleased that the name itself suffices to distinguish him from all others, without the use of a word, in this instance, understood without its utterance. That Raphael should be called Divine, is very natural, and all acquiesce in its propriety. The word has not been abused; it has been given to Raphael and to Corelli, and both deserve it. It might be amusing to examine the claims of various individuals to the epithets which have been associated with their names; as the 'magnificent,' the 'liberal,' the 'learned,' the 'just,' the 'pious,' &c. But there is one very strange prenomen, —'old:' it seems to imply either that he to whom it is given has never been young, or that he lived to so great an age, that his youth was as nothing in comparison with his after-life. While living, it may serve to distinguish a man from his son, or his grandson, or may serve to imply contempt, in a manner for which the speaker can scarcely be called to account,—as we say 'Good woman' or 'Honest man;' to which terms it is awkward to object, although they are always felt as a contemptuous assumption of superiority. But when a man has ceased to be, it seems absurd to call him old. It is true he may have been old, but he has also been young, and probably for a much longer period, as in the instance of Gerarde the herbalist, commonly called 'Old Gerarde,' 'Good old Gerarde,' or 'Honest old Gerarde,'—who died at the age of sixty-two. There was a readiness of faith in the said Gerarde, capable of swallowing all absurdities, which gave occasion for the sort of insolent patronage implied in the expression. Bede is generally spoken of as the 'venerable Bede,' when the fact is, as I have been told by a learned friend, that his Christian name was Venerable. This reminds one of the story of the linen supposed to have been the property of the 'admirable' Crichton, because it was marked with the letters A.C.

A. A.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Sir Bevis of Hampton.—I am happy to say, that the memory of Sir Bevis is still fragrant in his town of Southampton; the gate of which is sentinelled by the effigies of that doughty knight-errant, and his gigantic associate.—Sir Walter Scott.

Dry Humour.—An Irish postboy having driven a gentleman a long stage during torrents of rain, he civilly said to Paddy, 'Are you not very wet?' 'Arrah! I don't know about being wet, but plase your honour, I'm very dry.'

Hint to a Traveller.—When you are in Egypt, enquire whence came the cavalry that Pharaoh sent into the Red Sea, in pursuit of the Israelites; for, all the animals having perished in the sixth and seventh plague, some impious persons pretend that Pharaoh no longer had any cavalry. Consult the Thousand and One Nights, the books of Exodus, of which Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Polybius, and Titus Livius make such particular mention; as well as all the Egyptian authors.—Voltaire.

St Fillan's Wells.—There are, in Perthshire, several wells and springs, dedicated to St Fillan, which are still places of pilgrimages and offerings, even among the protestants. They are held powerful in cases of madness; and in some of very late occurrence, lunatics have been left all night, bound to the holy stone, in confidence that the saint would cure and unloose them before morning. —Sir Walter Scott. [It would seem, that those who could prescribe such a remedy, must be themselves in great need of it.]

Moorish Bankrupt Law.—When a Moor is insolvent, he is confined in prison for the space of three days, after which, by giving up everything he possesses in the world, except just sufficient to cover his body, he can demand to be made a bankrupt. This is regularly drawn up and attested; and he is then freed from his debts, and, as with us, is freed from prison to begin the world again. —Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco. [There is, however, one great absurdity in the English law in these matters, of which the author makes no mention, in his account of the Moorish bankruptcy. In this country, a man is obliged to give up all he possesses, to make oath that he retains nothing; and thus being as it is understood quite pennyless, is called upon to pay a variety of fees, &c. without which, he cannot obtain his freedom. So that unless a man so circumstanced, has friends able and willing to assist him, he is, by the law itself, encouraged to take a false oath, and to keep back so much of his property as will be necessary for the recovery of his liberty. Surely, in common justice, a man should be exempted from the necessity of paying fees, in such a situation; and if the demand for them is an abuse not recognised by the law, well as it is known to exist, it should be remedied.]

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—William Tell—Turning the Tables—Timour the Tartar.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Teddy the Tiler.

NEW CITY THEATRE.

MR KEAN having "taken an interest in this Theatre," made his first appearance last night in the character of Shylock. The play of the Merchant of Venice, and Mr KEAN'S personation of the principal character, are too familiar to the town to call for particular criticism. His masterly identification of himself with the strongly-marked qualities of the malignant Jew, while at the same time he seizes all the more delicate and recondite features which give completeness to the portrait, render this one of the most impressive and perhaps, at present, the most perfect of all his performances. The audience last night had the advantage, which only a house of moderate dimensions can afford, of hearing every word, and of seeing expressed the emotions resulting from hope, exultation, confidence, rage and despair, which in the course of the play agitate the breast of Shylock. Mr KEAN, it appears, had just arrived from Edinburgh, and was not recovered from the fatigue of travelling. This could not be inferred from his acting, which was fully equal to his best performances of last season. The character was judiciously chosen, requiring, as it does, mental more than physical energy. All the strong points were made; and they who saw Mr KEAN last night for the first time, will not soon forget the scene in which he vindicates his nation; that in which he encounters Tubal, and hears of his daughter's extravagances and Antonio's losses; and lastly, the trial scene. The look which he gives Gratiano when he leaves the Court, is itself worth going to see. After the fourth act, in which Shylock's part terminates, we quitted the theatre; but returned, on hearing from without great shouting in the house. On our re-admission we found Mr KEAN on the stage, about to address the audience. Owing to the noise which prevailed, we could not catch distinctly what he said. We understood him to express his gratitude for the reception given him—[which indeed was enthusiastic]—refer to the declining state of the large theatres, and their monopolizing spirit, and state his determination to try and make the little theatre in which he then addressed the patrons of the drama, the rival of the large ones in talent, though not in size. F. F.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

TANCREDI.

[By ROSSINI.]

Amenaide, beloved by Tancredi . . . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Isaura, her Attendant . Madame Castelli.
Tancredi . . . . . Madame Pasta.
Orbazzano, his Rival . . . . . Signor Santini.
Argirio, the Father of Amenaide . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Roggiero, the Friend and Companion of Tancredi . Signor Galli.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, M. Emile, M. Antoni, and M. Lefebvre.

In the First Act, Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance the Tyrolienne.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier. Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montbolon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Lauriston, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Tully.
Eau de vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.
Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.
English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcombe, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Ambition, Mr Almar. Justice, Miss Scott.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of

THE MAID AND THE MAGPIE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Mr MACREADY respectfully announces to his Friends and the Public, that his Benefit is fixed for FRIDAY, May 27, 1831, when will be revived Shakspeare's Historical Tragedy of CORIOLANUS. Menenius Agrippa, Mr DOWTON; Tullus Aufidius, Mr COOPER; Caius Marcius, Mr MACREADY; Volumnia, Miss HUDDART; Virgilia, Miss PHILLIPS. After which, in One Act, Sheridan's Entertainment of THE CRITIC, OR A TRAGEDY REHEARSED. Don Ferdinando Whiskerandos, Mr LISTON; Beefeater, Mr HARLEY; Sneer, Mr COOPER; Puff, (for that night only) Mr MACREADY. To conclude with a Grand Dramatic Spectacle.

Tickets and Places to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and of Mr MACREADY, 31 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of

VIRGINIUS.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Virginia, Miss Phillips. Shave, Mrs Webster.
Virginius, Mr Macready. Icilius, Mr Wallack.
Siccius Dentatus, Mr Cooper. Appius Claudius, Mr H. Wallack.
Numitorius, Mr Thompson. Spurius Oppius, Mr Howell.
Lucius, Mr Younge. Vibulanus, Mr Cathie. Honorius, Mr Stanley.
Valerius, Mr S. Jones. Caius Claudius, Mr J. Vining.
Marcus, Mr Cooke. Publius, Mr Honner. Titus, Mr Yarnold.

In the course of the Evening, Cherubini's Overture to 'Anacreon;' Winter's Overture to 'Calypso;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

After which a Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

THE JENKINSES.

Mrs John Jenkins, Mrs Orger. Miss Georgiana Jenkins, Miss Crawford.
Martha, Mrs Broad. Mr Carraway, Mr Farren.
Augustus Gingham, Mr J. Vining. Mr John Jenkins, Mr Cooper.
Master John Jenkins, Master Fenton.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; The Diorama; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Medley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.
Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

After which, the Musical Farce of

THE HIGHLAND REEL.

Jenny, Miss Hughes. Moggy M'Gilpin, Miss Taylor.
M'Gilpin, Mr Blanchard. Sandy, Mr Wilson. Shelty, Mr Keeley.
Charley, Mr Henry. Sergeant Jack, Mr G. Stansbury.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte, and The Irish Tutor.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

No. 226.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1831.

Mr Molloy Westmacott, not having anything to say for himself, has got somebody to say it for him in a very magnificent quarter; to wit, the back of a play-bill. Having exhausted absurdity in himself, he thinks it a cunning thing to be absurd by proxy. It is the opinion of some, however, that the say is still his own, especially as there is nothing in it. We have not seen it, but the contents have been reported to us. It is but the same desperate nonsense half a dozen times refuted,—the same boy's cry in the streets, hallooing after you when you have given him a shaking, and repeating the falsehood for which he was punished. It is a pity Mr Westmacott cannot make up his mind to be a little sensible. When a man has done a foolish thing, he has two wise things before him, to make amends for it, if he can but see them. The first is, to say no more about the matter; the second, to resolve that the experience shall do him good. Why cannot Mr Westmacott discern the common sense of abating, at once, the nuisances objected to in his behaviour, in preference to running the risk of being himself abated as a nuisance? A little agreement on the part of a very few persons would settle that matter in a shorter time than he seems to imagine; and we are surprised, that the reputation he affects of being a knowing fellow does not shew him the policy of getting this piece of saving knowledge as fast as possible.

INTERESTING ACCOUNT OF THE LATE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE.

(From the Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence, just published.)

The contemplation of domestic happiness must always be interesting, and yet more especially so when connected with princes;—not from any undue regard for their rank, but from a sense of its rarity among them. The affections of royal hearts are so apt to be thwarted, and they are so generally made the victims of policy, that, notwithstanding the many exclusive privileges they enjoy, we are pleased to see them, on any occasion, in possession of blessings commonly denied them, and yielding to sympathies that bind them to their fellow-beings, by ties infinitely more honourable than a long line of ancestry. During Sir Thomas Lawrence's first visit to Claremont, he found it the seat of happiness. His second visit, which was for the purpose of conveying to Prince Leopold the portrait of the young wife, whose loss had converted his happiness into mourning, has an interest, which is not unmixed with regret, that the feelings of the bereft husband should thus be laid bare before the world. Such feelings should be sacred; and one cannot but regret that, during the life of the Prince, Sir Thomas Lawrence's last interview with him should have been made thus public. In 1817, Sir Thomas Lawrence was commissioned to paint the portrait of the Princess Charlotte, a second time, and staid nine days at Claremont for that purpose. The following passages are extracted from letters to his friends, written after his return to town:—

A VISIT TO CLAREMONT.

'It is exceedingly gratifying to see that she (the Princess) both loves and respects Prince Leopold, whose conduct, indeed, and character, seem justly to deserve these feelings. From the report of the gentlemen of the household, he is considerate, benevolent, and just, and of very amiable manners. My own observation leads me to think that in his behaviour to her he is affectionate and attentive, rational and discreet; and in the exercise of that judgment which is sometimes brought in opposition to some little thoughtlessness, he is so cheerful and slily humourous, that it is evident (at least it appears to me so) that she is already more in dread of his opinion than of his displeasure. Their mode of life is very regular:—they breakfast together alone, about eleven: at half-past twelve she came in to visit me, accompanied by Prince Leopold, who stayed great part of the time: about three, she would leave the painting-room, to take her airing round the grounds in a low phaeton with her ponies, the Prince always walking by her side: at five, she would come and sit to me till seven; at six, or before it, he would go out with his gun to shoot either hares or rabbits, and return about seven or half-past; soon after which, we went to dinner, the Prince and Princess appearing in the drawing-room just as it was served up. Soon after the dessert appeared, the Prince and Princess retired to the drawing-room, where we soon heard the piano-forte accompanying their voices. At his own time, Colonel Addenbrooke, the chamberlain, proposed our going in, always, as I thought, to disturb them. After coffee the card-table was brought, and they sat down to whist, the young couple being always partners, the others changing. You know my superiority at whist, and the unfairness of my sitting down with unskilful players; I therefore did not obey command, and from ignorance of the delicacy of my motives, am recommended to study Hoyle before my second visit there next week, which must indeed be a very short one. The Prince and Princess retire at eleven o'clock.'

A few short weeks after this letter was written, all England was lamenting the death of the Princess, with a sincerity equal to the great hope it had placed in her. Sir Thomas writing, after that event, to his friend, says:—

'Charity and justice, high integrity, frankness and humanity, were fixed in her character. Her mind seemed to have nothing of subtlety or littleness in it, and she had all the courage of her station. She once said, "I am a great coward, but I bluster it out like the best of them till the danger is over." I was told by one of the members of the council awaiting her delivery, that Dr Baillie came in, and said, in answer to some enquiries, "She's doing very well: she'll not die of fear: she puts a good Brunswick face upon the matter."

'She had a surprising quick ear, which I was pleasantly warned of: whilst playing whist, which being played for shillings was not the most silent game I ever witnessed, she would suddenly reply to something that the Baron or I would be talking of, in the lowest tone, at the end of the room, while her companions at the table were ignorant of the cause of her observations. * * * * * Her manner of addressing Prince Leopold was always as affectionate as it was simple:—'My love;' and his always 'Charlotte.' I told you that when we went in from dinner, they were generally sitting at the piano-forte, often on the same chair. I never heard her play; but the music they had been playing was always of the finest kind. I was at Claremont on a call of enquiry the Saturday before her death. Her last command to me was, that I should bring down the picture to give to Prince Leopold upon his birth-day, the sixteenth of the next month.'

THE SECOND VISIT.

'I learnt that the Prince was very much overcome by the sight of the picture, and the train of recollections that it brought with it. Colonel Addenbrooke went in to the Prince, and returned shortly, saying, the Prince desires me to say how much obliged to you he is for this attention,—that he shall always remember it. He said, "Do you think Sir Thomas Lawrence would wish to see me? If he would, I shall be very glad to see him." I replied that I thought you would: so if you like, he will see you whenever you choose before your departure. Soon after, I went in to him. As I passed through the hall, Dr Short came up to me (he had evidently been, and was crying) and thanked me for having painted such a picture. "No one is a better judge than I am, sir," and he turned away.

'The Prince was looking extremely pale, but he received me with calm firmness, and that low, subdued voice that you know to be the effort at composure. He spoke at once about the picture, and of its value to him more than all the world besides. From the beginning to the close of the interview he was greatly affected. He checked his first burst of affection by adverting to the public loss, and that of the royal family. "Two generations gone! gone in a moment! I have felt for myself, but I have felt for the Prince Regent. My Charlotte is gone from this country—it has lost her. She was a good, she was an admirable woman. None could know my Charlotte as I did. It was my happiness, my duty to know her character; it was my delight." During a short pause, I spoke of the impression it had made on me. "Yes, she had a clear, fine understanding, and very quick;—she was candid, she was open, and not suspecting; but she saw characters at the glance,—she read them so true. You saw her; you saw something of us—you saw us for some days—you saw our year! Oh! what happiness,—and it was solid,—it could not change, for we knew each other—except when I went out to shoot, we were together always, and we could be together—we did not tire." I tried to check this current of recollection, which was evidently overpowering him (as it was me) by a remark on a part of the picture, and then on its likeness to the youth of the old King. "Ah! and my child was like her, for one so young, (as if it had really lived in childhood). For one so young it was surprisingly like—the nose—it was higher than children's are—the mouth so like her! My grief did not think of it, but if I could have had a drawing of it!—She was always thinking of others, not of herself—no one so little selfish—always looking out for comfort for others. She had been for hours, for many hours, in great pain, she was in that situation where selfishness must act, if it exists—when good people will be selfish, because pain makes them so—and my Charlotte was not—my grief could not make her so! She thought our child was alive; I knew it was not, and I could not support her mistake. I left the room for a short time. in my absence, they took courage and informed her. When she recovered from it, she said, "Call in Prince Leopold, there is none can comfort him but me!"—"My Charlotte, my dear Charlotte!" And now looking at the picture, he said, "Those beautiful hands, that at the last, when she was talking to others, were always looking out for mine!" * * * * I asked him if the Princess, at the last, felt her danger. He said, "No; my Charlotte thought herself very ill, but not in danger. And she was so well but an hour and a half after the delivery! And she said I should not leave her again,—and I should sleep in that room—and she should have in the sofa-bed—and she should have it where she liked—she herself would have it fixed. She was strong, and had much courage, but once she seemed to fear. You remember she was affected when you told her that you could not paint my picture just at that time; but she was much more affected when we were alone—and I told her I should sit when we went to Marlborough House, after her confinement. 'Then,' she said, 'if you are to sit when you go to town, and after my confinement—then I may never see the picture.'—My Charlotte felt she never should."

Digitized by Google

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

FIENDS MADE USEFUL.

Michael Scott was chosen to go upon an embassy, to obtain from the King of France satisfaction for certain piracies committed by his subjects upon those of Scotland. Instead of preparing a new equipage and splendid retinue, the ambassador retreated to his study, and evoked a fiend, in the shape of a huge black horse, mounted upon his back, and forced him to fly through the air towards France. As they crossed the sea, the devil insidiously asked the rider what it was that the old women of Scotland muttered at bed-time. A less experienced wizard might have answered, that it was the Pater Noster, which would have licensed the devil to precipitate him from his back. But Michael sternly replied, 'What is that to thee? Mount, Diabolus, and fly!' When he arrived at Paris, he tied his horse to the gate of the palace, entered, and boldly delivered his message. An ambassador with so little of the pomp and circumstance of diplomacy was not received with much respect, and the King was about to return a contemptuous efusal to his demand, when Michael besought him to suspend his resolution till he had seen his horse stamp three times. The first stamp shook every steeple in Paris, and caused all the bells to ring; the second threw down three towers of the palace, and the infernal steed had lifted his foot to give the third stamp, when the King rather chose to dismiss Michael with the most ample concessions, than to stand the probable consequences. * * * * * Michael was once much embarrassed by a spirit, for whom he was under the necessity of finding constant employment. He commanded him to build a cauld, or dam-head, across the Tweed at Kelso; it was accomplished in one night, nnd still does honour to the infernal architect. Michael then ordered that Eildon Hill, which was then a uniform cone, should be divided into three. Another night was sufficient to part its summit into the three picturesque peaks which it now bears. At length the enchanter conquered this indefatigable demon, by employing him in the hopeless and endless task of making ropes out of sea-sand.

Lives of the Scottish Worthies. (Quoted from Sir Walter Scott.)

SIR WILLIAM WALLACE.

His father, Sir Malcolm Wallace, upon the first publication of the orders for all to come in and take their oaths of allegiance to the English monarch, had fled from Ellerslie into the mountainous district of the Lennox, accompanied by his eldest son, and it is one of the least improbable of the stories which rest on the single authority of the Minstrel, that he was, not long afterward, slain in an encounter with the English at Kyle in Ayrshire. His mother, meanwhile, had taken refuge with her father's relations, and Wallace, now advancing into manhood, found himself driven from his paternal home, an object of suspicion to the government, and avoided by those cautious and timid friends who regarded Scotland as lost, and preferred the quiet security of servitude to the desperate chances of insurrection. Over all this, his mind, pent up in a silent restraint, which, for a season, he was compelled to observe, brooded and rankled in secret; but an event now took place, which settled his destiny, and drove him into open rebellion. It appears that he had formed an attachment to a beautiful woman who resided in the town of Lanark, and that, in passing through the streets of that burgh, well armed, and somewhar richly dressed, he was recognised by a troop of English soldiers, who surrounded and insulted him. Wallace, at first, would have prudently got clear of their insolence; but a contemptuous stroke which one of them made against his sword provoked him to draw, and the culprit was laid dead at his feet. A tumult now arose, and almost overpowered by numbers, he escaped with difficulty into the house of his mistress, and through it by a back passage, into the neighbouring woods. For this ready aid, the unfortunate girl was seized next day, by William de Heslope, the English sheriff, and with inhuman cruelty, condemned and executed. But Wallace's revenge, when he heard of her unmerited fate, was as rapid as it was stern. That very night, he collected thirty faithful and powerful partisans, who, entering the town when all were in their beds, reached the sheriff's lodging in silence. It was a room or loft, constructed, like most of the buildings of those times, of wood, and communicating with the street by a high stair. Up this Wallace rushed at midnight, and beating down the door, presented himself in full armour, and with his naked weapon, before the affrighted officer, who asked him whence he came or who he was?—"I am William Wallace," he replied, "whose life you sought yesterday, and now thou shalt answer me for my poor maiden's death." With these words, he seized his naked victim by the throat, and passing his sword through his body, cast the bleeding wretch down the stair into the street, where he was immediately slain. He then collected his soldiers, and as the stir and tumult arose, drew off through the streets into the woods which surrounded the town.—The same.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

SEVENTH CONCERT, MONDAY MAY 23, 1831.

ACT I.

Sinfonia in C minor	Spohr.
Trio, Miss H. Cawse, Mr Horncastle, and Mr E. Taylor, "Ad Te levavi"	Cherubini.
Fantasie Caracteristique, pour le piano forte, sur un Air Indienne d'Oberon, Mr Hummel	Hummel.
Recitativo e Quartetto, Miss Inverarity, Miss H. Cawse, Mr Horncastle, and Mr E. Taylor, col Coro, "Alziam gli evviva," (Euryanthe)	C. M. von Weber.
Overture, Anacreon	Cherubini.

ACT II.

Sinfonia, No. V	Haydn.
Scena. Miss Inverarity, "Non mi dir," (Il Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Fantasia, Violin, Mr Blagrove	Mayseder.
Quartet, Miss Inverarity, Miss H. Cawse, Mr Horncastle, and Mr E. Taylor, "Over the dark blue waters" (Oberon)	C. M. von Weber.
Overture, Fidelio	Beethoven.

Leader, Mr Mori.—Conductor, Sir George Smart.

They who assert that Spohr is deficient in melody, would find it difficult to maintain their ground with any show of reason, after hearing the very beautiful and masterly symphony which opened the concert on Monday evening. The same charge, however, was formerly urged against Beethoven by a majority of his audiences, till it was found that all the real musicians were unanimous in admiring his genius, and till they themselves began to understand him. And so it will be with Spohr. There is not a scientific musician now in London who will speak slightingly of his compositions, either on the score of melody or harmony; and if professors are not to be judges of their own art, who should? A man who has all his life been studying the construction of poetical thought, and the melody of verse, is more competent to understand the mind, and appreciate the design of an elaborate poem, than he who is ignorant of the first principles of composition, and who never attempted to construct a single verse. Music is pronounced to be an affair of pure feeling—so is poetry; judgment and design, however, must accompany the composer; and feeling, design, and judgment, are to be improved by cultivation. The man, therefore, whose sole occupation has been directed into an opposite channel, should feel some visitings of modesty before he presumes to express open contempt for a work of thought that is at the same moment receiving the unequivocal approbation of professors and men of acknowledged genius. But the English nation will never perish through modesty. Because a man busies himself in the economy of an academy of music, he does not in consequence become authorised to decide upon the merits of composition; still less can he be supposed to know much of the matter, whose chief employment has been to scour the country for orders of drugs. Such persons should be satisfied with the reflection that their mental vision is neither naturally nor artificially strong enough to perceive the merits of so elaborate a construction as the oratorio of 'The Last Judgment,' or of such a symphony as was performed on Monday evening —particularly at a single hearing. The same people, we feel assured, would not, at a single hearing, perceive one tithe of the beauties in the 'Paradise Lost;' and they would be completely mystified with COLLINS's ode 'On the Poetical Character:' yet these are pretty compositions; though to a dull man, or a rider to collect orders, the latter poem might appear wild and nonsensical.

Digitized by Google

With respect to the oratorio above named, the reader already knows our opinion; that opinion has increased and strengthened after a dozen hearings of the music: the same feeling of admiration has attended each time of hearing the 'Azor and Zemira,' which has been three times in public, and unremittingly in private; and we venture to predict that the symphony in question will eventually be pronounced worthy of any composer—not even excepting of MOZART himself. It is interspersed with the most charming melodies; with masterly scoring, exquisite passages of imitation for the various instruments; these are tossed about the orchestra, taken up, repeated, and inverted with excellent ingenuity and effect: the whole design is symmetrical, and the last movement contains a fine fugue upon an original subject.

The trio from CHERUBINI, 'Ad Te levavi,' is an old favourite with us. It forms one movement in his first mass (in F) for three voices, and in its present adaptation may be found in the first number of NOVELLO's 'Motetts for the Offertory.' It is a charming piece of dignified simplicity and sweetness, and gave so much pleasure upon the present occasion, both for its own merits and the judgment with which it was performed, as to obtain an animated encore.

The subject of HUMMEL's fantasia did not appear to us a very fertile one for various treatment; he however did wonders with it; and as for his own playing, we have only to repeat the universal opinion, that it is the perfection of skill and neatness, of grace and delicacy.

The quartet from 'Euryanthe' is a pleasing composition, and was well executed. The soprano part, which is of a florid character in the last movement, was written by the composer for Mademoiselle SONTAG.

The 'Overture to Anacreon'—an A 1, as the men at Lloyd's would rate it—was played with a fire and brilliancy worthy of its own fervid character.

HAYDN's symphony, which is in the same key as that of SPOHR—C minor, went off delightfully. The solo players, in two or three instances during the course of the evening, appeared to be a little wavering and nervous. The cause may be attributable to the relaxing state of the atmosphere, certainly not to original deficiency in themselves.

Miss INVERARITY sang the beautiful scena from Don Giovanni very creditably, both as to feeling and execution. She was evidently not in complete self-possession, probably from the reflection that her audience, generally speaking, were more fastidious judges than the ordinary assembly at a theatre. The piece, we observed, was transposed a note lower, a practice which seldom, perhaps never improves a fine composition.

With a little more power and feeling (and these will no doubt succeed with years, and study of the most sterling compositions) Mr BLAGROVE will become a finished performer. He has already a pure and delicate intonation, with abundant execution. It was evident that a party in the room supported him; which he did not require, for he is a young man of superior talent.

The pretty quartett from Oberon was encored, and purely as it appeared to us because two or three petulant ones hissed. If the demand for repetition were injudicious, the disapprobation was peevish; for we have in times past, at the Philharmonic concerts, heard compositions of the most flimsy character, and howlings worthy only of a menagerie, yet both have been tumultuously applauded.

The fine overture to Fidelio completed the performance of a most choice entertainment.

C.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

ST. CUTHBERT.—It is said that the Northumbrian Catholics still keep secret the precise spot of the Saint's sepulture, which is only entrusted to three persons at a time. When one dies, the survivors associate to them, in his room, a person judged fit to be the depository of so valuable a secret.—Sir Walter Scott.

ORDERS FOR PAINTING.—A person one day called upon Sir Thomas Lawrence to give him orders about painting his house. Lawrence, by no means petulent or offended, replied with a smile, that he was not a painter of houses, but only a painter of faces. 'Well,' rejoined the man, 'If you are too proud to do the job, I'll find plenty of others that will be glad of it;'—saying which, he abruptly left the room, Sir Thomas seeming to enjoy the scene.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

A LIVELY CORPSE.—Mr Gallaher, the celebrated ventriloquist, lately observed two simple country-looking fellows carrying a coffin out to Roundtown. When they got near the bridge at Harold's Cross, they stopped to rest themselves. Mr Gallaher pretended to be walking quietly by them, when he threw his voice into the coffin, and immediately a loud shriek of agony was heard to issue, followed by cries of 'Oh! murther! murther! is it into the canal you're goin' to throw me? Isn't it bad enough to Burke me, but you must be after drownin' me too?'—'What in the world is that?' said a person who was passing.—'Is that the question you're askin'?' said the voice from the coffin; 'let me out o'the coffin, you scoundrels, and though I am half choaked, I'll box the two o' you—one down and the other come on.'—'Oh! good Christians,' cried a poor woman, who was now attracted by the noise, 'here's a dead man in the coffin that wants to fight his two murderers.' A crowd was immediately collected; the two poor countrymen were arrested as resurrectionists, and it was not until the coffin was opened and examined, that they were permitted to proceed with their burden. Just as the crowd was dispersing, a voice from the coffin was heard to exclaim, 'Now, boys, after all the trouble I gave you, I hope you won't forget to bury me dacently.'—Dublin Morning Register.

"COMBING."—The Morning Herald gives the following amusing account of a "victimizer" or swindler, who has lately been figuring at Brighton:—'Brighton has been lately visited by one of those impudent swindlers who often carry everything before them at the watering places by stringing together lies about their condition in life, which ordinary means will often fail in detecting. The adventurer alluded to on this occasion exercised his ingenuity so dexterously, as to fix himself in an extensive and elegant acquaintance in the town. He is an Englishman, but represented himself as a Colonel in the Russian service, come here to arrange some family affairs thrown into confusion by the death of an old uncle, who died intestate. He was full of Russian anecdote, and boasted of an intimacy with the Duke of Devonshire, whom he described as a d——d liberal good fellow, to whom the British Government were under great obligations for the early information he was in the habit of communicating on Russian affairs, facilities being afforded to him by his intimacy with Count Diebitsch. Nobody doubted the veracity of the Colonel, until he thought proper to give a finishing stroke to his importance, by the introduction of a Polish Princess, and then his fortunes suddenly gave way, and his elegant associates found they were the dupes of a regular "victimizer." As he progressed in the good opinion of those whose circle he graced, he at one time threw a party of reformers into dismay, by telling them that his friend Lord John Russell, with whom he had dined that day at Lord Egremont's, had assured him confidentially that the Bill would be mulled in the Lords,—an intimation with whi h he was not a little pleased, as, although he loved a little reform, to prevent the bawling of the multitude, he did not like to see property, which ought to be as sacred as the grave, divided amongst mislead and vulgar robbers. After having excited consternation of this kind, he joined a whist party, and astonished them in another way. In the management of the cards consisted his peculiar excellence. He had a most graceful way of shuffling, which he called combing, and he won with so kind and obliging an air, that even those who were losing took pleasure in seeing him "comb." When engage l in this recreation, as he called it, he never spoke a word; and when asked the reason in private, said, "No, no, I never speak when I play; I speak a little when I comb, but I never speak when I play; I then make the cards speak for themselves." After whist it was usual for him to propose a new round game called "fright," in which he had extraordinary luck, for he invariably struck terror into his antagonists, and never left them till he combed them into mere apparitions. At last the Polish Princess made her appearance at Brighton, and put up at one of the most fashionable hotels, when she assumed a title hard enough to cause a locked-jaw in pronouncing; but she was not there long when she was recognised as an obliging acquaintance from the romantic neighbourhood of Hull. Her Serene Highness's bill was soon made out, and she departed in the Red Rover coach, for town. This led to an inquiry, by which the Colonel was at once found to be a London "victimizer," and to have been formerly a locksmith in the neighbourhood of Smithfield. He bolted from Brighton, after having obtained, amongst other valuable things, a splendid set of teeth and gold palate for his Princess, who had unfortunately occasion for such articles, in consequence of an intense cold caught in her native country in her alarm at the aggression of the Russian troops.'

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Tancredi—Kenilworth.
DRURY-LANE.—Virginius—The Jenkinses—Timour the Tartar.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Highland Reel.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr SHERIDAN.]

Lady Teazle, Miss Chester. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Faucit.
Mrs Candour, Mrs Orger. Maria, Miss Faucit. Maid, Mrs Webster.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr Farren. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr Dowton.
Joseph Surface, Mr Macready. Charles Surface, Mr Wallack.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr Harley. Crabtree, Mr W. Bennett.
Careless, Mr Yarnold. Rowley, Mr Younge.
Moses, Mr Webster. Trip, Mr Balls. Snake, Mr Thompson.
Sir Harry, (with a Song), Mr Sinclair.
John, Mr Eaton. William, Mr Honner.
First Gentleman, Mr East. Second Gentleman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Lindpaintner's Overture to 'Le Vampyr;' Mozart's Overture to 'Cosi Fan Tutti;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

After which, the Exhibition of the New and Splendid DIORAMA, designed and painted by Mr STANFIELD.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, The Legion of Honour; The Diorama; and Timour the Tartar.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans, Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stappe, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Comte Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.
Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To which will be added, a Farce, called

THE IRISH TUTOR.

Rosa, Miss Lawrence. Mary, Mrs J. Hughes. Terry O'Rourke, Mr Power.
Mr Tillwell, Mr Evans. Charles, Mr Baker. Dr Flail, Mr Blanchard.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte, and Hide and Seek.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'
PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonnini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

MOLIERE'S celebrated Play of

LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME.

(Avec les Corrections du Théâtre Français.)

Madame Jourdain, Mme. Baudin. La Marquise, Mlle. Eliza. Lucille, Mlle. Florval.
Nicole, Mlle. St. Ange. M. Jourdain, M. Laporte. Dorante, M. Alfred.
Cléonte, M. Guenée. Corvielle, M. Gamard. Le Maitre de Musique, M. Paulin.
Le Maitre d'Armes, M. Pelissié. Le Maitre de Danse, M. Préval.
Le Maitre de Philosophie, M. Cloup. Le Maitre Tailleur, M. Arnaud.
Un Valet, M. Granville.

In the course of the Evening, Madame Pasta will sing a Favorite Air.

Suivi de

LOUISE: OU, LA REPARATION.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Louise, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Barneck, Mme. Préval.
M. de Malzen, M. Alfred. Sadler, M. Paulin. Salsbach, M. Laporte.
Frits, M. Guenée.

On Finira par

LE BAL CHAMPETRE:

Vaudeville de MM. SCRIBE et DUPIN.
Madame Durfort, Mlle. Jamain. Josephine, Mlle. St. Ange.
Angelina, Mlle. Florval. Amanda, Mme. Gamard. Toinette, Mlle. Corra.
Annette, Mlle. Eliza. M. Pastourelle, M. Guenée.
M. Belle Jambe, M. Laporte. Poussif, M. Préval. M. Durfort, M. Cloup.
At the End of which, a Quadrille, by Mlle. Taglioni, Mesdames Clara, Kaniel, and Zoe Beaupré, MM. Lefevre, Emile, Pelissie, and Laporte.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Poole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier. Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumboog, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Lauriston, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Tully.
Eau de Vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.
Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.
English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcombe, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

After which a New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND! OR, THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Edith, Miss Nicol.
Judy Magillicuddy, Madame Simon. Shelah, Miss Ellis.
Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Ennismore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Honner. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Old Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.
Ralph Brush, Mr Maitland. Landlord, Mr Webb. Sailors, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Pescara, Mr Marshall. Foscari, Mr Munroe. Alberto, Mr Davis.
Julio, Mr Willing. Gerald, Master Smith. Pietro, Mr Young.
High Priest, Mr Jones. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson. Nixonomed, Mr Spencer.

After which, the Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

DELUSIONS.

Ellen Mowbray, by a Young Lady. Mary, Miss Wells.
Mrs Jenkins, Mrs Garrick. Frank, Mr Marshall. Charles Euston, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

Taken from Sir W. SCOTT'S celebrated Story.

Lady Ashton, Miss Wells. Lucy Ashton, Mrs Evans. Marion, Miss Ayres.
Dame Lightbody, Mrs Garrick. Edgar, Mr Keppell.
Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr Forrester. Captain Craigengelt, Mr Marshall.
And Caleb Balderstone, Mr Munroe.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Shepherd of Derwent Vale —Martha Willis, the Maid Servant—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

ROYAL PANARMONION THEATRE. — Irresistibles. — Jealousy! or the Secret Door.—Timour the Tartar.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

No. 227.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1831.

SLANDERERS "WORSE THAN HOUSEBREAKERS."

——"Good name in man and woman
Is the immediate jewel of their souls;
Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that, which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."—Othello.

We are exposed in 'this best of all possible worlds' to a variety of evils, some of which act on our physical enjoyments, and others chiefly affect our minds. The thief who deprives us of our property, if his depredations proceed beyond a certain point does the one; the slanderer who assails our reputation, in a greater or less degree, does the other. As there can be no question that mental evils afflict us more intensely, and consequently are harder to bear than bodily ones, so I conceive there can be as little doubt that, comparing the slanderer and his adjunct, the willing listener to slander, with the thief and his auxiliary, the receiver of stolen goods, the palm of superior infamy must inevitably be awarded to the former. Many considerations support this conclusion. First of all, it must be admitted that the thief has more to offer in the way of extenuation, than his parallel, the slanderer, can pretend to. Necessity does sometimes drive the former unwillingly into his vocation, and once involved in it, the door of respectable society is shut against him, and he must continue outside, from loss of character. The slanderer can set up no such plea. For, although no doubt he too labours under an analogous poverty, that of imagination and right feeling, his want is not like the other's, of that peremptory nature which must immediately be satisfied: nobody dies of mental insufficiency. The motive of the slanderer, then, must be traced to something else, and may safely be attributed to a diseased appetite, an inward craving and fondness for mischief for its own sake; or, in other words, for a love of the worst kind of pleasure to himself, at the cost of the worst pain to others. This will appear more obviously, if we remember that the slanderer inflicts injury often without producing any apparent benefit to himself,* and that in few instances is the benefit to himself correspondent to the mischief done to others: add to this, as the aggravation of his criminality, that the victims he selects are generally persons distinguished by superior merit, or powerless from their weakness, and not seldom his acquaintances and supposed friends. On the first point of comparison, the thief may fairly be pronounced the better man. In the second place, the qualities called into exercise by the thief and the slanderer may be noticed. The known risk of detection and opposition in enterprises of hazard or difficulty, naturally suggests that they who engage in them must possess a certain portion both of courage and fortitude. Of these abstract virtues the slanderer needs not a particle, for as he practises his iniquities principally among his intimates, detracting from one or another, as occasion prompts, gaining the confidence of all (for a time) by false pretences of esteem for each; so he generally contrives to keep himself safe from detection, by making his slander rest on the authority of absent persons. Of course, if his own veracity is now and then called into question, he has no scruple about equivocating to any extent, and giving another colour to his defamation; and too frequently the speciousness which enables him effectually to injure saves him from the punishment which would follow the detection of his maliciousness. Again, then, must we award the preference to the thief.

To pursue the comparison but to one point more: I shall advert only to the means which society possesses to protect itself against these two nuisances. Little need be said of the precautions to protect property; they present themselves to our minds at once; and although not always effectual, they are so for the most part; and at the worst, the loss consequent on their inefficacy is determinate, and in general to be replaced. Not so the effects of slander. Despicable in its origin, having its root only in minds where better plants will not thrive, its fruits are correspondingly baleful; producing their effects by their agreeable flavour to some palates, like the fruit of some poisonous plants, which please while they destroy. A good name, which, by universal admission, is above riches, is the natural and favourite prey of the slanderer: creatures of his kind escape; better natures only excite his venom: indeed, you may know the better natures, as travellers in strange lands are said to know the wholesome fruit, by observing whether they have been pecked at or not. In conclusion—as to guarding against his machinations, it is impossible; he must possess cunning superior even to that of the slanderer to be either prepared for his crooked underminings, or able altogether to frustrate them.—The receivers of stolen goods, and the willing listeners to slander must be remanded for the present,—their trial cannot come on this session.

* It is proper to observe, that this desultory article is written with reference to private slanderers only; and therefore has only a partial application to such as make the press the channel of their malignity. The latter, it is well known, derive, by catering to diseased appetites, very considerable pecuniary advantage, for which they willingly forego any claim to decency of character.

MOORISH AND ENGLISH BEAUTY CONTRASTED.

'The Moorish ideas of female beauty differ from our English notions on that point in one considerable respect. With us a slender waist and graceful figure add very greatly to other personal charms; and fat people, though much respected, are not much admired. This is the very antipodes of Moorish criterion. A really handsome woman ought not to be able to walk, corpulence and comeliness being synonimous, and the extreme of the one being considered the height of the other. A woman of a ton weight is, in the opinion of a Moor, a morsel fit for the Sultan; and instead of the waspish proportion of a modern waist, which is laced in as tightly as the stomach, liver, and other superfluous parts will allow, a Moorish shape,

"If shape that can be called which shape hath none," is considered, by these sensual connoisseurs, as nearly approaching to perfection when it resembles, or rather exceeds, the circumference of a butt, pipe, or any other large measure. In order to obtain this degree of excellence, the Moorish ladies eat large quantities of kouskousou, in itself very nourishing, and its fattening qualities are increased by the introduction of a small yellow grain, or seed, called alholba (trigonilla) used also in making bread.'—Brooke's Sketches of Spain and Morocco.

It is doubtful whether the most enlightened men are admirers of these extremes, in any country. It is well known that English ladies are apt to make great mistakes on this point, and to make themselves actually hideous in the eyes of those whose admiration they sacrifice their health and comfort, and sometimes life itself, to obtain. It can never be to the interest of any woman, to sacrifice the attractions of healthful gaiety, and natural freedom of action, to any conventional ideas of form. The form most admired in this country, by men of taste, is, not the unnatural waspish one which begets disease, and is incompatible with graceful movement; but one of such delicate and feminine proportion, as to unite the plumpness of youth and health, with the slenderness of activity: a form that is neither associated with beef, vinegar, nor whalebone; but with pure blood, active limbs, and a cheerful mind. If the Moorish ladies mistake the taste of the other sex, as much as the English do, their cramming of kouskousou must be not only a superfluous tasking of the digestion, but a folly of which the result is more reprobated and pitied, than admired.

Digitized by Google

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

(From the Lives of the Scottish Worthies.)

MISCHIEVOUS FOLLIES.

The King (Alexander the Third, of Scotland) who was only in his forty-fifth year, dispatched his chancellor, Charteris, along with three knights, Sir Patrick Graham, Sir William St Clair, and Sir John de Soulis, on a matrimonial embassy to France. Their commission was to select, from one of the noblest families in that country, a second consort for their sovereign; and they chose Joleta, a daughter of the Count de Dreux, who was wedded to the king at Jedburgh, with great pomp and rejoicing, on the fifth of April 1285. Her extreme beauty, the splendour of the suite of French nobility who accompanied her, and the generous wishes of the Scottish nobles to manifest their joy at the marriage of the King, and to efface all melancholy recollections from his mind, rendered these festivities unusually brilliant. Amid a numerous concourse of all that was lordly and beautiful in the land, Alexander and his Queen presented gifts to the foreign Barons, who came to grace the ceremony; and the feast, the dance, and the rude dramatic or pantomimic entertainment of these times, occupied many successive days. But the nuptial mirth was suddenly overclouded by a singular apparition. At night, when joy was at its height, when the floor was thronged with maskers, and the minstrels made the roof echo to their music, a spectre like Death suddenly glided in amongst the revellers, and approaching the beautiful Joleta, invited her with a silent and fearful motion to join the dancers. All were horror-struck; a loud shriek from the Queen announced the extremity of her terror; and falling into the arms of her husband, the music ceased, and the entertainment abruptly broke off, amid the sighs and tears of the Queen's female attendants, and the indignant enquiries of the prince and his nobles. It was, indeed, soon discovered that the whole was only a well-acted piece of mumming; but a feeling of superstitious dread and dark presentiment had taken hold of the minds of the assembly, and the death-like mask at Jedburgh seems to have been universally considered as ominous of some deep national calamity. Nor was this an unfounded foreboding; for the King did not survive his marriage for a single year, and his death was sudden and violent. Having gone to visit his Queen, he returned on horseback with a small retinue of his nobles, and reached Inverkeithen in the evening. The night was dark, and as the road wound dangerously along some precipitous cliffs overhanging the sea, his courtiers earnestly entreated him to delay his journey till the morning; but he insisted on pressing forward towards Kinghorn, and his horse making a false step, stumbled over a cliff, and falling with its rider, killed him in an instant. The place where the accident happened is still pointed out in the tradition of the neighbourhood, by the name of 'the King's Wudend,' and a cross of stone was erected on the spot, which still existed in the reign of James the Second. In England, his death was considered, if we may believe Knighton, as a judgment from heaven, for having broken the holy season of Lent, by a visit to his Queen. Such is the ridiculous blindness of superstition! In Scotland, however, the universal love and affection of his subjects repelled so injurious an imputation. 'Let no one,' says Fordun, reasoning upon the suddenness of his death, 'presume to doubt as to the salvation of this King. He cannot die ill, who hath lived well.'

MICHAEL SCOTT.

In the brief but interesting accounts of this singular man, which we meet with in the ancient Chronicles of Italy, it is mentioned that he was the inventor of a new species of casque or steel basnet, denominated a cervilerium, which he commonly wore under the furred or velvet cap used by the learned of those times. The origin of this invention is curious. In those dark periods, when the belief of magic was universal, not only among the lower ranks, but with the learned and educated classes of the community, it was reported that the Wizard, having cast his own horoscope, had discovered that his death was to be occasioned by a stone falling upon his bare skull. With that anxiety which clings to life, he endeavoured to defeat the demon whom he served, and by repeated incantations constructed this magic casque, which he vainly deemed invulnerable. But his fate, according to the tradition of Italy, was not to be avoided. In passing a cathedral when the bell was ringing for vespers, Michael endeavoured to pay his devotions, and forgetful of his cervilerium, which was fixed inside his cap, uncovered as he reverentially knelt on the stone floor. The moment of his fate was arrived. The rope of the belfry had loosened one of the carved corbels which ornamented the interior of the roof beneath which the Magician knelt; before he could remove, the sharp and heavy mass descended on his forehead, and whilst it confirmed the infallibility of his prescience, in an instant deprived him of life. Michael, however, according to the account of Benvenuto da Imola, had strength enough to lift up the stone and ascertain its weight, after which he declared it was of the exact size he expected, and that nothing was left him but to die, which he did accordingly, after very properly making his will. It is needless to remark that this fable is confuted by the return of Michael to his native country; but it appears to have been the origin of a tradition still current among the peasantry of Scotland, and which ascribes a miraculous power to the bonnet of the Wizard. It is curious to find the tale of the invulnerable cervilerium of the Italians travelling on the breath of credulity and superstition into the 'far north countrie,' of which the Magician was a native, and only changed by tradition from the blue steel worked and welded by magic art, into the blue bonnet which was waited on by Scottish demons, who were heard wailing in mid air when it was waved by its dreaded master.

(From the Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.)

TWO TONIES TOGETHER.

The late Mr Hayes, the surgeon, of Charlotte street, Fitzroy square, used to tell a singular anecdote of an occurrence in Sir Thomas Lawrence's attelier, when he resided in Old Bond street. It appears that Mr Hayes, ere the age at which the hey-day of the blood is tame, was not quite temptation-proof against strong excitement to wrath. It happened that Sir Thomas, then Mr Lawrence, had painted the portrait of a Mr Sheepshanks, a friend of Mr Hayes, whose appearance, however, was less singular than his name. Mr Lawrence told Mr Hayes of his progress in his friend's portrait; and when it was finished, Mr Hayes, who thought it an excellent likeness, one day escorted, to the artist's rooms, a friend from the town where Mr S. resided, and who was acquainted with him. The gentleman thus to be introduced to the arts, was one of the best specimens of a race now happily extinct in this country. He was a fine representative of the squirarchy, the country gentleman of "the good old times,"—a perfect Tony Lumpkin, rich, and master over all things in his neighbourhood, except himself. Mr Hayes, introducing this rural magistrate among the numerous portraits, watched his rubicund visage in expectation of his wonder and admiration at being surrounded by works of art, and he anticipated the climax of joy, when his eye should be caught, in a rude frenzy rolling, by the likeness of his country friend and neighbour, Mr Sheepshanks. The squire, however, gaped and gazed, without the slightest appearance of any emotion whatever; and, at last, as if tired, and wishing to depart, he begged that the portrait of his friend might be shewn to him at once. "Zounds!" cried the astonished and irritated surgeon, "that is it, which you have been looking at these five minutes!"—"That he! hang me if it is a bit like un—no more like un, than its like our parson." In vain did the doctor try to persuade the country gentleman, to whom he was showing the lions of London, that it was an admirable painting, and a correct likeness—his friend as sturdily maintained that "he was not to be done arter that fashion—that the portrait wasn't a bit like un, and he wouldn't give a guinea for a score of such pictures." Coarseness on the one side begot anger on the other; but the rustic gentleman repaid every term of irritation with an immense interest; and

> "So high at last the contest rose,
> From words, they next proceed to blows,
> When luckily came by a third:"—

The third was the astonished Mr Lawrence, who had been below, and knew nothing of the dispute; but hearing a scuffle in his painting room, he ran upstairs, and, to his surprise, saw the two infuriated combatants; and the portrait, the innocent cause of the battle, knocked off the easel upon the floor. Having parted "the friends," in terror least, like the bull in the china shop, they might destroy all things around them, he next learnt the source of their quarrel. He bore the explanation with great equanimity, and reconciled the parties; nor would he suffer them to leave his roof, till they "shook hands, embraced," and probably "hated each other most cordially ever after."—Vol. II. pp. 435—437.

A PORTRAIT BY SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

I went to Princess Lieven's to see Don Miguel, to whom, at his desire, I was introduced. He told me he had heard much of me at Vienna—was very courteous and pleasing. He has gained on the good opinions of all, by his quiet, modest manner, his attention to everything presented to his notice, and his avowed love of English society. I received a letter the next morning from a fair sitter of mine, telling me that he kept them up, teaching them German dances, till six in the morning. His features have symmetry, delicacy, and character. His eyes bear a larger proportion to the rest of the countenance, than is seen in our English faces: his nose is handsome, and mouth small and pleasing. When not speaking, he has a quiet gravity of expression; but then it lights up with an unaffected smile, and with a manner gracious without the alloy of condescension. He is about Andrew's size, or an inch taller, but stouter, without the least tendency to the corpulent.—[Had Sir Thomas Lawrence's pencil been no more successful than his pen, his portraits would surely have needed labels about their necks. His biographer remarks upon the consummate hypocrisy which could, in this instance, deceive the practised eye of this artist; but he would probably have been clearer, had Don Miguel been a person of inferior rank. He had seen much flattered, and admitted to habits of familiarity with princes and sovereigns, and was naturally willing to think the best of them;—to say nothing of that respect for high station, in the abstract, which he acknowledges in his letters.]

A BENEFICIAL REBUFF.

However gentle and kind, Sir Thomas was occasionally annoyed by presumptuous ignorance, and on one occasion he took rather a cruel or rough mode of performing what, in substance, was a real benefit to the individual—to check his seeking a livelihood in a profession for which he had no capacity. It was in the year 1815, just after he had received the honour of knighthood, that a young man, without any introduction or previous application by letter, called upon him, and intruding himself into his room, with an air of confidence and vanity that nothing could well depress or mortify, told Sir Thomas that he had brought his first production to shew him, and to ask his opinion of it. Sir Thomas took the painting handed to him, and seeing at a glance that it was fatally destitute of merit, he said, 'And pray, Sir, how many of these may you have produced?'—'Exactly two, Sir.'—'Then you have, in my opinion, painted exactly two too many,'—saying which, he wished the astonished aspirant a good morning, and rang the bell for the servant.—[The author of this work, although evidently a great admirer of his hero, so honestly admits his faults, that we are bound to give full credit to his assertion, that this roughness of manner was an exception to his usual treatment of those who asked his aid or counsel; we must therefore suppose the manners of the young artist to have compelled this rebuff, and it is well known that the mildest and kindest natures are apt to be the most severe, when their patience and forbearance is too much abused.]

Digitized by Google

THE FINEST PORTRAIT EVER PAINTED.

A gentleman, many years ago, took an opportunity of asking Sir Thomas which was decidedly, in his opinion, the best portrait his great predecessor, Sir Joshua, had ever painted. Sir Thomas, without hesitation, replied, 'The portrait of Mrs Siddons, as the Tragic Muse—that is the finest portrait ever painted under the canopy of heaven.'—'No, Sir,' answered the querist; 'I think Sir Joshua's portrait of the Marchioness of Tavistock, at Woburn Abbey, the very best.'—'Undoubtedly,' answered Lawrence with mildness, 'that is a very fine portrait; but I should give the palm decidedly to that which I have mentioned. I was so struck with the beauty of the colouring, and the extraordinary state of its preservation, that I was nearly two hours fixed before it, by admiration.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Paganini.—That Paganini has a right to double the ordinary prices of admission to his concerts, we think is as clear as a mathematical fact. In that view, therefore, nobody has a right to complain. The public, on the other hand, have a right to absent themselves; and in that event Paganini would probably discover that he was wrong in exercising his right. But the newspapers complain that Paganini has no right to deprive thousands of the opportunity of hearing him, who would willingly pay half-a-guinea, but who cannot afford a guinea. All this is very foolish; for not only has Paganini a right to deprive any portion of the public of all chance of witnessing his performances, by demanding prices that amount to a prohibition, but he has a right to deprive the whole public—'yea, the great globe itself, and all it doth inhabit'—of the same enjoyment. Our critics mistake it for a question of art. It is no such thing. It is not a question at all. Suppose Paganini finds the house crowded at his increased charges, then he will find that he has calculated correctly, and the public will thereby have admitted that he knows his own value better than they do. But suppose he is greeted by a beggarly account of empty benches, then no doubt he will tot up the items of his attraction over again, and reduce his price. Paganini, like any other marketable commodity, is worth just so much as he will bring, and no more. Perhaps he is only coming in, like the green peas, at a guinea a quart, and is merely putting on extravagant terms at first for the luxurious and exclusive ranks. As the season advances he will probably fall, and we have no doubt he will sink to his proper level in the long run. At all events, be that as it may, he is now doing that which is essential to the reputation of all great men, fiddlers included—i. e. getting himself into general notice. Having once accomplished that desirable object, it is not impossible but that he may strike before the doors open.—Atlas.

Combination of Authors.—In consequence of some attempts having lately been made by the French authorities to re-establish a censorship over dramatic productions, and the managers of some theatres having manifested a disposition to yield to it, by consenting to submit all pieces to a previous examination, the authors, to the number of seventy-five, have entered into a combination to resist it, and if they can hold out, they have hit on the right method. They have agreed, under a heavy penalty, to withdraw from those theatres whose managers submit pieces to previous examination, all their works, whether represented or not, over which they have control, and not to present any new ones until such managers shall think proper to come to their senses.—Athenæum.

— When Louis the Eighteenth sent the French Roscius (Talma) a service of Sevres porcelain, each sort of utensil being eighteen in number, and with 'Louis dix-huit,' marked on each peice, 'Ah mon Dieu,' cried the witty actor, 'combien je voudrais que ce fut Louis vingt-huit!'—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

An Artist Bewitched.—For many successive evenings Sir Thomas came to our house in such evident low spirits, that we all feared some painful circumstance had befallen him. At length he suddenly regained his usual manner, and I then ventured to ask what had so depressed him. He seemed astonished that I had not divined the cause, saying, 'How could you expect a man to be less than miserable, who had Michael Angelo's Witch on the wide seas, and did not know for a fortnight what had become of her?' Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Popular Fancies.—It is a popular article of faith, that those who are born on Christmas, or Good Friday, have the power of seeing spirits, and even of commanding them.—The Spaniards imputed the haggard and downcast looks of their Philip II to the disagreeable visions to which this privilege subjected him.—Sir Walter Scott. [This reminds one of a notion, prevalent among country-people, that pigs see the wind, and that those who eat the marrow of that animal, having the same power, become mad in consequence. The former, indeed, is the more gentlemanly superstition.]

"Conform to the Times."—My good friend, the late M. de Montampui, rector of the university of Paris, had a great wish to go to see the representation of Zaire, a very pious piece, in which the heroine makes an appointment, only for the purpose of being baptised. It would be necessary, however, to go in a hackney-coach from his college to the theatre, in his usual dress, as other honest men did; and he believed, like P. Cartel, that all the universe had eyes upon him; and he believed this with so much the more reason, as, according to the full meaning of the words, being rector of the university, he had the direction of the universe, which, of course, would be continually observing him. He felt that the universe would learn with astonishment, that a man named Montampui had been to the theatre, and that all ages would be scandalized at it. M. Montampui, unwilling either to give so much pain to the universe, or to give up his visit to the theatre, he bethought himself of going disguised as a woman. He had in an old wardrobe a dress of his grandmother's, who died in the time of the Fronde. He muffles himself up in a red petticoat and a russet-coloured mantle, covers his learned head with a head-dress of three stories, surmounted by a large knot of rose-coloured ribbons. A pair of long red ruffles, somewhat torn, show off to advantage his rough, square arms; and, thus dressed out, our rector leaves the college by a private door, and makes the best of his way to the theatre. His strange figure attracted everybody's attention; little respect was paid to Madame, who being hauled about pretty roughly, was soon discovered to be a man, and led off to prison, where she remained until she made full confession that she was the rector of the university, the eldest daughter of our kings. If M de Montampui had followed the admirable maxim, 'Conform to the times,' he would not thus have exposed himself before the universe.—Voltaire's Facetiæ.

Scottish Waggery.—Sir David de Lindsay, first Earl of Crauford, was, among other gentlemen of quality, attended, during a visit to London in 1390, by Sir William Dalzell, who was, according to my authority, Bower, not only excelling in wisdom, but also of a lively wit. Chancing to be at the court, he there saw Sir Piers Courtenay, an English knight, famous for skill in tilting, and for the beauty of his person, parading the palace, arrayed in a new mantle, bearing for device an embroidered falcon, with this rhyme—

'I bear a falcon, fairest of flight,
Whoso pinches at her, his death is dight,*
In graith.'†

The Scottish knight, being a wag, appeared the next day in a dress exactly similar to that of Courtenay, but bearing a magpie instead of the falcon, with a motto ingeniously contrived to rhyme to the vaunting inscription of Sir Piers:—

'I bear a pie picking at a piece,
Whoso picks at her, I shall pick at his nese,‡
In faith.'

This affront could only be expiated by a joust with sharp lances. In the course, Dalzell left his helmet unlaced, so that it gave way at the touch of his antagonist's lance, and he thus avoided the shock of the encounter. This happened twice. In the third encounter the handsome Courtenay lost two of his front teeth. As the Englishman complained bitterly of Dalzell's fraud, in not fastening his helmet, the Scottishman agreed to run six courses more, each champion staking in the hand of the King two hundred pounds, to be forfeited if, on entering the lists, any unequal advantage should be detected. This being agreed to, the wily Scot demanded that Sir Piers, in addition to the loss of his teeth, should consent to the extinction of one of his eyes, he himself having lost an eye in the fight of Otterburn. As Courtenay demurred to this equalization of optical powers, Dalzell demanded the forfeit, which, after much altercation, the King appointed to be paid to him, saying he surpassed the English both in wit and valour. This must appear to the reader a singular specimen of the humour of that time. I suspect the Jockey Club would have given a different decision from Henry the Fourth.—Sir Walter Scott.

* Prepared. † Armour. ‡ Nose.

Arrangements are in preparation, to be acted upon at the beginning of the week, which, without trenching upon the rest of its character, will vary the features of our journal, and we trust will considerably improve it. The reader in the mean time will be good enough, on this account, to excuse any defect more than ordinary which he may observe in our pages.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury-Lane.—The School for Scandal—Timour the Tartar.
Covent-Garden.—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Irish Tutor.
French Plays.—Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme—Louise—Le Bal Champetre.

Digitized by Google

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The First Act of an Opera Buffa, entitled

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

[By Cimarosa.]

The principal Characters by Mme. Meric Lalande, Miss F. Ayton, Mme. Rubini, Signor Rubini, Signor Santini, and Signor Lablache.

Between the Acts, (by particular desire) the Second Act of

GUILLAUME TELL.

In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance the Tyrolienne.

After which will be presented the First Act of

TANCREDI.

[By Rossini.]

Amenaide, beloved by Tancredi . . . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Isaura, her Attendant . Madame Castelli.
Tancredi . . . . . Madame Pasta.
Orbazzano, his Rival . . . . . Signor Santini.
Argirio, the Father of Amenaide . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Roggiero, the Friend and Companion of Tancredi . Signor Galli.

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA BAYADERE.

[Composed by M. Deshayes.]

The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Nadaud.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertram.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.
Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.
Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Viola.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr Lunn.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. Tree. Charlotte, Miss Lawrence.
Mordaunt, Mr Baker. Merton, Mr Henry. Moses, Mr Keeley.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte, and The Omnibus.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Pescara, Mr Marshall. Foscari, Mr Munroe. Alberto, Mr G. Smith.
Julio, Mr Willing. Gerald, Master Smith. Pietro, Mr Young.
High Priest, Mr Jones. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson. Nixonomed, Mr Spencer.

To which will be added a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[From the French, by Mr Barnett.]

Mrs Properly, Miss Wells. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Stohwasser. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
And Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with a New Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtsdorff, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Ayres.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Count of Linsdorf, Mr Munroe.
Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall. Augustus, Mr G. Lejeune. Boltsheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassontrompdorf, Mr Forrester.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Mr MACREADY respectfully announces to his Friends and the Public, that his Benefit is fixed for Friday, May 27, 1831, when will be revived Shakspeare's Historical Tragedy of CORIOLANUS. Menenius Agrippa, Mr Dowton; Tullus Aufidius, Mr Cooper; Caius Marcius, Mr Macready; Volumnia, Miss Huddart; Virgilia, Miss Phillips. After which, in One Act, Sheridan's Entertainment of THE CRITIC, OR A TRAGEDY REHEARSED. Don Ferdinando Whiskerandos, Mr Liston; Beefeater, Mr Harley; Sneer, Mr Cooper; Puff, (for that night only) Mr Macready. To conclude with a Grand Dramatic Spectacle.

Tickets and Places to be had at the Box Office of the Theatre, and of Mr Macready, 31 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr Planché.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing, 'Away, away to the Mountain's Brow.'
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

In the course of the Evening, A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles;' Rossini's Overture to 'La Gazza Ladra;' and H. R. Bishop's Overture to 'Cortez.'

After which the Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr Planché.]

Ottavia, Miss Faucit. Maria Grazie, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge. Nicolo, Mr Webster. Fabio, Mr Hughes.
Albert, Mr H. Wallack. Theodore, Mr J. Vining.
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr Wallack.
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford. Spoletto, Mr Bland.

To which will be added, a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr Poole.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Melo-Drama of

TIMOUR THE TARTAR.

Zorilda, Miss Huddart. Selima, Miss Russell. Liska, Miss S. Phillips.
Timour, Mr H. Wallack. Oglou, Mr Cooper.
Agib, Miss Poole. Bermeddin, Mr Cooke. Abdalec, Mr Howard.
Octar, Mr Honner. Orasmin, Mr Fenton.
Kerim, Mr Howell. Sanballat, Mr Bartlett.
Tartar Chiefs—Messrs. Eaton, Bishop, Robinson, Walsh, T. Price, East, &c.
Georgian Cavalry—Messrs. Cooke, Cooke, jun., Davis, Smith, Williams, &c.

To-morrow, Coriolanus; The Critic; and Blue Beard.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier. Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Lauriston, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Tully.
Eau de Vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.
Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.
English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcombe, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

To conclude with a Romantic Melo-Drama, entitled

THE BROKEN SWORD.

[By W. Dimond, Esq.]

Rosara, Miss Vincent. Stella, Miss Summerville, with the Song of 'Come where the Aspens quiver.' Jacintha, Miss Jordan.
Beatrice, Miss Nicol. Nina, Miss Rumens. Jeannette, Miss Boden.
Rosa, Miss R. Boden. Baron Maraldi, Mr Gough. Captain Zavior, Mr Williams.
Col. Rigolio, Mr D. Pitt. Claudio, Mr Honner. Pedro, Mr Thompson.
Pablo, Mr Vale. Estevan de Burgos, Mr C. Hill. Myrtillo, Mlle. Rosiez.
Fabio, Mr Smith. Nicaro, Mr Boulanger. Bartolo, Mr Jones. Thomaso, Mr Wild.

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

Coburg Theatre.—The Shepherd of Derwent Vale—Martha Willis, the Maid Servant—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

Cooke's Equestrian Circus.— Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

Royal Pavilion Theatre.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Royal Panarmonion Theatre. — Irresistibles. — Jealousy! or the Secret Door.—Timour the Tartar.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at Eber's Library, Old Bond street; W. Kenneth, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Google

Nº 228.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, MAY 27, 1831.

A PAGE FROM THE "HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ANCIENT WORLD."

(Not published.)

THERE is a remnant of antiquity which throws some light on events now obscured by the obliterating hand of Time. The most acute antiquarian, aided by the profoundest research of the philosophic historian, has been able to elicit little that is certain or true respecting the remote age to which this Fragment must be referred. The scene of the transactions it alludes to was probably an island called Angland, or England, lying at the mouth of what was then called the Baltic Sea. This island has been long since lost, and little knowledge remains of the character or customs of the barbarians who inhabited it. The ignorance and superstition of those ages have left but little that can gratify the curiority, interest the philosophy, or conduce to the welfare of the modern world. A few scattered and unconnected events, lost in a fabulous origin, and terminating in uncertainty and contradiction, have been handed down to us by circumstances equally casual and fortuitous. Between cotemporary nations which possess extreme degrees of civilization, little certain knowledge of each other is established, and the hand of time quickly converts the gloom of obscurity into the impenetrable darkness of night. The first event which we can identify with the history of this island, is the fabulous invasion of Julius Cæsar. This chief, known as the destroyer of nearly three millions of his fellow-creatures, was invested with the attributes of Deity, as we suppose from the epithets which were applied to him, and the great respect in which his memory was held. To this fabulous period of history succeed ages, which, though more prolific of events, are equally involved in perplexity, from the poverty of records, and the conflicting nature of traditions. The characteristic features of ancient government appear to have been displayed here, in all their strange colours of incongruity in theory, and contradiction in effect. The people were perpetually engaged in resisting the encroachments, curbing the cruelty, and repairing the evil effects of those governments, which themselves had constituted for their own good. Considerable discussion has lately prevailed concerning the nature of the "Borough-mongers," and the parts which they filled in government and society. So wild has conjecture wandered in search of truth, that we have seen philosophers not scrupling to deny them the properties of humanity, nor, to make them fabled monsters, partaking, in the wild imaginations of the poets of the age, of the ferocious cowardice of the fabled crocodile, and the insatiate voracity of the modern vampire. This would be allowing too much, however, to the fancy, and too little to the judgment of the ancient poet; his Fragment also will decide against the theory of the principal of these philosophers in a different way. He has supposed that the whole history was but a version of the old story of Perseus and Andromeda, that the Boroughmongers resided on the banks of the Marsus, where the chief goods of the island were sacrificed to appease them, and that, finally, they were destroyed there, by St Stephen the English Hercules. Another more probable story, and that which the poet corroborates, is, that they were defeated at a great battle at St Stephen by Russello or Rollo, a famous chief, both sides fighting with such bravery that but one man survived. Concerning the era of Ossian, it is now clearly ascertained that he was the last prince of the Runic or Brunswick race. We shall not consider it beneath the dignity of history to insert here a poem, which may in some degree gratify a rational curiosity, concerning events which oblivion has almost enveloped, and regions of which a disputed existence is almost all that remains to mankind.

—— The night is dull and dark. Clouds rest on the hills. No star with green trembling beam; no moon looks from the sky. I see a dim form on the plain! It is a ghost! it fades, it flies. Ah! the Boroughmonger visits St Stephen's Hall; sad is the soul of the King. Chiefs gleam by his side; chiefs of the frowning brow. Where is now their fame of old? Where their deeds of mighty name? The fields of their battles are silent. Our sons shall ask of the aged, where stood the walls of their fathers? The Boroughmonger lifts his gloomy brow, and his voice is heard amidst the winds. 'Come down thou dweller between the harps, raise a song to the fame of our race.' 'Oh! why, thou wanderer unseen, that filled the pockets of Lora; why are thy notes departed, thou bender of the voices of the chiefs? We hear no distant roar of applause; no sound of gold from the bank. Yet, though the plains of our battles are dark and silent, and our fame is in the four grey stones, the voice of the Boroughmongers has been heard, and the sword was drawn in St Stephen.' Proud over them rises the moon. They lie like wings on the blast; their eyes are like flames, and their voices like distant thunder. Do we fear your gloomy forms, spirits of Sarum? Weak are your shields of clouds; the blast rolls them together. Feeble as a meteor your swords. Fly, sons of night, call your winds and fly. 'Who would force us from our places?' saith a gloomy voice. 'The people bent before us. We turned battles in the field of the brave. We looked on peace, and it vanished. Our nostrils poured forth the blast of death. Who saith to us, fly to your lands, receive your winds and fly?' But our hills are peaceful, spirits of the past. We trouble not your repose. Free is the world of clouds. Ye can divide them into tenths. Ye can tax their fleecy whiteness. The sunbeams are equal; gather them together; burn and be frozen. Hope is not dead, gloomy spirits, for the sun shines everywhere; the winds do not carry chains; the clouds trespass through all domain; the trade of nature is free. Hope is not dead, gloomy spirits. Come not then to disturb the land of your graves. Visit not the hall of your fathers. Fly, spirits of the past, receive your winds and fly. Clouds hide the face of the moon. Again floats the song of bards on the gale of night. 'Our dwellings were not always the blue circling clouds, nor our steps in the blast of the desert. Dun and feeble are the chiefs who travelled in terror before. Still is our delight to mingle in the blast of the wintry land storm, and exult with the howling waves. Did not we once make earth a desert? And what are the green billows, but moving graves? We sit in our stormy halls, the chambers of thunder. We laugh with the raging winds. Our voices echo in battle from heaven, and we paint its red scenes on the sky. We ride on the foaming waves when they leave their bed of repose, and cover the valley with death. But once we thundered in echoing halls. What wind withered like the blast of our rage? Then the earth drunk of blood, and tears of sorrow deluged the vales.' Broad over them rises the moon. The winds depart on their wings. The red stars lift their heads on high. The stream of the valley murmurs, but its murmur is sullen and sad. From the tree at the grave of the dead, the long-howling owl is heard. The bat flaps his wings in the shade. The Boroughmonger flits in the hall of St Stephen; sad flies the ghost of the King. The tales of old pass along his soul by night. He stands in his place. His name is not known in St Stephen's Hall. But a voice comes and awakes his soul; it is the voice of years that are gone; they roll before him with all their deeds. Their fire had resounded in the halls, but the voice of his people is heard no more. They are now forgot in their land. Their tombs are not found on the heath. Years came on with their storms. The green mounds are mouldered away. Scarce is the grave of Dunthalmo seen where he fell by the spear. Some grey warrior, half blind with age, sitting by night at the flaming oak of the hall, tells now their deeds to his sons, and the fall of the dark Dunthalmo. They have left no son; but the song shall prolong their name. * * * * * * * * They sit in a mist together. Gone is their strength in war. Their voice remains like a blast that roars lonely on a sea-surrounded shore when the winds are laid. Their form is not now the terror of the valiant. It is like a watery cloud, when we see the stars behind it with their weeping eyes. * * * The winds moan in the ancient hall, The ghosts leer in the gloom. Each broods in his place in the hall of his fathers. Why do ye wander, spirits? Why do ye leave your home of clouds? Ye can sow divisions here no more. Love is shed upon the earth like dew; doth it not blight your repose? Whence that grim smile, dim spirits? Swords were buried in your graves. They rust in your clay. The earth favours all her children. The sons and daughters of distress have vanished. The wind that whistled through the moss of your graves drove them away. Whence that grim smile, dim spirits? None frowns on artless pleasure. None rolls in useless splendour. Hope grows, and buds, and brings forth fruit. None blasts it in early youth. Why that scorching glance, dim spirits? The polished smile belies not the heart's working. The heavings of sorrow have their home in the breast. Joy lies on the face not alone. Man looks into the heart of his neighbour, for his pleasure is also there. He loves his brethren, and his brethren are all, and his joy is the joy of his race. Whence that loud laugh, dim spirits?

Digitized by Google

The moon is in a cloud in the west. 'Who speaks in our place' saith a hollow voice, 'raise the song, O bards, let the words of the stranger be strewn on the wind.—We have been in the gloom of the battle, as a mist that is rolled on a valley, when storms invade the silent sunshine of heaven. We have buried swords in blood-stained breasts. Red eyes have awaited our course. Sad voices have published our triumph. Blood hath reeked on our altars. We have rolled hair in dust. We rushed to death and wounds. The groan of the people spread over the hills; it was like the thunder of night when the cloud bursts on Cona; and a thousand ghosts shriek at once in the hollow wind. We revelled at the banquet of death. As a hundred winds on Morven; as the streams of a hundred hills; as clouds fly successive over heaven; or, as the dark ocean assaults the shore of the desert; so roaring, so vast, so terrible the armies mixed on Lena's echoing heath. We lifted the song of victory, and it was sung on a thousand hills. We earned our fame with the glittering spear. We trod on truth to power. We entered the mind of man, and ruled in the region of thought. He bent his knee to shadows. He was like a lovely tree, with all its branches around, but we came, as a blast from the desart, and laid its green head low. The spring returns with its showers; no leaves from it arise. We curbed man's tongue with a frown. He lisped a prayer to splendour, and called on glory, good. Faces were masked. Hope was dying. Hearts were hidden. Truth had flown. Peace was wounded. Who lifted the beam of war on the field of the brave? But now our grey hairs glitter on the beam. The winds lifts our flaming locks. Hast thou heard the spirit of Loda, when he comes on the roar of a thousand storms, and scatters battle from his eyes? Hast thou seen the green meteor of death sitting on the heath of Malmor, when the traveller is alone, and the broad moon is darkened in heaven? Hast thou heard a dark spirit descend from the skirt of his blast? The troubled ocean feels his steps as he strides from wave to wave. His path kindles behind him. Islands shake their heads on the heaving seas. * * * Our robes are the clouds of the hill. Our eyes are like two decaying flames. Dark are the wounds in our breasts.' * * * Light shines on the eastern clouds. The green hills lift their dewy heads. The blue streams rejoice in the vale. Ye love not the light, gloomy spirits, receive your winds and fly.——

TO THE TATLER.

Dear Mr Tatler,—Do you ever ride in an Omnibus? Shakspeare has said that 'All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players.' Without questioning that fact, I would ask you,—May it not as justly be said, that—all the world's an Omnibus, and all the men and women merely passengers? A journey from the Bank to Paddington is like a journey through life. Do not get into one of Shillibeer's omnibuses, unless you are disposed for a short life and a merry one. With this exception, you enter an Omnibus with as little foreknowledge of the life before you, as an infant has, in the first hour of its birth. You may find yourself thrown into a sphere of gentility, in the early part of your career, but you are continually making new acquaintances, and losing old ones, consequently go through many vicissitudes. I have lived many lives of this kind, which might furnish a volume of respectable dimensions, containing an autobiography for every degree of rank from a queen to a scullion. But you know how fickle Fortune is, Mr Tatler, and it has often happened that when I have commenced life as a queen or a princess, I have ended it as a scullion or washer-woman, and vice versa. Upon one occasion, I was jumbled amidst a number of individuals of such various ranks, that I seemed to have a choice in which to place myself. There was a princess and a great landholder present, but the former was sullen and the latter brutal and self-sufficient; I was as little disposed to associate with the one, as the other was to take any sort of notice of me; and I soon discovered by the familiar address of a blacksmith and his wife, who were taking a 'sixpenny cast,' that I belonged to a more humble sphere than I had intended to claim. The dingy couple departed this Omnibus, and I presently found myself considerably advanced in my fortunes. I was hand and glove with a portly dame, who sympathised tenderly with me in the great mortification which, like herself, I must necessarily endure, in travelling in a public conveyance. Sudden friends, however, are apt to be as fickle as fortune; and I was reduced to the necessity of seeking consolation for the forfeited favour of this elegant piece of rotundity, in the witticisms of a young hair-dresser, whose tongue seemed as sharp as his scissors. In short, Mr Tatler, in an Omnibus you meet with an amusing variety of characters in quick succession; and if you are not one of those persons who are shocked at the idea of travelling in the same vehicle with individuals less elegant and important than yourself, you would find it far preferable to a stage-coach; more especially in warm weather, because it is more roomy, and better ventilated. Yet it is remarkable that people generally seem ashamed of riding in them. A passenger in a stage-coach will ask you with a tone and manner conveying at once a contempt of the vehicle, and an apology for the doubt, if ever you have been in one of 'those Omnibuses;' and those persons who, being actually found seated in one, cannot deny the fact, generally contrive to let you know that they never rode in one before, but either that they have entered it from curiosity to see what it would be like, or have been reduced to it by some disappointment of a more dignified conveyance. The great objection made to them, is, that having no outside passengers, the company is not sufficiently select; and certainly I must own that I have sometime sat by the side of a man with his coat out at elbows, and once I remember being seated opposite to a woman who did not say anything which could lead the rest of the company to suppose either that she kept a carriage of her own, or that she even disdained that of which she had availed herself. The true cause of the contempt, as well as of the number of the passengers, is, no doubt, the cheapness of the conveyance. It is very convenient to save a few shillings, certainly; but it would not do to let people know we found it so. The proprietors would do well to put up a placard at one end, announcing that those who prefer it, are permitted to pay double. It would then only be necessary to insinuate that you did so, and you need no longer despise the Omnibus so vehemently. As I have acknowledged a frequent use of them, Mr Tatler, I do not think it prudent to subscribe my name. I will, therefore, as upon a former occasion, content myself with assuring you, that I am,

A Respectable Reader.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN UNPALATABLE DRAUGHT FROM THE FOUNTAIN HEAD.

A person had a drawing which he considered to be a 'real Raphael, and worth a hundred guineas, at least.' He accordingly took it to a celebrated dealer, for his valuation or purchase; but it was rejected with a contemptuous 'pshaw.' The possessor, however, was by no means disposed to be diffident of his own judgment; on the contrary, he was confirmed in his opinion, for he attributed the dealer's conduct to a sinister scheme of 'doing him out of the jewel.' He resolved, he said, 'to go to the fountain-head at once;' and accordingly he took it to Sir Thomas Lawrence, for his fiat. Sir Thomas, however, was engaged, and difficult of access, and after repeated calls, the gentleman at last sealed up the precious object, and left it at Sir Thomas's house, with a note explanatory of his wishes. The next day he came for an answer, full of confidence; and so impatient was he, that he untied the wrappers in the hall, when what was his astonishment and grief to behold, that the only answer was Sir Thomas's endorsement of the drawing in these words:—'I will be upon my solemn oath, that Raphael never saw this drawing.'—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Digitized by Google

(From the Lives of the Scottish Worthies.)

THE MARRIAGE OF ROBERT BRUCE, THE FATHER OF ROBERT THE FIRST OF SCOTLAND.

It appears that a short time after his return from the crusade, Bruce was riding through the beautiful domains of Turnberry Castle, the property of the widowed Countess of Carrick, who, in consequence of the death of her husband, had become a ward of the crown. The noble Baron, however, if we may believe an ancient historian, cannot be accused of having visited Turnberry with any design of throwing himself in the way of the heiress of Carrick; and, indeed, any such idea, in those days of jealous wardship, would have been highly dangerous. It happened, however, that the lady herself, whose ardent and impetuous temper was not much in love with the seclusion of a feudal castle, had come out to take the diversion of the chase, accompanied by her women, huntsmen, and falconers; and this gay cavalcade came suddenly upon Bruce, as he pursued his way through the forest alone and unarmed. The knight would have spurred his horse forward, and avoided the encounter, but he found himself surrounded by the attendants; and the Countess herself, riding up, and with gentle violence, taking hold of his horse's reins, reproached him in so sweet a tone for his want of gallantry in flying from a lady's castle, that Bruce, enamoured of her beauty, forgot the risk which he run, and suffered himself to be led away in a kind of triumph to Turnberry. He here remained for fifteen days, and the adventure concluded, as might have been anticipated, by his privately espousing the youthful Countess, without having obtained the concurrence of the king, or of any of her relations. Alexander III, however, although at first indignant at this bold interference with the rights of the crown, was a benevolent prince, and on the payment of a large feudal fine, extended his forgiveness to Bruce.

BRUCE AND THE SPIDER.

When driven from haunt to haunt by his enemies, uncertain, in the complicated difficulties with which he was surrounded, whether it would not be desirable at once, to renounce the daring and desperate enterprise in which he was engaged, and become a voluntary exile from Scotland, Bruce had retreated into a wretched hovel, where he threw himself down to snatch a short interval of repose. There, as he lay on a heap of straw, and bitterly pondered on a plan for engaging in the holy war, and for ever forsaking his country, his eye was involuntarily directed to a spider, which, engaged in the process of constructing its web, had suspended itself by its long and slender thread from the roof above his head, and endeavoured with a perseverance, which was unconquered by repeated defeats, to swing itself from one joist or rafter to another. Bruce watched its efforts, and unconsciously became interested in them. Six times it had essayed to reach the destined point; six times it had failed, and fallen back. He was led, not unnaturally, to draw a parallel between himself and the insect, whose determination of purpose he admired; and with a superstition, which no one acquainted with the human mind will pronounce unnatural, he resolved that he would regulate his own conduct by its ultimate success or failure. The seventh effort was made: the spider attained its object, and fixed its web, and Bruce, not a little encouraged by this augury, dreamed no more of deserting Scotland. He accordingly retired into the more mountainous and inaccessible parts of the country, and whilst the English beset his haunts on every side, had the good fortune to escape the toils which were laid for him.*—[Much has been said of the extraordinary consequences of the fall of a tea-cup upon a lady's gown; here is another circumstance affording a similar opportunity to moralize upon the apparent disproportion of causes and effects. The movements of the insect appear equally trivial, in comparison with the results of its success; but the determination of Bruce to be guided by it, gives to this trifle an interest which the former had not. In the first instance, circumstances are traced back to a mere accident; in second, we look forward, and see the destinies of nations hanging upon the slender web of an insect, as it is spun under the almost superstitious observation of the discomfited warrior.]

PRIVILEGE OF THE GOATS OF THE ROYAL MANORS.

The winter soon approached; and the king (Bruce) with two hundred men, which was all that was now left him, found it impossible to maintain himself amongst the mountains, amidst the snow showers which began to fall, and the hunger and cold which every day grew more intense and grievous. He determined therefore to push forward as rapidly as he could to Kintyre, from which he trusted to sail for Ireland; and he dispatched Sir Neil Campbell with a small company to procure ships and provisions amongst his kinsmen who inhabited that country, from whom he confidently looked for support and assistance. He then continued his progress to Lochlomond, which he reached on the third day after Campbell had left him, towards evening. It was in vain, however, that he looked along the shore, in hopes of finding a boat to ferry them across the lake; and he was compelled to take up his quarters in a cave near Craigrostan, into the narrow entrance of which he and his men were glad to creep, that they might shelter themselves from the inclemency of the weather. On lying down to sleep, they were suddenly terrified by hearing in the dark, a stirring and breathing around them, and began to fear that they had entered a den occupied by more desperate outlaws than themselves: but on striking a light, the shaggy countenances and towering horns of a flock of wild goats presented themselves, and mirth and laughter succeeded to serious alarm. It is said that Bruce was much amused with the adventure, and so pleased with his companions of the night, whose warm breath and shaggy coats were agreeable to men so poorly provided against the winter cold, than he ever after took an especial liking to the goat species; and when he came to be king, made a humourous provision, that on the manors belonging to the crown, all goats should be grass-mail free—that is, should pay no rent for their pasture.

* This tradition is strongly corroborated by the fact, that at the present day, in Scotland, no individual of the name of Bruce will willingly kill a spider.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Dramatists and Managers.—Mr Kenney, in the preface to his new play, states some painful facts of discourtesy and difficulties against which dramatists have to contend in their intercourse with managers. As to the particular establishment (Drury Lane) of which Mr Kenney writes, it is said there is too much cause for complaint; nor is Mr Kenney, if all that is reported be true, the only author who has experienced, in his dealings with the conductors, similar treatment. 'I state these facts at present, as well as those which precede, not in anger, but deliberately. I state them in an honest spirit of self-defence, and in the common cause of my brother dramatists. I state them, because I have found in this theatre an obtuse, an intractable, and an unblushing insensibility to the claims of authors in every way, which is only aggravated by forbearance. I state them because we have become so signally and so peculiarly the victims of the changed conditions of the London theatres, that, at a time when the spirit of reform and justice is abroad, it may seem good to the enlightened and influential portion of the patrons of the drama, that some efforts should be made in our behalf, either in the way of legislative protection, or relieving the regular drama from a monopoly so open to abuse. It is for these reasons that I begin to feel that grievances of this nature, increasing as they are, should no longer be indolently lost sight of, or dissipated, as mine have hitherto been, by a good night's sleep, or a walk in Regent's park.'—Atlas.

Miss Fanny Kemble's face is not regularly handsome, but she has a fine and flexible brow, with eyes and hair like Mrs Siddons in her finest time. In stature she is rather short, but with such admirable carriage and invariable grace of action, that on the stage, she appears fully of woman's height. Her voice is at once sweet and powerful; and blest with a clear 'Kemble' understanding, (for it is peculiar to her family), she has likewise fine literary talent, having written a tragedy of great interest, besides lighter pieces of admirable verse. Her manner in private is characterised by ease, and that modest gravity which I believe must belong to high tragic genius, and which, in Mrs Siddons, was strictly natural to her, though, from being peculiar in the general gaiety of society, it was often thought assumed.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Humility in a Bishop.—It was early in his (Sir Thomas's) career, while living, I think, in Broad street, that Dr Tracy, the Bishop of —— had fixed a sitting as early in the day as eleven o'clock. Mr Lawrence's friend, Mr Charles Moore, brother to Sir John Moore, called in, and being a man of wit, and of the most delightful conversation, time flew with the young friends; and at nearly one o'clock, the Bishop was only recollected by his want of punctuality. On Mr Moore's going away, their consternation was great, to find the Bishop over a poor fire, in the outer room, where he owned he had been more than an hour, having interdicted the servant from breaking up what he called so joyous a tete-à-tête.—Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence.

A Saintly Sinner.—St Bernard's austerity of life is a favorite theme with the monkish chroniclers. On one occasion, he happened to fix his eyes on the face of a woman; but immediately reflecting that this was temptation, he ran to a pond, and leaped up to his neck into the water, which was then as cold as ice, to punish himself and to vanquish the enemy.—Achievements of the Knights of Malta.

A FRIEND COMMENDED.

Wonder not that I call a man so young my friend:
His worth is great; valiant he is, and temperate;
And one that never thinks his life his own,
If his friend need it. When he was a boy,
As oft as I returned (as, without boast
I brought home conquest) he would gaze upon me,
And view me round, to find in what one limb
The virtue lay to do those things he heard.
Then would he wish to see my sword, and feel
The quickness of the edge, and in his hand
Weigh it: he oft would make me smile at this.
His youth did promise much, and his ripe years
Will see it all performed. The Maid's Tragedy.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—Il Matrimonio Segreto — Guillaume Tell — Tancredi — La Bayadere.

Drury-Lane.—The Legion of Honour—The Brigand—Timour the Tartar.

Covent-Garden.—Napoleon Buonaparte—Hide and Seek.

Digitized by Google

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

CORIOLANUS.

ROMANS.

Volumnia, Miss Huddart. Virgilia (for this night only) Miss Phillips.
Valeria, Miss Faucit. Servilia, Mrs Newcombe.
Caius Marcius, Mr Macready. Menenius Agrippa, Mr Dowton.
Young Marcius, Miss Marshall. Cominius, Mr H. Wallack.
Sicinius Velutus, Mr Thompson. Junius Brutus, Mr Younge.
1st Citizen, Mr Webster. 2nd Citizen, Mr Ross. 3rd Citizen, Mr Howard.
4th Citizen, Mr Honner. Fulvius, Mr C. Jones. Appius, Mr Cooke.

VOLSCIANS.

Sextus, Mr Howell. Lucius, Mr Cathie.
Tullus Aufidius, Mr Cooper. Volusius, Mr J. Vining.

In the course of the evening, Spontini's Overture to 'Ferdinand Cortez;' Rossini' Overture to 'Tancredi;' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

After which an Entertainment, in One Act, called

THE CRITIC, OR A TRAGEDY REHEARSED.

[By SHERIDAN.]

Tilburina, Mrs Orger. Confidant, Mrs C. Jones
1st Niece, Mrs Webster. 2nd Niece, Mrs East.
Dangle, Mr Thompson. Sneer, Mr Cooper. Puff, Mr Macready.
Under Prompter, Mr C. Jones. James, Mr Honner.
Mrs Dangle, Mrs Newcombe.
TRAGEDIANS.—Don Ferolo Whikerandos, Mr Liston. Beef-Eater, Mr Harley.
Governor of Tilbury Fort, Mr W. Bennet. Earl of Leicester, Mr Webster.
Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr Ross. Sir Christopher Hatton, Mr Tayleure.
Lord Burleigh, Mr Andrews. 1st Sentinel, Mr Eaton.
Master of the Horse, Mr Richardson. 2nd Sentinel, Mr Dowsing.

To conclude with the Grand Dramatic Spectacle, called

BLUE BEARD.

In which Mr Cooke's Magnificent Stud of Horses will appear.

Fatima, Mrs Waylett. Irene, Miss Byfeld. Beda, Miss S. Phillips.
Abomelique, Mr Younge. Ibrahim, Mr W. Bennett. Hassan, Mr Horner.
Selim, Mr Horn (who will introduce the Song of 'Love's Empire.'
Shacabac, Mr Harley. 1st Spahi, Mr Yarnold.
2nd Spahi, Mr Bland. 3rd Spahi, Mr C. Jones. 4th Spahi, Mr Eaton.

To-morrow, Alfred the Great; Popping the Question; and Blue Beard.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LA LUNE DE MIEL: OU, LES SABOTIERS.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de M. SCRIBE.

Poleska, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Le Baronne de Vladimir, Mlle. St. Ange.
Micheline, Mlle. Eliza. Le Comte de Woronski, M. Alfred.
Koulikoff, M. Gamard. Jean, M. Prêval. Un Postillon, M. Arnaud.

Suivi de

LA SOMNAMBULE.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE et DELAVIGNE.

La Somnambule, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Marie, Mme. Gamard.
M. Dormeuil, M. St. Aubert. Frédéric de Luzi, M. Paulin.
Gustave de Mauléon, M. Alfred. Baptiste, M. Laporte.

On Finira par

LA DEMOISELLE A MARIER.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.

Camille, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Dumesnil, Mme. Prêval.
M. Dumesnil, M. Cloup. Alphonse de Luceval, M. Alfred.
Ducoudrai, M. Gamard. Baptiste, M. Guenée.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

New Entertainment.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which he will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes,'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain the following characters:—
Madame Pompeydoor; Lord Phidias Crackstone; Signor Tommaso Jacksonaini; Signora Catterina; Sir Sturgeon Garrett; Fra Diavolo; Terence Gossoon; Beau Flamington; and Capt. Cloudesly Ogle.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier. Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Montholon, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Tully.
Eau de Vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.

Russians.—Peterhoff, Mr Ransford. Rimski, Mr Williams. Soldiers, Peasants, &c.

English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcombe, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of

THE FOREST OF BONDY.

Dame Gertrude, Madame Simon. Ursula, Miss Vincent.
The Seneschal, Mr Almar. General Gontran, Mr Gough. Landry, Mr Asbury.
Chevalier Macaire, Mr D. Pitt. Aubri di Mont Didier, Mr C. Hill.
Bertrand, Mr Yale. Eloi, Mlle. Rosier.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Lannes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stapps, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Ledger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Rooney, Mr Power.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte; and The Waterman.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudie, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Pescara, Mr Marshall. Foscari, Mr Munroe. Alberto, Mr G. Smith.
Julio, Mr Willing. Gerald, Master Smith. Pietro, Mr Young.
High Priest, Mr Jones. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson. Nixonomed, Mr Spencer.

To which will be added a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[From the French, by Mr BARNETT.]

Mrs Properly, Miss Wells. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Stohwasser. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
And Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with a New Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtsdorff, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Ayres.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Count of Linsdorf, Mr Munroe.
Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall. Augustus, Mr G. Lejeune. Boltzheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassontrompdorf, Mr Forrester.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Shepherd of Derwent Vale —Martha Willis, the Maid Servant—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship —Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 25 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER's Library, Old Bond street; W. KE[illegible], Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Digitized by Google

No. 229.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1831.

Next Monday The Tatler, in addition to its usual articles, will commence a regular series of Notices of the Fine Arts and of Music.

Numerous Correspondents, whose letters our preparations have hindered us from duly acknowledging, will have the proper attention paid to them next week.

An accident occasioned the omission of the signature of Agis to the article in our yesterday's paper, entitled 'A Page from the History of the Decline and Fall of the Ancient World.'

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF SCENE-PAINTING IN ENGLAND.

[From the 'Library of the Fine Arts,' No. IV. for May.]

Much speculation has been bestowed upon the subject of scene-painting for the stage, though the result has not been so creditable to antiquarian research as other matters relating to the drama. The literati have devoted years of inquiry upon the etymologies of Shakspeare, and have elucidated the customs of the age in which he lived; but of that very interesting feature of the represented drama, the scenic department, so little is known, that it is not determined whether, at the Globe Theatre, there was a change of scenes for the different plays. Upon the subject of costume too, another essential to the illusion of dramatic exhibition, we can gather little information. It may be inferred, however, from certain scarce prints, that the dramatis personæ were dressed somewhat in character, though with no reference to the costume of the age which the play was intended to represent. Indeed, judging from these graphic documents, the costume was that of the age of Elizabeth, or James the First, the periods in which the plays were written.

The first record of painted scenes that we have been enabled to discover, is of the age of James the Sixth of Scotland, who is said to have employed a celebrated Scotch artist of the time to design and paint the scenery for the theatrical pieces played at the royal palace Holyrood House. This was during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and a few years before the Scotch monarch became the sovereign of England.

Queen Elizabeth was partial to dramatic exhibitions, and the singing-boys of St Paul's and of Westminster Abbey were engaged as performers on the stage erected within her palace of Windsor Castle. It is likely that these performed the parts of angels, or spirits in Moralities, or religious dramas, so prevalent in former times.

Subsequently, the regular drama was performed at the palace of the Queen, as it is known that the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' written by Shakspeare at the express command of Her Majesty, was first acted at Windsor Castle. Whether the stage was supplied with scenes on those occasions, we have no means of discovering; though it is not improbable that it was, as there were English landscape painters of that period, some of whose topographical works are still to be found in the royal collection; and moreover it is known that neither this Queen nor her courtiers spared expense in furnishing materials for the royal pageants in which she delighted, and which were so abounding in her long and prosperous reign. It may not unreasonably be supposed, however, that the 'Merry Wives of Windsor' was got up under the management of Shakspeare; in which case, it is probable that he would avail himself of her Majesty's authority, to bring the piece before her Court with every advantage of stage effect; consequently appropriate costume and scenery would be supplied.

That the public stage was ornamented with scenes shortly subsequent to the death of Shakspeare, we can prove, by a scarce woodcut of nearly coeval date with this illustrious dramatic poet, in the possession of the writer of this article; and which may be seen, as a graphic curiosity, by the cognoscenti at our publisher's. In it the side scenery and other machinery of the stage, as at present in use, are clearly discernible.

Whether the dramatic exhibitions which were provided for the amusement of James the First and his Court at Windsor and Whitehall, were decorated with scenery, is equally left to conjecture; though his favourite architect, Inigo Jones, had practised as a landscape-painter before he studied architecture professionally. It may therefore, perhaps be not too vaguely hypothetical, to suppose that the King, who was not indifferent to the Arts, would have the private stage at his palace in England, as complete in all its appointments, as that had been at his palace it Scotland; particularly when it is recollected that Shakspeare, Jonson, Marlow, Chapman, and other distinguished play-wrights, flourished under his reign, and that the splendid-minded Duke of Buckingham was the arbiter elegantiarum of his Court, and the accomplished Prince Henry and Prince Charles, two of the greatest patrons and amateurs of the pictorial art, were living under the royal roof.

However these hypotheses may be regarded, we are satisfied that scene-painting for the stage was an art that had attained to some eminence in the early part of the reign of King Charles the First; for the elegant masques written by Ben Johnson, and performed by his Majesty's Queen Henrietta and the lords and ladies of their brilliant court at the palace of Whitehall, were decorated with all the advantages of splendid scenery and machinery, which were designed and executed by, and under the superintendence of, Inigo Jones.

From the commencement of the civil war in the reign of this sovereign, and during the period of the Commonwealth, the drama met with no patronage; and at length stage plays were forbidden by the rulers of the state.

At the restoration of King Charles II, the drama revived; and under the auspices of the Duke of York, with the concurrence of his Majesty, Sir William Davenant opened the theatre in Dorset Gardens, Blackfriars; and it was there that the first public stage representations were exhibited with the advantages of appropriate scenery and rich costume.

Sir William had been early initiated in the affairs of the stage. He was the godson of Shakspeare, and in his youth passed much of his time at the Globe, Shakspeare's playhouse. Sir William had distinguished himself in the royal army, having fought gallantly for the king in the civil wars; and after the death of his sovereign, he resided on the Continent until the Restoration.

The splendour of the French stage at this period was a subject of general admiration. Still devoted to the affairs of the drama, it was in France that he made himself acquainted with the scenery, machinery, and all the internal conduct of the theatre; and when he had obtained the patent for erecting his playhouse, he made another visit to Paris, and there engaged some of the most distinguished scene-painters, machinists, and suppliers of costume, to return with him to London; by whose aid his stage was rendered completely appointed to represent the various acts of a play, with every scenic advantage capable of producing stage-effect. From this period then, may safely be dated the commencement of that improved state of stage-representation, which added so essential a charm to dramatic exhibition.

The English artists, having thus seen the capabilities of scenic representation, sedulously endeavoured to render the British stage comparable with that of Paris. Streater, a landscape painter, and a great favourite of King Charles, subsequently designed many of the scenes for the theatre in Dorset Gardens. Robert Agas also, a contemporary landscape-painter of repute, both in oil and distemper, and well skilled in architectural design, painted several scenes for the same stage.

The most able scene-painter that England had produced, however, up to the period of the early part of the last century, was the celebrated George Lambert, then denominated the English Poussin. This lively genius, the founder of the memorable Beef-Steak Club, was employed as principal scene-painter to the Lincoln's-Inn-Fields theatre, under the management of his friend Rich. It was on the removal of Rich's company to the new theatre in Covent Garden, erected in the year 1733, however, that the effect of stage scenery and machinery was first beheld in full splendour; for the pantomime was there, for a succession of years, brought out in scenic glory. Lambert, who had a dispensation from Rich to render the stage as imposing as the collateral aid of painting, machinery, and costume could raise it, wrought day and nigh t in his vocation; and such was the interest which his ingenious operations created, that the scene-room became the favourite lounge of noblemen and men of fashion; and the Beef-steak Club was instituted therein, for the pure whim of eating a relishing steak hot from his German stove, and the enjoyment of his lively conversation and his wit. Lambert, who was candid and open, having the interest of his friend Rich always prominent in his thoughts, proposed to unite Signor Amiconi, a celebrated Italian painter and decorator, with him in the scenic department. The union was beneficial to all parties; and Covent Garden stage, through the spirit and liberality of the manager Rich, and the talent of his scene-painters, acquired the reputation of being the most splendid in Europe.

Digitized by Google

At this period the Opera-house, Haymarket, which had been erected by Sir John Vanbrugh, and opened in 1704, occasionally exhibited a rich display of scenic representation. Foreign artists, however, were principally employed in all the internal decorations of this theatre. Whatever merit the scenery department might exhibit, certainly that of the costume was woefully deficient both in propriety and taste, which subjected the management to the formidable joint attacks of the satirists who wielded the pencil and the pen. Hogarth, in his treatise 'The Analysis of Beauty,' exposed the absurdities and anachronisms of the Opera wardrobe, with much graphic point; and was not sparing of his sarcastic humour upon the same management, in many of his satirical etchings.

The scene-painters in succession, from the period when Garrick appeared at the theatre Wellclose-square, were Ald Oram, in his day a landscape-painter of some repute, who designed for that company, and also a Monsieur De Voto. Jack Laquerre, the son of the painter of that name, who assisted Verrio on the plafonds at Windsor Castle, was an adept in his department of art.. Servandoni, an Italian, Monsieur French, and others, were of coeval date, and were employed alternately at most of the metropolitan theatres.

Amongst other foreign artists who practised scene-painting in the British metropolis, Signor Novosielski deservedly obtained public applause. He was also an architect; and under his direction was erected the eastern façade of the Italian Opera-house, which, though never completed, was generally admired for boldness and unity of design. The architectural drop-scene, and many others which he designed and superintended the painting of, for this theatre, were much admired by the artists of the day.

When the elder Colman became proprietor of the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, he spared no expense to render the scenic department equal to the general dramatic arrangements of his well-regulated stage. Michael Angelo Rooker was appointed principal scene-painter there, and for several years charmed the town with the characteristic skill and mastery which was displayed in his scenic effects. Rooker was well qualified for this appointment, as he was decidedly the best topographical artist that England had yet produced. The views of the colleges at Oxford, drawn and engraved by his skilful hand for the Oxford Almanac, will long remain evidences of his taste and talent in topographical art.

Coeval with our scene-painters, about the middle of the last century, were several foreign artists, renowned in the same department. The distinguished Canaletti was principal scene-painter to the Opera-house at Venice; and Cassanova, the master of De Loutherbourg, was deputed to paint the scenes for the magnificent theatre erected by Louis the Fifteenth at Versailles.

During the reign of George the Third, scene-painting in England was cultivated with great success. This is to be ascribed to various causes; amongst others to that universal rage for dramatic exhibitions which gave birth to many provincial and minor theatres; to the prevailing taste for pantomimes, melo-dramas, burlettas, operas, and other stage compositions, more particularly addressed to the imagination, and which owed their popularity to splendid spectacle. For many years, the name of Richards was constantly printed on the play-bills. His scenery for the 'Maid of the Mill' delighted the town, and rendered that piece so popular, that two very clever prints, from line engravings, were published from certain scenes exhibited therein, which had a great sale, and contributed much to his general reputation. Bowles and Carver were also esteemed for their talent in the same walk of art. The younger Catton, too, obtained celebrity for similar works; as did Capon, and many others. When the Pantheon was converted to a theatre for the performance of the Italian opera, Hodges, a distinguished pupil of Wilson, was employed there as principal scene-painter; and the stage effect owed much to the picturesqueness and romantic character of his designs, and the vigour with which they were executed.

Many other painters of celebrity occasionally furnished designs for scenes, amongst whom were Hogarth, who painted a camp-scene for a private theatre; and Zuccarelli, who designed for the Opera-house: Garvey too is of the number. Cipriani, Rebecca, Hamilton, the elder Catton, were employed in designing and painting decorations for most of the metropolitan theatres. It may not be known to many, perhaps, that the whole ceiling of the first theatre in Covent-garden was superbly painted with allegorical subjects selected from heathen mythology, from designs by Amiconi. This ingenious foreigner also was employed in decorating with his designs the walls and the plafond of the magnificent old staircase of Buckingham-house.

Many of the minor theatres supplied occupation for ingenious artists, whose talent for scenic representation delighted crowded audiences for years in succession, but whose names have not survived their works. The late Charles Dibdin, the lyric bard of our "wooden walls," in conjunction with Dighton, a favourite performer at Sadler's Wells, about half a century ago, furnished the scenery for a fantoccini, entitled the Patagonian Theatre, which was erected in the great room over Exeter 'Change. There the regular drama was played by puppets of about fourteen inches in height; and Dibdin and Dighton, with other actors, spoke and sung the parts for the automatons, to the great delight of the town.

It was the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, that due attention to the scenic department of the stage might be made beneficial to painting generally, by exciting the whole body of the public to feel delight in pictorial representation. His successor, the president West, expressed the same opinion: and Gainsborough urged Garrick to benefit by these remarks, adding, "Be assured that the scene which can give pleasure to the eye of the painter, will seize upon the imagination of an audience, and inoculate even dullness with admiration of an art that can thus excite wonder and delight." That these reflections were founded in truth is now too demonstrable to admit of doubt; when we consider the scenery designed by, and executed under the superintendence of, our two ingenious and highly talented contemporaries Stanfield and Roberts, whose splendid scenery is so topographically and locally true, or so richly imaginative, as not only to be regarded amongst the most attractive gratifications of the amateurs of the stage generally, but as affording a high mental treat to the professors and amateurs of pictorial representation, and all persons of cultivated taste. Hence may be publicly repeated, what has been said in private to the professional renown of these worthy contemporary artists, that the two great English metropolitan theatres can boast the most distinguished scene-painters of the age.

Having thus briefly sketched the history of the origin and progress of scene-painting for the English stage, it is due to the memory of the illustrious Garrick to say, that although much had been effected by the liberal spirit and taste of the respective stage managers his predecessors, yet it was entirely owing to his liberality and judgment that dramatic exhibitions were brought to that state of improvement which could satisfy the perceptions of the enlightened few, who indeed could not endure to behold the anachronisms of scenery and costume, which had hitherto debased the stage representation of the drama.

Previously to that reformation which was introduced, though late in life, under the auspices of the British Roscius, anomalies characterized every scene in the best acted of the most admired plays. Garrick himself played Othello, the Moor of Venice, in a regimental suit of King George the Second's body-guard, with a flowing Ramillies wig. Hamlet was attired in a modern room suit, with dress sword, shoe-buckles, ruffles, and a bag; while Julius Cæsar and Mark Antony, Brutus and Cassius, and even Cato himself, declaimed in costume so remotely uncongenial to character, that modern taste would view the scene thus appointed, in spite of the eloquence of the actors, as the burlesque of pantomime, and hoot them off the stage.

Garrick, soon after the arrival of De Loutherbourg, cognomened 'Prince of Scene-painters,' engaged that rare genius to superintend the scenic department of the boards of 'Old Drury.' The first exhibition of his inventive talent in this theatre was the splendid representation of the Winter's Tale, wherein there was a fine field for the display of his knowledge of scenery, machinery, and all the pictorial concomitants of spectacle and stage effect. The fire-scene was beheld by the audience with astonishment; and the characteristic appearance of Draco and his demons, designed with that pictorial feeling which assimilated with the imaginative beings represented in the painted incantations of Salvator Rosa, and the Hellish Breughel, electrified the audience with delight. This piece attracted all the world of taste; and every artist and connoisseur admitted, that De Loutherbourg had proved that it was possible to render a dramatic scene completely illusive.

Digitized by Google

Satisfied with the advantage which appropriate scenery and its concomitant suitable costume were capable of rendering the stage, Garrick, with the assistance of his friend and intimate associate De Loutherbourg, set about a complete Reformation of the wardrobe. Sir Joshua Reynolds and Mr West the celebrated historical painter were consulted on this proposed improvement, and strenuously recommended its adoption; and from this period the absurd and anomalous dresses of the performers gave way to a costume compatible with the respective dramatis personæ, collected from the best antiquarian authorities, as connected with the chronology and local attributes of the scene.

Garrick lived to effect successfully the introduction of this desirable improvement on dramatic representation; and what he left unaccomplished was supplied by the liberality and judicious exertions of his successor John Kemble, who rendered the appointments of his stage so admirable, that established painters not only availed themselves of its aid, but recommended the theatre to the tyro as a useful school for the study of grouping and costume.

The last exhibition of the powers of De Loutherbourg as a scene-painter, was in the pantomime performed at Drury Lane Theatre, entitled Harlequin Omai, or Oberea, Queen of the Sandwich Isles, which for splendour and pictorial effect was perhaps the most astonishing of any scenic representation that the stage has ever produced. In this, for certain scenes, the whole length of the stage was occupied; and in one, which represented the Frozen Ocean, forty-two separate slips were used, to give continuity to the perspective. The pictorial display astonished the audience; for so powerful and effective was the combination, and so judiciously was it illuminated, that the imitative scene amounted to reality.

The dresses for the numerous characters which figured in this pantomime were all strictly correct, being made up in the wardrobe from prototypes supplied by Webber, the ingenious painter who accompanied Captain Cook in his last voyage to the Southern Ocean. Every scene too was topographically true.

This distinguished painter was enthusiastically devoted to this department of his art: hence, for every scene he wrought an elaborate prototype fitted by scale to a small model of the stage of Drury Lane Theatre, from which the other painters on the establishment executed the large scenes, under his superintendence; and he usually added to them such improvements as his rich imagination and spirited hand considered necessary to render them effective.

The last scenic representation, which constituted De Loutherbourg's memorable Eidophusikon,—or a series of moving pictures, which were exhibited on a stage of eight feet in breadth, at an elegant theatre erected for the purpose,—was of that surpassing excellence which excited the admiration of all who were capable of appreciating the imitative powers of painting thus applied.

It has been whispered that our two distinguished contemporary scene-painters have been urged to undertake a pictorial display of scenery, aided by machinery, on a similar plan. Such a series of moving pictures, produced by such able artists, at this more enlightened period, when the arts excite an hundredfold interest to what was felt fifty years ago, could not fail amply to remunerate those who would embark in so interesting and desirable a speculation.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Drury Lane Theatre.—We understand that the articles of separation between Captain Polhill and Mr A. Lee have been executed, and that the former gentleman has now the sole management of Drury Lane Theatre. There has been a great deal of gossip as to the causes which led to this separation, but we are assured that a simple matter of business was the immediate occasion of it. The treasurer of the theatre, in the usual way, informed the two lessees that a large sum of money (about 800*l.* we believe) would be required by him to pay the salaries, &c. on Saturday last. Captain Polhill said he was prepared to furnish his proportion, which was one half the sum, but positively refused to advance a single shilling more than he was bound to do under his agreement with Mr Lee. In consequence of Captain Polhill's adhering to this determination, the treasury was closed on Saturday. On Saturday evening, however, Mr Lee formally withdrew from the management, by signing articles of separation, and Captain Polhill has since supplied the treasurer with the necessary fund.—Evening Paper.

— Our sight is the most perfect and most delightful of all our senses. It fills the mind with the largest variety of ideas, converses with its objects at the greatest distance, and continues the longest in action without being tired or satiated with its proper enjoyment.—Addison.

Anecdotes of Sir George Etherege.—There was formerly at or near Charing-cross a famous ordinary, kept by one Locket. It is often mentioned in the plays of Cibber, Vanburgh, &c. and was much frequented by Sir George Etherege. On one occasion Sir George and his company, provoked by something amiss in the entertainment or attendance, got into a violent passion and abused the waiters. This brought in Mrs Locket. 'We are so provoked,' said Sir George, 'that even I could find in my heart to pull the nosegay out of your bosom, and throw the flowers in your face.' This turned all their anger into jest. Sir George discontinued Locket's ordinary, having run up a score, which he could not conveniently discharge. Mrs Locket sent one to dun him, and to threaten him with a prosecution. He bid the messenger tell her, that he would kiss her if she stirred a step in it. When this answer was brought back, she called for her hood and scarf, and told her husband, who interposed, that 'she'd see if there was any fellow alive that had the impudence.'—'Pry'thee, my dear, don't be so rash,' said her husband, 'you don't know what a man may do in his passion.'

The Royal Martyr.—Many instances can be produced of Charles the First exerting a power contrary to the interest of the Protestant religion; and a capital one is this King's express and strict orders, signed with his own hand, to Captain John Pennington, to deliver (and he did in obedience thereto, deliver) a squadron of the naval forces of England, consisting of eight men of war, into the hands and absolute power of the French King; and Charles directed, that in case of disobedience in the English captains to that order, Pennington was to sink them. These naval forces enabled the Gaulish King to break and suppress the power of the Rochelle Protestants. This was an unjustifiable step in Charles's reign: and if to this we add a thousand acts of this said Sovereign Lord, that were the cause of all the disagreements, differences and contentions between his Majesty and his people, that happened in his reign, and the sources of public calamity, it is certainly most amazing, to see the memory of this Prince treated equally, if not superior, to the most celebrated martyrs! Torrents of tears have I seen pour from the eyes of our mourning theologers on the 30th of January. I remember one time, when Dr Warren preached the commemoration sermon at St Margaret's, Westminster, that he wept and sobbed so bitterly and calamitously, that he could hardly get out the following concluding words of his fine discourse —'The Roy - - - Royal Ma - - - Martyr - - the - - holy Martyr - - - the - - - the - - - blessed Martyr!'—Life of John Buncle, Esq. Vol. I. p. 345. Note.

Infant Victims.—It is told, that Cardinal James de Vitre, who was present at the siege (of Damietta) purchased a vast number of orphans, with an intention, which was considered exceedingly laudable in those days, of having them baptized; but of this miserable multitude, upwards of five hundred expired soon after, in consequence of the horrible privations to which the mothers that suckled them had been exposed.—Achievements of the Knights of Malta.

Education in France.—A magnificent scheme is at this moment in operation in France, to afford the means of useful and improving reading to the whole body of the working population in France, by placing a public library in every one of the 40,000 communes (or parishes) into which the kingdom is divided. The scheme promises to be successful: it is provided by voluntary subscriptions, and the books are to consist of the best elementary works on the arts, sciences, and literature, history, biography, poetry, and other subjects, selected by a Committee in Paris.

Plurality of Wives.—A sailor, lately committed by the Magistrates at the Thames Police-office for polygamy—he having three wives living, and being on the point of marrying a fourth—appears to have studied to some purpose the following verse from a popular sea song:—

'I have a wife at Portsmouth gates,
Another at Goree;
A Copper-colour up the Straits,
And a Black at St Lucie.'

— As the gardener of Henry Host Henley, Esq. near Chard, was digging out the root of an old tree in the garden, the pickaxe struck against a Roman urn, which was found to contain between 500*l.* and 600*l.* worth of gold pieces of the Emperor Claudius. They were as fresh and bright as if they had been struck at the Mint last year.—Bridgewater Herald.

— Sir Stamford Raffles' children had imbibed from him those tastes it was his pleasure to cultivate: this will not be wondered at, even at their early age, when it is added that two young tigers and a bear were for some time in the children's apartments, under the charge of their attendant, without being confined in cages; and it was rather a curious scene to see the children, the bear, the tigers, a blue mountain bird, and a favourite cat, all playing together—the parrot's beak being the only object of awe to all the party.

— Sir Thomas Lawrence, writing to a friend who was about to give a large price for a supposed original work of art, says, 'As the sum proposed, or to be given, must, from the real merit of the work, be large, demand a full history of the picture;—you have a right to do so; and, since the value set upon it is equal to that of an estate, with the title to which you would be fully satisfied before you bought it, require that a clear account be made out to you of the original destination of the work, and the names of its possessors down to this moment.'

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Coriolanus.—The Critic, or a Tragedy Rehearsed.—Blue Beard.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Omnibus, or a Convenient Distance.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Kenric, Mr Cooke.
Edwy, Mr Yarnold. Oswald, Mr Honner. Arthur, Mr Eaton.
Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.

Arnold, Mr Cathie.

Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Oscar, Mr C. Jones.
Haldane, Mr Howard. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's 'Grand Accession March' (by Mr T. Cooke); and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

POPPING THE QUESTION.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

Ellen Murray, Mrs Newcombe. Miss Biffin, Mrs C. Jones.
Miss Winterblossom, Mrs Broad. Bobbin, Mrs Orger.
Mr Primrose, Mr Farren. Henry Thornton, Mr Howard.

To conclude with the Grand Dramatic Romance of

BLUE BEARD.

In which Mr Cooke's Magnificent Stud of Horses will appear.

Fatima, Mrs Waylett. Irene, Miss Byfeld. Beda, Miss S. Phillips.
Abomelique, Mr Younge. Ibrahim, Mr W. Bennett. Hassan, Mr Horner.
Selim, Mr Horn (who will introduce the Song of 'Love's Empire.'
Shacabac, Mr Harley. 1st Spahi, Mr Yarnold.
2nd Spahi, Mr Bland. 3rd Spahi, Mr C. Jones. 4th Spahi, Mr Eaton.

On Monday, Wild Oats; the Little Corporal; and Blue Beard.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Seven Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Doppet, Mr F. Matthews.
Citizen Gasparin, Mr Turnour. General Lapoype, Mr Compton.
Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Valentine, Mr Evans. Vincent, Mr Wrench. Robert, Mr Cooper

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. Carlotta, Mrs J. Hughes.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. General Murat, Mr Irwin. General Launes, Mr Jones.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Victor, Mr Mears.
General Kellermann, Mr Harris. General Gerard, Mr H. Jones.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Marmont, Mr Green. Valentine, Mr Evans.
Colonel Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett.
Vincent, Mr Wrench. Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Robert, Mr F. Cooper. Superior of the Convent of St Bernard, Mr Morley.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Hortensia, Miss Horton. Louise, Miss Nelson.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Duke of Bassano, Mr Baker.
Marshal Lannes, Mr Jones. Marshal Davoust, Mr Brown.
General Massena, Mr Pope. General Rapp, Mr Holl.
General Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury. General Lauriston, Mr Phillips.
General Berthier, Mr Norris. General Macdonald, Mr Wells.
Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour. Count Bubna, Mr Fuller.
Roustan, Mr F. Sutton. Walder, Mr Blanchard.
Frederick Stappe, Mr Abbott. Herman, Mr Heath. Sturmwald, Mr Henry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans. Frantzel, Mr Addison.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Victor, Mr Mears. General Belliard, Mr Benedict.
Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
Sergeant Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Lieut.-General Count Drouet, Mr Rawlins. Lieut.-General Count Belliard, Mr Pope.
Lieut.-General Count Corbineau, Mr Warren. General Petit, Mr Andrews.
Baron Fain, Mr Wright. Colonel of the Imperial Guard, Mr Turnour.
General Schouwalow, Mr King. Colonel Sir Neil Campbell, Mr Lyon.
General Köhler, Mr Stephens. Baron Waldbourg, Mr Hopkins.
Lieut. Torti, Mr C. Adams. Commandant Loubers, Mr Parry.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Valentine, Mr Evans.
William, Mr Keeley. Conscript, Mr Sheriff.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

Victoria, Miss Taylor. William, Mr Keeley.

Part 7.—St Helena. 1818 and 1821.

Marchioness Bertrand, Mrs Lovell. Mademoiselle Bertrand, Miss Kendall.
Mademoiselle Josephine Bertrand, Miss Hunt. Governess, Mrs Payne.
Claudine, Miss P. Horton. Female Attendant, Miss Vials.
Napoleon, Mr Warde. Marshal Bertrand, Mr Egerton. General Gourgaud, Mr Willis.
Captain Poppleton, Mr Griffiths. Henry Bertrand, Master Jones.
Arthur Bertrand, Master Harvey. Doctor Antomarchi, Mr F. Matthews.
Abbé Vignani, Mr Brooks. Balcombe, Mr Barnes.
Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Marchand, Mr Henry.
Saint Denis, Mr Brady. Frank, Mr Bender.

At the end of the Spectacle, in honour of his Majesty's Birth-day, 'God save the King' will be sung by Miss Inverarity, Miss Hughes, Miss H. Cawse, Mr Wilson, and Chorus.

The 'Waterman' will conclude with 'Rule Brilannia,' by Miss Inverarity, Miss Hughes, Mr Wilson, and Chorus.

After which the Musical Entertainment of

THE WATERMAN.

[By Mr DIBDIN.]

Mrs Bundle, Mrs Tayleure. Wilhelmina, Miss Hughes.
Tom Tug, Mr Wilson, who will sing 'The Bay of Biscay O!'
Bundle, Mr Blanchard. Robin, Mr Keeley.

On Monday, Napoleon Buonaparte; and Neuha's Cave.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. III, for June, is embellished with an Engraving of a Roman Serenade, from Pinelli.

Contents:—1. Extraordinary Case of the Royal Associates of the Royal Society of Literature.—2. The Stranger Maiden, from Schiller.—3. My Little Grey Landlord, by the Author of 'Scenes in Poland.'—4. Confessions of a Tippling Philosopher.—5. Archery Meetings.—6. Awake! O Awake!—7. The Seven Signs.—8. To My Northern Love.—9. Journal of a South-African Emigrant.. No. II.—10. I know that he loves me.—11. Mackintosh's History of England.—12. Exhibition of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture.—13. The Two Munchausens, by a Veteran.—14. Recent Rambles, in the Footsteps of Don Quixote. No. III.—15. Notes on Rome, Albano, and Tivoli.—16. Poor Bobby—a Yarn from the Mid-watch.—17. The Minaret of Bois-Monsil.—18. Our Early Patriots.—19. The Sorrows of a Musical Mookey.—20. Life of Thomas Muir.—21. Paganini.—22. Some account of how I spend my time in the Country.—23. Reporting Progress.—24. Journal of Literature—Music—Theatres, &c.

Price 2s. 6d.

London: HURST, CHANCE, and CO. St Paul's Church yard.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

TANCREDI.

[By ROSSINI.]

Amenaide, beloved by Tancredi . . . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Isaura, her Attendant . Madame Castelli.
Tancredi . . . . . Madame Pasta.
Orbazzano, his Rival . . . . . Signor Santini.
Argirio, the Father of Amenaide . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Roggiero, the Friend and Companion of Tancredi . Signor Galli.

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA BAYADERE.

[Composed by M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Musard.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertraux

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Therese, Miss Nicol.
Panchon, Mlle. Rosier. Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent.
Madame Bertrand, Mme. Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Jeannette, Miss Ellis. Victorine, Miss Pharaoh. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Ney, Mr Ede.
Marmont, Mr Almar. Montholon, Mr Lee. Prince of Benevento, Mr Young.
Roustan, Mr Honner. Captain Boncour, Mr Ransford.
Sergeant Dupont, Mr D. Pitt. Count Hilt, Mr Maitland. Henri, Mr T. Hill.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale. Boo, Mr Asbury. Chief Deputy, Mr Tally.
Eau de Vie, Mr Rogers. Hannibal Wildfire, Master F. Carbery.
Sergeant André, Mr Harris. Mayor of Frejus, Mr Webb. Guillaume, Mr Hobbs.
François, Mr Emden. Jean, Mr C. Pitt.

English.—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
Ensign Tipperary, Mr Ede.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

The Highland Fling, by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble. Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubbs, Mr Webb.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Pescara, Mr Marshall. Foscari, Mr Munroe. Alberto, Mr G. Smith.
Julio, Mr Willing. Gerald, Master Smith. Pietro, Mr Young.
High Priest, Mr Jones. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson. Nixonomed, Mr Spencer.

To which will be added a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[From the French, by Mr BARNETT.]

Mrs Properly, Miss Wells. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Stohwasser. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
And Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with a New Musical Entertainment, called

BARON TRENCK.

Countess Holtsdorff, Miss Stohwasser. Victorine, Miss Ayres.
Baron Trenck, Mr Green. Count of Linsdorf, Mr Munroe.
Major Muffledorf, Mr Marshall. Augustus, Mr G. Lejeune. Boltsheim, Mr Cooke.
François Bassontrompdorf, Mr Forrester.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Shepherd of Derwent Vale—Martha Willis, the Maid Servant—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS.— Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—True British Sailor—Burmese Stud—Quang Cœlis—The Magician—Unlucky Valet.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBER'S Library, Old Bond street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane · and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

N°. 230.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, MAY 30, 1831.

GREEK DRAMAS FOR ENGLISH READERS.*

THOUGH it is impossible to regard the Quarterly Review school of criticism as the best for appreciating and recommending the nobler poets of Greece, and though the editor of the volume before us (whom we take to be Mr Henry Nelson Coleridge) betrays too much of its usual inclination to subject his scholarship to certain standards of orthodoxy, which have no more to do with it than a bishop's wig with the head of Plato, yet we cannot but hail any attempt to put such of the unlearned as have taste, in as much possession as possible of those treasures of antiquity which, as he justly observes, are too often wasted upon such as have learning and nothing else. Mr Murray has here presented us with another volume, which upon the whole has a real claim to be called 'popular.' It consists of selections from Potter's translation of Æschylus, filled up with abstracts in prose, so as to render the view of the pieces complete, and preceded by clear and agreeable accounts of the nature of Greek tragedy and its performance on the stage. The type is of the usual large size (the best undoubtedly to be found in periodical publications of this kind) and the book (all for five shillings) is enriched with thirteen plates, after those famous outlines of Mr Flaxman, in which, with a truly classical spirit, and agreeably to the high physical cultivation of the Greeks, the most terrible passions move in a round of beauty.

The following passages from the Editor's introductory essays will shew what a good right they have to be so called. Speaking of the Greek Theatre, he says,—

'The reader must be pleased to divest himself of all the associations which the modern name of theatre or opera-house conjures up to his imagination, the covered and curtained box, the crowded, motley-looking pit, and the general glare of artificial lights, and must picture to his mind's eye a colossal structure of Parian marble, open at top, but decorated with the most gorgeous magnificence and exquisite taste. In this noble building let him imagine thirty thousand Greeks assembled to witness what with them partook of the solemnity of a religious rite, seated on cool, commodious seats of semi-circular shape, rising over each other with a rapid elevation as they recede, so as to preserve the view unobstructed towards the stage, with the cloudless sky for their canopy, and the blue hills of their country descried over the walls of the theatre, closing the distant view. Carrying the eye down the prodigious flight of marble benches which formed the audience-part of the theatre, it perceives between the lowest and the stage, which are on the same level, a comparatively small sunken semi-circular space, nearly in the situation of the pit of the English theatres, set apart for the chorus, when it sits inactive, and having a broad staircase at either end, by which to ascend to the stage itself; a division of the sunken space between these two staircases, like the modern orchestra, immediately adjoining the stage, and therefore called the hyposcenium, contained the musicians.

* * * * * *

'The vast dimensions of this stately edifice, as well as the religious solemnity of the exhibition, obliged the Greeks to have recourse to every expedient for increasing the effect produced by the actors, both to the eye and to the ear. For this purpose, the figure and the voice were artificially magnified: this was effected by the mask and the buskin or cothurnus. The mask was either of leather or of very thin wood, stuffed inside; it covered the entire of the head, and was exquisitely wrought by the best artists of Athens, in imitation of the marble statue of the person represented, or under the immediate direction of the poet himself. The mechanism of the joinings, and whatever else could improve the beauty and expression of the features, was attended to with the nicest accuracy; the opening of the mouth was so contrived as to increase the sound of the voice exceedingly; and besides this, there were brazen vessels constructed on acoustical principles, and extending under the seats of the spectators, which, in some manner unintelligible to us, enabled the articulation on the stage to be distinctly heard in the remotest benches of the amphitheatre. The increased size of the head, produced by the mask, was proportionate to the increase of height caused by the cothurnus, or buskin, the sole of which was composed of several layers of cork or other light wood, so as to raise its wearer four or five inches; gauntlets lengthened their arms, and the dress, a rich and flowing habit with a train, was so managed as to conceal the want of corresponding magnitude in the rest of the limbs, so that the actors, as has been already observed, more resembled colossal statues of the finest sculpture, waked into life and motion, than imitations of mere ordinary humanity.

* * * * * *

'With respect to the instrumental accompaniment of the voice in ancient tragedy, it is clearly demonstrable, from the harmonic problems of Aristotle and many other authorities, that the music was not confined to the choral odes, but pervaded most of the dialogues also, so that their declamation must have somewhat resembled the recitative of our modern opera.

* * * * * *

'As to scenery, the action usually passes in the vestibule of a palace or temple placed directly opposite the spectators, with streets, or the sea-beach, or the open country, seen in perspective, going off at each side. Hence the front scene was generally architectural; sometimes, however, it was a landscape painting, as in the Prometheus, for example, where it represents the base and rugged aspect of Mount Caucasus.'

The editor proceeds to give an account of the Greek chorus, &c. and there is a summary of Aristotle's account of the drama, and a sketch of the life of Æschylus, all calculated to give the English reader a good idea of the scenes he is about to contemplate. With regard to the poet himself, "By no one," he truly observes, "have his genius and style been more admirably characterised, than by the German critic Schlegel."

'"The buskin of Æschylus," says that eloquent writer, "has as it were the weight of brass; on it none but gigantic figures stalk before us. It also seems to cost him an effort to paint mere men; he frequently brings gods on the stage, particularly Titans, those ancient gods, who shadow forth the dark primeval powers of nature, and who had long been driven into Tartarus, beneath a world governed in tranquillity. In conformity with the standard of his dramatis personæ, he seeks to swell out the language which they employ to a colossal size; hence there arise rugged compound words, an over-multitude of epithets, and often an extreme intricacy of syntax in the chorusses, which is the cause of great obscurity. He is similar to Dante and Shakspeare in the peculiar strangeness of his images and expressions; yet these images are not deficient in that terrible grace which the ancients particularly praise in Æschylus."'

And again, quoting the same author's opinion of Greek tragedy in general:

'Its whole appearance was "beautiful and dignified to a degree, which we cannot easily conceive. We shall do well always to think of them, in conjunction with ancient Sculpture; and, perhaps, the most faithful representation of them is to consider them as living and moving statues of the highest order."

Perhaps (though we do not presume to decide) the effect is still more beautiful to our imaginations, than it was on the stage. To the religious among the spectators, no doubt the case was different; but, like the Catholics, the Pagans could take great liberties with their gods, and grow familiar with them. It is difficult to conceive that men on stilted shoes, and with arms elongated by gauntlets, could move about with the dignity of animated heroic statues; certainly they could not have done so with just anatomical effect: nor is it possible to imagine that their masks, however beautiful and flexible, could have been so fine as the faces of very fine actors; at least as far as genuine expression went; though the human expression, we grant, might reasonably have been sacrificed to the look heroical. With the propriety of the recitatives, as every way fitter for the utterance of grand and extraordinary emotion than commoner tones, anybody may accord, who has witnessed the performances of Madame Pasta.

We are sorry we cannot agree with the Editor's estimation of Potter, especially in his translations of the lyrical passages, which are surely formal and prosaical. But upon the whole he gets at more of the spirit of his author than was to be expected from an uninspired scholarship,—as in that grand opening, for instance, of the address of Prometheus to the elements, after his terrible silence;

* Æschylus—Popular Specimens of the Greek Dramatic Poets, with Introductory Essays and Explanatory Notes. (Fourth Vol. of the Dramatic Series of the Family Library.) 12mo. pp. 291. Murray.

Digitized by Google

and with a help from the imaginations of such readers as are likely to read the book, much good notion of the original may be obtained from him. There is a great want of translations of all the Greek poets, the tragedians in particular. Mr Shelley should have given us an Æschylus. The living writer most capable of rendering him we take to be Mr Wordsworth.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A N-ICE VOICE.

IMITATED FROM THE FRENCH.

Three strapping clowns were seen one day (strange case!)
Holding poor Hodge up to his knees in ice;
'Twas terrible to see the fellow's face;
Yet there he sat, stuck fast as in a vice.

With wond'ring ire a passenger was seiz'd:
'Good God!' cried he, 'what have ye no remorse?
Hands off! give over!'—'Sir, be not displeas'd,'
A beadle said, 'we're making the man hoarse.'

'Hoarse!'—'Yes, Sir, manly in his tones like, gruff:
Tomorrow's the saint's day in this here place;
And this here lad, who winces sure enough,
We're putting in a state to sing the bass.' E.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. I.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

MODERN ART.

 These Notices will appear about every alternate day.

As the exhibitions are now pouring forth their riches, we propose drawing the attention of our readers to the pretensions of modern art. It is unlike ancient art: and the question is—which is the best? If we should not be able to answer this question satisfactorily to all, we will at least express our opinions, both as they respect painting and painters, with perfect honesty; a virtue by no means too common in criticism. Not that we attribute ill-nature to the critics; on the contrary, it is their good-nature in general, or their partiality for individuals, that gives a bias to their writings,—perhaps even to their opinions. When we say therefore that we are free from this, we do not mean to assume any superiority for ourselves on the score of principle; but simply to say that we are not fettered by any personal intimacy with artists. This being understood, we begin.

The world, as it regards modern art, may be divided into three classes; viz. those who altogether admire or despise it, and those who know and care nothing either as to its merits or defects. By far the greatest class—(in numerals) is the last,—the ignoramuses. We are bound in common justice to ourselves, to state,—candidly—that we do not form part of this respectable class. Neither do we care to ally ourselves to either of the others. We neither love nor hate the works of our contemporaries of the brush absolutely or without reserve. In a word, we are in the predicament of being neutrals, without the excuse of ignorance. We like the good; we have an aversion to the positively bad (there is the atrocious in art, as in crime), and we look upon the innumerable instances of mediocrity, daily glittering before our eyes, with the most profound indifference.

We shall let the reader into our confidence speedily, as to our opinions of modern painters. But first let us indulge ourselves in a preamble.

There can be no doubt, we apprehend, in the minds of competent judges, but that art has degenerated. The moderns are not such good painters as the ancients. If this be so—and who but a painter can doubt it?—it becomes a matter of interest to enquire into the reason of this degeneracy, and to ascertain how it can be amended. We do not profess to be able to produce all the reasons for the change,—but we beg to tender a few. These are,—1st, the multitude of pictures which already exist; secondly, the want of the natural model (properly so called); thirdly, the pursuit of small, instead of lofty, objects; and finally, the blindness and vanity of the artists themselves.

We are aware that the verdict of the living painters is unanimous in favour of their cotemporaries. One holds that Turner has outstripped both Claude and Poussin; another considers Phillips equal to Titian; a third points out the superiority of Calcott over Cuyp,—or of Wilkie over Teniers and Ostade united; with another, Chalon has more merit than Watteau—Hilton is an agreeable mixture of Raffaelle and Rubens—Newton is exquisite—Etty is grand—Danby is sublime—and Martin is very sublime, &c. In short, nothing that can suggest itself to the vanity or partiality of men, is found wanting to delude artists into a belief that they are making a rapid progress towards the top of the mountain of Fame, and leaving their predecessors far behind.

It would be cruel to dissipate this delusion, were it productive of any beneficial effects. But it is not. In the first place, it diverts the attention of young artists from good to indifferent models; teaching them to imitate painters who waste their time in the mechanism of art, instead of following those great geniuses who gave to art its intellectual character. And secondly, it is of little benefit, even in a pecuniary view; for the good judge will go on buying specimens of Italian and Flemish art, notwithstanding the supposed merits of the moderns. Our professors are indeed indignant at this; they require us to abandon our superstitious reverence, and insist on the superiority of the present age. But in the face of this assertion, we find them rubbing to pieces Venetian pictures, to penetrate their secret of colour;—we find them studying the flesh-tints of Rubens,—the chiaro-scuro of Ostade,—the colouring and composition of a dozen individual masters, whom, in the aggregate, they profess to despise. This blindness, or jealousy of former merit, is, we are of opinion, a fatal symptom,—announcing anything but health and strength in the body corporate of painting. If artists be envious of their predecessors, it is so far evidence of a little mind. If they be actually blind to the great merits of the old masters, is it not questionable whether they can discern clearly the truth of objects around them? Is it not questionable, in fact, whether, with this defect, they can apprehend the infinite degrees and beauties of expression—the delicacies, even of colour—the propriety of gesture and action—the grace and dignity, and other qualities which go towards forming a good picture? It is not very probable, we think, that men who can see little or no merit in Raffaelle, who overflowed with grace, beauty, and expression, should detect the grace and beauty and expression of the living model.*

One cause of the degeneracy of art is undoubtedly the multitude of pictures that exist. One might have imagined, from the way in which they are decried, that the old masters would be passed by altogether. But that is not the case. They are studied, though they are abused. They are studied too much, indeed; for they are resorted to as a sort of common treasury, and those things derived from them which should proceed from invention only. The painter need not go to nature, nor rack his brains for ideas. He has nothing to do but imitate, in order to obtain moderate reputation and—money. The consequence is, that he does imitate to a degree that is not generally known. We remember (amongst other things) seeing, a few years ago, a picture by a celebrated artist, the main part of which was copied from a print of Marc Antonio; and it is notorious that Sir Thomas Lawrence's portrait of the Princess Charlotte was a mere transcript of the Sophonisba of Titian. Sir Joshua Reynolds's Cupid and Psyche, again, is nothing more than a copy from the old print, by the master of the die; and there are a multitude of other pictures in precisely the same predicament.

Nature should be studied; but she is not studied—at least not to advantage. It is true that the artist attends the Life Academy, and studies the limbs of the living model. But where does he study expression? We do not complain that painters do not give us occasionally tolerable trunks of men; but we complain that they do not put heads upon their shoulders. In the comic style of art, indeed, there is occasionally some meaning (as in the works of Wilkie and Leslie) but in the grand style, there is absolutely nothing. It would perplex the Royal Academicians, we imagine, to a very painful degree, were they compelled to produce half-a-dozen historical pictures, where the heroes and heroines might not very properly be employed in selling meat and millinery in Carnaby market or Cranbourne street. And our portraits partake (though in a less degree) of this want of high character. They are either debased or exaggerated into theatrical expression. Whose fault is this? Is there a want of lofty models? Or are the artists themselves wanting in high taste? We suspect that some blame, at all events, attaches to the painters. They do not seek out fine subjects. If they resort to nature, which is not too often the case, as we should suppose, it is to polished artificial nature, so to speak,—to the nature of courts and commercial cities; not to the healthy, unrestrained, unsophisticated nature, that springs up, wild and beautiful, in country places,—not that which the wind wooes and the shower falls on, which looks out unclouded, and carries the mark of its internal qualities in the face; and—whether dark or fair, hideous or lovely—has at all events the stamp and impress of what human nature was intended to be, and is not clipped and defaced into a smooth impostor, by the caprice of fashion, or the wear or excessive polish of too refined society.

It may be that there is something in our cold northern complexions, which is adverse to art. We are satisfied that our rigid features and reserved habits do present impediments to artists: and so far as this is the case, it offers an excuse for the painter; but unluckily it does not add to the beauty of his works. We can easily believe, for we see, that there are in the sunny faces of Italy, the pale proud gravity of the Spaniard, and the swarthy lineaments of the Moor, materials which our country aspects do not possess. But we have something nevertheless at our service—something that we see perpetually, even in the streets of London, but seldom or never on canvass. Titian, who painted such noble portraits, was in some degree in the same predicament of the modern artist. He had to deal with courtly faces, with artificial expressions, and yet observe what he has done, by dint of his great genius. He has done what

* We were once, when descanting on this subject, met by the question—'Were not artists in former times as vain at they are at present?' We answered, Yes, they were naturally so, perhaps; but they at least had the taste or good sense to pursue lofty objects; and this pursuit of itself abated, in some degree, their petty failings, and left whatever of strength or clear-sightedness they had, to be employed, as it was employed, in the true service of art.

Digitized by Google

our artists do not achieve. He has steered between the two besetting vices of the moderns—theatrical expression on the one hand, and utter insipidity on the other—and has transmitted pictures for our admiration, which the modern artist will do well to study. He will do well also, if instead of limiting his ambition to painting a jar or a chest of drawers, a satin gown or a damask curtain to perfection, he will let loose his imagination and direct his energies to higher objects. There is the 'human face divine' still in existence, somewhere or other, and he cannot do better than set out on a journey to discover it.

We will say no more on this subject at present, but will content ourselves with letting our thoughts escape as we proceed. We shall now and touch upon some of the more eminent artists as their names occur in the catalogue.

'begin at the beginning,'

[No. 2, will comprehend R. Westall, R. A. and T. Phillips, R. A.]

ANIMALS AT THE EGYPTIAN HALL.

Oran Otan and Chimpanzee.—On Saturday we had a private view of these animals, which have been just imported. The Oran Otan is a female from the island of Borneo; the Chimpanzee a male from the river Gambia. They are both young, about three years old, or hardly so much; and between two or three feet in height. The Oran Otan is by far the inferior in interest. Her mind seems as shapeless as her body, which is preposterously corpulent, with long thin arms, and a loose pendulous skin about the throat; a composition, which, joined to the sinking of the head between the shoulders, presents the appearance of a huddled mass of paunch, head, and limbs. Her face is melancholy and sullen; her voice a sort of whistling squeak, with an alternation of grunt; her behaviour selfish; and she seems irritable in temper. She has very little hair upon her body, which is ascribed (and probably her temper may be so) to the ill-treatment the poor animal received on board ship. The Chimpanzee is a very different sort of person. His mild and intelligent eyes, prominent nose, better proportioned figure, his neck of a reasonable length and well defined, give him a very human appearance. His arm is excessively man-like, though somewhat of the lanky order; indeed we have seen more than one man's arm with less elegance of contour than this good fellow's can boast. But in his manners he makes a still greater approach to the human being. They are those of a gentle and caressing child. He sat, apparently with exceeding comfort, in the arms of one of his attendants, with his own round the man's neck. He would put one arm round his friend the keeper, while he sought for something he had in his hand. He broke a piece of bread that was given him, in the most deliberate and handy style, and in eating used his lips as well as his teeth. When any one came into the room, he looked with a face of earnest curiosity to see what it was; and would then resume his original manner, whether of indifference or excitement. But his voice is his greatest humanity. It is so various and so expressive in its inflections, that one can hardly believe him denied actual speech. He had on a sort of flannel petticoat and frock in consequence of a cold from which he is recovering; and his mild cough, with its slight protrusion of the lips, make a singular addition to the human-like effect of his appearance.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Doubly Alone.—A lady who had not sufficiently cultivated the art of making the domestic fireside as delightful as she might have done, asked her husband one day why he yawned. "My dear," said he, "the husband and the wife, you know, are but one, and when I am alone, I get tired."

A New Fish-sauce.—A countryman, arrived at Paris, was desirous of following the newest fashions. He heard gas spoken of as being very superior to oil, but he had not the courage to ask any explanation on the subject. Going to dine at a restaurateur's he ordered some turbot, and on being asked by the waiter, whether he would take oil with his fish, he answered, "No, I wish to try the new mode; give it me with gas."

The Sustillo.—A caterpillar, which the Indians name sustillo, and by which a paper is fabricated, very similar to that made in China, is bred in the pacac, a tree well known in Peru. In proportion to the vigour and majestic growth of this tree, is the number of the insects it nourishes, and which are of the kind and size of the bombyx, or silk-worm. When they are completely satiated, they unite at the body of the tree, seeking the part which is best adapted to the extension they have to take. They then form, with the greatest symmetry and regularity, a web which is larger or smaller according to the number of the operators; and more or less pliant according to the quality of the leaf by which they have been nourished, the whole of them remaining beneath. This envelope, on which they bestow such a texture, consistency, and lustre, that it cannot be decomposed by any practicable expedient, having been finished, they all of them unite, and, ranging themselves in vertical and even files, form in the centre a perfect square. Being thus disposed, each of them makes its cocoon, or pod, of a coarse and short silk, in which it is transformed from the grub into the chrysalis, and from the chrysalis into the papilio, or moth. In proportion as they afterwards quit their confinement, to take wing, they detach wherever it is most convenient to them, their envelope, or web, a portion of which remains suspended to the trunk of the tree, where it waves to and fro like a streamer, and which becomes more or less white, according as the air and humidity of the season and situation admit. This natural silk paper has been gathered measuring a yard and a half, of an elliptical shape, which is peculiar to all of it.—Mirror.

MUSIC.

'Mozart's Six Grand Symphonies,' newly adapted for two Performers on the Pianoforte; with Accompaniments for Violin, Flute, and Violoncello (ad libitum), by J. B. Cramer. No. 1. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

The symphony before us is the fine one in D, that opens with an Adagio.—We have little to add to the announcement in the title-page, unless it be to express our approbation of the handsome manner in which the work has been brought out. Mr Cramer's name alone is a sufficient pledge for the completeness of the arrangement, and its practicability for the performer. The next benefit a man of genius can confer on the public, after making known his own thoughts, is to carry on the thoughts of congenial minds, by placing them in some new and attractive attitude.

'Napoleon's Midnight Review,' cantata, sung by Mr Parry, Jun. at the Public Concerts, &c. Translated from the German of Baron Zedlitz, by William Ball; the music by the Chevalier Sigesmund Neükomm. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

The subject of this cantata is admirably adapted for musical expression. There is something peculiarly impressive in the idea of a Spectre Drummer parading a moon-lit plain, with his sullen and muttering roll, summoning the spirits of the departed warriors, with their chieftain, to the review. The Chevalier Neükomm has felt the ghastliness of his theme, and has produced a composition, masterly in character and complete in effect. We have heard it performed in public, and were struck with the richness of the scoring and the uncommon-place combinations of the harmonies. In short, without entering into a critical notice of the piece, which, to do it justice, would occupy too much of our confined limits, we can confidently recommend it to every amateur, the compass of whose voice is of the baritone class, and who has made some progress in the art of singing. The publication is well-timed, seeing that all our places of theatrical amusement are celebrating the career of that extraordinary man.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—Tancredi.—La Bayadere.
Drury-Lane.—Alfred the Great.—Popping the Question.—Blue Beard.
Covent-Garden.—Napoleon Buonaparte.—The Waterman.

King's Theatre.

From what we have seen of Mademoiselle Taglioni, we are sorry to lose her; though we are compelled nevertheless to say, that after the enthusiastic praises we heard of her style of dancing, it disappointed us. The truth is, that unless there are characters in her list, far surpassing those in which we have seen her, she must have been admired rather for something negative than positive,—rather for offering a grave and graceful contrast to the ordinary style of French dancing, than for any very marvellous faculties of her own. We thought, when we first heard her name, that she was an Italian, and that she was come to shew us the vast superiority of a truly good Italian dancer, over the mere twirls, entre-chats, and other unmeaning vagaries, hitherto admired in France. And most likely she is of Italian origin, for her dancing is at all events not French: at least it is not of the sort we are accustomed to consider French in this country. Its chief character is a graceful repose. The extreme ease of it is indeed wonderful, especially when we consider the laborious and artificial exercises which dancers have to practice, and which generally produce an indelible stiffness in their manners. Mademoiselle Taglioni winds hither and thither with singular smoothness: she is perfect mistress of her actions, her deportment, her face: she does whatever she pleases. But we cannot help wishing, that she would be pleased to do something more. Dancing, after all, in its greatest repose, is an extraordinary departure from our ordinary style of movement: it can only be supposed warranted by a certain enthusiasm; and in the repose of Mademoiselle Taglioni, there is too much repose. It seems as if she should either move more or less. The amount of action is hardly warranted by the impulse. If she is incited to do so much, there is no reason why she should not be more lively. If she feels no particular call to be lively, there is no reason why she should do so much. She might as well walk,—incederet regina. There is, it is true, a certain class of dancers, who in the grandiloquence of the profession are styled 'heroical,'—or as Mr Blasis has it, 'pursue the serious branch.' We suspect we seldom see one of these in England, the dancers who visit us being usually of the demi-caractére, or mixed character; that is to say, of a reasonable gravity or levity, as it may happen. Mlle. Taglioni, we conclude, is of the heroical class, especially as she is of tall stature, the possessors of which are enjoined by masters of the art to consider themselves of a superior moral organization; persons of a foot shorter being desired to despair of attaining to any elevation of character: so that if all the world had been dancers, the Agesilauses, Napoleons, and other great little men, would have had their ascendancy nipt in the bud, and no man of letters been allowed to be witty, or a comic writer, if he was six foot high. It would have been all over with such a strapping fellow as Fielding.

There is one set of characters, for which we can imagine dancers of this height of pretension to be calculated well enough; which are the Dianas, Junos, and other serious people of antiquity; that is to say, supposing them to dance at all, which it is easier to conceive from the habit of reading about them in the poets, than when we present to our imaginations the impulses that commonly move people to a livelier line of action than ordinary. Diana is described as dancing on the banks of the Eurotas; and a huntress may be allowed considerable vivacity of movement. But at the Opera-House, love is the great mover; and Mlle. TAGLIONI, to our taste, is deficient in the enthusiasm necessary for taking her part in the display of that passion. She seems to think that if she were more lively, she would be less modest; which does not follow. If dancing, as it often did with the Greeks, partook of a religious character, shadowing forth the movements of floating Gods or of planets, and careering round an altar as the latter do about the sun, she would be an unexceptionable performer. As it is, we are grateful for being relieved from the mechanical capriccios of the ordinary French school, than which nothing can be more intolerable. But having an Italian name, our fair dancer made us think of the divine De' Martini, whom we saw at Turin; and after her's, we never can fancy we see any real dancing besides, unless it be of the Spanish order.

Digitized by Google

☞ *

* This signature, which was only adopted for a temporary purpose, will in future be omitted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged to J. B.; but at present, our departments are full.

W. M. shall be gratified, if we can manage it.

The same answer to AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

'Received' does not imply 'accepted.' Our recollection of the article alluded to by the correspondent who asks the question to that purpose, is, that it did not suit us.

More Correspondents tomorrow.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

For the Benefit of Mr Wallack.

The Comedy of

WILD OATS.

[By O'KEEFE.]

Lady Amaranth, Miss Phillips. Amelia, Mrs Faucit. Jane, Mrs Orger.
Sir George Thunder, Mr Farren. Harry Thunder, Mr Cooper.
Rover, Mr Wallack. John Dory, Mr Dowton.
Banks, Mr Younge. Farmer Gammon, Mr W. Bennett. Sim, Mr Harley.
Ephraim Smooth, Mr Listen. Lamp, Mr Hughes. Trap, Mr Salter.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Guillaume Tell;' Mehul's Overture to 'De Jeune Henry Chasse;' and Winter's Overture to 'Mahomed.'

After which, a petite Historical Drama, called

THE LITTLE CORPORAL, OR THE SCHOOL OF BRIENNE.

Josephine, Miss Crawford.
The Minister of War, Mr Cooke. The Principal of the Academy, Mr C. Jones.
Egidius, Mr Younge. Patrault, Mr Thompson. Buonaparte, Miss Poole.
Bourienne, Darbel, Delestrade, Duhasset, Masters Cathie, Richardson, Hildrew, and Fenton.
Captain Morel, Mr Andrews.

To conclude with the Grand Dramatic Romance of

BLUE BEARD.

In which Mr Cooke's Magnificent Stud of Horses will appear.

Fatima, Mrs Waylett. Irene, Miss Byfeld. Beda, Miss S. Phillips.
Abomelique, Mr Younge. Ibrahim, Mr W. Bennett. Hassan, Mr Horner.
Selim, Mr Horn, who will introduce the Song of 'Love's Empire.'
Shacabac, Mr Harley. 1st Spahi, Mr Yarnold.
2nd Spahi, Mr Bland. 3rd Spahi, Mr C. Jones. 4th Spahi, Mr Eaton.

To-morrow, William Tell; Deaf as a Post; and The Portrait of Cervantes.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Six Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde, Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

To conclude with a New Melo-Drama, called

NEUHA'S CAVE; OR, THE SOUTH SEA MUTINEERS.

Partly founded on LORD BYRON'S Poem, 'The Island.'
[By Mr PEAKE.]
The Music composed by Mr G. Stansbury.

Islanders.—Neuha, Miss Taylor.
Fegee, Mr Collett. Attoo and Tahamea, Mr F. Sutton and Mr Brady.
Captain Boldweather, Mr Baker. Sprayling, Mr G. Bennett.
Torquil, Mrs Vining. Mr Pimpernel Chickweed, Mr Keeley.
Ludwig Bomperts, Mr F. Matthews. Black Sam, Mr Panlo.
Ben Bunting, Mr Evans. Jack Skyscrape, Mr Turnour.
Locksley, Mr Henry. Dogsbody, Mr Fuller.

To-morrow, Buonaparte; a New piece called The Gipsy Father.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

VALERIE.

Suivi de

YELVA.

On finira par

ALEXIS.

Les Rôles de Valeria, Alexis et Yelva, par Mlle. Léontine Fay.

Lately published by EFFINGHAM WILSON, 88 Royal Exchange.

THE WHOLE ART OF DRESS,

OR, THE ROAD TO ELEGANCE AND FASHION,

AT THE ENORMOUS SAVING OF THIRTY PER CENT.

Being a Treatise upon the essential and much cultivated requisite of the present Day,

GENTLEMEN'S COSTUME:

Exhibiting, and clearly defining, by a Series of beautifully engraved Illustrations, the most becoming Assortment of Colours, and style of Dress and Undress, in all their varieties, suited to different Ages and Complexions, so as to render the Human Figure most symmetrical and imposing to the eye.

BY A CAVALRY OFFICER.

"This book is expected to effect a complete reformation amongst both young and old. It contains rules for the selection of gentlemanly apparel, from the hat, to the shoe tie; with illustrative engravings of the most appropriate shapes for hats, cravats, coats, waistcoats, inexpressibles, and all the et ceteras of male costume. A slovenly man is an eye-sore to all around him. We recommend the uninitiated to get a copy of 'The whole Art of Dress,' without loss of time; even the experienced may profit by an attentive perusal of this work."—Ollo.

Price 5s.

A NEW GUIDE AND COMPANION TO THE

BILLIARD TABLE,

Exhibiting in an intelligible and comprehensive manner, by means of a Synoptical Drawing, the method of executing the most difficult Strokes; Rules, Regulations, &c. The whole newly and completely arranged, by AN AMATEUR. With Plates, Price 2s. 6d.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.

MINTER'S SELF-ACTING AND RECLINING CHAIR.

BY THE KING'S LETTERS PATENT.

G. MINTER begs to acquaint the Nobility, Gentry, &c. that he has invented an EASY CHAIR, the positions or elevations of which are so numerous, that the number is quite indefinite, say from one to one thousand, and are obtained by a slight pressure of the back, which not only reclines the back of the chair, but raises the back part of the seat, thereby causing a proper inclined plane, which supports the weakest part of the back at any and every position. When you rise, the back follows you, and should you stop, the back immediately stops; and all this action is obtained without any spring, rack, or other machinery whatever.

G. Minter particularly recommends it to Invalids for its simplicity: if even they have lost the use of either of their hands or legs, they can obtain any position of themselves without any attendance, or exertion on their own part. The chair is made by the Inventor only, in a variety of plain and elegant shapes, at his manufactory, 26 PRINCES STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE (opposite Coventry street), and are sold as cheap as a common fixed easy chair of the same pattern, which is impossible in any other reclining chair, on account of their complicated construction, and which subjects them to be often out of repair, and even dangerous.—G. M. is confident any person honouring him with an inspection of his Chair, will be sufficiently convinced of its superiority over all others. It is also made portable for travelling, and will pack in a case only fourteen inches deep. It is warranted to act perfect fifty years.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters:—

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

Josephine, Miss M. C. Poole. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

The Highland Fling, by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballet of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

The principal Characters by Mrs Evans, Miss Wells, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Saville, Miss Dix, Mr Keppell, Mr Forrester, Mr Porteus, Mr G. Lejeune, Mr Wilkinson, Mr Spencer, and Mr G. Smith.

After which the admired Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

DELUSIONS.

Charles Eustace, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Clandio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

OTHELLO.

Othello, Mr Kean.

After which, THE WATERMAN.

To conclude with CURIOSITY CURED.

Kitty, Mrs Fitzwilliam.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—The Lady and the Devil—More Reform.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

VAUXHALL GARDENS Open this Evening, with a Variety of Entertainments.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS' Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPEL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 42 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº. 231.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1831.

SURPLUS POPULATION:

A COMEDY IN THREE ACTS.

BY WILLIAM COBBETT.

This unusual production, considering the pen it comes from, occupies the main part of last Saturday's 'Political Register:' but it is of a style so distinct from the ordinary matter of that publication, and belongs to us of the Tatler so emphatically to notice, that we cannot but "speak to it." Mr Malthus makes out that a surplus population is a great tragedy; Mr Cobbett is of opinion that it is or ought to be, a comedy; and a comedy he has accordingly made it, with a proper matrimonial termination, though there is a bit of tragedy by the way; to wit, the ducking of a Boroughmonger in a horse-pond. The substance of the drama is soon told. A young village couple are about to be married; Squire Thimble, a Malthusian philosopher, interferes with his advice: Sir Gripe Grindum, a Boroughmonger, takes the more summary mode of endeavouring to carry off the girl, for his own "private eating;" the ruffians employed in the abduction are pursued; the Boroughmonger is ducked, and population triumphs.

What the Tory critics will say to this, we know not, except that it is a terrible thing to inculcate the ducking of Boroughmongers. We confess we do not consider any recommendation to that effect necessary, seeing what our good King and his Ministers are about; but we are convinced, that had not the King been as good as he is, and the Ministers as sagacious, much worse things than duckings would have taken place. A little tossing, therefore, of the waters after the storm may be allowed to Mr Cobbett's mind, especially under certain ploughings with which it is threatened, and for which we would fain hope that the persons concerned may substitute a pouring of the oil of Lethe. The wiser they are, the better they can afford it. Mr Cobbett has had a good deal of the rough work of Reform to go through, and if he has not always gained by it in any way, he may be the more easily excused by those who had more refinement and less zeal, or, if they please, less violence and self-will; but who have profited by it nevertheless; for unquestionably he has smoothed for others the politer parts of the operation.

We subjoin a specimen or two of the drama, as curiosities.—Mr Cobbett, who used to carp at sonnetteers, opens his play with all the pastoral sweetness of an Allan Ramsay:—

'ACT I.

'Scene I.—Sunrise: a Meadow and Cows in it, with a Lane on the side of it: a Farm-House in the back-ground: Betsey in the Meadow with a milking-pail on her arm, and Dick, in a smock-frock, coming along the Lane.

'Dick. [Singing.]

Soft's the note of yonder wood-lark,
Softer far my Betsey's voice:
Sweet's the dew in cups of cowslips;
Sweeter something that's my choice.

'Bet. [Behind the hedge listening.] And pray what may that be?

'Dick. [Starting, and then jumping over a gap in the hedge.] Why the dew upon your lips, my lovely Betsey!

'Bet. Come, come, let go my hands, do: mistress scolds so, when I get in late with the milk.

Squire Thimble has come on a visit to Sir Gripe, but the latter who is miserly in his profligacy, has quartered him upon the farm-house of Dick's master:—

'Scene IV.—A small Parlour in the Farm-house: Squire Thimble sitting before the fire: breakfast preparing.

'Squ. Thim. [To himself.] I don't much like his sending me here, instead of receiving me at the Hall; but I dare say he will explain it when he comes.

'Mrs Stiles. [Entering.] Hope you will excuse our homely fare, Sir, but we'll give you the best we've got. [Betsey, entering with eggs, lets a couple of them roll off the plate upon the floor.] What a deuce is the girl about; But [turning to Squire Thimble] I hope you'll look over it, Sir: she's going to be married to-morrow, and her head has been running upon that all the morning.

'Squ. Thim. Married, did you say? Married! That girl going going to be married!

'Mrs Stiles. Yes, Sir; they have been courting a long while, and they be desperate fond of one another.

'Squ. Thim. Desperate, indeed! But do you encourage such things, then?

'Mrs Stiles. What things, Sir?

'Squ. Thim. Why, the coupling together of these poor creatures to fill the country with beggars and thieves.

'Mrs Stiles. [With warmth.] I'm sure there isn't a better young man in the parish than Richard Hazle; and as for Betty Birch, young as she is, she shall make bread, butter, cheese or beer, with any woman in the whole country, let the next be who she will. Beggars and thieves, indeed!

'Squ. Thim. Well, if these be good people, so much the more reason to keep them from being plunged into misery, and ....

'Mrs Stiles. [Interrupting him] Misery, Sir!

'Squ. Thim. Yes, and from adding to that great national disease, the surplus population.

'Mrs Stiles. Never heard of that disease before, Sir; we ben't troubled with't in these parts, though we have the small-pox and measles terrible bad sometimes; and our poor neighbour, Chopstick, lost four as fine children last week as ....

'Squ. Thim. So much the better! so much the better!

'Mrs Stiles. What, Sir!

'Squ. Thim. Yes; so much the better, I say, and [aside] if it had taken you off too, it would have been better still. [To her.] Go, good woman, and tell the girl to come and speak to me.

'Mrs Stiles. She's going to her mother's to get ready for her wedding; but I'll call her in for a minute. [Exit.

'Enter Betsey.

'Squ. Thim. So, young woman, you are going to be married, I understand?

'Bet. Yes, Sir.

'Squ. Thim. How old are you?

'Bet. I'm nineteen, Sir, come next Valentine's eve.

'Squ. Thim. That is to say you are eighteen! [Aside.] No wonder the country is ruined! And your mother now; how old is she?

'Bet. I can't justly say, Sir; but I heard her say she was forty some time back.

'Squ. Thim. And how many of you has she brought into the world?

'Bet. Only seventeen, Sir.

'Squ. Thim. Seventeen! Only seventeen!

'Bet. Seventeen now alive, Sir; she lost two and had two still-born and ....

'Squ. Thim. Hold your tongue! Hold your tongue. [Aside.] It is quite monstrous! Nothing can save the country but plague, pestilence, famine, and sudden death. Government ought to import a ship-load of arsenic. [To her.] But, young woman, cannot you impose on yourself "moral restraint" for ten or a dozen years?

'Bet. Pray what is that, Sir?

'Squ. Thim. Cannot you keep single till you are about thirty years old?

'Bet. Thirty years old, Sir! [Stifling a laugh.

'Enter Sir Gripe Grindum.

'Squ. Thim. [rising.] How do you do, Sir Gripe; hope I've the pleasure of seeing you well.

'Sir G. Very well, very well; but rather hungry.

'Squ. Thim. Draw up, then; here are plenty of eggs and butter.

'Sir G. Yes, they think nothing of Malthus here.

'Squ. Thim. So it seems, for this young hussey is going to be married to-morrow, though she is only eighteen. Her mother has had, it seems, only twenty-one children; so that you'll have your parish finely stocked.

'Sir G. Married! [Aside.] What a beautiful creature it is!

'Squ. Thim. Yes, married; and she laughs at the idea of moral restraint.

'Sir G. I dare say she does. [Aside.] And so shall I too, if I can get her into my clutches.'

[Last, the village shoemaker, comes in, and proves too good a logician for Thimble:]—

'Squ. Thim. [Aside.] These fellows have all been reading Cobbett, and as my friends, Trevor and Wilmot, say, nothing can stand, neither Church nor State, if that wicked fellow be not put to silence. [To them]. You think, then, that the more the merrier, and the more paupers you breed, the better it will be for you, and that, instead of checking premature marriages, you ought (as, indeed, you do) to offer a premium for breeding children, as we do for breeding sheep or planting trees?

Digitized by Google

'Last. There needs no premium; for, whether married or not, country girls will have children; but since you talk of paupers and of a premium for breeding, pray what are those who are on the pension and sinecure lists, men, women, and children; and, as to the premiums for breeding, what do you call the money that is given to poor parsons and to half-pay officers and their widows and children? Are not these premiums for breeding, and premiums, too, paid out of taxes raised in part on these very labourers? And what are the military academies and asylums but premiums to the rich and the soldiers to induce them to breed? You find no fault of these premiums for the breeding of idlers, and are alarmed only at the increase of those who work?'

It is bold enough in Mr Cobbett to write in this way, with a prosecution hanging over his head. Courage, however, is calculated to do no man a disservice; and we have no hesitation in saying, that this instance of it ought to do none to Mr Cobbett. We are not Cobbettites, and never have been; but neither are we among those who affect to think with peculiar respect of the opinions of a clergyman, who consents to live, aye, and to increase and multiply, on the strength of the scriptures, and then writes a book, opposed equally to scripture and reason: for the Malthus doctrine is nothing but a violent opening of one eye to a question in behalf of the few, and a shutting up the other on the side of the many. Whatever Mr Cobbett may do sometimes, he evidently writes on this occasion with a strong sense of being in the right; and it would be wise, we think, in the Crown lawyers, and far from wanting in a proper spirit, not to hazard the pressing upon that sort of consciousness in a man of his powers. They may reckon upon his want of repute with certain classes; but it would be better to consult their own "honor and dignity,"—things that can now be spoken of, even in conjunction with the idea of an Attorney-General.

The verses at the end of Mr Cobbett's play are not so good as those at the beginning. He is afraid that the players will act it without his leave; an apprehension that we take to be unfounded. In short, the piece is only curious in coming from such a pen. The best thing in it is its healthy sympathy with rural scenes and buxom village maids, who see 'no reason in nature' why they should not love, and who resent above all monopolies the monopoly of marriage.

Switzerland, the South of France, and the Pyrennees, in 1830. By Derwent Conway. (Constable's Miscellany, Nos. 66—67). 2 vols. 18mo. Hurst, Chance, and Co.

Some extracts from the first volume of this work have already been given in the Tatler; the second volume, which completes the work, has now appeared, and we hail it as an agreeable companion for a leisure hour. We have travellers innumerable, who wander about the world measuring buildings, and informing us, with an endless repetition, where certain pictures, statues, &c. are to be found; and, although the majority tell us little that is new on these subjects, they still find readers; for there are few, if any, from whom we cannot gather something interesting concerning the minds and manners of human beings. Mr Conway has not journied in unknown lands, but he has not followed the much-beaten path; he describes things which most travellers overlook, or consider beneath their notice; but which are, nevertheless, interesting and useful. He strips away from the scenes he visits all romance that is not accordant with reality; he shows us a country covered with vines and olives, and bids us not deceive ourselves, for that—notwithstanding the romantic terms in which Truth herself may describe it—it is barren and uninteresting. He speaks of great names without enthusiasm: yet without endeavouring to depreciate them. He touches pleasantly upon what is picturesque amid the common-places of life, and has a particular predilection for fruit-markets. He gives one the idea of an intelligent and kind-hearted youth, who has associated too much with old people, and has, therefore, not kept pace with the times. He seems to take a pleasure in looking upon the worst side of the French character; is rather surprised that the poor should think they have a right to be fed, and that an enlightened nation should object to a little tyranny; yet he seems less wanting in sympathy than in reflection. The work is written in a light, unstudied manner, gives a passing touch upon everything, great and small, and is not only very amusing, but contains a great deal of information upon the familiar habits of the people, and has upon the whole an air of originality and good humour, that entitles it to rank above many volumes of greater pretension. The following extracts will show the grounds of the objection; which we are unwilling to make, without giving reasons for it. After expatiating at some length upon the vanity of the French, the author goes on to say,—it was 'this that tore down the Bastile, murdered a king, and abjured God, because such things were a spectacle for the world to gaze at,—this that received the yoke of Napoleon, because the spectacle of revolution was no longer new, and because his ambition and la gloire Française went hand-in-hand,—this that encouraged industry, commerce, and manufactures during fifteen years, because France could not be great without them,——and finally, this that now threatens to desolate Europe with the scourge of war, because la grande nation is beginning to be forgotten.' This is surely dismissing a nation's character with a vengeance. In truth it is not too much to call it a childish ebullition, unworthy of the good sense which we conclude the author is to arrive at by and by; for we cannot persuade ourselves he is too old for such improvement. Mr Conway denies that the French are a polite people, and says that selfishness and vanity are their chief characteristics. A Frenchman, as much disposed to judge unfavourably, might present a very forbidding picture of the English character. Speaking of the manufacturers of Lyons, he says,—'I do not recollect to have seen in any of the great manufacturing towns of England, so much to remind one of the fatal vicissitudes of trade, in the spectacles of poverty and wretchedness that every moment present themselves; and it struck me that among the lower orders there seemed to exist, in a remarkable degree, the elements of turbulence and civil commotion. The look, air, and expression of the unemployed workman of Lyons has nothing in it of uncomplaining sufferance. He carries an air of defiance in his countenance; and solicits alms in the manner of one who thinks he has a right to partake the purse of another who wears a better coat than himself. Three years before I visited Lyons, 23,000 persons were employed in the silk manufactories; and three years later, in the year 1829, when I again visited it, not more than one-fourth part of this number was required.'—Mr Conway was most likely quite correct as to the opinion of the suffering manufacturers of Lyons, and if he has travelled much in his own country, during the last year, he may probably have discovered, that human beings, whom willingness to work has not saved from a state of starvation, are apt to partake of that opinion, reside where they may. It is not a national, but a natural result of their sufferings; and it would be a bold thing to say that it is an unjust one. Does Mr Conway not only expect the 'eels to lie still,' but to look grateful?

ORIGINAL POETRY.

BEAUTY.

Painters! Poets! who can tell
What Beauty is—bright miracle?
Sometimes brown and sometimes white,
She shifts from darkness into light,
Swimming on with such fine ease
That we miss her small degrees,
Knowing not that she hath ranged,
Till we find her sweetly changed.
They are poets false who say
That Beauty must be fair as day,
And that the rich red rose
On her cheek for ever flows,
Or that the cold white lily lieth
On her breast, and never flieth.
Beauty is not so unkind,
Not so niggard, not so blind,
As yield her beauties but to one,
When she may walk unconfined,
Associate with the unfettered wind,
And wander with the Sun.
No; she spreads her gifts, her grace,
O'er every colour, every face;
She can laugh, and she can breathe
Freely where she will,—beneath
Polar darkness, tropic star,
Impoverish'd Delhi, dark Bahar,
And all the regions bright and far
Where India's sweet-voic'd women are!

Amante.

Digitized by Google

FINE ARTS.

MR PETER HOLLINS'S EXHIBITION OF SCULPTURE.

HERE we saw an old friend, or rather enemy, with a new face,—The Massacre of the Innocents. How this subject seems to be enjoyed! None has been more often represented; and Mr Hollins now holds it out as his great attraction, aided doubtless by its being COLOSSAL; of which, however, we do not see the advantage. There is something striking in the design, but where is the necessity for the expressions of malicious rage in the face of the mechanical and paid assassin? and why does not the mother, who is supplicating him, look in his face? We cannot like it so well as the groupe of Aurora and Zephyrus. This is very beautiful; and the composition is elegant in the extreme. The Zephyr is perfect. We could wish the face of the goddess a little more handsome, and the figure is perhaps hardly full or luxuriant enough for Aurora, but it is exceedingly graceful, and the design is not unworthy the execution. The Conrad and Medora cannot compare with this. The composition is straggling, and the face and attitudes are of a very vague meaning. We should much doubt the costume of this groupe. Of the likeness of the bust of Mr Charles Lloyd we are not able to judge, but it has all the characteristics of a minutely painstaking performance. This gentleman is of the Society of Friends, a banker at Birmingham, and known for his extensive patronage of scientific and charitable institutions. Being a Quaker, he would not, of course, voluntarily sit for his portrait. He did it involuntarily;—Mr Hollins followed him to all places where he might see him, he did 'hang upon him like a disease.' Mr Lloyd 'had caught the Hollins,' and so 'the taker' was taken. A better testimony of the likeness of this bust than the copies of certain letters lying by it (which have an unpleasant appearance) is the admirable likeness of Mr Macready. It has his every peculiarity but the voice. There is another bust or two in the room, and a few smaller designs, but of little concern to any but the Birmingham public, being of local interest.

MUSIC.

SIGNOR BEGREZ' CONCERT.

M. BEGREZ gave his annual morning concert yesterday, in the room at the Opera-house. He was ably supported by the Vocal Profession; the performers upon the occasion being Mesdames PASTA, LALANDE, RUBINI, RAIMBAUX, DU PUY, and MEESI; and Sig. LABLACHE, Mr H. PHILLIPS, Sig. RUBINI, DE BEGNIS, CURIONI, SANTINI, LEVASSEUR, TORRI, and BEGREZ himself. Mr MORI led, and Sig. COSTA was the Conductor. The room was crowded, the ladies bearing, to all appearance, the proportion of twenty to one gentleman. The selection was not exactly to our taste, being made up almost exclusively of the whip-syllabub of ROSSINI and his jack-puddings, MERCADANTE, MAYERBEER, and PACINI. The concert opened with the overture to 'Tancredi,' which, like that to 'Oscar and Malvina,' always sets us laughing, both at the composition itself, and the nodding heads of the auditors. The English are so musical!—Signor PUZZI executed some of his very clever passages on the horn; and Madame DULCKEN one of Mr HERZ's tight-rope rondos on the piano-forte. This lady's performance is quite worthy of the composition she vouchsafes to honour; mere difficulties are written, and mere difficulties are accomplished. We must honestly confess, that with the exception of two or three pieces, we have rarely heard so much trash comprehended in one morning's musical entertainment. Mr H. PHILLIPS's introducing of the 'Qui sdegno' from the 'Zauberflöte,' (and which he sang, as usual, charmingly) seemed as inappropriate to the general character of the selection, as a passage from Jeremy Taylor or Sir Thomas Brown would be during a Christmas game of forfeits. We compliment Mr BEGREZ upon his accurate perception of the West-end taste in music.

THE METROPOLIS OF THE RATS.—In noticing the noxious quadrupeds which were found in the City, Dr M. adverted to the rats. He said, that in many parts of the country, the Norway rat has almost extirpated the ancient legitimate occupier, the English black rat; not so much by regular battle, as by depriving him, by his superior strength, of the means of obtaining a living; but this was not the case in London; for in certain distilleries and breweries, both the brown and the black rat were to be found on the same premises. The metropolis of the rats, Ratopolis it might be called was assuredly the common sewers of London. In them the rats lived as in, streets, and from thence the levies were made in thousands for the supply of the ratticides at the Pit or Circus at Westminster.—It is stated, that a few years ago, four prisoners in Newgate, under sentence of death, managed to descend from the water-closet into a sewer, having formed the daring project of proceeding along it until they reached the Thames; but by the time they got as far as Fleet-market, they were beset by such legions of rats, who furiously set upon them to revenge the invasion of their dominions, that the unhappy men were compelled in their agony to scream for assistance, and people having heard them, opened the gratings and hoisted them up; when they were conducted back to the place from whence they came. The men who enter the sewers to clean and repair them carry lights, and are in too great force to be attacked.—Dr J. Mitchell's Lecture on Animal and Vegetable Life in the City of London.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Statesmen are the only things that look greatest at a distance.—Bogle Corbet.

— A writer in a Magazine, who does not know a smiling remark from a remark altogether serious, charges us with 'cockneyism,' because we hailed, in the name of Don Telesforo de Trueba, a reminiscence of the play-writers and other worthies in Gil Blas and the Devil on Two Sticks. We thought it had long been found out by everybody, that there is nothing which betrays a more genuine spirit of cockneyism, than charges of it. We recommend the writer to get rid of this monomania.

— The hat worn by Mr Warde, in his personation of the Emperor Napoleon at Covent Garden, is said to be the identical hat worn by the hero himself; and borrowed of the gentleman to whom it belongs, who is a resident in Paris, under a solemn injunction to return it at the end of the season.

— It is announced that M. Laporte will not undertake the engagement of the King's Theatre after the present season.

— Ries, the celebrated composer, has arrived in London from Germany.

— Signor Paganini, yielding to his own judgment, rather than the counsel of pretended friends, has abandoned the idea of attempting to evade his contract with M. Laporte, and is to appear at the King's Theatre, at old prices, very early in June.—Courier.

DIVIDED UNITY.—A monk travelling in the country, sought the hospitality of a poor village curate. The latter gave him the best reception in his power, but was obliged to serve up the repast in earthenware, with the suitable accompaniment of pewter spoons, common forks, &c. The monk, more accustomed to utensils of higher pretension, accommodated himself but indifferently to this simplicity, and at length opened his trunk, and took from thence silver utensils, and placed them on the table. The curate, at the sight of this luxury, addressed his guest, "Reverend father, we should make a good monk between us." "Why?" said the visitor. "Because," rejoined the curate, "you have taken the vow of poverty, and I observe it."

SOCIAL IMPROVEMENTS. — A correspondent of the Morning Herald (a paper distinguished among its contemporaries not more by the copious variety of its matter than by a certain zealous and graceful tone of humanity,) recommends that fountains should be made in our squares and other convenient places, and bands of music be stationed there upon summer evenings (at a trifling subscription from the inhabitants), to help our beloved countrymen to pass their days more agreeably, and not be behindhand with France and other countries in the art of making the most of life. Bands of music, he thinks, might also be upon the Serpentine in boats, and add a most desirable attraction to the promenade in that quarter. We cordially agree with these suggestions, and think that the temper of Englishmen would be much improved by adopting every measure calculated to make them more comfortable in each other's society. And after all, temper and good-humour are the great things. Our lives are made up of moments, and they are the wisest and best who can make the greatest number of moments agreeable to themselves and others.

THE BEGGAR AND HIS DOG.—The number of dogs, and of curs especially, was generally deemed a nuisance; but although many of them might be dispensed with, yet a large proportion of them rendered valuable service as cheap co-operators with the police in the protection of property: many belonging to persons living in courts and alleys, and who unhappily having no property to protect, nevertheless shared their scanty pittance with their four-legged friends. The poor man was not on this account to be contemned. Neglected, and too often at war with the world, having few pleasures allowed to him, his dog should in charity be spared to him, that the beneficent feelings and affections might not be totally extinguished in his breast. One of that immense class of powerful people, who never care for the pains and pleasures of their fellow men, attempted to deprive a wretched beggar, in Paris, of his faithful dog. The beggar resisted, as if for his life. When he was brought before the magistrate, he was asked how it was that he, who was half starving himself, should, nevertheless, share his pittance with a useless animal? The beggar took up in his arms his dog, which fondly licked his face: he wept, and said, "Now I am alone in the world, and if you take from me my poor dog,—who would love me, or care for me?" The magistrate happened to be a feeling man, and allowed him to depart.—Dr J. Mitchell's Lecture on Animal and Vegetable Life in the City of London.

MODES OF LIVING AMONG THE CHINESE.—The modes of living among the Chinese are, of course, very different, according to the rank and wealth of the people; but the extremes of luxury and misery are nowhere more ludicrously contrasted. Those who can afford to purchase rare and expensive delicacies grudge no cost for them, as is proved by the price paid for edible birds' nests (glutinous compositions, formed by a kind of swallow, in vast clusters, found in caves in the Nicobar and other islands), 5,000 dollars being sometimes given for a picul, weight 133 1-3 lbs. In the streets multitudes of men are employed in preparing these for sale, with a pair of tweezers plucking from them every hair, or fibre of feather, or extraneous matter; and, at the same time, carefully preserving the form of the nests, by pushing through them very slender slips of bamboo. Sharks' fins are highly prized, and, when well dried, they fetch a great price. The beche-de-la-mer (a horrid-looking black sea-slug, brought from the Pacific Islands) is also exceedingly esteemed by Chinese epicures. But, while the rich fare thus sumptuously, the mass of the poor subsist on the veriest garbage. The heads of fowls, their entrails, their feet, with every scrap of digestible animal matter, earth worms, sea reptiles of all kinds, rats, and other vermin, are greedily devoured. We have noticed lots of black frogs, in half dozens, tied together, exposed for sale in shallow troughs of water. We have seen the hind quarter of a horse hung up in a butcher's shop, with the recommendation of the whole leg attached. A lodger in our hotel complains that his bed-room being over the kitchen, he is grievously annoyed in the morning by the noises of dogs and cats, which are slaughtering below for the day's consumption—but not at our table. Not a bone nor a green leaf is ever seen in the streets; some use or another is found for everything that would be refuse elsewhere.—Bennet and Tyerman's Voyages and Travels.

Digitized by Google

THE OPERA.—Crowds at this theatre are more profitable to the management than pleasant to those who assist in making them. The pit is intolerably hot when the curtain is down. The opening above the gas chandelier cannot carry off more heat than is produced by the gas itself. This theatre, overtopping all surrounding buildings, and open on all sides, ought to be the best ventilated theatre in London. In addition to the heat, another evil of crowded nights is the necessity of fixedness in one place, which, besides preventing that inter-communication which is one of the pleasures of this theatre, subjects many an unfortunate would-be spectator to an irremediable total eclipse of the stage, behind some of those walls of gauze, lace, silk, velvet, or plumage, which some women, with a selfish disregard of the comfort of others, are in the habit of building on their heads: to say nothing of an occasional square foot of tortoiseshell, professing to be the top of a comb. We derive a malicious pleasure from seeing a female, thus equipped, deprived of the opportunity of annoying. We have surrendered a seat to a simply appareled head, but never to one of these: they deserve no courtesy. It is curious and true, as we have ascertained by repeated observation of the phenomena, that the volume of the head-dress increases in mathematical proportion with the ugliness of the wearer.—Examiner.

CITY CROWS.—A few years ago a crow, with his fair lady, intending to confer upon London the honour of making his progeny genuine native citizens, by being born within the sound of Bow-bell, more securely to effect his object, actually built his nest between the wings of the Dragon, on the top of the steeple, from which, with calm philosophic dignity, he might look down on the scene of human ambition and vanity below. The place was well selected for security, as the head of the Dragon always pointed to the wind, and the two wings protected the nest on each side. The place was sufficiently capacious, for the body of the Dragon is almost as large as a horse. A gentleman, who was more an amateur of projectiles than of ornithology, with much bad taste, amused himself by shooting balls at the crow from an air-gun—but between the wings of the Dragon he sat, and defied the vain attempt. Unfortunately the steeple required repair, and the scaffolding and workmen disturbed the venerable pair, and they took their flight from an ungrateful city, as unworthy of their presence. "Whether it be the same pair," said he, "now arrived at a good old age, or another pair of the same family, I cannot say; but certain it is, that a pair of crows have, this spring, taken up their abode within the city, and built their nest in the top of the lofty plane tree in Wood street, close to Cheapside." The citizens had discovered recently, as well from the claims of lay impropriators, as of the two-and nine-pence-in-the-pound clergy, that the church sometimes gives shelter to characters of very questionable utility. This very last season, a hawk built his nest under the dome of St Paul's, and a similar occurrence took place some forty years ago. A few years ago one of the falcon tribe took his abode a very short distance beyond the city boundaries, in the top of the steeple of Spitalfields' church, to the sad annoyance of the amateurs in that pigeon-fancying neighbourhood. He was often fired at, but without effect. Afterwards, when it became necessary to repair the steeple, the nest was found covered with feathers and bones.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Wild Oats.—The Little Corporal.—Blue Beard.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte.—Neuha's Cave.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Valerie.—Yelva.—Alexis.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Signor Costa.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, M. Emile, M. Antoni, and M. Lefebvre.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Historical Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss Huddart. Anneli, Miss Russell. Agnes, Miss Faucit.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnam, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lutold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr Macready. Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge.
Erni, Mr Cathie. Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke.
Waldman, Mr Hughes. Michael, Mr Cooper. Jaghell, Mr J. Vining.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford, Mr Robinson, Mr Price, and Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Guillaume Tell;' Winter's Overture to 'Tamerlane;' and Lindpaintner's Overture to 'Joko.'

To which will be added,

DEAF AS A POST.

[By Mr POOLE.]

Sophy Walton, Mrs Newcombe. Amy Templeton, Miss E. Absolon.
Sally Maggs, Mrs Orger. Mrs Plumpley, Mrs C. Jones.
Old Walton, Mr W. Bennett. Captain Templeton, Mr Cooper.
Tristram Sappy, Mr Liston. Crupper, Mr Hughes. Gallop, Mr Salter.

To conclude with

THE PORTRAIT OF CERVANTES.

Isabella, Mrs Newcombe. Lucetta, Mrs Orger.
Murillo, Mr Farren. Don Guzman, Mr C. Jones. Don Carlos, Mr J. Vining.
Father Benito, Mr W. Bennett. Scipio, Mr Webster.
Sancho, Mr Liston.

To-morrow, Coriolanus; The Little Corporal; and High Life Below Stairs.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE GIPSY FATHER.

Rose Franklin, Miss E. Tree. Mary Barwell, Mrs Lovell.
Dolly Dolittle, Mrs Tayleure. Clara, Miss Hughes.
Gipsy Woman, Mrs Daly. Lucy, Miss Hunt.
Barwell, Mr Warde. Richard Barwell, Mr G. Bennett.
Simon Salubrious Dolittle, Mr Keeley. Edwards, Mr F. Matthews.
Judge Franklin, Mr Evans. Jem Hartshorn, Mr Meadows.
William and James, Miss P. Horton and Miss Kendall.
First Gipsy, Mr Turnour. Clerk, Mr Irwin. Servant, Mr Heath.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Six Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.

Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.

Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.

Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

To-morrow, Fazio; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Opera of

THE SLAVE.

[By Mr MORTON.]

Zelinda, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'The Mocking Bird,' and 'Pity and protect the Slave.' Stella Clifton, Miss Vincent.
Miss Von Frump, Madame Simon. Mrs Lindenberg, Miss Nicol.
Governor of Surinam, Mr Gough. Colonel Lindenberg, Mr Ede.
Captain Malcolm, Mr Edwin, in which he will sing 'My Native Highland Home,' 'The King, God Bless Him,' and the Duet, 'In joyful peace disarming,' with Miss Somerville. Captain Clifton, Mr Honner. Fogrum, Mr Vale.
Mathew Sharpset, Mr C. Hill. Sam Sharpset, Mr D. Pitt.
Somerdyke, Mr Almar. Secretary, Mr Maitland. Provost, Mr Hobbs.

The Highland Fling, by Mlle. Rosier.

After which the Drama, entitled

LAW AND LIONS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Mrs Mammoth, Mrs C. Hill. Miss Jane, Miss Vincent, in which Character she will sing 'Oh Men, what silly things ye are!'
Mr Suavey, Mr Williams. Mr James, Mr C. Hill. Ensign Pudor, Mr Honner.
Mr James, sen. Mr Almar. Mr Pudor, sen. Mr Gough.
Jemmy Mammoth, Mr Vale. Robert, Mr Lee. Sam Smoothface, Mr Rogers.

A Divertimento on Wheatstone's newly invented Symphonion, by a Gentleman.

To conclude with a New Romantic Drama, called

THE PROPHET OF THE MOOR.

[By Mr ALMAR.]

Catherine Gray, Miss Somerville. Honor Jeykel, Miss Jordan.
Dame Hetty Horner, Miss Nicol. Crazy Ruth, Miss M. C. Poole.
Elkanah White, Mr Osbaldiston. Colonel Launce Leolyn, Mr C. Hill.
Ralph Gayton, Mr Williams. Dwarf Stephen, Mr Almar.
Hal Hardenbrass, Mr Honner. Haveril Horner, Mr Gough.
Master John Horner, Mr Vale. Goliah Goodbody, sen. Mr Asbury.
Goliah Goodbody, jun. Master F. Carbery. Oliver Brown, Mr Lee.
Piers Talbot, Mr Edwin. Joey Stokes, Mr Rogers. Thomas Green, Mr Hobbs.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballet of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

The principal Characters by Mrs Evans, Miss Wells, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Saville, Miss Dix, Mr Keppell, Mr Forrester, Mr Porteus, Mr G. Lejeune, Mr Wilkinson, Mr Spencer, and Mr G. Smith.

After which the admired Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

DELUSIONS.

Charles Eustace, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—J. Cooke's Act of the British Sportsman and the Reaper—Williams's Tourbillions—Equestrianism, by Miss M. A. Cooke—Sir William Button.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—The Lady and the Devil—More Reform.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS' Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPEL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 232.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDESDAY, JUNE 1, 1831.

EXTRAORDINARY MANIFESTO AGAINST THE BISHOPS. *

This is a very singular production, and an extraordinary sign of the times, especially if it proceeds, as it appears to do, from one of the country-gentlemen of old families. We have had Congreve of Congreve in former times, taking liberties with the church; but that was under the licensed mask of comedy, and even then the church rebuked him, and with success. Beverley of Beverley comes boldly forward, pronounces the hierarchy a nuisance, and aims one of the most formidable blows at it that the reader can conceive. The Quarterly Reviewers, and other logical goers upon assumption, will feel themselves in a singular state of emotion at this pamphlet. It thrusts aside all ceremony, and by depriving them of their last conventional resources, reduces them to the necessity of 'not knowing what to think.' Furthermore, it shews that their Review itself cannot be so well received as they still affect to think it. Here is a country-gentleman, one of the 'Squirearchy,' one of their own especial readers and patrons (as they pretend), coming to court among them, pushing all their assumptions away, and saying that neither he nor hundreds of his class believe a syllable of what they say, or will abide by any of their notions. It is just as if some mad wag had come among a dinner of bishops, and with one rush at the table, thrust the whole 'set out' upon the floor, drowning the bishops in the turtle, and the turtle in the bishops.†

If we had not read the postscript to Mr Beverley's letter, we should have been inclined, ourselves, to quarrel with the boldness of his exordium, or rather with what he says of it; for he piques himself upon being more valiant than his friends, and leading a 'forlorn hope against the ecclesiastical batteries.' Now Mr Beverley, however indisputable his courage, does not lead a forlorn hope; nor indeed does he give us to understand as much in other parts of his letter. Many forlorn hopes have been led before him; and what we were going to quarrel with him for, was his talking in this manner, when, if it had not been for these forlorn hopes, and for their long and open daring in less favourable times,—they talking of 'convincing,' while he most probably was talking of 'dining,'—it is likely he might not have come forward as boldly as he does. A spectacle of this nature is sometimes not a little provoking (so far) to the self-love and the smarting wounds of old reformers, who now hear all the world valuing themselves upon triumphs and approaching triumphs, which but for those old and perhaps forgotten soldiers would have been as far off as they were fifty years back. But an honest hope for the many is soon reconciled. It is not to be expected that all should move at once. When they do, there are still hazards or annoyances enough to their new leaders, arising from old habits. Mr Beverley's Postscript very properly alludes to these; and therefore, on closing his pamphlet, the only ground of quarrel we found left with him was of a nature perhaps he would still less expect. It is nevertheless a just one, and a lover of justice ought to be sensible of it. It is simply this,—that he does not make sufficient allowance for the habits in which the beneficed clergy and their friends have been brought up. He treats them too cavalierly, as a parcel of conscious and wilful rogues, forgetting, in spite of his exaltation of Christian charity above Church orthodoxy, that all men are creatures of circumstances; that the clergy have as good a right as any other men to whatever allowances can be made for them; and that if he, with all his better knowledge, and his long secret opinions, has not thought proper to come forward against them till now, he ought to be so much the less severe upon other men, 'tied and bound in the chains' of their worldly advantages.

Premising thus much in justice to justice, whose cause we advocate in common with Mr Beverley, we must observe that his pamphlet affords no ordinary specimen of united vivacity, good sense, boldness, and classical attraction. His style is that of a man of wit and a scholar; his information drawn evidently e secretioribus; his hand has a light air, but its blows are those of a sledge-hammer. The whole spirit of the pamphlet may be described in a word. Everybody knows that there has long been a long story to tell of the corruptions and anti-christianism of the clergy; and here is a man to tell it. Again, however, we must make one remark in dissent. It is on his panegyric upon the Evangelical Clergy. Does Mr Beverley really prefer the spirit of those men, however exemplary their conventional conduct? and would he rather have them for 'overseers' than the bishops? If so, we are not of his mind. We prefer less rigid conduct, with indulgence to others, before the inquisition of the worse anti-christ of unsympathizing severity and bad notions of God. After all, the worst fault we find with our author, is the voluntary insincerity we cannot help suspecting in some of his little 'prudential' touches. It is easy, we know, especially for the insincere, to say that such things are unnecessary. We do not believe it. We believe that nothing is so necessary or so powerful as sincerity, especially when it comes from those who have been thought 'men of the world.'

We have only room for a specimen or so of the pamphlet. The rest of it we must leave to the curiosity which the specimens will excite, and which will be amply justified.

'On some weak minds, perhaps,' observes Mr Beverley, 'the unceasing assurances from the pulpit, that the Church of England is synonymous with the Christian religion, may have made a little impression; and I know some few persons who agree with the majority of the Clergy in their definition of religion. Our reverend pastors present us a strange picture of Christianity in their sermons, their charges, and their tracts. According to their notions, the Apostles, or at least the immediate disciples of the Apostles, were reverend gentlemen, residing on wealthy livings, preaching fifty-two written, printed, or lithographed sermons in the course of the year, and securing livings for their clerical, or commissions in the Roman army, for their military sons. In that golden age, according to their system, all the world was not only taxed by Cæsar, but tithed by Cæsar, for the benefit of the primitive Clergy; and the priests of the first three centuries amused themselves with card-playing, fox-hunting, horse-racing, shooting, fishing, and dancing, as they do at present. Pluralities were multiplied, and translations were frequent. St Paul had a golden prebend of Philippi, a large living at Rome, another at Thessalonica, and was besides "the very reverend" the Dean of Corinth. St Peter was translated from the bishoprick of Babylon to that of Rome; and St James was enthroned at Jerusalem, with great pomp and large lawn sleeves, after having subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles, according to Act of Parliament. St Bartholomew was pressed to take the see of Jericho, but he preferred holding the deanery of Napthali, with the great living of Succoth, which last was of the clear yearly value of 8,000*l.* and besides was encumbered with very little duty, as there were only seven hundred persons in the parish, five hundred of whom did not believe in the Christian religion. St Clement died worth twelve hundred thousand pounds in the Three per Cent. Consols, the careful savings of forty years' episcopacy; and Irenœus, having been a tutor to a consul's son, had the primacy of Rome offered him, which, however, he refused, being content with the bishoprick of Lyons.' . . . . . .

'I have known, and do know, scores of young priestlings, who come warm from the hot-beds of the Universities. A mighty sensation they make amongst the good Christians in some country town or village; but no one inquires what they have done hitherto in their zeal for Christ, nor what they are likely to do for the time to come. But let me tell these good Christians what they have done, up to the moment that they entered into holy orders. They led the life of jovial debauchees at the University; they hunted, poached, frequented the stews, got drunk, broke lamps and windows, gave the Proctors a run, contracted enormous debts, drove tandems to London, slanged, swore, smoked, fought, roared, and rioted all the time that they were preparing themselves for the ministry of Christ's religion. But, your Grace will demand of me, how could they commit all these excesses, and yet pay sufficient attention to their academical and divinity studies? Allow me to assure your

* A Letter to his Grace the Archbishop of York on the Present Corrupt State of the Church of England. By R. M. Beverley, Esq. | pp. 41. Sixth Edition. (Printed at Beverley in Yorkshire.)

† 'Stubbs and I fell in the mud,' quoth the merry prelate Hall, speaking of his fat chaplain:—'Stubbs was up to his elbows in mire, and I was up to my elbows in Stubbs.'

Digitized by Google

Grace, that the most distinguished scholars are frequently men of profligate habits,—but that, for all ordinary purposes of academical examination, sobriety of conduct is not in the slightest degree requisite, unless a man is a perfect dunce. Your Grace has, doubtless, heard of the process of CRAM; and it is by this process that they prepare the young wolves who are intended to devour the flock of Christ. Paley's 'Evidences of Christianity,' some works of Beausobre, Grotius, Tomline's 'Theology,' the Greek of the Greek Testament, the dates and geography of the Old Testament, a Latin theme, and a little more of such religious dainties, are easily crammed down the throats of future Priests, to be inwardly digested till they are brought to light again by the stomach-pump of your Grace's chaplain.'

Mr Beverley reminds his readers of the meaning of the word Bishop (Episcopus) which is Overseer. His business, he says, in a great word of capital letters, is to WORK, and to get a reputation for apostolical simplicity; not to be a lord, and get rich. He therefore, in anticipation of what he thinks will inevitably be done before long, proposes to sweep away the whole bench of sacred Barons; to resume the possession of Church-property; and put the Church of England on a footing with all the 'other sects.'

'If a question,' he concludes, 'be raised as to the political management of Church-property, it seems that great benefit might accrue to the state, if a sale of it were to take place, according to some fair and equitable arrangement. Suppose, for instance, that all who now pay tithes to spiritual persons for spiritual purposes, should be compelled to purchase a perpetual release, by paying a ten years' income of the tithe to Government. Thus, if a person paid 100*l.* per annum in tithe, he would have to pay 1,000*l.* to Government, and be released for ever from any future payment. Surely the tithe-payers would not much complain of such an arrangement; but if the Clergy should complain, I answer, that all present incumbents should be allowed to retain their benefices for life, by which means no person in possession would be at all injured; and as for those future parsons who are not yet in being, it cannot be said that they who do not exist would be injured by such an arrangement: for no one hereafter would take holy orders who did not know what he had to expect. . . . . .

'If the Church-property be taken at five millions per annum, (though some rate it much higher) there would by this scheme be paid fifty millions sterling to Government, deducting a certain sum for purchasing an ample landed estate, for the perpetual repair and ornament of the cathedrals.'

Mr Beverley is for keeping the cathedrals in good condition, both from admiration of them as structures, and in behalf of such Christianity as may hereafter be preached in them: upon which point, and on both these accounts, we heartily accord with him.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. II.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

R. WESTALL, R.A. AND T. PHILLIPS, R.A.

THE first picture that presents itself to the eye—the No. 1, of the Catalogue—is 'Margaret at Church, tormented by the Evil One.' It is introduced by the following lines, which form part of Lord Leveson Gower's translation of Goethe's Faust:—

'Evil One. The glorified are turning
Their foreheads from thee.
The holy shun
To join their hands in thine.
Despair! Despair!
'Margaret. Help me! I faint!'

Had we entertained any doubt as to the quality of Mr Westall's picture, these vapid verses, which form the original of the painting, must have determined our opinion. Surely nothing more feeble or prosaic than this could come even from a lord. If the German were no better than the Englishman, he ought to be crowned with foolscap, and burned in effigy. But he is a very different person. Let the reader look at Mr Shelley's version of his 'May-day Night,' and he will see that the Baron Goethe (a pity he should be a Baron!) is as little like the small weak person who is reflected in Lord Leveson Gower's glass, as the admirers of poetry can desire. He is wild, ghastly, powerful, and imaginative. There is no clipping, or squaring, or emasculating words, with him. All is full of downright meaning. Look, he says—

'How, clift by clift, rocks bend and lift
Their fawning foreheads as we go:
The giant-snouted crags, ho, ho!
How they snort and how they blow!'

These are not lines to be scribbled with a crow-quill on hot-pressed paper.

Mr Westall's pictures are but too much like the young Lord's translation from Faust. They bear the same resemblance to Nature, that Lord Leveson Gower does to the great genius of Weimar. They want the truth of the original,—and wanting the truth, they want the beauty, the sublimity, the attraction which Nature beyond all other things possesses. The 'Evil One,' in the picture of Mr Westall, is nothing more than a copy, manufactured from a dozen originals; or rather it is the result or offspring of the artist's memory, in which a dozen images, each with some resemblance to this figure, are carefully hoarded, to be used as occasion requires. We are loth to say anything unpleasant of Mr Westall, who is, we believe, a very amiable man, and—strange as it may seem—is understood to be a good judge of ancient art. But truth-telling is our province, and to that all other things must bend. Mr Westall's 'Evil One' is a mere nursery monster. It has staring eyes, knitted brows, a mouth compressed, and arms cast abroad, like the sails of a windmill. There is no meaning in his face,—none of that terrific concentred meaning that we can imagine to belong to the emissary of Satan. His strength would not lie in his sinews, but in his eye, in his smile—

'I see his face;
He frowns on others, but he smiles on me!'—The Cenci.

But it is easier to paint the heels than the head, and accordingly, we now-a-days expend our strength upon the limbs and muscles of man, and leave his head to take care of itself. This is not the vice of Mr Westall alone, but of almost every other artist, as we have said, and may have occasion to shew hereafter.

Margaret is—we are obliged to say—as common-place and indifferent a personage as her tormenter. She is merely an Academy figure, thrown into an ungraceful, and we should think a very uncomfortable position. Her limbs may be tolerably drawn, her flesh indifferently well-painted; but where is the soul of despair, which should, even in painting, gleam from her eyes? Where is the horror-struck and astonished visage which such an encounter would produce? Where, in short, are all the natural and touching consequences which would spring from such an event, and which it is the duty of the painter to exhibit? We exclaim, 'where?'—and the Echo answers, 'where?'

The remainder of Mr Westall's pictures merely provoke a repetition of these remarks. No. 33, represents another scene from the same subject; No. 234, a Holy Family; both equally deficient in the same higher qualities of art.

The next name of note that occurs is at No. 6, where we find 'A Portrait of Wilson Patten, Esq. by T. Phillips, R.A.'—Mr Phillips is simply a portrait-painter. He has made one or two alarming deviations from his course; but his 'profession' being that of a portrait-painter only, we shall forbear to record the eminent failures of which he has been guilty. These—like the capriccios of musicians—may be excused for being wanting in taste and meaning, provided the artist be found famous in his regular path of art. Let us see how this is, in respect to Mr Phillips. Previously to the death of Sir Thomas Lawrence, he was spoken of confidently as only second to that courtly artist; and his elevation to the President's chair was prophesied by more than one admirer. We are not inveterate admirers of Sir Thomas Lawrence's works; and we confess, should have contemplated Mr Phillips's exaltation without spleen. He is as worthy to succeed Sir Thomas Lawrence, as Sir Thomas himself was to sit in the chair of Sir Joshua Reynolds. There is, moreover,—although as an artist we must on the whole consider him inferior—less of the meretricious in the works of Phillips than in those of Lawrence. The latter exhibited more expression, and generally more grace—but the grace was conventional, and we are not quite sure that it always made amends for the simplicity that frequently distinguishes Mr Phillips's portraits. To say the truth, we have a little bias, perhaps, in favor of Mr Phillips, by reason of his being almost the only (we believe the only) English artist who has publicly done justice to the great merits of Hogarth. This argues a sensible mind, and is enough to extenuate a hundred defects, supposing that Mr Phillips possessed them, which we do not allow. In regard to his portraits in the present Exhibition, there are several which appear to us to be good, and amongst others we may refer to one of the Earl of Winchilsea (No. 24). The portrait of Dr Sleath (No. 165) is indifferent enough; but that of Mr Phipson, besides being better painted, reminds us pleasantly of Mr Southey. Although the countenance exhibits less intellect, it has more amenity, than that furious but clever anti-Reformer's face possesses. Poor Southey! We saw him a few months ago, in a public place in London, with a face as melancholy as the month, (it was November) with a cloud of hair that had grown almost white, and eyes that seemed to have forsaken their once fierce meaning, and subsided into softness—such as, we may imagine, they possessed before their master left off 'commercing' with the muse, and turned from poetry to polemics. We half forgave him his political faults.

[No. III, will contain NEWTON, CALCOTT, and CHALON.]

OCCULTATION OF JUPITER AND HIS SATELLITES.—This remarkable phenomenon took place this morning. It was one of the most interesting among the heavenly movements visible on earth for the year.—The bright limb of the moon came in contact first with the 4th satellite, then with the 2nd; the immersion of the planet then occurred about eight minutes after one; the moon afterwards proceeded to the 1st satellite, and finally the 3rd was obscured. At emersion the 4th was first visible, then the 2nd; the planet next reappeared at fourteen minutes after two, and afterwards the 1st, and finally the 3rd satellite, emerged from behind the moon's dark limb. During the occultation, the 1st and 2nd satellites approached a little nearer to their primary, and the 3rd and 4th receded a little farther off.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea.—Kenilworth.
DRURY-LANE.—William Tell.—Deaf as a Post.—The Portrait of Cervantes.
COVENT-GARDEN.—The Gipsy Father.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COVENT GARDEN,

THE Grand Historical Spectacle, relating to Napoleon, was preceded last night by a new 'Drama, with music, in two acts,' entitled the Gipsy Father, and attributed to the pen of a lady well-known in the fashionable circles of literature. We have not seen the books which have given the fair author her reputation; and we are sorry to say, that the present piece affords us no light on the subject. We thought at first it was going to be entirely humourous. The exordium introduced us to a facetious apothecary, Mr Simon Salubrious Dolittle (KEELEY) who piqued himself on his born genius for pills,—to his apprentice Jem Hartshorn (MEADOWS) whom he told to 'keep pounding,'—and to Mistress Dolly Dolittle his wife, who coaxed him for a bonnet, and was always saying, 'James is so funny.' We feared that this cant phrase was ominous for James; but we saw very little either of him or his mistress afterwards. Even KEELEY had little to do, compared with what was expected of him; and on one account we were not sorry for it, as he talked a great deal too much, and with little ceremony, of pills and physic-taking,—a ground of the jocose, not very pleasant, we think, in any author, and particularly disagreeable in a female one. Furthermore, the jokes were not good in themselves. The highest flight was to say, that somebody had a 'castor-oil countenance.' In only one instance did we recognize any symptom of the style hereditary. It was where the doctor, lamenting the dearth of diseases in his neighbourhood, consoled himself with a report that there was 'a promising little typhus in the next village.'

All on a sudden, the piece became profoundly serious and melodramatic; and with little exception continued so to the end. The man who gives the piece its title (WARD) is a farmer, who has joined a set of gipsies in consequence of having been ruined, with his wife and family, and his wife's old father, for having 'one day knocked down a hare, which was called poaching.' He joins our old friends in vain, for they have nothing to give him but a little piece of bread (which for gipsies is not quite the thing); and the consequence is, that he returns home, and we are presented with the spectacle of the starving family, great and small. We now thought the authoress was going to make us repent for our misgivings, by reading the public a fine seasonable lecture on the hardships of the suffering poor. All which the Irish poor had suffered, and all which they are now horribly suffering, and all which the SHERIDANS and SWIFTS had done for them, and our contemporaries have not done, came pouring into our minds, and we were ready to kiss the fair writer's hands in imagination, not for being (as we understand they are) among the fairest in the world, but because they were among the kindest. And very likely they are so; but if her intentions were of this nature in the present instance, they sadly overshot their mark, for while we looked for nothing from the audience but sympathy and tears, the man was made to shock them by seizing his wife's old father in a fit of frenzy, and proceeding to turn him out of doors, for eating more than his share of bread from the children. The old man's daughter at this seizes a knife, and stabs her husband, and at this instant the son (BENNET) comes in, and the first act closes with a theatrical situation of horror! Here was a fine spectacle, but the sympathy was gone; and many of the spectators cried 'Off!'

This false style continued to the end. A real ground of sympathy was swallowed up in horrors, and violence, and unnecessary strainings after heroism. The father is thought to have been killed; the mother is thrown into prison; the son accuses himself of parricide, to save his mother; and not content with substituting this pleasant chance for her after-misery in the place of a reasonable chance for her life, he must needs go and gratuitously shock a young lady, with his false accusation, who had been bred up with him in humbler life, and acquired a love for him. (Miss ELLEN TREE, by the way performed this character admirably, and with genuine pathos.) Meanwhile, it turns out, of course, that the father is not dead; and so when the trial is about to commence, the mother rushes in with a scream, and says so; and the young lady, we suppose, is permitted to marry the son for his virtue; and 'they all live very happy afterwards.'

Now all this is neither of a healthy taste, nor useful, nor sensitive, nor clever: and we heartily hope that the next time we have to record a dramatic production of the fair author's, she will have seen her mistake, and enable us to make a criticism, at least more comfortable to ourselves, if of no consequence to her.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.—Lord F. Levison Gower entertained a large party of fashionables on Monday night, at Bridgewater House, when a Play was given on the occasion. A stage was fitted up at the end of the splendid picture-gallery. The scenery was very beautiful, and is said to have been painted by one of the Covent Garden artists. Miss Fanny Kemble performed on the occasion; the rest of the characters were sustained by the Nobility.

— The Italian Opera House was on Saturday evening the fullest of the season, presenting an assemblage of elegant females, attired in the splendid dresses and diamonds, worn by them in honour of the King's birth-day.

— Mr Kemble is at present in Paris, catering for a second splendid dramatic spectacle; rumour says the Citizen King will form the subject, and some of the events of the Three Days of July will be introduced to give effect to the piece.—Sun.

— To-day is the birth-day of Nicholas Poussin. Our landscape-painting readers ought to toast him.

— In the library of the Collegiate Church of Constance, may be seen a chronology from Adam to Constantine. Among other curious things, it is recorded that Eve at the accouchement of her first born, was attended by two midwives.

— The captain of a privateer writing to his owners an account of an engagement, felicitated them on the general safety of his crew, 'having had only one of his hands shot through the nose.'

— From the number of clerical attendants at some of the late Levees and Drawing-rooms, a natural suspicion arises as to the state of health of some of the Church Dignitaries.

— If it be true that it is determined to convert Buckingham Palace into a National Gallery, it is not improbable but that the treasures in the British Museum will be placed there also.—Daily Paper.

— A gentleman who writes to the Glasgow Chronicle, describing some experimental trips made by a new steam-carriage on Mr Gurney's plan, which is about to start between Glasgow and Paisley, remarks on the apparent astonishment of the village-curs, which, on hearing the rattling of the carriage-wheels as they passed through, came out barking as usual, but slunk off with their tails lowered, on finding no horses' heels to bark at!

— An evening paper, in commenting on the labours of the parochial authorities in collecting the Population returns on Monday, says, "In many cases they found it difficult to obtain any return at all—the papers were, in many instances, lost, mislaid, or forgotten; and, in many more, from their apparent complexity, not well understood. In one instance, a letter-out of donkeys described himself as a 'capitalist;' and, in another, a seller of cat's-meat, whose shop consists of a barrow, with more reason, claimed to be set down as a 'retail trader.' No doubt, many ludicrous scenes occurred; but, upon the whole, the result is likely to prove a sickener to the Malthusians."

BIRD'S NEST ON BOARD SHIP.—As some boys were playing on board the Active in Bridport harbour, they discovered on the ceiling of the cabin a swallow's nest, with the bird sitting on five eggs; the birds were not disturbed, and continued their attentions as if in the greatest privacy.—Hampshire Advertiser.

STYLE.—It is remarked by anatomists, that the nutritive quality is not the only requisite in food; that a certain degree of distension of the stomach is required, to enable it to act with its full powers; and that it is for this reason hay and straw must be given to horses, as well as corn, in order to supply the necessary bulk. Something analogous to this takes place with respect to the generality of minds, which are incapable of thoroughly digesting and assimilating what is presented to them, however clearly, in a very small compass. Many a one is capable of deriving that instruction from a moderate sized volume, which he could not receive from a very small pamphlet, even more perspicuously written, and containing everything that is to the purpose. It is necessary that the attention should be detained for a certain time on the subject; and persons of unphilosophical mind, though they can attend to what they read or hear, are unapt to dwell upon it in the way of subsequent meditation.—Dr Whateley's Rhetoric.

A PRETTY PICTURE.

In petticoat of green,
Her hair about her een,
Phillis beneath an oak
Sat milking her fair flock.
'Mongst that sweet-strained moisture (rare delight!)
Her hand seem'd milk, in milk it was so white.

Drummond.

Digitized by Google

LONDON SPARROWS.—At a late lecture on 'Animal and Vegetable Life in London,' delivered by Dr J. Mitchell at the London Literary and Scientific Institution, he stated that the London sparrows were often as sooty and black as chimney-sweepers. Their favourite abode for building their nests is within the foliage of the capitals of Corinthian columns and pilasters. He stated, that they also build within the mouth of the lion on the top front of Northumberland-house. The benevolence of some, and the cruelty of others, placed pots on the sides of houses for their reception. Dr Johnson marks with his abhorrence one man who did this. The sparrows, not knowing the character of the man with whom they had to deal, built their nests in his pots. It was disgusting to hear the fellow express his delight at the prospect of making pies of their young.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our welcome correspondent AGIS will have had the best answer to the questions he put to us (which we did not see till afterwards) in the insertion of his Fragment. We allude to his first letter. In answer to the question in his second, we have to observe, that the improvements in our journal were always intended to take place, on our first convenience.

We regret that circumstances have hitherto prevented our noticing a letter we received on the 17th ult., from the author of the Emissary, handsomely disclaiming any merit in the lines we quoted with approbation from that play, and assigning them to their real author.

The memorial transmitted for us by J. H., is justly valued by him; but it required the occasion to give it the due effect.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

CORIOLANUS.

Romans.—Volumnia, Miss Huddart. Virgilia, Miss Faucit.
Valeria, Mrs Newcombe. Servilia, Mrs Webster.
Caius Marcius, Mr Macready. Young Marcius, Miss Marshall.
Menenius Agrippa, Mr Dowton. Cominius, Mr H. Wallack.
Sicinius Velutus, Mr Thompson. Junius Brutus, Mr Younge.
Citizens, Mr Webster, Mr Ross, Mr Howard, and Mr Honner.
Fulvius, Mr C. Jones. Appius, Mr Cooke.
Volscians.—Sextus, Mr Howell. Lucius, Mr Cathie.
Tullus Aufidius, Mr Cooper. Volusius, Mr J. Vining.

In the course of the Evening, Cherubini's Overture to 'Anacreon;' Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni;' and Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi.'

After which, a petite Historical Drama, called

THE LITTLE CORPORAL, OR THE SCHOOL OF BRIENNE.

Josephine, Miss Crawford.
The Minister of War, Mr Cooke. The Principal of the Academy, Mr C. Jones.
Egidius, Mr Younge. Patrault, Mr Thompson. Buonaparte, Miss Poole.
Bourienne, Darbel, Delestrade, Duhasset, Masters Cathie, Richardson, Hildrew, and Fenton.
Captain Morel, Mr Andrews.

To conclude with the Farce of

HIGH LIFE BELOW STAIRS.

[By the Rev. J. TOWNLY.]
Kitty, Mrs Waylett. Lady Bab's Maid, Mrs Orger.
Lady Charlotte's Maid, Miss Crawford. Cook, Mrs Broad. Cloe, Mrs Webster.
Lovel, Mr Cooper. Freeman, Mr Howard. Philip, Mr Andrews.
Tom, Mr Tayleure. Duke's Servant, Mr Vining. Sir Harry's Servant, Mr Harley.
Kingston, Mr Eaton. Coachman, Mr Fenton. Robert, Mr Honner.

To-morrow, The Jealous Wife; the Diorama; and Der Freischutz.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Taylor. Clara, Miss Phillips.
Bianca, Miss F. Kemble. Giraldi Fazio, Mr Warde.
Duke of Florence, Mr Egerton. Bartolo, Mr Blanchard.
Philario, Mr Henry. Falsetto, Mr Parry. Gonsalvo, Mr Baker.
Theodore, Mr Mears. Keeper, Mr Cooper. Pietro, Mr Turnour.
Gentleman, Mr Irwin. Antonio, Mr Heath. Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Six Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

To-morrow, The Gipsy Father; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters:—

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE QUAKER ET LA DANSEUSE.

Vaudeville Nouveau en Un Acte, par MM. SCRIBE et PAUL DUPONT.
Miss Georgina Barlow, Mlle. Léontine Fay.
James Morton, M. Laporte. Arthur d'Arsie, M. Alfred.
Murray, M. Paulin. Toby, M. Gamard. Un Domestique, M. Granville.
Solo de Violoncelle, par M. George.
'Una Voce Poco Fa,' par Mme. Raimbault, 'Lavoix de ce qu'on aime,' et par 'La Leçon de Tyrolienne.'

Suivi de

UNE FAUTE.

Drame en Deux Actes, Mêle de Couplets, par M. SCRIBE.
Léonie, Mlle. Léontine Fay. Madame Darmentieres, Mme. Prêval.
Josephine, Mlle. Florval. Ernest de Villevallier, M. Alfred.
Between the First and Second Acts of 'Une Faute,' Un Air varié sur le Violon, M. A. Tolbecque.
Description du Carnival de Venise, par Mme. Meesi, et 'L'Orage.'
A Favorite Duo, by Mme. Meric Lalande and Sig. Lablache.

On finira par

LES PREMIERES AMOURS.

Vaudeville Nouveau en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
D'Emmeline, Mlle. Léontine Fay.
Charles, M. Laporte. M. Dervière, M. Cloup. M. de Rainville, M. Alfred.
Lapière, M. Guenée.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.
Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar,
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

A Favorite Dance by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble, Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubbs, Mr Webb.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballet of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

The principal Characters by Mrs Evans, Miss Wells, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Saville, Miss Dix, Mr Keppell, Mr Forrester, Mr Porteus, Mr G. Lejeune, Mr Wilkinson, Mr Spencer, and Mr G. Smith.

After which the admired Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

DELUSIONS.

Charles Eustace, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr Harroway.
The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Miss Ayres.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

MASSINGER'S Comedy of

NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.

Sir Giles Overreach, Mr Kean.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—J. Cooke's Act of the British Sportsman and the Reaper—Williams's Tourbillions—Equestrianism, by Miss M. A. Cooke—Sir William Button.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—The Lady and the Devil—More Reform.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS' Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPEL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNETT, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 233.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1831.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF RANK AND TALENT.*

ATHERTON is one of the most agreeable novels which have come from the pen of this fertile and lively writer. The materials are not very new: the plot is old (that of a son deprived of his birthright, and represented by an interloper): but the interest, which is of an old order too (the Newgate-Calendar species) and as much thumbed as the Newgate-Calendar itself, has acquired a gloss by the mode of treating it; the characters are various, and well-sustained; and the remarks, and suggestions of thought, on mankind, far surpass what is to be found in most of the novels of the day. There was always a superior tone of thinking, as well as of style, in this author's productions; but he used to tire us with the unceasing levity of his manner, and sometimes to provoke us by a certain moral dispassionateness on all subjects, looking not so much like impartiality as insensibility. There is great improvement, in this respect, in the volumes before us. The author has shewn that he can be grave as well as gay,—that he can have faith in something, as well as a joke for most things. Nay, he has given us what is too often a desideratum in novels of the first order,—a good honest, candid, warm-hearted heroine, who is in love and dares to say so, and who says it admirably well too, in a style as fit as the occasion. There is such a dearth of natural flesh-and-blood heroines in novels,—we mean of women equally removed from cant and coldness,—that we have often been tempted to think of writing a novel, on purpose to see if we could not give a better specimen. We have been tempted to exclaim, like Sir Anthony, 'I'll marry the girl myself.' But we had much better pursue our vocation, and criticize.

Our author's lover is not quite so good, quoad the passion. He is able to abstract the idea of himself a little too much from that of his mistress; but the foundation of his love is of the best sort, and we have hearty belief in it:—

'He loved her with a sentiment of strong moral approbation. He saw in all her conduct and demeanour a most exquisite propriety, not merely the substance of goodness, but also the form of gracefulness; and love occupied his thoughts, and dwelt in his soul, not as a selfish passion, but as an involuntary admiration of goodness and moral beauty.'

We believe with most people, perhaps a little more strongly than our author does, that the very best love has a hearty desire to possess what it loves; but we do no more believe that it is impossible to love without any prospect of return, than we believe it impossible to admire roses or the sky. There is indeed some sort of return in the very fact of loving and admiring. The charm we admire is in some measure reflected upon us; and we know that we do admire, and are capable of admiring. But where there are loveable and admirable qualities, it is idle to say we cannot like them for their own sakes,—otherwise they would not be what they are.

If Atherton had been as good throughout, and as probable, as it is up to page 42 of the second volume, we are not sure that it would not have taken its stand as a lasting work. There is that tone in it of natural manners and natural writing, which argues for duration. But all on a sudden the author, perhaps tiring of his task, allows himself to get improbable,—not outrageously so, according to what is considered outrageous in novels,—but quite enough to make us regret the mortal condescension; his events accommodate themselves to his convenience. The hero, like almost every hero on record but Tom Jones, has in view the unknown gentleman who is to make a book out of his adventures, and blinds himself to measures which he ought to take, purely in order to help his biographer to a third volume. There is no reason why Atherton should submit himself, as he does, to the Major in Madeira, or why he should not have endeavoured to get explanations from him, or from others, on this and twenty occasions. But he interests us nevertheless: and the interest increases to the end, in spite of improbability, and though an old novel-reader sees all that is coming. It is right to state, at the same time, that much of the perplexity induced by the mysterious Major is skilfully and probably wrought up, as far as the murder is concerned; and the catastrophe of his killing his own son instead of the hero is well conceived and executed. Nicholson, the conceited, presumptuous, timid attorney, is capitally done. So is the old citizen, Bryant, at the beginning of the novel:—

'Mr Bryant was a neat, quiet, orderly sort of a man, regular as clock-work, and steady as time, the very pink of punctuality, and the essence of exactness. He had been in business nearly forty years, in the same shop, conducted precisely in the same style as in the days of his predecessors; he lacked not store of clothes or change of wigs, but his clothes and wigs and three-cornered hats were so like each other, that they seemed, as it were, part of himself. His wig was brown, so were his coat and waistcoat, which were nearly of equal length. He wore short breeches with paste buckles. He was most intensely and entirely a citizen. He loved the city with undivided attachment. He loved the sound of its bells, and the noise of its carts and coaches; he loved the color of its mud, and the canopy of its smoke; he loved the November fogs, and enjoyed its street musicians and its itinerant merchants; he loved all the institutions, civil and religious; he thought there was wisdom in nothing else; he loved the church and he loved the steeple, and the parson who did the duty, and the parson who did not do the duty; and he loved the clerk, and the sexton, and the parish beadle, with his broad gold-laced hat, and cane of striking authority; and he loved the watchmen, and their drowsy drawl of "past umph o'clock;" he loved the charity-schools, and admired beyond all the sculpture of Phidias, or the marble miracles of the Parthenon, the two full-length statues about three feet each in length, and two feet six inches in breadth, representing a charity boy and a charity girl, standing over the door of the parish school; he loved the city companies, their halls, their balls, though he never danced at them, their dinners, for he never missed them; and above all companies he loved the Stationers', and its handsome barge, and its glorious monopoly of almanacs; he loved the Lord Mayor and the Mansion-house,—it was not quite so black then, as it is now,—and he loved the great lubberly state coach, and the little gingerbread sheriffs' coaches; and loved the aldermen and common council-men and liverymen. He knew of nothing, thought of nothing, and could conceive of nothing more honourable, more dignified, or more desirable, than a good business properly attended to.'—Vol. I. p. 6.

Wilkes and Dr Johnson are introduced in these volumes, both very well, the latter in particular. The author, we think, has done him justice; and has the right relish both of his style and character. He makes him abrupt yet attentive, superstitious yet full of admirable good sense, dictatorial but kindly. Here is a bit of dinner of him, that might have been found in Boswell:—

'It was tolerably manifest during dinner-time, that Mr Boswell was afraid that the doctor was not in a humour to shew off. Mr Robert Bryant, who knew the lexicographer's feelings on such occasions, was most anxiously fearful lest there should be to the doctor's eye any appearance of a wish to shew him to the company; and he was also very careful to avoid any political topic, or any mention of the name of Wilkes. Very few words were spoken during dinner, and those few were merely words of business, and not addressed to the doctor. The whole party seemed to be dining with a tame lion, who would not eat them all up if they behaved themselves properly. At length there appeared symptoms of an oracle. Dr Johnson laid down his knife and fork. Mr Boswell pricked up his ears, and looked round to the company, as much as to say "Attention!" "Mrs Bryant," said the doctor, "your apple-pies are excellent."

'After dinner the whole attention of the company was directed to the great man, who did not seem inclined to open his mouth, and none of the party seemed to have wit or courage to open it for him. Nobody dared to speak but in an under-tone of voice, and the doctor himself, as if imagining there was no antagonist present, over whom victory would be glorious, sat long in solemn silence. Mr Boswell fidgetted in his seat, and twenty times was on the brink of making a speech, but as often his wits unfortunately failed him. The worthy draper and his guests were beginning to fear that the whole concern was a failure, and that they might as well, and per-

* Atherton. A Tale of the Last Century. By the Author of "Rank and Talent," &c. In Three Volumes. 8vo. Simpkin and Marshall.

Digitized by Google

haps better, have dined without Dr Johnson, when by accident Mr Boswell aroused the dormant energy of his friend.

'Mention was made, amidst the mutterings of their commonplace talk, of a Mr Vernon, a great West-India proprietor. Dr Johnson spoke highly of Mr Vernon.

'"But Sir," said Mr Boswell, "you do not approve of slavery."

'"No, Sir," roared the doctor (and the company were delighted to hear him roar) "I do not approve of slavery; but I love Vernon."

'"And yet Mr Vernon is a great owner of slaves," replied Mr Boswell.

'"So much the better for them," said the doctor; "and if I were a slave, and could choose my master, Vernon should be the man."

'"Yes, Sir," answered Mr Boswell, "for if you were Mr Vernon's slave, he would not set you to work in the plantations; he would be too happy in the pleasure of your conversation to drive you to bodily labour. You would be his companion rather than his slave."

'"Sir," said the doctor, "there is as much slavery in being compelled to talk as in being compelled to work."

'"But Mr Vernon," replied Mr Boswell, "would not compel you to talk."

'"Why no, Sir," replied Johnson, rather wearisomely, "he might not use the whip, and compel me to do so; but he might provoke me by talking nonsense." '—Vol. I, p. 148.

MATTHEW GREEN'S POEMS.

THE SPLEEN.

It is extraordinary how much merit may remain generally unknown, and yet be easily accessible. Green's works, for instance, are included in all collections of British Poets, and have besides received the commendations of critics of reputation,—Dr Aikin, Melmoth, Campbell, and Hazlitt; notwithstanding which, his works are not only less known than they deserve, but less even than those of many of his inferiors. In Mr Gorton's 'Biographical Dictionary,'—where the reader will do well to look when he wishes to find satisfactorily condensed the diffuse information of preceding biographers,—Green is said to have been the son of reputable parents, dissenters; and that he held a place in the Customs. He is described as a man of great probity and sweetness of disposition, and in conversation abounding with wit of the most inoffensive kind. His learning was very moderate, extending not beyond a little Latin. Of this he takes advantage in his poem on 'The Spleen,' to vindicate his originality:—

'The child is genuine; you may trace,
Throughout, the sire's transmitted face;
Nothing is stol'n: my muse, though mean,
Draws from the spring she finds within.
* * * *
School helps I want, to climb on high,
Where all the ancient treasures lie,
And there, unseen, commit a theft
On wealth, in Greek exchequers left.
Then where? from whom? what can I steal,
Who only with the moderns deals?'

This poem of 'The Spleen' was written as a counteraction to low spirits, to which he was subject. Some specimens, gathered here and there, will shew that he had in him the very best elements of cheerfulness,—sterling sense, wit, and a nice perception of the ludicrous. In furtherance of the object of his poem, he recommends temperate diet, and all sorts of exercise, and very felicitously illustrates the benefits of the latter, by recalling to the reader's recollection, without direct allusion, the encounter of David with Goliah,—

'Fling but a stone, the giant dies.'

Like all wise men, he knew that there was 'a time to laugh,' and knowing also that laughter was an excellent remedy for the spleen, he brings together, in the following lines, some capital provocatives. If his allusion to the dissenter be thought a little awry from propriety, it may be fairly ascribed to early tight-lacing.

'Since mirth is good in this behalf,
At some particulars let us laugh.
Witlings, brisk fools, curs'd with half sense,
That stimulates their impotence;
Who buz in rhyme, and, like blind flies,
Err with their wings, for want of eyes;
Poor authors worshipping a calf,
Deep tragedies that make us laugh,
A strict dissenter saying grace,
A lecturer preaching for a place,
A miser starving to be rich,
The prior of Newgate's dying speech,
Disdainful prudes, who ceaseless ply
The superb muscle of the eye,
A coquet's April-weather face,
A Queenborough-mayor behind his mace,
And fops in military shew,
Are sovereign for the case in view.'

As everybody likes 'to provide against a rainy day,' the following passage will be its own recommendation:—

'In rainy days keep double guard,
Or Spleen will surely be too hard;
Which, like those fish by sailors met,
Fly highest, while their wings are wet.
In such dull weather, so unfit
To enterprize a work of wit,
When clouds one yard of azure sky,
That's fit for simile, deny,
I dress my face with studious looks,
And shorten tedious hours with books.
But if dull fogs invade the head,
That memory minds not what is read,
I sit in window, dry as ark,
And on the drowning world remark:
Or to some coffee-house I stray
For news, the manna of a day,
And from the hip'd discourses gather,
That politics go by the weather.'

The following lines are characteristic of the practical good sense for which we have given him credit, and also of his prudential habits:—

'I never game, and rarely bet,
Am loth to lend, or run in debt.
No compter-writs me agitate;
Who moralizing pass the gate,
And there mine eyes on spendthrifts turn,
Who vainly o'er their bondage mourn.
Wisdom, before beneath their care,
Pays her upbraiding visits there,
And forces folly through the grate
Her panegyric to repeat.
This view, profusely when inclin'd,
Enters a cavent in the mind:
Experience join'd with common sense,
To mortals is a providence.'

Here we close the volume for the present; perhaps another day we may give a specimen or two more.

MUSIC.

'They have given thee to another.' A Ballad written and composed by George Linley, Esq. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

The melody of this ballad and its accompaniment are admirably in character with the words; the first couplet of which may be received as a specimen of their united excellence:—

'They have given thee to another,
They have broken every vow;
They have given thee to another,
And my heart is lonely now.'

'Wipe it up,' said my uncle Toby, 'and say no more about it.'

New Fantasia, on Subjects selected from the favourite Opera, 'La Fiancée,' and dedicated to Auber by his friend John Cramer. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

After an introduction of a spirited and elegant nature, in the key of 3 flats common time, the first movement consists of a charming little romance. This is followed by a Tyrolienne in the key of A 3 sharps, and the whole piece concludes with a Scherzando in the original key.

The selection is well adapted for school exercise, and it is likely to be as favourite as it will be a serviceable lesson.

British Museum.—Our reading readers will be glad to hear, that the reading-room of the Museum is now open on Saturdays as well as during the rest of the week. The tautology of this sentence will be forgiven for its good news.

— A Scotch anti-Reformer, it is said, lately carried his prejudices so far, as to refuse to take two ponies which had been ordered for him, merely because they were grey. 'I detest everything that has the name of Grey,' said this rational being.

Napoleon.—A Correspondent sends us the following extract from a paper:—'Prophetically indeed did Napoleon say, "You will see that in a short time the English will cease to hate me. So many of them have been, and are in France, where they will hear the truth, that they will produce a revolution of opinion in England. I will leave it to them to justify me, and I have no doubt about the result."—Barry O'Meara's Voice from St Helena, vol. I, p. 128.—Is not this true, as well as prophetic? There are not less, we believe, than five dramatic pieces at this moment on the English stage, of which he is the hero.'

Abernethiana.—The late Mr Abernethy would never permit his patients to talk much. He could not succeed in silencing a loquacious lady but by the following expedient:—'Put out your tongue, Madam.' The lady complied. 'Now keep it there till I have done talking.' An old lady, very much inclined to be prosy, once sent to him, and began by saying that her complaint commenced when she was only three years old. The professor rose abruptly and left the house. It was observed to Mr Abernethy that he appeared to live much like other people, and by no means to be bound by his own rules. The professor replied, 'That he wished to act according to his own precepts, only he had such a devil of an appetite.'—Metropolitan Magazine.

Digitized by Google

FINE ARTS.

LEADING POINTS IN THE EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

[A Correspondent has sent us the following list, which he thinks may save time and trouble to the visitors of the Exhibition. It is to be understood, that the opinion of the paper is not committed by it; but the idea struck us as one that might be reasonably adopted.]

Great Room.

Nos.
6	Portrait of Wilson Patten, Esq	J. Phillips
7	Merchant of Venice	G. S. Newton
11	Dutch Coast	A. W. Calcott
16	Winter's Tale	W. H. Worthington
18	Hunt the Slipper	E. A. Chalon
20	Going to Market	F. W. Watts
23	Portrait, Countess of Guildford	J. Partridge
24	Ditto, Earl Winchilsea	T. Phillips
25	The Venturesome Robin	W. Collins
28	Sir Piersie Shafton and Mysie Happer	H. Liversage
32	Lord Byron reposing	W. Allen
33	Faust	R. Westall
34	Cattle Piece	T. Fielding
37	Portrait, Lord De Dunstanville	J. B. Lane
38	Shipping	W. Daniel
45	Portrait, Master Tighe	J. Partridge
55	Progress of Civilization	H P. Brigs
56	Mary Queen of Scots	A. Cooper
60	The Miff	E. V. Rippengale
61	Evening	A. W. Calcott
62	Portrait, Lady Lyndhurst	D. Wilkie
63	Storm	C. Stanfield
64	Sir Calepine rescuing Serena	Wm. Hilton
65	Portrait of His Majesty	Sir W. Beechey
66	Ditto of Her Majesty	Sir W. Beechey
70	Ditto of Lady Clanwilliam	H. W. Pickersgill
71	Bay of Naples	W. Havell
72	Scene from Hamlet	H. Liversedge
73	Life boat	J. M. W. Turner
75	Head of a Fox	J. Noble
77	Battle	W. Daniel
78	An Italian Family	C. L. Eastlake
79	The Maid of Judith	W. Etty
83	Prague	G. Jones
86	Interior of a Highlander's House	E. Landseer
87	Portrait, Lord Stowell	T. Phillips
89	Portrait, Miss Levien	Wm. Dyce
91	Ditto, Lord Melville	D. Wilkie
92	Circe	H. Howard
96	Sketching a Countryman	S. Williams
97	An Italian Landscape	A. W. Calcott
98	A Sailing Match	W. Mulready
99	Pan and the Nymphs	H. P. Bone
104	View	R. R. Reinagle
105	Portrait, Miss E. Cooper	Sir M. A. Shee
106	Ditto, Lady S. Walroud	T. Phillips
107	Ditto, Miss Riviere	E. W. Pegler
112	Ditto, John Woolmore, Esq.	Sir M. A. Shee
113	The Dinner at Mr Page's House	C. R. Leslie
122	Italian Landscape	A. W. Calcott
123	Yarmouth Pier	J. Constable
124	Death of Mary Magdalene	R. Westall
125	A Peasant Woman	C. L. Eastlake
133	Portrait, Lord Lyndhurst	H W. Pickersgill
135	Canal of Bruges	A. W. Calcott
136	A Mill-dam	A. W. Calcott
138	The Morning Bath	Wm. Collins
146	Poachers	E. Landseer
147	Little Red Riding Hood	E. Landseer
148	Portrait, Pascoe Grenfell, Esq.	Sir M. A. Shee
152	Lear and Cordelia	G. S. Newton
154	A Friar and Pilgrims	W. Havell
157	Portrait, J. P. Ord, Esq	Mrs Carpenter
161	Ditto, Sir R. W. Vaughan, Bart.	Sir M. A. Shee
162	Caligula's Palace and Bridge	J. M. W. Turner
163	Window in Venice	Wm. Etty
168	The Angel releasing Peter	Wm. Hilton
169	Salisbury Cathedral	J. Constable
170	Sabrina	W. Etty
171	Portrait, E. L. Bulwer, Esq.	H. W. Pickersgill
178	Vision of Medea	J. M. W. Turner
186	Portrait, Miss Losach	G Clint
190	The Forts in the Persian Gulf	Wm. Daniel

School of Painting.

197	Corn Field	W. F. Witherington
198	Portrait, W. Phipson, Esq.	T. Phillips
206	The Sleeping Page
216	Portrait, Dr L. Stewart	G. Clint
232	Ditto, Major Johnston	R. Rothwell
233	Landscape	F. R. Lee
238	From Tristram Shandy	C. R. Leslie
239	Le Bonnet Rouge	H Sass
242	Nymph and Cupid	G. Patten
246	Lear and Cordelia	W. Boxall
248	Portrait of Howqua	G. Chinney
257	Portraits of Children	R. Rothwell
258	A Domestic Affliction	W. E. West
263	Lucy, Countess of Carlisle	I. M. W Turner
265	The Father's Admonition	W. Brockenden
267	The Trusty Guardian	G. Foggo
281	Mr Young in Hamlet	G. Clint
288	Admiral Van Tromp's Barge	J. M. W. Turner
291	Portrait of Sir J. G. Cotterill, Bart.	H. W. Pickersgill
293	The Poacher's Bothy	E. Landseer
298	Wattean Study	J M. W. Turner
299	Shrimpers	Wm Collins
301	Poacher and Red Deer	E. Landseer
307	View of Trent	A. W. Calcott
308	Portrait of Lieutenant-Colonel O'Donnell	J. G. Hollins
310	Portrait of Lord Combermere	S. Lane
311	Gil Blas and Aurora de Guzman	M. A. Shee, jun.
312	Tapping the Ale-barrel	A. Fraser
313	The Catholic Communion	S. A. Hart
320	Jesus in the Temple	H. Singleton
321	The Bride	E. I. Paris
326	Portraits	J. Wood

Ante-Room.

340	Portrait, Sir J. Becket	J. Simpson
341	Highland Deer-Stalker	W. Simson
352	Portrait, Sir G. Farrant	H. Wyatt
355	The Stolen Interview	A. G. Vickers
357	Portrait of a Field Officer	F. R. Say
363	Ditto of Charles Kemble	H. W. Pickersgill
374	The Water Log	W Willis
390	The Biter Bit	R. W. Buss
399	A Marriage in Paris	S. J. Masquerier
406		J M. W Turner
411	The Shipwrecked Mariner	Wm. Etty
417	A Sunny Morning	A. W. Calcott
431	Portrait	W. Dyce
442	Ditto	C. W. Pegler
443	Ditto, Viscount Beresford	R. Rothwell

Antique Academy.

449	Lord Durham	C. Turner
451	Study from Nature	G. S. Shepherd
453	Beatrice	H. D.
454	Enamel, Duchess of Northumberland	W. Essex
455	Ditto, F. Chantrey, Esq.	H. Bone
463	Ditto, Venus disarming Cupid	W. Essex
465	Strasburg	C. Stanfield
471	Portrait of a Lady	A. E Chalon
472	Flowers, from Nature	G. Sintzenich
475	Portraits	A. E Chalon
478	Portrait of Lady Russell	A. E. Chalon
484	Harold's Body discovered	G. Jones
493	Mary Magdalene	G. Jones
504	Groupe of Children	J. Green
505	Portrait of a Lady	I. Heaphy
513	The Wounded Bittern	S. Taylor
538	Portrait of a Lady	J. P. Knight
543	View in Herts	C. L Tyler
544	The Cactus Speciosissima	V. Bartholomew
552	Portrait	Mrs Carpenter
557	Portrait	E Preston
567	Frnit	R. Colls, jun.
575	Flowers	C. L. Tyler
578	The Idolatrous destroyed	G Smith
579	Morning	H. Parke
580	Portraits	A. Buck
589	Hollyhocks	Mrs Pope
590	Cataract of the Nile	H. Parke
591	Portrait	O. Oakley
596	Fishermen	C. Stanfield
610	Portraits	C. R. Bone
626	Abbeville	H. E. Downing
638	La Pensierosa	Miss Millington
667	Portrait of Lady Gore Booth	A. Robertson
671	—— Hon. W. Cust	W. Derby
672	Le Baron Schwiter	S. I. Rochard
673	Countess Clanwilliam	Mrs J. Robertson
675	A Lady	R. H. Giles
680	Mrs Fraser	F. Cruickshank
716	F. F. Fraser, Esq.	F. Cruickshank
721	A Lady	G. Patten
722	Mr and Mrs Barker and Child	W. J. Newton
723	Mrs F. Parr	S. J. Rochard
724	Mrs Deacon	A Robertson
725	Hinda	Miss Heaphy
729	A Spanish Lady	L. Mansion
731	Sir W. Beechey	W. J. Newton
831	F. Chantrey, Esq.	A. Robertson
832	Portrait	A. E. Chalon
834	Miss Roberts	C. Ford
841	Portrait	F. Cruickshank
853	Edmund Forster, Esq.	Mrs Green
872	S. J. Capper, Esq.	A. Robertson
878	The Pilgrim	W. C. Ross
885	Mrs Deacon	A. Robertson
886	E. Daniel, Esq.	F. Cruickshank
887	Captain Elliott	W. Haughton
895	Miss Foote	S. J. Rochard

Library.

960	Pandemonium	J. Gaudy
982	London Bridge	G. Scharf
1010	Compositions	J. Gaudy
1016	Antique Temples	H. Parke

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Coriolanus.—The Little Corporal.—High Life Below Stairs.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Fazio.—Napoleon Buonaparte.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Le Quaker et La Danseuse.—Une Faute. — Les Premières Amours.

DRURY LANE.

OUR old acquaintance Mr MASSINGHAM, whose face we have now been accustomed to for we know not how many years in the vestibule of this theatre, has presented us with some tickets for the play which is to be performed for his benefit to-morrow night; and we hereby state, that we mean to write a paragraph for him, and urge our readers to go and see the play. It is the School for Scandal, full of SHERIDAN'S wit, and the excellent acting of Messrs FARREN, DOWTON, MACREADY, &c.: with the lady-like ease of Miss CHESTER. After which there is the new little historical drama of the Little Corporal (Napoleon at school) with little Miss POOLE in it; who is the fittest person in the world to act the little great man, because she is a little genius. And then comes the excellent farce of The Jenkinses, with such domesticities in it about lodgings, and bills, and lovers, and married people, as go home to everybody's 'business and bosoms,' especially by means of the capital acting of Mr FARREN, Mr COOPER, and Mrs ORGER. If these are not attractions for play-goers of all ages and sexes, we know not what are.

We must not guess how long it is since we have identified Mr MASSINGHAM'S face with the entrance to Drury Lane Theatre, lest we should seem to exaggerate. Suffice it to say, that we have been play-goers, yea, and critics! ever since our boyhood, and that our old vestibulary friend seems a sort of father to our play-going. Many a year it is since first we became familiar with his busy, earnest, and courteous demeanour; and there, though not exactly in the same spot (for even the entrances of theatres undergo vicissitude) he still sits, receiving tickets, giving courteous answers, and yet being just withal; for it pleaseth him not, that those who come second, should write their names in his book first. We trust he will not be displeased with our filial notions, albeit time has treated us worse in our proportion, and made us look very elderly offspring. If he is not paternally given, we much mistake him: but late hours and cold nights do not seem to touch him, as they do the critics. His task is pleasanter. At all events, there he is, as he ever used to be; and there we expect he will be found, when perhaps we shall not. If there are theatres, however, in the next world (and there are much worse things, according to some) we shall certainly look for him in the box-office, when we go to see the ghost of BETTERTON or GARRICK in Romeo.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

SEMIRAMIDE.

[By ROSSINI.]

Semiramis, Queen of Babylon . . . Madame Pasta.
Arsaces, Commander in Chief of the Army . . . . . Madame Rubini.
Asema, Princess of the Blood of Belus . . . . . Madame Castelli.
Assur, Prince of the Blood of Belus . . . Signor Lablache.
Idrenus, King of India . Signor Curioni.
Oroe, Chief of the Magi . . Signor De Angeli.
Mitranus, Captain of the Royal Guard . . Signor Galli.
Ghost of Ninus . . . Signor . . .

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

Josephine, Miss M. C. Poole. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

A Favorite Dance by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble, Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubbs, Mr Webb.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

THE JEALOUS WIFE.

[By G. COLMAN, the Elder.]

Mrs Oakly, Miss Chester. Lady Freelove, Mrs Orger. Harriet, Miss Faucit.
Toilet, Mrs Newcombe.
Mr Oakly, Mr Macready. Major Oakly, Mr Farren.
Charles Oakly, Mr Cooper. Russet, Mr Dowton. Sir Harry Beagle, Mr Harley.
Lord Trinket, Mr Balls. Capt. O'Cutter, Mr H. Wallack.
Paris, Mr B. Hill. Tom, Mr Salter.

At the end of the Play, 'The Highland Fling,' by Miss Baltin.

In the course of the evening, Spohr's Overture to 'Faust;' Rossini's Overture to 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia;' and Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischutz.'

After which, the Exhibition of the New and Splendid DIORAMA, designed and painted by Mr STANFIELD.

To conclude with the Opera of

DER FREISCHUTZ.

[By C. M. VON WEBER.]

Linda, Miss Bruce. Rose, Mrs Bedford.
Bridesmaids—Miss Absolon. Miss Butline, Mrs. East, &c.
Ottocar, Mr Yarnold. Bernhard, Mr Bedford. Adolph, Mr T. Cooke.
Caspar, Mr Horn.
Kilian, Mr Webster. Zamiel, Mr Howell. Hermit, Mr Downing.
Principal Foresters—Mr Honner, Mr Eaton, Mr Wieland, and Mr Chikini.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; The Little Corporal; The Jenkinses.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE GIPSY FATHER.

Rose Franklin, Miss E. Tree. Mary Barwell, Mrs Lovell.
Dolly Dolittle, Mrs Tayleure. Clara, Miss Hughes.
Gipsy Woman, Mrs Daly. Lucy, Miss Hunt.
Barwell, Mr Warde. Richard Barwell, Mr G. Bennett.
Simon Salubrious Dolittle, Mr Keeley. Edwards, Mr F. Matthews.
Judge Franklin, Mr Evans. Jem Hartshorn, Mr Meadows.
William and James, Miss P. Horton and Miss Kendall.
First Gipsy, Mr Turnour. Clerk, Mr Irwin. Servant, Mr Heath.

Previous to the Drama, C. M. Von Weber's Overture to 'Preciosa.'

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Six Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schoenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

To-morrow, Isabella; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballet of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

The principal Characters by Mrs Evans, Miss Wells, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Saville, Miss Dix, Mr Keppell, Mr Forrester, Mr Porteus, Mr G. Lejeune, Mr Wilkinson, Mr Spencer, and Mr G. Smith.

After which, a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

The Music composed by Mr H. P. Hill.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Mrs Saville.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

In the course of the Evening, Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering,' and Rossini's Overture to 'Italiana in Alghieri.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—J. Cooke's Act of the British Sportsman and the Reaper—Williams's Tourbillons—Equestrianism, by Miss M. A. Cooke—Sir William Button.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—The Lady and the Devil—More Reform.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS' Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPELL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; F. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 234.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1831.

MISSIONARIES IN TAHITI.*

THESE travellers are Missionaries, sent out to enquire into the proceedings of those whom the Society has dispatched to various parts of the world, as they tell us, to inculcate Christian doctrines. They rise up in arms against the Russian traveller, Kotzebue, who has spoken somewhat strongly of the result of the missions to Tahiti (Otaheite), &c. but they do not disprove what he says. An imperfect acquaintance with the language may have led that traveller into errors, with regard to the violent measures used in the conversion of the people; but nothing is said in contradiction of his assertion that all innocent diversions are forbidden; that the people have rather exchanged vices, than learned virtue; and that the missionaries have seized the civil as well as spiritual power. A man's observations or arguments are not now to be put down by such an answer, if answer it be, as the following:—

'"The religion taught by the Missionaries is not true Christianity," (says Kotzebue)—if that which Captain Kotzebue practices, be "true Christianity," assuredly that which the Missionaries teach, is not. Try him by his own test. In an interview with the queen, he says, "she asked me whether I was a Christian, and how often I prayed daily?—I merely replied, that we should be judged according to our actions, rather than the number of our prayers.'"

Captain Kotzebue is not alone in lamenting the dreary change in the manners of the Tahitians. Captain Beechey expresses the same feelings; and, on this point, our Missionaries say nothing, but that their habits were unspeakably reprobate, and are perfectly sober and orderly. If this be the case; if the people are so willing to be taught, and to benefit by the teaching; where can be the necessity for that rigour which forbids them all amusement? a rigour which could be palliated only by the fact of the people being so hardened in vice, as to make it dangerous for them to assemble together in their dances, &c. Captain Kotzebue does not deny that the Missionaries have done some good to these islanders; he only asserts that they have also done much ill; and who will doubt it, who knows the clerical appetite for power and pelf? The following passage extracted from the farewell letter of the deputation, to the resident Missionaries, speaks volumes:—

'The Society receives with great satisfaction the noble contributions which are made from time to time; and thanks you, dear brethren, and, through you, your numerous flocks, for your united exertions, which have been so productive. Let this liberality be continued; and allow us to suggest, whether the subscriptions might not be increased; and, if not increased, whether some other plan might not be acted upon to render the present subscriptions more productive, by affording greater security to the property subscribed. Though it is the wish of the society that the Missionaries, whom it sends into the heathen world, should not interfere with the politics of the countries where they may reside, yet, as you have to instruct these people in all the institutions of civilized society, and have been called upon by them to assist in forming several codes of laws under which we are happy to see them living, it is necessary that you should continue to explain to them their own laws; that you should watch against their falling into neglect, on the one hand, or being unjustly applied, on the other, until such time as the people become so thoroughly versed in their meaning and administration, as to render your assistance unnecessary.'—Vol. II, pp. 109, 110.

As to the amount of good or evil done, perhaps religion has had little to do with either. Some of the Missionaries have had a knowledge of agriculture, natural history, &c. They have introduced flocks and herds, planted useful roots and trees, taught the people to build more durable and convenient dwellings, encouraged them to industry, by instructing them in various mechanic arts, which they found conducive to their comfort; and lastly, have taught them to read and write. Infanticide is no longer practised, and parents are seen with a numerous family around them, whom the Missionaries have saved from assassination. By increasing the means of living, they had enabled them to provide for all their children; and no longer feeling it necessary to sacrifice the younger for the advantage of the elder (as more enlightened nations have done, by conventual imprisonment, in many instances far more cruel than infant assassination,) they rear and cherish them all with affection. All this good the Missionaries have done, but it has been by the dissemination of knowledge,—by Christian practice, not religious doctrine. They have taken into their own hands the laws and liberties of the natives; they have inspired them with fear, and taught them hypocrisy; have forbidden them the recreations which should sweeten labour, and laden their passing hours with melancholy. And this they have done from fanaticism, and a love of power,—not from Christian zeal. Had they instructed these ignorant islanders in the genuine principles of Christianity;—to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them; to forgive injuries, &c., and cheerfully to enjoy the blessings God had given them; then, indeed, would they have merited to the utmost, and from the world at large, the eulogies they now so liberally bestow upon themselves. But we are entering too far into a subject which is not to be treated in our limited space; and it is time to return to our travellers and their editor.

We have read the volumes with pleasure, but our relish of them has had no connection with faith, or—we were going to say—with good works. They contain much doctrinal cant, and much interesting information. The travellers have visited, not only the South-Sea Islands, but China and India; they give lively representations of the customs of the different countries; concise, but clear descriptions of many natural productions, of the uses to which they are applied, and the mode of applying them; and whenever they take leave of dogmas and their conventional phraseology, they become agreeable companions. The general reader will consider the work as a useful and pleasant addition to his library; and many, whom the title might deter from looking into it, will find—if they can be induced to disregard the title—that it has attractions sufficient to compensate for its defects.

* Journal of Voyages and Travels. By the Rev. Daniel Tyerman and George Bennet, Esq. Compiled from Original Documents by James Montgomery. 2 vols. 8vo. Westley and Davis.

SCOTTISH BIOGRAPHY.*

THE Worthies who figure in this volume are Alexander the Third, Michael Scott, Sir William Wallace, and Robert Bruce; all names of great note, and the two latter, more particularly, carrying with them a romantic interest. The first has been termed the Scottish Alfred, and in some respects, he appears not altogether undeserving of the appellation. His wars, indeed, are rather to be defended than admired; and when we see him, in the bloom of youth, and in circumstances calculated to make him fully sensible of the value of life, exerting all the powers of his mind to entrap thousands in a maze which shall leave them only a choice of death,—by the sword or by the sea, we are less inclined to admire the skill with which he overreached his aged adversary, the King of Norway, than to seek excuses for him in the habits of the times, and the undue admiration that has always been given to military conquest. It must be acknowledged, that by engaging the elements on his side, he spared the lives of many of his own subjects; but thousands of human beings, like himself, the creatures of God, were deliberately sacrificed to the delays, purposely occasioned by his feigned desire of a peace that would have been infinitely more honourable to him than the result of a war, in which the elements, rather than he, were the victors. His conduct on this occasion is the more remarkable, as he was not a warlike prince, and his after reign was one of continued peace and prosperity. Alexander was beloved, and deservedly beloved, by his subjects. He jealously preserved the independence of his country, and personally superintended the administration of justice.

'It was his custom,' says Fordun, 'that he might put down all

* Lives of the Scottish Worthies. By Patrick Fraser Tytler, Esq. F.R.S. and F.S.A. Vol. I. (Family Library, No. XXII.) Murray.

Digitized by Google

violence and disorder, to make an annual progress through the kingdom, accompanied by a select but powerful body of his knights and nobles. In this manner he took up a temporary residence in each quarter of his dominions, having along with him his great Justiciar, so that no complaint which was then made should be overlooked, but justice promptly and impartially administered to all.'

'The oldest Scottish song now known,' says Mr Tytler, 'is a species of lyric elegy upon the death of this monarch, lamenting the sorrowful changes which took place upon his death.'

The life of Michael Scott will give but little satisfaction to a lover of the marvellous, since all his supernatural powers are shewn to amount to no more, than that he was a scholar and a man of science, in an age of ignorance and superstition. Sir William Wallace, also, owes much of his fame to romantic traditions, and to the poetical imagination of his chronicler, Henry the Minstrel. With all the ardour of chivalry, he had none of its refinements. He was zealous for liberty, but tarnished the fame he gained, by frequent and unmanly cruelties. The author does him full justice, yet he does not spare him on this head, nor, though proud of him as his countryman, show him any undue partiality.

'The truth seems to be, that the character and actions of this extraordinary man were in all respects colossal. His crimes as well as his virtues evolved themselves on a great scale; he himself and his nation had been crushed under the intolerable weight of an unjust system of government, till, from a desire not only to avenge the blood of friends and countrymen, but to strike terror into the hearts of the oppressors, and to impress upon them the conviction that nothing short of their utter extermination was intended, retaliation in its most cruel shape was sometimes not only permitted, but encouraged, by this formidable leader. To expect in a mind like his, bred up in a dark and iron age, and perpetually exposed to the hardening influence of the saddest sights of war, the refined benevolence and the gentler virtues of peace, would be unreasonable and absurd; and it is quite evident, notwithstanding the unmingled eulogies of his minstrel biographer, and the enthusiastic sophistry of later writers, that Wallace, in the great struggle to which he had devoted himself, despised and trampled on the artificial refinements of chivalry. . . . . His soul was devoted to a far simpler worship, that of Liberty: at the horns of her altar he was eager not only to slay every invader of his country, but, with a rude and savage pleasantry, to trample upon all refined generosity and high-wrought sensibility and humanity, which no doubt appeared to him utterly misplaced and absurd with regard to the mortal enemies of Scotland. It is here that we are to remark the decided difference between the characters of Wallace and Bruce; the latter, throughout his whole career, never losing or outraging for a moment the feelings of a chivalrous and accomplished knight.'

While speaking of Wallace, our author questions and examines records, with all the coolness and caution characteristic of his country; but when he speaks of Bruce, his heart seems to warm from admiration into love, and sensibly to enjoy the power of eulogizing his hero, without forsaking truth. There is no foul blemish here, which it irks him to point out; and he gives himself up to his feelings without fear that they should lead him astray. He has done justice both to his subjects and to the public. As in a well-written romance, we find the interest increase as we proceed, and we close the volume with a wish that the second were ready for perusal;—a wish so much the stronger, as the life of Bruce is left unfinished.

We conclude our present notice of this interesting work, by extracting the account of King Robert's coronation, and the melancholy fate of the Countess of Buchan for the part she acted in it.

'Bruce and his attendants now resumed their progress to Scone; and on their arrival there, being joined by the bishops of St Andrews, Glasgow, and Moray, he was crowned in that ancient monastery, on the 27th of March 1306. The ceremony could not be performed with that studied splendour and pomp of preparation which accompany the succession to a secure and pacific throne; but, on this account, it perhaps rather gained than lost in the deep interest which attended it. The regalia of Scotland, the sacred stone on which the kings were accustomed to take the oaths to the Celtic portion of their people, the regal mantle, and everything connected with the state and dignity of the throne, had been carried off by Edward in 1296; the ready aid of his friends supplied the want. From his own wardrobe, the Bishop of Glasgow furnished the regal robes in which Bruce appeared; a banner embroidered with the arms of Baliol, was brought from the treasury of the same prelate; a small circlet of gold, borrowed, in all probability, from the brows of some virgin saint, or holy martyr, was placed by the Bishop of St Andrews upon his head; and as he sate in the state chair of the Abbot of Scone, the small band of prelates took their oaths of homage, and the applauses of the inferior clergy belonging to the monastery, and of the people who had crowded from the neighbourhood to witness the solemnity. The inauguration in the stone chair was necessarily omitted, and no Highland sennachy, or bard, deduced, as at the coronation of Alexander, the descent of the monarch from the ancient kings of Albyn; but almost immediately, the accession of Bruce acquired additional solemnity from an extraordinary circumstance. To the Earl of Fife, as the descendant of Macduff, belonged the right of placing the King of Scotland upon the throne. The then Earl of Fife, however, was of the English party; but his sister, Isabella, Countess of Buchan, entertained a romantic admiration of Bruce. Eloping from her husband, and carrying with her his war-horses, and a train of attendants, worthy of her rank, this bold and high-spirited woman suddenly appeared at Scone two days after the coronation, and demanded that the ceremony should be repeated, and her hereditary right of placing the king upon the throne of his ancestors, admitted and enforced. Singular as was this request, Bruce did not conceive that he was in circumstances to think lightly of it; and on the 29th of March, he was a second time placed by Isabella upon the regal chair, and crowned King of Scotland. [The unfortunate Countess afterwards fell into the hands of the English, and, in the same volume, we find her fate recorded, as follows]:—Edward, in imitation of a barbarous practice, which he had probably witnessed in Italy, commanded a cage of wood and iron to be constructed in one of the outer turrets of the castle of Berwick, which was next the street, and open to the public gaze. Within this singular apartment, the Countess was placed; no one except the woman to whose keeping she was intrusted, was permitted to speak with her; and she was ordered to be so strictly guarded, that escape should be impossible. Here she remained, to use the words of an ancient English historian, "suspended as a spectacle of eternal disgrace to all who passed by," for the period of four years, till the clemency of Edward the Second exchanged the cage of Berwick, for a milder imprisonment in the monastery of Mount Carmel.'

FINE ARTS.

PICTURES IN SHREDS AND PATCHES.

'Well, and is it better than oils? would it be better to teach? is there any use in it?' These are questions that we were asked by a friend to whom we mentioned the curiosities before us. They are not better than oils; and the only use in them is the amusement they have been and will be to the public, and the benefit we hope they will prove to their ingenious workwoman. Standing on one's head, or making feet of one's hands and shouldering one's legs, is not likely to supersede the ordinary mode of progression; still it is curious to see such phenomena. We like to know, as Johnson said, what human beings can do. The extraordinary power acquired over the apparently untractable material of cloth, and the great cleverness with which the spirit of the design is preserved, repay the curiosity of the visitors of these pictures, more than most of the modern Exhibitions. At a little distance they are indistinguishable from oils; the most unusual thing about them being the total want of lustre, as to their own surface; for the representation of lustre is most admirable; as the liquid and glaring eyes of the dog, in the 'Dog, cat, and partridge,' and the transparent 'Grapes,' can testify. The dog and cat threatening each other, with the dead partridge at their feet, may challenge comparison with many an oil painting of the present times, both as to colour and spirit. Two small cabinet pictures, after the younger Teniers, and a copy of a head by Titian, are astonishing from the extraordinary fineness of their execution. There is moreover, a landscape or two in the room; one of which, a view of Wemyss Castle (a copy of a modern picture), represents a substance apparently as incompatible with its material as could well be chosen; namely, water; yet it is as liquid and flowing as its prototype, and has all its varied tints and reflections. 'Una,' is interesting, because it is an early work, and an evidence of the improvement the artist has made. There is an unfinished sketch in the room, which helps us to understand the mode of working, and does away with the involuntary incredulity that forces itself upon the mind. The explanations personally afforded by the Lady who has executed these works, are highly amusing. We think the price of admission likely to be against her; as quantity, not quality, is the great desideratum now-a-days. An Englishman will hesitate before he pays for one sight, that which will procure him two, though inferior.

THE LIVING PAINTERS, No. III [Messrs Newton, Chalon, and Callcott] will appear to-morrow.

MR C. J. ROBERTSON'S IMPROVEMENT IN PAINTING IN WATER COLOURS.

ON Friday week, Mr Charles Robertson, the miniature-painter, delivered a discourse at the Royal Institution, explanatory of a system he has for some time adopted, of painting in water colour. Feeling the disadvantage at which the members in his branch of the profession are placed, on account of the comparative incompetence of the material with which they work, he determined upon making a series of experiments, for the purpose of rendering the water colour medium equal in vigour of tone, body, and durability with its hitherto unmatched rival; and to all appearance, his success has been complete.

Digitized by Google

In the first place, he mixes his colours with a solution of gum arabic, and in the course of laying them on, as he proceeds in the different stages of his effects, he covers them with a varnish, compounded of isinglass and spirit of wine, which is laid on while the material is hot (for the isinglass can be brought to dissolve in spirit only at boiling heat, and this will not be effected under three hours.) In this manner he proceeds, laying body of colour upon body, varnishing at each stage till the work be finished; when, to secure the whole from the injuries of damp and soiling, he covers it with a copal varnish. In this state of completion, the picture, if soiled, may be washed with a sponge as securely as an oil painting. If, during the progress of the work, the artist desire to make any alteration, the portion to be removed is readily so treated, and by the same means as in ordinary water-colour drawings.

The substance upon which Mr Robertson makes his paintings is the best drawing paper (in preference to Bristol board), and this he lays down upon canvas, with strong glue and paste. Damp, the dire enemy of pictures, more readily assails them at the back, both from their always hanging against the walls of buildings, and from the bare and porous nature of the canvas, which is constantly presented to its action. In Mr Robertson's plan, moisture would obviously be most detrimental: to counteract its effect, therefore, he covers the whole back of the canvas with tin-foil, firmly glued on; and this he has proved to be impervious to moisture.

Mr Robertson most triumphantly proved the practicability of his invention, by exhibiting four large drawings, two of them original designs; the one, 'Ariel being wafted on the Clouds;' the other, which occupied many feet of canvas, a group of 'Cupid and Psyche,' nearly the size of life. The remaining two were a copy from the 'Bacchus and Ariadne' in the National Gallery, and a copy from a 'Holy Family,' by Andrea del Sarto. The whole produced an animated applause from the assembly. Some members of the Royal Academy were among the audience; two of whom, upon examining the copy from Sarto, expressed their opinion, that they should not have supposed it to be other than an oil painting.—Abridged from the Atlas.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

English Musical Taste.—It has been asserted that the English are very much improved in their taste for music. We will not contradict this opinion; still we cannot but entertain the conviction that there is some quackery in this supposed improvement; nor can our doubts be removed so long as we perceive that the vulgar and unmeaning tol-de-rol style of songs, which still lords it in our national theatres, is suffered to remain; and that even Pasta, in the Italian Opera, is obliged to conciliate general favour by those abominable shakes at the end of a musical piece, which 'make the judicious grieve.' We trust, however, that these depravities will gradually disappear, and, in the meantime, we earnestly request Pasta, and every other great singer, not to condescend to court applause by resorting to expedients so totally unworthy of their talents.—Englishman's Magazine.

Primitive Steam-Engine.—In 1629 a compilation was published, entitled 'Le Machine del Sig. G. Branca; Roma.' It contains a description of all the machines known to the author. Among them is an æolipile,—a hollow metallic ball, having but one small opening,—filled with water, and placed on a brasier in such a manner, that the current of steam, issuing by a pipe, strikes the wings or spokes of a little horizontal wheel, and makes it revolve. It was remarked, in the year 1605, by Florence Rivault, in his 'Elemens d'Artillerie,' that æolipiles burst with a loud report when the steam was prevented from escaping. He adds, 'the effect of the rarefaction of air will startle the boldest man.' Some of the French scientific journals of the present day are endeavouring to shew that the name of Salomon de Caus ought to be substituted for that of the Marquis of Worcester, as giving the first suggestion of the steam engine.—Literary Gazette.

Recruiting Bill.—The eloquence of the following appeal to the country bumpkins to become soldiers, issued by a regiment recently returned from the East Indies, is worthy to have been issued by Serjeant Kite himself.—'On enlisting, he receives from the King a bounty of three guineas; he exchanges his old clothes for a handsome comfortable uniform, and his homely fare of coarse bread and vegetables, for good tea or coffee, soup and beef. He no longer lives in a low confined hut or cottage, but has a fine airy large barrack-room. Instead of rolling about, and walking as if he had a load of clay at each foot, he steps smartly along with an upright air. Instead of hard labour from sunrise to sunset, with little pay or food, he has only to clean his arms and clothes, and attend one or two parades a-day He need no longer whistle to himself, as he has a fine band of music, besides drums, fifes, and bugles. If he behave himself well, and know anything of writing or reading, he may soon hope to be made a Corporal, and then a Serjeant; his Officers will take care he is not wronged, but will protect and promote him. If he is sick, he will receive every attention in an excellent hospital, from experienced surgeons, and be visited by his Officers and Chaplain. If he is married, and has children, they will be educated gratis, at the school of the regiment. Should the interest and the honour of the nation render a war necessary, the soldier will be well provided for; he will fight beside brave men who will stand by him; and under gallant and considerate Officers, who will not foolishly throw away the lives of their men. If he escapes, he will share in prize money and honour; should he be wounded, a grateful country will reward him by a liberal pension; and should he be killed (as we must all die some time) he will enjoy the satisfaction of dying in a good cause, of leaving his family to the kind care of the nation, who will provide for them, and of being buried where he fought, with the colours waving and muskets discharged over him.—Kentish Chronicle.—[This reminds us of a similar requisition for recruits for the East Indies, which we read some years ago, in which, after enumerating various felicities, it was stated that the Colonel could 'only allow hunting twice a-week, as he wished to keep the horses fresh to meet the enemy.']

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.
King's Theatre.—Semiramide.—Kenilworth.
Drury-Lane.—The Jealous Wife.—Der Freischutz.
Covent-Garden.—The Gipsy Father.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

Queen's Theatre.

A successful trifled called Reformation was produced here last night, from the pen of Mr Baile Bernard. It is of no very ambitious character; but what it undertakes to do, it does pleasantly. Its highest wit consists of some good puns; its most interesting incident, indeed its entire plot, is made up of the old stage joke of hurrying two or three damsels at once into hiding-places, while the hero of the piece has to put the best face he can on the matter with some elderly kinsman. This is just the whole story before us. Dashington (Mr Green) is a sort of Don Giovanni, whom his uncle wants to persuade into Reformation and law-chambers. He is at the uncle's country-house, resolving to try and oblige the old gentleman, and reading a book of reports, when a damsel presents herself at the garden-gate, who has come for a servant's place. Away goes the book, and Mr Dashington begins making furious love. His uncle's footman (Mr Marshall), who seems commissioned to act the part of a Mentor on these occasions (which he does at the perpetual peril of a broken head) diverts his attention by telling him that there is a post-chaise halting near the door with a young lady in it. 'A young lady!' Off dashes Mr Dashington, and to the amazement of the footman is seen handing her out of the chaise, and kissing her hand. The servant-maid meanwhile has been thrust into a summer-house. The fair stranger proves to be the damsel he is paying his addresses to, Miss Ellen somebody, bound on her way to boarding-school. Our hero insists upon her stopping, 'only five minutes,' but while he is making love as before, another lady is announced, and Miss Ellen is thrust into another summer-house! The third lady, who is rather too elderly to be as well received as the former ones, is suddenly smitten with Mr Dashington, and is holding him in a long tête-à-tête, when the footman, frightened out of his wits at this collection of women, and despairing in particular of getting rid of the elderly lady, fires off a fowling-piece behind her. She seizes the opportunity of fainting in a very resolute manner into the arms of Mr Dashington: the footman cries out that the uncle is coming; Dashington thrusts her into the arms of the hopeless man-servant, and resumes his book. A book-case (the most accommodating moveable of the kind we ever saw, and fond of fresh air) happens to be standing in the garden! They succeed in thrusting her into this book-case; the uncle comes in, with the father of Miss Ellen, who has come on a visit, and points with paternal pride to his reformed boy, doating over his studies. The reader guesses the rest. Dashington is asked to give them a specimen of the style in which he means to speak at the bar, but declines; and he opposes their seating themselves in the summer-houses, on the plea of his having stowed books there, and a 'little electrical machine.' He, the footman, and the uncle, happen to be called away, we forget for what; and Ellen's father, after the fashion of Sir Peter Teazle, when he fetches out the 'little French milliner,' resolves upon having a peep at the 'little electrical machine,' and discovers the maid-servant. The parties returning, his own daughter is discovered next; and finally the elderly inamorata is fetched out of the book-case, and turns out to be a kinswoman of one of the gentlemen, who has come also on a visit. All this was made pleasant enough by Mr Bernard, to a good-humoured audience, who approved even one or two jokes which we think might have been spared; not because they were a little free, but because their imagery tended to degrade the sex. We allude in particular to the passage about being 'spoilt with keeping.' We are always for being tolerant to animal spirits and good humour, but we like them to run on the exalting side, or at least to put pleasant metaphors in one's head, and not revolting ones.

Mr Marshall did the footman very well, and Mr Green the hero; only it is a pity he is so eternally on the fidget. His interlocutor scarcely says anything, but Mr Green must give it an accompaniment of looks and gestures. Every comma may be reckoned to meet with a nod; a shifting of the leg answers to a semicolon; and a full stop has a shrug.

Digitized by Google

MR KEAN AT THE CITY THEATRE.

TO THE TATLER.

My Dear Mr Tatler,—I should very much like to see you give due honour to the little theatre in Milton street. The critics in general, seem, like cats, to be attached to the houses themselves, rather than to those who figure in them; and while they continue to visit the larger theatres, talk of being reduced to the necessity,—if these do not behave themselves,—of going to a theatre trodden by Mr Kean! of going to 'Grub street.' Cannot the presence of one man of genius, and the name of another, overcome the association of vulgarity with that spot?—There has been much outcry against the size of our principal theatres.—The first actor of the day may now be seen in a small theatre. Who goes to see him? Now he is spoken of with contempt, and placed upon a level with Punch;—and why?—because the change implies broken fortunes. It might be well that Mr Kean should not appear in public, while any deficiency of strength renders him inferior to himself;—but if he does appear,—be it necessity, or inclination, which induces him so to do, he should surely be treated with respect; and it concerns every man of genius to uphold him. I remain, Mr Tatler,

An Admirer of Kean and Macready, act where they may.

[We shall do ourselves the pleasure of again attending to Mr Kean next week.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

H's misgiving is worthy of him. His last verses are not so good as his former ones.

Has not the passage respecting the Countess de Rossi already appeared in the newspapers?

The gentleman who writes to us from Leominster is informed, that the Indicator is out of print. The other publications may be had, we believe, upon giving directions to any London bookseller to procure them. The Reflector was completed in two volumes.

We are obliged to the author of the paper upon the 'Study of English Literature,' but have not room for it.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr Sheridan.]

Lady Teazle, Miss Chester. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Faucit.
Mrs Candour, Mrs Orger. Maria, Miss Faucit. Maid, Mrs Webster.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr Farren. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr Dowton.
Joseph Surface, Mr Cooper. Charles Surface, Mr Wallack.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr Harley. Crabtree, Mr W. Bennett.
Careless, Mr Yarnold. Rowley, Mr Younge. Moses, Mr Webster.
Trip, Mr Balls. Snake, Mr Thompson. Sir Harry (with a Song) Mr Sinclair.
John, Mr Hooner. William, Mr C. Jones.
First Gentleman, Mr East. Second Gentleman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening the Band will perform Boieldieu's Overture to 'Les Deux Nuits;' Rossini's Overture to 'Il Turco in Italia;' and Mozart's Overture to 'Idomeneo.'

After which, a petite Historical Drama, called

THE LITTLE CORPORAL, OR THE SCHOOL OF BRIENNE.

Josephine, Miss Crawford.
The Minister of War, Mr Cooke. The Principal of the Academy, Mr C. Jones.
Egidius, Mr Younge. Patrault, Mr Thompson. Buonaparte, Miss Poole.
Bourienne, Darbel, Delestrade, Duhauset, Masters Cathie, Richardson, Hildrew, and Fenton.
Captain Morel, Mr Andrews.

To conclude with a Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

THE JENKINSES.

Mrs John Jenkins, Mrs Orger. Miss Georgiana Jenkins, Miss Crawford.
Martha, Mrs Broad. Mr Carraway, Mr Farren.
Augustus Gingham, Mr J. Vining. Mr John Jenkins, Mr Cooper.
Master John Jenkins, Master Fenton.

To-morrow, The Legion of Honour; The Brigand; and Masaniello.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

ISABELLA.

[By Mr Southern.]

Isabella, Miss F. Kemble. Nurse, Mrs Tayleure.
Count Baldwin, Mr Egerton. Biron, Mr Ward. Biron's Son, Miss Hunt.
Carlos, Mr G. Bennett. Villeroy, Mr Abbott. Maurice, Mr Henry.
Belford, Mr Baker. Officer, Mr Turnour. Samson, Mr Meadows.

In Act III. AN EPITHALAMIUM.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Six Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Duguommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montpreau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.
Part 6.—Victoria's Vision.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and The Gipsy Father.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

Part I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31.' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

Part II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French:—Josephine, Miss M. C. Peole. Panchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.

English:—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

A Favorite Dance by Mlle. Rosier.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble, Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubbs, Mr Webb.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballad of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'Farren.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Miss Wells. Mrs MacToddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Perteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

After which, a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

[By Mr Bernard.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Perteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

[By Mr Keppell.]

The Music composed by Mr H. P. Hill.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Mrs Saville.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

In the course of the Evening, Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering,' and Rossini's Overture to 'Italiana in Alghieri.'

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

Shakspeare's Tragedy of

OTHELLO.

Othello, Mr Kean.

After which,

MATCH-MAKING.

Madame Manette, Mrs Fitzwilliam.

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

Cooke's Equestrian Circus, Great Windmill St. Haymarket.—Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—J. Cooke's Act of the British Sportsman and the Reaper.—Williams's Tourbillons—Equestrianism, by Miss M. A. Cooke—Sir William Button.

Coburg Theatre.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

Sadler's Wells.—The Frozen Hand—The Lady and the Devil—More Reform.

Royal Pavilion Theatre.—The Field of the Cloth of Gold—The Sylph of the Sunflower.

Vauxhall Gardens.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at Ebers' Library, Old Bond street; by J. Chappel; E. Wilson, Royal Exchange; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street; W. Kennath, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 33 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 235.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1831.

MR MOXON'S PUBLICATIONS.

Mr Moxon has begun his career as a bookseller in singularly high taste. He has no connexion but with the select of the earth. The least thing he does, is to give us a dandy poem, suitable to Bond street, and not without wit. We allude to the Byronian brochure, entitled 'Mischief.' But this is a mere condescension to the elegance of the street he lives in. Mr Moxon commenced with some of the primæval delicacies of Charles Lamb. He then astonished us with Mr Rogers's poems on Italy, full of beautiful plates after Turner and Stothard,—a golden volume. Then came the Sonnets of Shakspeare and Milton (which it was a refinement in the cruelty of his prosperity not to send us): then the Poetical Works of Mr Landor, truly classical and Catullian; then the high-German hypochondrias of Tieck; and now he presents us with Selections from the Poems of Mr Wordsworth, a book long a desideratum; purchaseable, portable, and containing some of the best things of the best poet of his time.

Of some of these publications we have already spoken,—Mr Lamb's Album Verses among them. And why (the reader may ask) not have noticed his Satan in Search of a Wife? Because, to say the truth, we did not think it worthy of him. We rejoice in Mr Lamb's accession to the good cause advocated by Sterne and Burns, refreshed by the wholesome mirth of Mr Moncrieff, and finally carried (like a number of other astonished humanities, who little thought of the matter, and are not all sensible of it now) on the triumphant shoulders of the Glorious Three Days. But Mr Lamb, in the extreme sympathy of his delight, has taken for granted, that everything which can be uttered on the subject will be held to be worth uttering, purely for its own sake, and because it could not well have been said twelve months ago. He merges himself, out of the pure transport of his good will, into the joyous common-places of others; just as if he had joined a great set of children in tossing over some mighty bowl of snap-dragon, too scalding to bear; and thought that nothing could be so good as to echo their 'hurras!' Furthermore, we fear that some of his old friends, on the wrong side of the House, would think a little of his merriment profane: though for our parts, if we are certain of anything in this world, it is that nothing can be more Christian.

Mr Landor's book would have had a criticism from us some weeks ago; but circumstances of various kinds, and productions more easily noticed, compelled us from time to time to lay it aside: for in justice neither to itself, nor to our pleasure, can we go through it hastily. It is one of those volumes which we linger over as long as possible, marking it with our pen, and not missing a word.

With Mr Wordsworth's writings we are more intimate; and of his volume can speak at once.* We have said that he is the best poet of his time. It is an old opinion of ours, and we are proud to say that it remains just what it was. We have true poets now living, after their several orders:—

> 'For orders and degrees
> Jar not with poetry, but well consist,'

every man being more or less a poet, who can throw up his experience into a certain kind of flower; and there are therefore a variety of classes in the poetical, as there are in the floral world. It is idle to say that none but great poets are real poets. We might as well assert that there are no flowers but roses. The stock is a flower too; and Shenstone is as truly a poet, after his kind, as Spenser. Shenstone's charming little poem of the Schoolmistress is such a flower as he describes in it,—balm, or pink, or a piece of lavender. The Faerie Queene of Spenser is a forest in bloom. And yet who shall add a new poem to the list, any more than a new flower, however humble a one, unless (not to speak it profanely) he be a real 'maker?' Campbell, Moore, Lamb, Scott, Rogers, Crabbe, Landor, Montgomery, Coleridge, Barry Cornwall, the Tennysons, and others (we have not mentioned them in their order) are all poets, of greater or less merit. We think Mr Wordsworth the head of them; and our opinion is impartial, because we differ exceedingly with Mr Wordsworth upon many points, and (if we may so speak) do not personally love his poetry; at least not in the degree that we should wish to love that of so fine a writer.

But what living poet has written so much, and so admirably, as he? Who has dared to venture such heaps of verses, at the risk of writing many feeble ones (as we grant him to have done), but upon the whole such heaps of good and fine verses, deep in thought, and fitting and masterly in words? Who has so much habitual poetry about him? Who sees such a multitude of things, with so many of their beauties, physical and moral, about them, breathing the air of fancy, and knowing that they are not simply what they are called by common men? And who has such fine language at will? Who can, evidently, at a moment's notice, summon such apt and sovereign words, to express what he pleases? Take any ten out of the hundreds of his pages, and many a poet would increase his reputation a hundred-fold by spreading their thoughts over his whole works.

Is it not provoking that such a man should be behindhand with the world half a century in his political and religious opinions, and that he should choose to be behindhand? Mr Wordsworth does not give us the idea of his being a happy man, or of one whose intervals from doubt and melancholy have any real refreshment. There is a misgiving in his aspirations, and owing to his sectarian caste of mind, a self-seeking in his very universalities, that contradict his claims to be considered a sympathiser with every thing. Mr Hine (the gentleman to whom the public are indebted for editing this volume, and who has performed his part in a manner highly creditable to him) justly claims for his great friend the reputation of a sympathy more extensive than what is exhibited by the living poet, as far as a multitude of things are concerned; but we cannot allow that he sympathises more deeply with any part of 'God's creation.' God has created not only the works more commonly attributed to him, but what man has created also; and among others, the works of cities; yea, even theatres and the French nation; and we do not think Mr Wordsworth sympathises much with those. He has written an unjust and an untrue sonnet against France; and has acknowledged elsewhere, that he takes little interest 'in the interlocutions of Caius and Lucius,'—meaning Shakspeare's plays. This is not unbounded sympathy; neither is it a poetical or philosophical universality to be always looking back to old times, and wishing not to 'make progression' with the world, unless it will come round. Mr Wordsworth contradicts the liberality natural to him as a poet and philosopher, by compounding his morbid and personal hankerings after what others wish to give up, with what they ought to retain: and he does this, purely because they have not asked his advice, or do not care for it. The general light is too much for his single taper, however virgin the wax and golden the candlestick; and yet he would fain have the sun of knowledge stop, and trim itself at the lustre that beams from his cottage-window. In plain words, he would not go on with the world, when they moved in good earnest; the world have gone on without him; and this is what the infirm part of his nature cannot bear. He has chosen to live like a hermit, and prefer a Government salary and the luxuries of poetical meditation, and yet fancies that the world ought to receive his reveries as oracular in all their parts, instead of liking them for what they are,—the effusions of a mind highly poetical, saddened and narrowed by education, discoloured perhaps by the insensible indulgences of the temperament naturally belonging to it, all events grudging that cheerful advancement of mankind which it ought to have been among the first to lead.

But the book which Mr Hine has collected for us is still admirable, still a precious and extraordinary volume, worth not only five shillings, but five jewels of Golconda; and we earnestly exhort our readers to make haste, if they can, and purchase it. It is luckily the nature of all real genius to do good in the end. Time drops or neutralizes its infirmities, as not belonging to it: the good remains, because it is good, immortal as the beauty it had faith in. We pity Cowper's Methodism: we dare to smile at the Calvinism of 'Paradise Lost' (as its illustrious author did himself before he died); but the 'Task' remains and is enjoyed: the 'Paradise Lost' is an edifice we look up to with delight and reverence, notwithstanding the fantasticalness of some of the sculpture. So it will be with Mr Wordsworth. His politics and polemics will come to nothing, like the system that begat them. His beauties will be as immortal as the fields and the skies that begat them.

* Selections from the Poems of William Wordsworth, Esq., chiefly for the Use of Schools and Young Persons. 8vo. pp. 365. Moxon.

Digitized by Google

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE CURATE AND HIS BISHOP.

[From the French.]

On business call'd from his abode,
A Curate jogg'd along the road.
In patient leanness jogg'd his mare;
The Curate, jogging, breath'd a prayer;
And jogging, as she fac'd the meads,
His maid, behind him, told her beads.

They hear a carriage; it o'ertakes 'em;
With grinding noise and dust it rakes 'em:
'Tis he himself! They know his port;
My Lord the Bishop, bound to court.
Beside him, to help meditation,
The lady sits, his young relation.

The carriage stops; the Curate doffs
His hat, and bows; the lady coughs:
The Prelate bends his lordly eyes,
And 'How now, Sir!' in wrath he cries:
'What! choose the very King's highway,
And ride with girls in open day!
Good heav'ns! what next will curates do?
My fancy shudders at the view.
Girl, cover up your horrid stocking:
Was ever seen a group so shocking!'

'My Lord,' replies the blushing man,
'Pardon me, pray, and pardon Anne:
Oh deem it, good my Lord, no sin:
I had no coach to put her in.' E.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. III.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

G. S. NEWTON, A.—A. W. CALLCOTT, R. A.—A. E. CHALON, R. A.

Now let us look at Mr Newton—

'All tongues speak of him, and the bleared sights
Are spectacled to see him; your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry
The while she chats him.'

Mr Newton is the prettiest painter in the world. For a lady with a love letter—a young girl in a Spanish boddice—Lesbia and her sparrow—Mr B. and Pamela Andrews, and such things (some of them, however, really tinged with domestic pathos) commend us to Mr Newton. He is the man for our money. He takes a pretty girl, dresses her up in fantastic fashion, puts a tear in each eye, and throws her into an attitude that will not discompose her satin, and we are ready to die with delight at his sensibility. 'What a sweet painter Newton is,' we hear perpetually from the young ladies of our acquaintance. And so he is. We have not a word to say against him. Generally speaking, he accomplishes all he aims at: and this is no mean praise. He does not indeed often attempt more than the merely elegant in art. There is no soaring beyond the common apprehension in his pictures—no thoughts infinite! All is elegant and agreeable, and all is adapted to the meanest capacity. The limit of his meaning is apparent, is palpable. A milliner would comprehend him as completely as a philosopher;—perhaps better.

No one can reasonably wonder at Mr Newton's popularity. He addresses himself to the every-day sympathies of people, and succeeds accordingly. Were he forced, on pain of the pillory, to paint a giant or a prophet, to let loose the chimeras or fantastic images of the air or ocean upon his pannels, he would be sorely perplexed, we suspect, at the difficulty of the task. He would probably fail also, almost equally, in any attempt at embodying the divine beauty of Raffaelle, or stamping on his canvas the grand visages of Titian. His beauties are pretty but homely, elegant but strait-laced; and lest they should be too bewitching they have a due quantity of the artificial mixed with their natural expression, as we mingle alloy with our gold to make it serve the purposes of currency better. Not that we attribute that species of policy to Mr Newton, which influences Braham to address the galleries with a popular flourish; which he knows to be in a vicious taste. Our artist has no such far-sighted speculations. He paints as well as he can. This, indeed, is not in the best taste or the highest style; but it is agreeable as far as it goes, and—what we dare say suffices for the painter—it produces money, and temporary renown.

Mr Newton has only two pictures in the present exhibition. No. 7, 'A Scene from the Merchant of Venice,' and No. 152. 'Lear and Cordelia.' The first, which exhibits Portia leaning on her newly married husband, and requiring to be partaker of the melancholy news that he has just received from Venice, is pretty enough. The face of Portia struck us as a little out of drawing, and the picture we think is deficient both in simplicity and expression; but it possesses merit of a certain kind, and we have no doubt will be liked. We have seen one or two instances of positively fine colour come from Mr Newton's painting-room; but we do not think that this year's exhibition will add another to the list. As to 'Lear and Cordelia' it is beyond question a failure. There is nothing like Lear or Cordelia in the picture. There is an old man, indeed, 'old as the heavens,' and a young lady kneeling by him; but there is nothing of the mad and dethroned king—the deserted parent—the utterer of that frightful curse, more terrible than a sybil's frenzy; there is nothing of the princess at his feet—the true, high-minded, devoted Cordelia—who submitted to all evils rather than swerve from the natural integrity of her mind, and who returned at last to her old deserted father, to make him amends for the wrath and malice of the elements, and all that he had suffered from ungrateful children. We have a proper respect for Mr Newton's talents, but we think that he has less talent for the 'sublime' than for the 'ridiculous.'

Mr Callcott is an eminent artist. He is not equal to Mr Turner, who is, in our opinion (notwithstanding all his absurdities), the greatest genius in landscape-painting which this country has produced; but he is the next living painter to him. Mr Callcott formerly presented us almost exclusively with sea-shore scenes and river landscapes; now he is all Italian. The subjects of his present pictures are undoubtedly much finer than those that he celebrated formerly. We are not quite so sure that they are treated in a finer manner. He used to take a piece of the sea or of a river, and, with a few vessels, or a rood or two of land, would send into the Exhibition, works of which Cuyp need not have been ashamed. Now, he appears to us to paint from his recollection more, and this, or some other cause, has made him somewhat of a mannerist. His colour especially is objectionable to our eyes. There is a monotony about it—a flatness—notwithstanding the fine aërial tints that he occasionally introduces—that make us wish for a little change. Why are all his scenes coloured like a half-baked piece of clay? If this be true sometimes, it is not always true, as we know; and we do not readily see the wisdom or object of converting the vernal green and everlasting blue of nature into the quaker's drab. Mr Callcott is so fine an artist, and (we have no doubt, for he has married a handsome and sensible lady) so sensible a man, that he may be told of his supposed faults without any apprehension of offence. It is only the week, the vain, and the ignorant painter, that is stirred up to fury—fury 'signifying nothing'—by candid criticism.

Mr Chalon is a painter of silks, and satins, and jewels, and head-dresses, and all the materials of distinction in the world of fashion. He appears to prefer the back of the head to the front, the sleeve to the arm, the stiff stomacher to the undulating bosom, the adjunct to the principal, of which it ought only to be an ornament. His lay figure we imagine would be as good for him as the living model: so that the blonde was of the prettiest pattern, the Mechlin of the costliest sort, and the fur-belows not wanting in dignity. His picture of 'Hunt the Slipper,' No. 18, is merely a collection of gowns and head-dresses, with a carpet in tolerable keeping. You see the shoulder of Cloe opposed to Belinda's petticoat, whilst the point lace of Myra and Amanda's necklace of pearls are thrown into confusion by the fan (the truncheon) of Sophronia. Surely Mr Chalon would be the happiest person in the world were he only sentenced to solitary imprisonment for a week in the show-room of Madame Maradan, or one of the bonnet-shops of Bond-street.

Digitized by Google

'All his reverend wit
Lies in his wardrobe,'

is said of some person; but that is not Mr Chalon's case. He has done better things than immortalize a sack or a toupee, and we recommend him to do so again. One or two of this artist's drawings in the lower rooms are good, with however a certain portion of the usual affectation. He cannot get on without it: so we must even be content.

[No. IV. still contains W. COLLINS, R.A., W. DANIEL, R.A., and A. COOPER, R.A.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THE BILL.—A Gentleman, a few days ago, when he was leaving Long's Hotel, had his bill presented to him by one of the waiters. The Gentleman paid it to a single penny. The waiter stood in expectation of the usual gratuity, but received nothing. 'Sir,' said the waiter, 'I hope everything has been to your mind.'—'Perfectly so,' replied the Gentleman 'I hope, Sir, I have given you no offence.'—'None whatever,' answered the Gentleman. 'Will you be pleased to consider the servants?'—'No, no, my man; I am for the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill!'

— The arms of the Earl of Munster (the late Colonel Fitzclarence) are said to be, in all respects, those of the Royal Family, except that the white horse of Hanover takes the station of the unicorn.

DIGNITY.—The following (from the Herald) puts one in mind of Goldsmith's pleasantry on this subject, in the 'Citizen of the World,' where Mr Deputy Bellowsmender is addressed by some brother Deputy, and enquiries are made after Mrs Deputy Bellowsmender, and all the little Master Bellowsmenders:—'It was not till the announcement of "Mrs Herbsttewer Fellowes" at the late drawing-room, that we ever heard of females having their office thus attached to their names. If this be etiquette, however, we may soon expect to see "Miss Maid of Honour ——," and "Lady Mistress of the Robes ——," like "Mr Secretary this," or "Mr Serjeant that."

ABERNETHY BISCUITS.—At this moment the public are deceived by supposing that a certain biscuit, abhorrent to our olfactory and gustatory senses, was the favourite breakfast and luncheon of Mr Abernethy, whose name it bears, because the baker who invented it was named Abernethy. We venture to affirm that no such trash ever entered the worthy Professor's stomach, and we know that what are called tops and bottoms were his choice, soaked in tea or eaten dry.—Metropolitan Magazine.

THE BOAR'S HEAD IN EASTCHEAP.—Among the sacrifices to utility caused by the new London Bridge, there is none which the admirer of the drama, the archæologist, and the lover of good fellowship, will more regret than the Boar's Head in Eastcheap. The ancient hostel of Dame Quickly is quickly to disappear; and if the ghost of the fat knight could 'revisit the glimpses of the moon,' he would in vain seek his ancient and beloved sack posset there. The house has long ceased to be one of entertainment; its last occupant was a tape-merchant, and the only reminiscence of the scene where Hal and Falstaff, and Nim and Bardolph, drank over their successful depredations, was a boar's head rudely sculptured in stone, fixed in front of the house, bearing the date of its revival. Within a few days from this nothing will remain to point out the site of this immortal drinking-place, and the passenger who approaches London Bridge from the northward, will hardly deem that he walks over the spot.—Herald.

GOOD PILOTAGE.—Nothing is more amusing than the alacrity of Irishmen in getting into scrapes, and the happy naïveté and blunders by means of which they endeavour to extricate themselves. A captain of a man-of-war, newly appointed to a ship on the Irish station, took the precaution, in 'beating out' of harbour, to apprise the pilot that he was totally unacquainted with the coast, and therefore he must rely entirely on the pilot's local knowledge for the safety of his ship. 'You are perfectly sure, pilot,' said the captain, 'you are well acquainted with the coast?'—'Do I know my own name, Sir?'—'Well, mind I warn you not to approach too near to the shore.'—'Now make yourself aisy, Sir; in troth you may go to bed, if you plase.'—'Then, shall we stand on?'—'Why,—what else would we do?'—'Yes, but there may be hidden dangers, which you know nothing about.'—'Dangers!—I like to see the dangers dar hide themselves from Mick. Sure, don't I tell you I know every rock on the coast?' (here the ship strikes) 'and that's one of 'em!'—Metropolitan Magazine.

PREFERMENT SPOILED.

My uncle, rest his soul! when living,
Might have contriv'd me ways of thriving;
Taught me with cyder to replenish
My vats, or ebbing tide of Rhenish:
So when for hock I drew bad white-wine,
Swear't had the flavour, and was right wine;
Or sent me with ten pounds to Furnival's Inn, to some good rogue-attorney;
Where now, by forging deeds, and cheating,
I'd found some handsome ways of getting. Prior.

— A provincial paper, speaking of a recently published volume of 'Constable's Miscellany,' describes it as one 'replete with lively though melancholy interest.'

A TRADITION.—Charlemagne laid siege to the castle (of Lourdes) and not being able to take it by assault, resolved to force it to a capitulation by starvation. But Mirat, the lord of the castle, chanced to be an especial favourite of Notre Dame du Puy, and she sent an eagle to the summit of the castle, carrying in its beak a large fish alive. Mirat, taking advantage of this miracle, sent the fish to Charlemagne, as a proof that the garrison was not without food; and Charlemagne, knowing that a live fish could not be had on the top of the hill, perceived that it was a miracle; and finding that Mirat was under the protection of the Lady of Puy, proposed less hard conditions, and that, in place of surrendering the castle to him, it should be surrendered to Notre Dame du Puy. It is strange that the Lady of Puy should have taken so great a fancy to Mirat, who was not a Christian; but the tradition adds that he was afterwards baptised.—Conway's Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees.

SUPERSTITION OF SEAMEN.—When the late captain lay dead, some Portuguese sailors were appointed to watch the corpse by night. A black cat happening to be on board they all armed themselves with handspikes to defend their charge against the 'foul fiend,' saying that if she should walk over the coffin, between sunset and sunrise, the body would immediately rise up, when no power on earth could ever make it lie down again. They likewise placed a glass of brandy and water in the cabin where the captain had breathed his last, shrewdly observing that, as the deceased had always loved that kind of grog, perhaps his spirit might be hovering about, tormented with thirst: and if so, it would certainly be glad of a draught of its favourite beverage.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

MUSIC.

SIGNOR PAGANINI'S CONCERT AT THE KING'S THEATRE.

MARVELLOUS Paganini! Divine Paganini! In what way shall we —can we describe your accomplishments? We feel the task to be almost insurmountable. Those of our readers who have heard the most eminent of violin-performers; eminent for strength, sweetness, and purity of tone, will hear all these requisites to absolute perfection in PAGANINI: they who have heard difficulties in the way of execution overcome, which it seemed bordering on desperation to attempt, may tax their faculties to invent new enormities, and they will not only fall short in their imaginings, but he will perform all, and more, not merely without shew of effort, but as if they were a fanciful prelude, or pastime to some laborious undertaking. In the course of the concert given this evening at the Opera House, he performed four pieces, in which we conceive he exhibited every feature that the instrument can display, and many more than it has hitherto been thought capable of. The first was a concerto of the most florid character, varied with movements of exquisite expression and tenderness. The second was a composition in the minor key, and which for its own intrinsic merit made the strongest appeal to our feelings. In it he satisfied at once any doubt we might have, that he would prove unequal in a cantabile. His expression in this piece was the most genuine display of passionate feeling we ever remember to have heard on any instrument. It required no explanatory chorus, no voice of accompaniment—it was the perfection of musical sighing, and gentle sorrow. The third performance was a military rondo, the whole of which he played upon one string—the fourth. In it he introduced the subject of 'Non più andrai' from Figaro, with variations of the most astonishing description. He introduced passages of imitation in octaves with wonderful rapidity and neatness, and with a purity of tone that was delicious. The precision, too, with which he dashed from the lowest note of the string to the opposite extreme, and all with the utmost indifference of manner, was one of the commonest of his achievements.

The last piece, which was a brilliant rondo, he played entirely without the orchestral accompaniment; and this was the triumph of the evening. It consisted of an air with variations, crouded with enharmonic passages. The subject, now legato, and now hurried, was at one time attended with a florid, and at another with a pizzicato accompaniment; and as he drew to a close he accelerated his time to a prestissimo, the air and pizzicato moving on together, and ending with a rapid shake upon the latter! The violin-player will fully appreciate the difficulty of this achievement.

It is scarcely necessary to state that the audience were satisfied. The applause was showered upon him in torrents.

Digitized by Google

COOL REVENGE.—At Moorshedabad, a gentleman had a young elephant, which, being allowed to roam at large about his premises, one day entered the dining-room, where a large company were assembled. Being treated with a biscuit from one person, a piece of bread from another, and a sweetmeat from a third, it went all round the table, levying contributions, till it came to a young gentleman who pricked the end of its proboscis with his toothpick. The insulted animal retired immediately, but soon returned, and raising its trunk, blew out of it, full into the offender's face, thousands of ants, which it had collected from a nest hard by, whither it had repaired for the means of vengeance.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

ANCIENT CARRIAGES.—In Stowe's 'Summary of the English Chronicles' occurs the following notice of carriages:—'This yere Walter Rippon made a coche for the Earle of Rutland, which was the first coche that ever was made in England since, to wit, anno 1564. The said Walter Rippon made the first hollow turning coche, with pillars and arches, for her Majestie, being then her servant. Also, anno 1584, a chariot throne, with foure pillars behinde to bear a canopie, with a crowne imperiall on the toppe, and before two lower pillars, whereon stood a lion and a dragon, the supporters of the armes of England.'

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The School for Scandal.—The Little Corporal.—The Jenkinses.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Isabella.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

SEMIRAMIDE.

[By ROSSINI.]

Semiramis, Queen of Babylon . . . Madame Pasta.
Assaces, Commander in Chief of the Army . . . . . Madame Rubini.
Azema, Princess of the Blood of Belus . . . . . Madame Neuville.
Assur, Prince of the Blood of Belus . . . Signor Lablache.
Idreno, King of India . Signor Curioni.
Oroe, Chief of the Magi . . Signor De Angeli.
Mitranus, Captain of the Royal Guard . . Signor Galli.
Ghost of Ninus . . . Signor . . .

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA BAYADERE.

[Composed by M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Musard.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertram.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]

The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing, 'Away, away to the Mountain's Brew.'
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jacques Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

In the course of the Evening, A. Lee's Overture to 'The Invincibles;' Cherubini's Overture to 'Les Abencerages; and Auber's Overture to 'La Muette de Portici.'

After which the Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Ottavia, Miss Fawcit. Maria Grazie, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge. Nicolo, Mr Webster. Fabio, Mr Hughes.
Albert, Mr H. Wallack. Theodore, Mr J. Vining.
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr Wallack.
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford. Spoletto, Mr Bland.

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

MASANIELLO.

[By M. AUBER.]

Elvira, Miss Byfeld. Fenella, Mrs W. Barrymore. Inis, Miss Chikini.
Masaniello, Mr Sinclair. Don Alphonso, Mr T. Cooke. Pietro, Mr Bedford.
Ruffino, Mr Bland. Lorenzo, Mr Howard. Moreno, Mr Yarnold.

A Spanish Bolero, by Mr Gilbert and Mlle. Rosalia Gust.

On Monday, The Exile; The Waterman; and The Legion of Honour.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss Inverarity. Clorinda, Miss Cawse. Thisbe, Miss Hughes.
Fairy Queen, Miss H. Cawse.
Felix, Mr Wilson. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. Penson.
Alidoro, Mr G. Stansbury. Dandini, Mr Morley. Pedro, Mr Keeley.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hebert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schoenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

MADAME PASTA and Mr BRAHAM.

(Positively for this Night only.)

Mr HARLEY'S Benefit. On Monday next, June 6, 1831.

The Musical Play of THE EXILE. The Principal Characters by Mrs Faucit, Mrs Waylett, Miss Phillips, Mr Macready, Mr Cooper, Mr Horn, Mr Parry, Mr Harley, and Mr Liston. After the Play, Dibdin's Ballad Opera of THE WATERMAN. Tom Tug, Mr Braham, who will introduce several of his most favorite Songs. Madame Pasta will sing two popular Airs. In the course of the Evening, a Variety of Novel Entertainment. To conclude with a Romantic Drama, in which Mrs Waylett, Miss Poole, Mrs Orger, Mr Farren, Mr Liston, Mr Harley, and Mr Dowton, will perform. Tickets, Boxes, and Private Boxes may be taken at the Rotunda, Box Office, and of Mr HARLEY, 14, Upper Gower Street, Bedford Square.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.

MINTER'S SELF-ACTING AND RECLINING CHAIR.

BY THE KING'S LETTERS PATENT.

G. MINTER begs to acquaint the Nobility, Gentry, &c. that he has invented an EASY CHAIR, the positions or elevations of which are so numerous, that the number is quite indefinite, say from one to one thousand, and are obtained by a slight pressure of the back, which not only reclines the back of the chair, but raises the back part of the seat, thereby causing a proper inclined plane, which supports the weakest part of the back at any and every position. When you rise, the back follows you, and should you stop, the back immediately stops; and all this action is obtained without any spring, rack, or other machinery whatever.

G. Minter particularly recommends it to Invalids for its simplicity; if even they have lost the use of either of their hands or legs, they can obtain any position of themselves without any attendance, or exertion on their own part. The chair is made by the Inventor only, in a variety of plain and elegant shapes, at his manufactory, 26 PRINCES STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE (opposite Coventry street), and are sold as cheap as a common fixed easy chair of the same pattern, which is impossible in any other reclining chair, on account of their complicated construction, and which subjects them to be often out of repair, and even dangerous.—G. M. is confident any person honouring him with an inspection of his Chair, will be sufficiently convinced of its superiority over all others. It is also made portable for travelling, and will pack in a case only fourteen inches deep. It is warranted to act perfect fifty years.

SURREY THEATRE.

A New Hibernian Operatic Romance, in Three Acts, entitled

IRELAND: OR THE ROSE OF KERRY.

[By Mr THOMPSON.]

Glorvina, Miss Somerville. Ellen Maguire, Miss M. C. Poole.
Kathleen, Miss Vincent. Judy Magillicuddy, Mme. Simon.
Emmemore, Mr Almar. Bryan O'Connell, Mr C. Hill. Patrick, Mr T. Hill.
Charles Dwyer, Mr Honnor. Father Gerald, Mr Gough.
Dermot, Mr Ransford. Maguire, Mr Young. Howard, Mr Edwin.
Bobby Bloomsbury, Mr Vale. Darby Kelly, Mr D. Pitt.

After which an Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French:—Josephine, Miss M. C. Poole. Fanchon, Mlle. Roser.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.

English:—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin. Serjeant Orderly, Mr Boulanger.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble, Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubbs, Mr Webb.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballad of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Miss Wells. Mrs Mac Toddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Parsons.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

After which, a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

[By Mr BERNARD.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Foster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farrington, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Parsons.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

[By Mr KEPPELL.]

The Music composed by Mr H. P. Hill.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Mrs Saville.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

In the course of the Evening, Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering,' and Rossini's Overture to 'Italiana in Algheri.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—Dragon of Rhodes—Senor Valli's Herculean Feats—J. Cooke's Act of the British Sportsman and the Reaper—Williams's Tourbillons—Equestrianism, by Miss M. A. Cooke—Sir William Button.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Wreck of the Leander, 50.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS' Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPELL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNATH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

N. 236.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1831.

FIRST FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

THE book mentioned below is decidedly the very best history of this great event, that has yet appeared from an English pen: and the reason stares the reader in the face, with all the squalid intensity of a sans-culotte. In other words, the sans-culotte himself stares him in the face. Here is more about the real movers in the revolution, the fiery demagogues, than in any other work. Copious extracts are given from their speeches: we become personally acquainted with Mirabeau, Marat, Robespiere; and not only personally, but hourly: we see what they were at from day to day, and are made strikingly sensible of the nothingness of all the other parties compared with those dreadful blood-letters, who, we greatly fear, must be considered to have been, in those times, a necessary, though horrible evil,—necessary to the eternal non-necessity for them afterwards.

We have also more than usual told us personally about the French court and its weaknesses. We see the well-meaning, the acquiescent, but homely and still narrow-minded Louis, risking the most terrible consequences for the sake of the paltriest distinctions. We have the famous interview of the flushed and indignant Antoinette, terrible in her beauty, with Dumouriez. And the most celebrated documents of the period are laid before us, such as the impudent and infatuated manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick, and the famous letter of the minister Roland, or rather of Madame Roland his wife, to the King; which, we must say, we consider to have been a very foolish production.

In short, this history does not make any great pretensions, as far as authorship is concerned; but it is an admirable compilation from Thiers, Lacretelle, and all the best memoirs on the subject, and may stand the reader instead of a dozen shelves full of revolutionary pamphlets. Without it, he must not consider his general idea of the Revolution complete, even though he possesses Mignet. With it, he may dispense even with that excellent volume.

We must allow ourselves no more room for remarks, having some interesting extracts to make, which will serve to make good what we say.

Court Folly at the Twelfth Hour.—'On the eve of the day on which the States-General were to assemble' (4th May 1789), "the deputies of the three orders accompanied the King in solemn procession to the church of Notre Dame. The full magnificence of the court was put in requisition to shed lustre on the occasion. The clergy came first; the dignitaries enveloped in purple robes and lawn sleeves, those of lower rank in cassocks, cloaks, and square bonnets. The deputies of the tiers-état followed; their prescribed dress being plain to meanness. The noblesse closed the procession, their black mantles glittering with lace, their cravats embroidered, and their hats beplumed, after the fashion of the age of Henry IV. During the procession, it was remarked that the Duke of Orleans, whose privilege it was to walk at the head of the noblesse, regulated his pace so as to be mixed with the commons who preceded him. In the church, distinctions equally invidious as to the seats allotted to the different representatives, were enforced. In short, had the King studied to deaden the kindly feelings of the commons towards his person, he could not have succeeded more effectually.'—P. 18.

The Duke of Orleans (a great rascal)—.'On the Sunday following, the Duke attended the levee of the King, where he met with a most humiliating reception from the courtiers, who were ignorant of what had passed, and from the royalists who were accustomed to visit the château on that day to pay their court to the royal family. Every one crowded about him, elbowed him, pushed him towards the door, and prevented his re-entrance. He then went to the Queen's apartment, where the table was laid for dinner: the moment he appeared, the exclamation of "Gentlemen, take care of the dishes!" was heard from all sides, as if he had been suspected of carrying poison in his pockets.

'The insulting murmurs which his presence excited, forced him to retire without having seen the royal family. He was followed to the Queen's staircase, and whilst descending, some spat on his head, and some on his coat. Rage and revenge was painted on his countenance; and he left the château, convinced that the King and Queen were the instigators of the insults he received, whilst, on the contrary, they were perfectly ignorant of what had happened, and exceedingly grieved when they learned it. He swore at the moment implacable hatred against them, and has shewn himself too faithful to his horrible oath. I (Bertrand de Moleville) was at the château on that day, and witnessed the facts I here relate.—P. 415.

Marat.—A native of Neufchatel; he had cultivated in the former part of his life the science of medicine, and had intrepidly attacked the best established systems, displaying thus early the convulsive disorganization and restless activity of his mind. He was veterinary surgeon to the Count d'Artois, at the commencement of the Revolution. When that new scene of things opened, he involved himself immediately in its disorders, and soon became remarkable in its section. His person was extremely repulsive; being of low stature, a large head, and extensive forehead; his features were strongly marked, his complexion livid, his eye fiery, and his dress slovenly. Such an assemblage of traits would at first sight have provoked laughter, if it had not been checked by a sensation of fear This hideous body, however, was an oracle, whence issued a medley of the most perverted and atrocious maxims, accented by a harsh voice, and proclaimed with the most insolent familiarity. Many thousand heads, he declared, must be brought low, and all the aristocrats who stood in the way of liberty must be got rid of. Whenever he appeared, he was hissed, ridiculed, and insulted for the deformity of his person; but being habituated to logical contests, he soon learned to despise those who despised him, and asserted that they were incapable of understanding his opinions. The subterraneous life he had been accustomed to lead, to conceal himself from the detection of justice, had embittered his temper; and the detestation of the public still further enraged his savageness. Polished manners he considered a vicious obstacle to the establishment of republican equality; and his distempered passions saw only one way of levelling all obstructions that stood in the way of his designs—extermination. His medical studies had cured him of all antipathy to the shedding of blood, and steeled his heart against every emotion of sympathy or consideration. He had only one means of attaining his end, and he desired the appointment of a Dictator, on whom should be imposed the terrible office of purging society. The Dictator, to use his own expression, he would have tied by the leg, that he might always be in the hands of the people. His countrymen were, in his opinion, but niggardly revolutionists. "Give me," was his frequent exclamation, "give me two hundred Neapolitans, armed with poniards, and carrying on the left arm a buckler, and with those I would over-run France, and complete the Revolution." He wished that the assembly, to mark the aristocrats, should order them to wear a white riband on their arms, and give permission to any one to kill them, when they were found three together. Under the name of Aristocrats, he comprehended the Royalists, Feuillans, and Girondists; and if the difficulty of distinguishing them was suggested, he declared that nothing was more easy—for that the patriots could not be deceived, if they fell upon all those who possessed carriages, who kept valets, wore silk, or who attended the theatres.'—P. 159.

Eighth Article of the Manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick.—'The city of Paris and its inhabitants are called upon to submit immediately, and without delay, to the King, to restore him to perfect liberty, and to invest him and all the royal personages with that inviolability, and pay them that respect, which by THE RIGHT OF NATURE AND NATIONS are due from subjects to their sovereign. Their Imperial and Royal Majesties further declare, that all the members of the assembly, of the departments, of the districts, of the national guard of Paris, the justices of the peace, and all others exercising authority, are responsible for all events that may happen at Paris, and that their crimes will be punished with martial law, leaving them no hope of pardon. Their Majesties further declare, on their royal and imperial word, that if the palace of the Tuileries is assaulted or menaced, or the least violence or the smallest outrage offered to their Majesties the King and Queen, or to the royal family; and that if their safety, security, and liberty is not immediately provided for, they will take an exemplary and ever-memorable VENGEANCE on the city of Paris, by delivering it over to a military massacre and total subversion; and that the rebels shall meet that condign punishment their crimes have so well merited. Their Imperial and Royal Majesties promise, on the contrary, to exert their influence with his Most Christian Majesty, to obtain pardon for all their crimes and errors, and to take the most vigorous measures to protect their persons and possessions, on condition of their prompt and literal obedience to the above injunction.'—P. 164.

* The History of the First French Revolution, by John Bell, Esq. Pp. 410. 8vo. Westley.

Digitized by Google

Lafayette (then a Marquis) imprisoned by the Austrians.—'He claimed his liberty but in vain. It was offered him as the price of a retraction, not of all his opinions, but of that, at least, which related to the abolition of nobility. He refused compliance with these terms; and he threatened if any false construction was put on his word, to give the lie to the public officer who recorded it. Chains were the reward of his constancy; and the fortitude and consistency he displayed at this period were quite admirable. The utter annihilation of liberty, which seemed now to be effected, did not dishearten his courage; nor did the dreadful abuse which he had suffered, blind him to its true value. He continued to consider it as the most precious of blessings, and maintained this sentiment both before his oppressors, who had loaded him with chains, and in his private letters to his old friends. "Cherish," said he, to the latter, "cherish always a love of liberty, in spite of the excesses it has apparently led to, and devote yourself to the service of your country." '—P. 182.

Petion's account of the dreadful slaughter of the Royalists, carried on night and day by a popular tribunal, superior to the laws.—'The 2nd of September arrived; the alarum guns were fired, the tocsin sounded. On this signal, the people assembled, rushed into the prisons, and slew and assassinated! Manuel, and many deputies of the national assembly, resorted to these scenes of carnage; their efforts were ineffectual; victims were slaughtered, even in their arms! Alas, I was enjoying a false security; I was ignorant of these massacres, for I had not lately mixed much in public business. Finally, I was informed of them—but how? in a vague, indirect, and partial manner; it was added, at the same time, that all was then over. The most heart-rending details afterwards came to my knowledge; but I was convinced that these horrors would not be again repeated. Nevertheless, they continued. I made urgent applications to the commandant, I required him to protect the prisons by an armed force At first he made me no reply. I applied again. He then told me he had given orders. These orders did not appear to be executed; the massacres continued; I went to the council of the commune I hastened to the Hotel de la Force, with many of my colleagues. The citizens, apparently peaceably disposed, obstructed the street which led to this prison; a very weak guard was posted at its gates. I entered. No, never can the spectacle I there witnessed be effaced from my heart! I saw three municipal officers hanging in their scarfs; I saw two men quietly seated at a table, the prison registers open before them, and calling over the names of the prisoners; others interrogated them; others acted as jurymen and judges; about a dozen of executioners, their naked arms covered with blood,—some with clubs, others with sabres and cutlasses—executed instant sentence on the wretched victims; the citizens waited patiently without, receiving with mournful silence, the sentences of death, and with exclamations of joy those of acquittal.

'Both the judges and executioners seemed to enjoy the same security as if they had been called upon by the law to exercise their functions. They boasted of their justice, of their attention to distinguish the innocent from the guilty, of the services they had rendered to the republic, and they demanded payment for the time spent in these butcheries.

'I addressed them in the austere language of the land. I expressed the deep indignation which I felt. I made them go out before me. But scarcely had I departed when they returned to their work. I again drove them out. But during the night, they completed their horrible butcheries.'—P. 200.

THE TERRIBLE CROCODILE.

It is in the annals of this Grandmaster's (Helion de Villeneuve's) government, that the following legend finds a place. A large serpent or crocodile, for it is described as an amphibious animal, had taken up its abode in a cavern on the brink of a marsh situated at the base of Mount St Stephen, about two miles from the city, from whence it sallied forth frequently in search of prey. Not only cattle, but even men, became its victims; and the whole island trembled at its voracity. Knight after knight, ambitious of the renown of slaying such a monster, stole singly and secretly to its haunt, and never returned. The creature was covered with scales, which were proof against the keenest arrows and darts; and at length the Grandmaster held it his duty to forbid his knights from courting so unequal an encounter. Deodato de Gozon, a knight of the language of Provence, alone failed to respect this prohibition, and resolved to deliver the island from the monster, or perish. Having often reconnoitred the beast from a distance, he constructed a model of wood or pasteboard, and habituated two young bull-dogs to throw themselves under its belly, on a certain cry being given, while he himself, mounted, and clad in armour, assailed it with his lance. Having perfected his arrangements, he bestrode his charger, and rode down privately into the marsh, leaving several confidential attendants stationed in a spot from whence they could behold the combat. The monster no sooner beheld him approach, than it ran, with open mouth, and eyes darting fire, to devour him. Gozon charged it with his lance, but the impenetrable scales turned aside the weapon: and his steed, terrified at the fierce hissing and abominable effluvium of the creature, became so ungovernable that he had to dismount, and trust to his good sword and his dogs. But the scales of the monster were as proof against his falchion as his lance. With a slap of its tail it dashed him to the earth, and was just opening its voracious jaws to devour him, helmet, hauberk, spurs and all, when his faithful dogs gripped it tightly with their teeth in a vulnerable part of the belly. On this the knight quickly sprung to his feet, and thrust his sword up to the hilt in a place which had no scales to defend it. The monster, rearing itself in agony, fell with a tremendous hiss on the knight, and again prostrated him in the dust; and though it instantly gasped its last, so prodigious was its size, that Gozon would have been squeezed to death, had not his attendants, seeing the object of their terror deprived of life, made haste to his assistance. They found their master in a swoon; but after they had with great difficulty drawn him from under the serpent, he began to breathe again, and speedily recovered. The fame of this achievement being bruited in the city, a multitude of people hurried forth to meet him. He was conducted in triumph to the Grandmaster's palace; but that dignitary, heedless of popular acclamation, sternly demanded wherefore he had violated his orders, and commanded him to be carried to prison. At a subsequent meeting of the council, he proposed that the culprit should atone for his disobedience with his life; but this severe sentence was mitigated to a deprivation of habit of the Order. To this degradation he was forced to submit; but in a little time the Grandmaster relented, and not only restored him to his former rank, but loaded him with favours. . . . . In 1346 the Grandmaster, Helion de Villeneuve, terminated his honourable career. It is recorded of him that he paid all the debts of the Order, strengthened and enlarged the fortifications of the city and island, built a church in honour of the Virgin at his own expense, and left a fund sufficient for the maintenance of two chaplains to celebrate mass in it daily for the repose of his soul. Several knights aspired to the honour of being nominated his successor; and the Order was divided as to their comparative merits; the elder brethren arguing, that the new governor ought to be a rigid disciplinarian, while the younger desired only a valiant commander to head them in war, and teach them to win riches and glory. It is told by some historians that among the electors was Deodato de Gozon, the knight who had immortalized himself by slaying the dragon, and who had latterly acted as Villeneuve's lieutenant. On being asked to give his vote, he said, 'When I entered this conclave, I made a solemn vow to give my suffrage in favor of the knight whom I should esteem most deserving of this great dignity, and whose intentions seemed to me most calculated to advance the general good. Having gravely considered the present state of Christendom, the perpetual war which we are sworn to wage with the Infidels, and the resolution and vigour necessary to prevent a relaxation in our discipline—I declare that I myself am the man best qualified to be your Grandmaster.' He concluded this singular address with a fine harangue on his own virtues, in which, of course, his rencontre with the serpent was duly remembered; and the knights, taken by surprise, and filled with admiration at a mode of proceeding, so widely at variance with that which had hitherto been considered becoming in a candidate for the supreme honour, voted by a majority in his favour.—The Achievements of the Knights of Malta.

FIENDISH TRUTH.

In the year 1470, when Mohammed the Second, surnamed the Vanquisher, Emperor of the Turks, attacked the island of Negropont, the ancient Eubœa, the defence of the city devolved on two noble Venetians, John Bondumiero, and Louis Calbo.—Paul Erizzo, another illustrious officer, whose period of service had just expired, and who was on the eve of returning to his native country, with his daughter, a young damsel of great beauty, nobly sacrificed his paternal anxieties to the interests of his country, and procrastinated his departure, that his compatriots might have the advantage of his counsel and his sword. In their first assault, the Turks were repulsed with great slaughter; but a traitor, Thomas of Liburnea, chief cannoneer, having pointed out to them an old and ruinous part of the ramparts, for which act of treachery he lost his life, their artillery speedily effected a vast breach. In their extremity, the besieged, who saw their merciless foes ready to fling themselves headlong into the city, sent a special messenger to Canalis, their admiral in the Ægean, imploring him to hasten to their relief. Supported by the Rhodian squadron, the admiral bore down into the channel; and, as wind and tide were in his favor, it was recommended by a council of war, that the combined fleet should at once attack the bridge across the Euripus, break it down with their cannon, and shut the Turks up in the island. The besieged beheld from their battlements the approach of the flags of St Mark and St John, and already looked upon their perils as ended; even Mohammed himself was startled at the prospect of finding the island a prison, and made preparations for flight; when suddenly, contrary to the urgent entreaties of his captains, and especially of the knights de Cardonne and D'Aubusson, the Venetian admiral, trembling, it is said, for the safety of his only son, who was on board his galley, ordered his helm to be put about, and abandoned the city to its fate.

To the defenders of Negropont this craven act was the sign of doom. Next day, the thirtieth of the siege, Mohammed gave orders for a general assault, and his turbanned slaves poured in thousands into the breach. A horrible slaughter ensued. The ditches were choked with dead, and twice the assailants, after having won the rampart, were beaten back at the point of the lance. At the end of twenty-four hours, unbroken by a respite from slaughter, the besieged gave way, and the Moslems entered the breach over the bodies of Bondumiero, Calbo, and the bravest of their band. The barbarities that were inflicted on the defenceless population, fill so red a page, even in the bloody annals of Moslem warfare, that humanity shrinks from transcribing them. Erizzo still survived; and under his command a devoted remnant slowly retreated into the centre of the city, contesting every inch of ground, and throwing up barricades in every street. Driven at length into the castle, he maintained it for some longer with great bravery: but provisions and ammunition failing, he was at last reduced to agree to a capitulation. Aware of the sanguinary nature of Mohammed, he required a solemn pledge that his life should be spared: and the Sultan swore by his own head, that not a hair of the Venetian's should be injured. But no sooner was Erizzo in his power, than he ordered him to be sawed asunder; scoffingly boasting that he had nevertheless kept his oath, inasmuch as, though he had sworn to spare the head, he was under no bond to spare the sides of his enemy. The gallant Venetian had, as has been already mentioned, a daughter, a lady of surpassing beauty, who was shut up with him during the calamitous siege. When he heard his own doom pronounced, he entreated that he might see her put to death, before he himself was led to slaughter,—for in such circumstances, he considered the grave her only refuge: but his captors sneered at his paternal anxiety, and laughingly told him she was reserved for the harem of the prince. Mohammed was indeed greatly transported with her charms, and the beautiful Anne Erizzo might have shared both his heart and throne, had her soul not revolted at the barbarian who had shed her father's blood. He tried to win her by pouring the riches of the East at her feet; but she disdainfully spurned both his gifts and his persuasions. Filled with fury at finding entreaties and menaces alike ineffectual, his love changed to hate; and in a paroxysm of rage, he suddenly drew his scimitar and struck off her head: thus giving her all that her disconsolate heart desired—a virgin grave.—The Achievements of the Knights of Malta.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

PAGANINI has consented to perform at the concert to be given at the King's Theatre, on the 24th. in aid of the fund for the relief of decayed musicians. This has given much satisfaction to the members of the profession gene ·l

COURSE OF THE NIGER.—There is now in the possession of Mr Brewer, at the St James's street Library, an old map, printed at Amsterdam, in which the Niger is distinctly laid down throughout its whole course to Biafra, where, agreeably to the recent discovery, it falls into the sea.—Brighton Gazette.

POWER OF MUSICAL EXPRESSION.—It is said of Pacchierotti, that on one occasion, when playing at Rome the character of Arbaces, he pronounced the three words, 'Eppur sono innocente,' in so touching a manner, that the very orchestra stopped: a short symphony, which should have immediately succeeded his declaration of innocence, was neglected; and on his demanding, somewhat angrily, of the leader, what he and his subordinates were about? the flattering answer was, 'Sir, we are weeping!'—Harmonicon.

FERDINAND 'THE BELOVED.'—Madame de Vigo, who has very laudably been turning an accomplishment to a useful account during the last three or four years in London, and supporting by her vocal talents her husband, a proscribed officer of high rank in the constitutional army of Spain, lately ventured to enter her native country on private business of some importance to her family, and was immediately seized by order of Ferdinand, and cast into a dungeon, charged with the heinous crime of having maintained General de Vigo and her children during their exile! How long will this man be suffered to disgrace a noble people, and pollute a Christian throne?—Harmonicon.

A RELISHING SYMPHONY.—The most singular spit in the world is that of the Count de Castel Maria, one of the most opulent Lords of Treviso. This spit turns 130 different roasts at once, and plays 24 tunes; and whatever it plays corresponds to a certain degree of cooking, which is perfectly understood by the cook. Thus a leg of mutton, à l'Anglaise, will be excellent at the 12th air; a fowl, à la Flamande, will be juicy at the 18th, and so on. It would be difficult, perhaps, to carry farther the love of music and gourmanderie.

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF MOZART'S DON GIOVANNI IN ENGLAND.—A German acquaintance had brought over with him a score of the Don Giovanni. Mozart's operas were new, almost unknown, in this country; a party of us united to copy out the orchestral parts, in the distribution of which either the second horn, or tenor trombone, or some equally important instrument, fell to my share. An amateur, whose name shall be rescued from oblivion if these lines can do it—Mr Hayward—lent us his floor cloth manufactory to perform in; and, with the exception of the Clemenza di Tito, brought out by Mrs Billington for her benefit in 1806, the first opera of Mozart's ever heard in this country was got up by a party of amateurs, and performed, oratorio fashion, without action, amidst the mingled effluvia of canvas, oil, and turpentine.—Autobiography in Harmonicon for June.

ANTIQUE COINS.—While these sheets were passing through the press, I received a letter from an honourable and learned friend, containing the following passage, relating to a discovery in Zetland: 'Within a few weeks the workmen taking up the foundation of an old wall, came on a hearth-stone, under which they found a horn, surrounded with massive silver rings, like bracelets, and filled with coins of the Heptarchy, in perfect preservation. The place of finding is within a very short distance of the (supposed) residence of Norna of the Fitful-head.' Thus one of the very improbable fictions of the tale is verified by a singular coincidence.—Waverley Novels, Vol. XXV. (Pirate, Vol. II.)

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Semiramide.—La Bayadere.
DRURY-LANE.—The Legion of Honour.—The Brigand.—Masaniello.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

KING'S THEATRE.

WE saw Madame PASTA on Saturday night in Semiramide. It is not a fine opera; and up to a certain point she appeared to take little interest in it. ROSSINI's forte is not tragedy. He is a sort of great overgrown boy of a genius, as full of spirits as if he had just come from school; and spirits are accordingly what he excels in. He can express joy, delight, congratulation, a revelry in merry feelings, and his love is not to be despised. In tragedy he can do little, except when he is to surprise you with an agitato, or sound an alarum, or beat a couple of unexpected drums. There is some good supernatural work of this sort in the piece before us. But this, be it known, like all other horrors, is the easiest part of tragedy. The least dabbler on the piano-forte can get up a few grim notes by 'having at' the black keys. ROSSINI is still himself in these passages. He is the wild fellow, putting on a grim face, and shewing you how well he can play the ghost. PASTA did not appear to be at all 'taken in' by him. She did not believe him in earnest; and nothing affects her but the truth. Semiramide (the famous Semiramis) is a queen who has killed her husband, and fallen, unknowingly, in love with her son, whom she is about to marry. She is a Clytemnestra and Jocasta united, not without a power to be awakened to better feelings than the Argive woman. The ghost of her husband comes, during the bridal ceremony, to forbid the banns. ROSSINI makes him stand and sing an immense while, in a door-way, enveloped in a blue mist; and PASTA would not feel his presence at all, notwithstanding the fright of the by-standers, and the words horror, shade, and tomb.

In the scene of explanation however with her son, she allowed herself to be moved. It is the best in the piece, with a good deal of tenderness in it. Madame RUBINI, (who when acting by herself makes efforts at strength which only shew her weakness, and breaks down under what she attemps) appears to be inspired beyond herself when she has PASTA's accompaniment to sustain her. (She acted the son). Their voices accorded well in the beautiful duos in this scene; and the majesty, the grace, the tenderness of PASTA, were all drawn out. Now she waved her arms in fifty beautiful attitudes, beautiful because natural: now she crossed them over her bosom, as if she had become once more sensible that she had a heart to cherish there; now she resumed her majestic will, and moved with her fine profile along the stage, queen-like, looking like one of the queens in a pictured story-book, with her radiated crown, and the piece of drapery flowing from the back of her head. But above all, most beautiful was the manner in which she embraced her son. Her son forgives her for her sorrow, and opens his arms to receive her. She precipitates herself towards his bosom, and in the very act of being received, feels a sudden penitential misgiving, which induces her to withold her arms from clasping him. She is clasped in his, but remains leaning against him, with her hands piteously folded. The house is silent, and the tears come into their eyes.

LA BLACHE is very loud in this piece; very loud and very fine, but too loud, we think, for the women who sing duets with him. He swallows them up like an ogre. The voice of this very powerful singer seems as if it came out of a body lined with brass. If one of the giants at Guildhall were to astonish a city dinner some day by taking a part in a glee, he would sing like LABLACHE. Or as a lady next whom we had the pleasure of sitting, observed, an elephant might sing like him. We fancy we see the inspired bulk opening his mouth, and exhaling the mighty music,—the essence of nine trombones.

A crowded house stayed to witness the performance of TAGLIONI (who is engaged a few nights longer) in La Bayadere (the Dancing Girl), a ballet with one of the best plots we remember,—simple, striking, and new. The god Vishnu, for some misdemeanour, is condemned, 'like another Apollo,' to a sojourn upon earth, till he finds somebody to love him with an affection surpassing mortality. An old Sultan has some girls dancing before him; the principal one falls in love with the disguised deity, and enrages the Sultan, who sends his rival to the stake. The stake is prepared, the god ascends it, the fire is about to be applied. The despairing girl, in spite of all attempts to detain her, rushes towards it, and insists upon sharing her lover's fate. Clouds descend, and envelope the divine pair, who in a few moments appear among them ascending to heaven. There is a second principal dancer, who is a sort of rival of the other both in dancing and love; and this part is performed by Mademoiselle BROCARD.

Digitized by Google

The book of the entertainments candidly observes, that 'there is not so much display' in this ballet, as might be expected from a sketch of the plot. 'It is exclusively an exhibition of dancing,' which, adds the book, 'is indeed of the very highest order.' A high order we allow; but we must beg leave to think, not of the very highest. We need not again enter into the reason we gave the other day for our opinion of TAGLIONI. She has wonderful ease, grace, and power; but she wants enthusiasm. Her face is not a millionth part so good as her feet: we mean, it is comparatively insipid and a non-entity, while the feet and legs are doing all sorts of things that, we should imagine, ought to put a little more expression in to it. She is a fine contradiction to the usual frippery of the French school of dancing; and in this lies the whole secret of her success. Mademoiselle BROCARD is one of the best specimens of that school, and has a livelier look and more piquant figure than TAGLIONI, not without a great deal of ease and grace also, though certainly inferior to the other. TAGLIONI does much that is very surprising, yet nothing extravagant. BROCARD now and then throws up her leg in such a way, that it seems as if it turned upwards in the socket, and would hitch over her shoulder, like the legs of the figure in the toy-shops.

There is a curious little evidence of the different characters of these two dancers, and of the instinct which gives TAGLIONI the advantage. BROCARD has a head-dress in this piece, knowingly put on. She 'sets her cap' at the audience. TAGLIONI has no head-dress at all: she is attired as simply as possible. It was thus (to make use of a simile in the grand style) that NAPOLEON'S Marshals figured round about him, in embroidered coats, and hats full of plumes; while the great chieftain predominated in a plain cocked-hat, and a great coat of pepper and salt.

We must not omit the beautiful shawl dance, executed by the whole corps de ballet. TAGLIONI disappointed us in it. We expected more variety. But the general dance itself is very striking and elegant, particularly when the performers (whom we are to suppose ladies of the Sultan's haram) coyly make a wall of their shawls, every now and then, extinguishing their whole line, and then gaily burst from betwixt them, full of mirth and gay colours; for they are beautifully dressed.

[Errata, in Saturday's paper, in the remarks upon Mr Wordsworth's poetry. For "any part of God's creation" read every part:—for "compounding," confounding;—and for "unless it will come round," unless it will come round to certain points of unnecessary doctrine.]

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

For the Benefit of Mr Harley.

The Operatic Play, in Four Acts, called

THE EXILE.

The Empress Elisabeth, Mrs Faucit. Katharine, Mrs Waylett.
Sedona, Miss Faucit. Old Villager, Mrs Broad. Alexina, Miss Phillips.
Daran, Mr Macready. Count Ulric, Mr Cooper.
Governor of Siberia, Mr Farren. Count Calmar, Mr Horn.
Baron Altradoff, Mr Liston. Servitz, Mr Harley. Yermak, Mr Hammerton.
Welzein, Mr Yomge. The Patriarch, Mr Thompson.

In the course of the Piece, the Coronation of Elizabeth.

After which, the Ballad Opera of

THE WATERMAN.

[By Mr DIBDIN.]

[Mrs Bundle, Mrs C. Jones. Wilhelmina, Miss Pearson.
Tom Tug, Mr Braham. Bundle, Mr W. Bennett. Robin, Mr Harley.

In the course of the Evening, a Variety of Singing.

A New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]
The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing 'Away, away to the Mountain's Brow.'
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

To-morrow, The Iron Chest; The Soldier's Widow; and The Battle of Waterloo.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Juliet, Miss F. Kemble. Lady Capulet, Mrs Lovell. Nurse, Mrs Gibbs.
Romeo, Mr Abbott. Prince Escalus, Mr Henry.
Paris, Mr Parry. Montague, Mr Turnour. Capulet, Mr Egerton.
Benvolio, Mr Holl. Tybalt, Mr Baker. Mercutio, Mr C. Kemble.
Friar Lawrence, Mr Evans. Friar John, Mr Mears. Apothecary, Mr Meadows.
Page, Miss Fortescue. Balthazar, Mr Irwin. Abram, Mr Heath.
Samson, Mr Fuller. Gregory, Mr Norris. Peter, Mr Keeley.
In Act I. A Masquerade and Dance.
In Act V. The Funeral Procession of Juliet, and a Solemn Dirge.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.

Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Azor and Zemira; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Baker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,)" Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

After which an Historical, Allegorical, and Pictorial Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Madame Bertrand, Madame Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Katty O'Neal, Madame Simon. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
English:—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

To conclude with, an Imitative Interlude, in One Act, entitled

CHARLEY OVER THE WATER.

Mary Primrose, assuming the Character of The Right Hon. Miss Matilda Rosabella Florina Flitterflutter, Madame Simon.
Farmer Primrose, Mr Gough. Squire Scapegrace, Mr Maitland.
Launcelot Longface, Mr Asbury.
Charley Primrose, assuming the Characters of Pady O'Whack, Archibald Malapropos, Fribble, Hercules Hannibal Sureshot, Mr C. Hill.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN: OR, THE ELECTION.

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Barnett. Jeremy, Mr H. Cooke. John, Mr Davis.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

After which, a Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballad of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Mrs Wells. Mrs Mac Toddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Porteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

To conclude with a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

[By Mr BERNARD.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Figaro;' Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering;' and Winter's Overture to 'Il Ratto di Proserpina.'

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

KING RICHARD THE THIRD.

Duke of Glo'ster, Mr Kean.

After which,

THE HAPPIEST DAY OF MY LIFE.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon —M. Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant —The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by J. ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by J. CHAPPEL; E. WILSON, Royal Exchange; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; W. KENNETH, Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at THE TATLER OFFICE, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 237.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1831.

CASE OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERATURE.

A considerable degree of indignation has been excited in the public press by a circumstance, which cannot be better told than in the following passages from an article on the subject in the current number of the Englishman's Magazine. We do not agree however with all that the Magazine has proceed to say upon it; and after making the extracts, we shall give our reasons why.

'The "Royal Society of Literature" was instituted in 1824, under the patronage of the late King, assisted by the zealous exertions of the learned Bishop of Salisbury. It consists, at present, of 248 members, each of whom, with the exception of ten Royal Associates, contributes to the general fund, sums, varying from two to ten guineas per annum, in addition to not unfrequent and liberal benefactions. The Royal Associates, on the other hand, have hitherto received one hundred guineas each from the King's annual bounty: and another hundred guineas, derived from the same source, have been applied to the purchase of medals, which have been presented, at the rate of two a year, to the most distinguished British and Foreign Literati. This, be it observed in passing, with two medals placed at the disposal of the Councils of the Royal Society, and of the Society of Antiquaries, is all that the Crown has ever done for the advancement of science or literature in Britain.* That in the present instance these small rewards of merit have never been indiscreetly disposed of, the list of celebrated parsonages, upon whom they have heretofore been conferred, will abundantly testify. It contains the name of Mitford the historian of Greece, Angelo Mai, librarian of the Vatican, Major Rennell the geographer, Wilkins, the eminent Orientalist, Professor Schweighæuser, Dugald Stewart, Scott, Southey, Crabbe, Archdeacon Coxe, W. Roscoe, and Baron Silvestre de Sacy. And justly renowned and deserving of distinction as this illustrious groupe of authors is, it is scarcely richer in characters who have toiled their laborious way to the highest summits of fame, than the selection of individuals who now form the body of "Royal Associates." They are, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the Rev. Edward Davies, Dr Jamieson, the indefatigable compiler of the Scottish Dictionary, the Rev. T. R. Malthus, Mathias, author of the Pursuit of Literature, James Millengen, Esq., Sir William Ouseley, William Roscoe, the Rev. Henry J. Todd, and Sharon Turner. It is our painful duty to add, that four of the gentlemen whose names we have given, and perhaps the most conspicuous of the number, are actually, or in a great measure, dependent for their subsistence on the paltry pittance which they receive from the funds of the Society.

'Think, benevolent and enlightened reader; and Oh! think of it with more than pity! that some of those under the influence of whose pages many of your most blessed and instructive hours have been spent, and whose career of worldly prosperity has been thwarted not by evil propensities or luxurious indolence, but that, by the unwearied toil of their great genius and understandings, they might establish themselves in the memories and direct the virtues of future ages; only think of such men, in the evening of their days, and the sterile winter of their minds, being reduced to the necessity of prizing a wretched pension which many of your illiterate and soulless menials would scorn! But--shall we be believed when we state it?—intimation has actually been given on the part of the Crown, to Mr Coleridge and his brother associates, that they must expect their allowances "very shortly" to cease. Such is the melancholy, and, our feelings compel us to say, most disgraceful fact.'

The Magazine, assuming that a minister of Lord Brougham's influential and literary character cannot be without his share of blame in the transaction, proceeds to contrast it with his toleration of the Pension List, and his advocacy of retiring salaries of two hundred a year for the seventy preposterous Commissioners of Bankrupts. The King is assumed to be an unconscious party in the matter, and the Chancellor is recommended to tell him how the case stands, and to further its proper settlement. Quotations are then made from Mr Nicholas and Mr Babbage, to shew that government ought to patronize, at all events, certain directions of intellectual ability, the scientific and historical for instance: and the article concludes as follows:—

'Even of the great poets of our own day, not to go farther back in the history of our literature, who, we should like to know, with the single exceptions of Sir Walter Scott, Lord Byron, and Tom Moore, has ever received any adequate pecuniary recompense for the exercise of his talents? Seventy pounds for writing in an annual, is the sum total we believe, that Mr Wordsworth has hitherto earned by his works. We question whether Coleridge has been fortunate enough to obtain so much; and it is no secret among booksellers, that some of Southey's finest poems have never defrayed the mere expenses of publication. We have been told, moreover, that Mr Murray has had a long poem of Crabbe's many years in his hands, the cost of printing which, he has, up to the present moment, been deterred from hazarding. Facts such as these are worth a folio of speculative arguments, and we apprehend, entirely relieve us from the necessity of any farther discussion. Earl Grey once exclaimed most indignantly, in his place in the House of Peers, against the ungenerousness of the Scotch towards their immortal countryman, Burns. We trust he still retains the same feelings by which he was influenced on the occasion alluded to, and that he will now prevent his native land from incurring a description of reproach which, in former days, he so eloquently and enthusiastically stigmatised.

We agree heartily with the deduction implied in the first portion of this article; we doubt the second part; and we confess that we totally differ with the general inferences contained in the last. In other words, we think it a 'disgraceful fact' indeed, if the government have withdrawn the pensions from the men of letters alluded to; but we doubt whether Lord Brougham could have contemplated their withdrawal, in the spirit imputed to him; and we are strongly of opinion, that governments, in their present state of imperfection, have, or ought to have, nothing to do with men of letters, nor men of letters (as pensioners) with them.

It may be asked, how we reconcile this last opinion with the first. Very easily: because it is one thing to deprive men of what they have been accustomed to, and induced, perhaps wholly necessitated to depend on; and another, to continue the system in future.

The Commissioners of Bankrupts were, we grant, (and so does the Noble Lord) 'enormously overpaid,' and yet though we should not agree with his Lordship in recommending retiring pensions for all of them (however we can understand the natural wish of a statesman in his position to sweeten the bitterness of reform), we should say, that where the two hundred pounds had become a matter of serious importance, and the Commissioner deserved consideration, it would have been a hard thing to take it away. But if we think this, which must of necessity partake of an assumption, and which concerns men bred up in a thriving profession, how much harder must we think it to take the money he has depended upon from the man of letters? from a man who has, probably delighted or instructed the community (perhaps both); whose anxieties are doubled by the sensibility and imagination that have made him the delightful instructor; and who by the very nature of what has rendered him most useful to the world; has probably been incapacitated from pursuing his worldly advantages?

If the government have objections to any political opinions entertained by some of the gentlemen in question (which is probably the case:—and we have still greater ones for that matter) surely it is beneath its dignity to manifest them in this sort of way. If it thinks any of them over-paid,—if there are some who are otherwise provided for, and do not, or ought not to want the two hundred pounds, would it not be better to say so, and candidly state the reasons? A resumption of the monies on that account would indeed not only be reasonable, but a matter of duty; and we should not care who lost it, whether Mr Malthus or Mr Roscoe. If the resumption did not proceed upon this principle, or upon some other sufficing one which the public are not acquainted with (and which it will be very necessary to make them acquainted with, should the measure have taken place), it is not to be expected that the ministers will regard all the losers of pensions with the same eyes. The Tory part may be suffered to go their ways, to get what lodging and make what breakfast they can: but will not some snug reconciling corners be found out for the Whig?

On the other hand we are to suppose perhaps, that government,

* See Observations on Historical Literature, by Nicholas Harris Nicolas, Esq. Vol. I. No. II.

Digitized by Google

even should it carry the measure into effect, will act impartially still, and provide for the impoverished associates in some better manner, with no regard to their opinion. Mr Malthus for instance, if he become poor, might have the salary of his professorship increased. Mr Malthus we requested to accept a place in the pension-list, in consideration, not of the politics in his Pursuits of Literature, but of the pains he has taken to give his countrymen a taste for Italian Literature; and Mr Roscoe might be invited to take a place under government, or have a present made him for his elegant histories, and his own liberality in all liberal causes.

This however would only be breaking up an establishment founded by Tories (for such is the Royal Society of Literature) and transferring its materials into the hands of Whig patronage.

For our parts, we plainly confess, that we are averse to all interferences of government with the Republic of letters; and to all hamperings of themselves with power, on the part of its members. We dislike Royal Societies of all kinds; we think (and have great reasons to think from the histories of all of them) that they never produced any great geniuses, that they have perplexed, and dishonoured many, and that from their nature and connexion with an influence they have nothing to do with genius, (perhaps is instinctively opposed to it), they have a tendency to degenerate, and always do degenerate, into mere corporate bodies of intriguers, in which the baser spirits naturally get the ascendancy.—Indeed all corporate bodies conferring honours and emoluments, have this tendency.—Such has been the case with philosophical societies, with painting societies, with musical societies, with literary societies: and what is very curious, the only exception we ever heard of, at once disproved the rule, and shewed that the society did good to nobody: for when the advancement of knowledge in France grew too powerful for the court, that very circumstance, aided by that natural jealousy of titular and extrinsic authority, which is an intellectual instinct, threw the leading members of the French Academy right into the arms of the public. Voltaire himself was one of the 'Gentlemen of the King's Bed-chamber,' and had regard enough for the designation to sign it occasionally in his letters! Yet now there is nothing in his history which strikes us as a more ludicrous feature, and Voltaire was the greatest man in the Academy. These royal societies are only good for petty purposes and petty men. See what a poor shew their Royal Society of Literature makes! but it would make a far poorer, if all the names were set down! It can boast of one man of genius, we grant: (Mr Coleridge) he is a great and good humoured casuist, and has a right to make himself easy with a thing convenient to him, since his genius is of that reconciling order. The society has also a few names of undoubted talent, But where are all the names of talent and genius that do not belong to it, and that nothing, we suspect, would induce to belong to it? Who wants their stamp on his back, if he is worth anything? and what is the stamp worth, even with the word 'royal' about it, Mr Robinson's sheep in Peter Pindar, were stamped after a similar fashion, and were turned out of the market for being incompetent mutton.

'If a man of letters, who is an honest man besides, can go all lengths with a government, let him, in the name of God, help it, and be blessed by it, as much as he can: but still let him not accept titles which no government can bestow without an absurdity. Let him be cautious how he commits himself in every respect, "for better, for worse:" for it is out of the most precious part of his talent, perhaps out of the very pains and difficulty with which he makes his way though conventional difficulties, that society is to be most benefited; and this part he owes eminently to society at large, and not to any modification or management of it. For ourselves, who may speak on the subject, as members of the common body of literature, and who live equally out of the pale of government and influence, and of the patronage of the great, we should say, that supposing us to be in want of patronage and in possession of talent enough to make it an honour to notice us, our supposing that we went sufficiently out in the world to attract it, and procure great friends, we had much rather be indebted to private munificence than to royal or ministerial, in other words, (for it only amounts to that) we would much rather have some great and comparatively private friend, rich enough to assist us, and amiable enough to render obligation delightful, than become the public property of any man, or of any government. We should have hated the lot, however we might have envied the genius of Racine and Boileau and other paid flatterers of Louis XIV; and we should not chuse to have been paid for flattery, and said nothing. If a divinity had given us our choice in these times, we should have said, 'Make us Molière, whose genius gets him riches, and at the same time enabled him to dispense with wordly honours:' (for Molière, by the way, the most original genius of that time, was never admitted into the academy). If we could not have attained to this lot (for we hardly dare in this commercial country to mention another proviso) we should have said "Make us La Fontaine, who goes and lives twenty years with some rich friend, as innocent of any harm in it as a child, and who writes what he thinks charming verses, sitting all day under a tree." —This is not the style in England: and perhaps, for the sake of what England and all the world are to be some day, it is better that it should not be so. It is better perhaps that as much should be got out of writers and reformers as possible, at whatever expence to themselves; since want and uneasiness are more powerful movers than a quiet lot. At least, this is a consolatory reflection to those who can afford sorrow still less than expense, and who may happen (supposing any such person to be in it) to be turned out of the funds of the Royal Society. We advise him to begin writing and reforming with all his might and main.

[Since the above was written, the following letter has appeared in the Times. We confess we do not understand the spirit in which the sum of 200*l.* was offered to Mr Coleridge in lieu of his pension, and do not wonder that he refused it:—]

'TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

'Sir,—In consequence of a paragraph which appeared in the Times of this day, I think it expedient to state the fact respecting Mr Coleridge as it actually is. On the sudden suppression of the Royal Society of Literature, with the extinction of the honours and annual honoraria of the Royal Associateships, a representation in Mr Coleridge's behalf was made to Lord Brougham, who promptly and kindly commended the case to Lord Grey's consideration. The result of the application was, that a sum of 200*l.*, the one moiety to be received forthwith, and the other the year following, by a private grant from the Treasury, was placed at Mr Coleridge's acceptance; but he felt it his duty most respectfully to decline it, though with every grateful acknowledgment of the prompt and courteous attention which his case had received from both their Lordships.

'I remain, Sir, your's respectfully,

'James Gillman.

'Highgate, June 3.'

NEW SERIES OF NOVELS.*

This series is intended to comprise the best novels of Fielding, Smollett, Goldsmith, Sterne, Swift, Cervantes, Le Sage, Defoe, &c.—of those, in short, which have attained the reputation of classical, and are not of modern, or at least of very recent date. The first two volumes (all that are yet published) contain 'Robinson Crusoe,' the work to which Daniel Defoe principally owes his reputation, although he is equally entitled to remembrance and admiration for his inflexible integrity, and his straight-forward pursuit of good and manly objects, regardless of the virulence of enemies, and the lukewarmness and ingratitude of partisans and pretended friends. The purchasers of these volumes will be able to form their own opinion of Defoe, as a man as well as an author; for while they will here renew their youthful delight in the perusal of his matchless fiction, they will derive no less pleasure in contemplating, in the well-condensed narrative of his chequered life, prefixed to the first volume, how estimable he was both in his public and private relations with society, to which he studied to do good, indefatigably and without ostentation.

The volumes are illustrated by several etchings by George Cruickshank, which to superficial observation may appear to want finish. On examination, they will be found to be the sketches of a master hand, and really illustrations of the characters and scenery of the novel. The volumes are tastefully got up; the binding is of glazed calico watered, of a pale colour, and the very labels are novel and elegant. 'Humphry Clinker,' by Smollett, is to follow.

Ornithological History of British Birds. By Colonel C. Montagu, F.S.S. Second edition. With a Plan of Study, and many New Articles and Original Observations. By James Rennie, A.M. A.L.S. 8vo. pp. 592. Hurst, Chance, and Co.

We are happy to see a new edition of this admirable work, which has been long out of print; and we congratulate the public,—more especially the students of Natural History,—that it has fallen into such competent hands, as to ensure improvement wherever there is addition. Mr Rennie is one of the few naturalists who study nature in the original, who seek her in her favourite haunts, and converse with her tête-à-tête. The 'plan of study' which he recommends, is no other than a pursuit of the same course. He would have the student not content himself with book knowledge

* The Novelist's Library, edited by Thomas Roscoe, Esq. with Illustrations from original designs. (To be published monthly, uniform with the Waverley Novels.) London, Cochrane and Pickersgill. 1831.

Digitized by Google

nor altogether reject it, but refer to books only when he seeks answers to questions which Nature herself has proposed to him. We fully agree with him, that Nature will never be understood by those who content themselves with studying books, many of which are written by persons but little conversant with her; and we accord in the opinion, that more is to be learnt by one observant walk in the fields or woods, than by weeks of mere reading. But we think our author goes a little too far, when he says, that, by his plan, 'any person, with a little care, may become a tolerably good naturalist, the first walk he takes in the fields, without much knowledge of books.'

Mr Rennie has a chapter on the Linnæan system, in which he touches upon the merits and demerits of its illustrious author, in other branches of natural history, particularly in botany, which is considered as having been his favourite pursuit, and that in which he was most successful. It has been the fashion of late to undervalue Linnæus. Some writers have even spoken of him with a disrespect far more degrading to themselves than to him. Mr Rennie does not join in this outcry against a man who has done so much for the science, but we think he scarcely does him justice. He truly observes, that the several systems of Linnæus are merely an index to the book of Nature; but he admits that it is 'a miraculous index.' He objects, that Linnæus had narrow views of science. System itself, he observes, is a mere cabinet, with compartments for depositing a variety of little facts, which, 'scattered through the memory at random,' would be in danger of being lost. But the grounds upon which certain articles are placed in the same compartment, and their relative connection with neighbouring compartments, led to conjectures and enquiries of infinite importance, and if Linnæus did not follow up these enquiries, it should be remembered that he had a great work before him. He found the productions of Nature thrown together in chaotic confusion; he so arranged them as to enable his successors to distinguish one from the other, with a readiness that left them leisure to examine their history and qualities; and surely he is not to be accused of narrow views, who undertook and executed a task of such magnitude. His object was to prepare for the world what Mr Rennie justly terms the alphabet of Natural History; and is it a subject of regret, or of reproach, that, having formed a few of the letters, he did not proceed to compound words and sentences, and so leave his alphabet unfinished? Upon this principle we might pull down the fame of some of the greatest founders of systems, and even of society,—from Bacon up to Cadmus. Bacon discovered little, except the necessity for discovery; yet it is to him we owe all that we have discovered since. When Linnæus wrote, the great desideratum was an alphabet and grammar,—he gave us that alphabet and grammar; and it is our business to study the language of Nature, by their help. We have no right to complain that the grammar is not an epic poem, or to blame its author if half-witted people mistake it for such. To mistake the means for the end, is an error not confined to botany or to natural history. How many boys lose the best years of their lives in learning the dead languages, who make little or no use of them when acquired? Are we, therefore, to blame the writers of the grammars and dictionaries, because they were not Virgil, Horace, and Homer? Linnæus never professed to be fully acquainted with the works of Nature, but to have enabled others to study them with facility. Even supposing that other systems may be discovered, that are thought more efficacious, does that lower the merit of Linnæus? He did much for his time and means, but it does not follow that he should have cast behind him the knowledge of all future ages. It is well known, and has often been observed with regard to Newton himself, that the knowledge of a child in one age would have sufficed to make a sage in a former. The more plainly young people are made to distinguish the means from the end, and to recognize system for neither more nor less than it is, the better it will be for all parties; but to complain that the means are not the end, is about as wise as if a man of twenty should complain that shoes did not fit him at that age which were made for him at ten.

The prefatory matter furnished to the Ornithological Dictionary is not all that the editor has added to the original work. Many facts and observations are scattered through it, under the heads to which they refer; and as the editor is as little disposed as the original author to take things for granted, the additions are all more or less valuable. The following passage is one among many that shew Mr Rennie to be an observer, not a compiler:—

'Amongst our larger birds the magpie excels all her congeners in architectural skill, though several of the older naturalists were inclined to attribute to her more ingenuity than facts will corroborate. Albertus Magnus, for example, says, "she not only constructs two passages for her nest, one for entering, and another for going out, but frequently makes two nests on contiguous trees, with the design of misleading plunderers, who may as readily choose the empty nest as the one containing the eggs; on the same principle that Dionysius the Tyrant had thirty sleeping rooms." Others maintain that the opening opposite the passage is for the tail of the mother magpie while hatching; but before speculating upon the use of this, it would have been well to ascertain its existence; for among the numerous magpie's nests which I have seen, (two very perfect ones are now before me) the alleged second opening is by no means apparent, though in some instances the twigs may appear more loosely woven than in others, but seldom so much so, I think, as to admit a passage to the bird.'

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—The Exile—The Waterman—The Legion of Honour.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Romeo and Juliet—Napoleon Buonaparte.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

ANOTHER new trifle was produced here last night, called My Friend from Town, or the Election. It is attributed to Mr LUNN. It is a pity the author has given it the second title, because, though there really is an election in the piece, the name looks just now like a trick; and if tricks succeed at first (which is doubtful) they are sure to do harm in the long-run. If we did not pique ourselves on our impartiality, we confess, for one, that we should be always set against a new production by the appearance of a trick. Perhaps we are so in the present instance, for in justice to the author, we must say that the audience saw things to applaud in it, where they were invisible to us. On the other hand, we must confess that some were passed over, which might equally as well have been approved. We do not quite understand the audiences at this theatre. They are very good-natured, but as unaccountably silent on some occasions as they are laudatory on others. Is it dullness? or what is it? If they are friends who do not think themselves justified in condemning, how is it that they do not approve? And if not, what is it that makes them so capricious? The performers often go through a whole first act, with little or no signs of existence on the part of the beholders; which, critics as we are, has often made us feel for them. By the time the curtain has risen for the second act, the house has waked up, and then an applause ensues, as unaccountable as the previous silence. One would think that the neighbourhood had not yet recovered the novelty of having a theatre among them, and that they took time every night to digest their amazement. Or has the Tabernacle made them timid?

We know not what to say of the plot of the new piece. It is of a very rambling kind, and yet confined to the exhibition of a character or two. Mr Pump, a shoemaker (WILKINSON) is ambitious of being a member of a literary society; and Sir Omnibus Dabble, a general busy body (Mr GREEN) undertakes to secure his election. Pump hopes at the same time to secure Sir Omnibus for his daughter, but the latter is in love with a young gentleman, who engages the knight's epistolary talents in aid of his application to the father; and as Sir Omnibus is not made acquainted with the names of the parties, he is accessory to the old trick of plotting against himself. The upshot is, that the knight is not married, and the shoemaker not elected; and the young gentleman succeeds, as all young gentlemen do in farces. The best scene in the piece is perhaps that in which the would-be academician gives a specimen of his abilities before one of the electors, in a touching account of the natural history and properties of the donkey; the inference from which was obvious. There are some good puns; and WILKINSON made his usual quaint air and incompetency effective; and GREEN, not being tickled into an excess of the fidgets by a foppish character, performed in a more solid style than we have yet seen him. But the piece can hardly have a run. There is such a zealous variety of pieces at this theatre, that it deserves to succeed; but they are apt to have no stamina.

THE LIVING PAINTERS, No IV. [Messrs Collins, Daniel, and Cooper] will appear to-morrow.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A Courtier Reproved by a King.—Philip the second, of Spain, having granted a general amnesty to a rebellious city, with the exception of certain persons, a courtier informed him of the place where a gentleman was hidden who was not included in the amnesty. "You would have done better," said the king, "to have gone and told him that I am here than to come and tell me where he is."

Infallibility Corrected.—In 1586 Philip the second of Spain sent the young constable of Castile to Rome to congratulate Sixtus the Fifth upon his exaltation. The Pontiff, dissatisfied at the youth of the Ambassador, pettishly said "Is your master deficient in men, that he has sent me an Ambassador without a beard."—"If my Sovereign had thought," replied the proud Spaniard, "that the merit consisted in the beard, he would no doubt have sent you a goat, and not a gentleman like me."

The Greek Kalends.—Lord Londonderry, who is something of a literary character, has discovered the period pointed out by the Greek Kalends, hitherto supposed to be unapproachable; for we find it stated in the papers, that when asked at what time he intended to have his windows—those demolished at Holdernesse House the night of their non-illumination—repaired, he answered, 'not until the defeat of the Reform Bill' We are right, then, in fixing these repairs at the Greek Kalends, and recommend patience to the family glazier.—Globe.

Chinese Piety.—In this village (Baitenzorg, in Batavia), there is a street nearly a mile long inhabited solely by Chinese. We called at several of their houses, and found in each an idol of some kind. That which most surprised us was a French engraving of the Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte, in a gilt frame, before which incense was burning; and the old man to whom the picture belonged, in our presence, paid it divine honours, bowing himself in various antic attitudes, and offering a prayer for blessings upon himself and family. When we asked him why he worshipped that as a god, which came from Europe, and not from his own country, he frankly replied, 'Oh, we worship anything!'—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

Cunning a Poor Quality.—Cunning has effect from the credulity of others, rather than from the abilities of those who are cunning. It requires no extraordinary talents to lie and deceive. It requires great abilities to have the power of being very wicked; but not to be very wicked. A man who has the power, which great abilities procure him, may use it well or ill. Wickedness is always easier than virtue, for it takes the short cut to everything. It is much easier to steal a hundred pounds than to get it by hard labour or any other way. Consider only what act of wickedness requires great abilities to commit, when once the person who is to do it has the power; for there is the distinction. It requires great abilities to conquer an army, but none to massacre it after it is conquered.—Johnson.

— When one of these ravenous animals (the hog) is happy enough to find a banana-tree, with a bunch of ripe fruit suspended above his reach, but not above his ambition, he does not waste his strength, like Æsop's fox with the grapes, leaping at an unattainable object, but wisely and leisurely sets himself to gnaw through the trunk, and bring the treasure to the ground, and this he will never relinquish, though he toil for hours, till his industry has been rewarded, and he literally eats the fruits of his labour.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

TANCREDI.

[By Rossini.]

Amenaide, beloved by Tancredi . . . . . Madame M. Lalande.
Isaura, her Attendant . Madame Castelli.
Tancredi . . . . . Madame Pasta.
Orbazzano, his Rival . . . . . Signor Santini.
Argirio, the Father of Amenaide . . . . . Signor Rubini.
Roggiero, the Friend and Companion of Tancredi . Signor Galli.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir Walter Scott's Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. Deshayes.]

The Music by Signor Costa.

In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance 'The Tyrolienne.'

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of

THE IRON CHEST.

[By Colman, the Younger.]

Helen, Miss Phillips. Barbara, Miss Pearson.
Blanche, Mrs Waylett. Judith, Mrs Faucit.
Sir Edward Mortimer, Mr Kean. Fitzharding, Mr Younge.
Wilford, Mr Wallack. Adam Winterton, Mr W. Farren. Rawbold, Mr Cooper.
Sampson, Mr Harley. Armstrong, Mr Sinclair.
Orson, Mr Bedford. Robber's Boy, Miss Poole.

After which,

TABLEAUX VIVANS.

Suggested by and illustrating A. Scheffer's beautiful Print, called The SOLDIER'S WIDOW!

The whole composed and arranged by Mr W. Barrymore.

The Action of the Scene will be confined solely to the expressive Movements of Rossini's beautiful Overture to 'Guillaume Tell,' which will be pourtrayed in character, by Mrs W. Barrymore, as The Soldier's Widow.

The whole to conclude with

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

French—Da Costa's Wife, Mrs Webster. Maainette, Miss Phillips.
Rose, Miss Butlin. Jeannette, Mrs Broad.
Napoleon, Mr J. Vining. General Frimont, Mr C. Jones.
General Dusheme, Mr H. Williams. Maladroit, Mr Benson Hill.
Guillot, Mr Honor. Antoine, Mr Howel. Jacques, Mr Eaton.
Jean da Costa, Mr Webster.
English.—Mary Cameron, Miss Crawford. Duke of Wellington, Mr Younge,
Lord Hill, Mr Hengler. Duke of Brunswick, Mr Smith.
Prince of Orange, Mr Williams. Marquis of Anglesea, Mr Cooke.
Corporal Standfast, Mr Yarnold. Robert Thompson, Mr Green.
Molly Maloney, Mr Porteus.
Prussians—Phedora, Miss Huddart. Delis, Miss Ballin.
Kouac, Mr Bland. Petran, Mr Cooke.
Dolits, Mr Fenton. Bredawski, Mr T. Blanchard.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr,

[Adapted by Sir George Smart.]

Fatima, Miss Cawse. Lesbia, Miss H. Cawse. Zemira, Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Leander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schoenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, The Provoked Husband; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Musical Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

JOHN OF PARIS.

[By Mr Pocock.]

Princess of Navarre, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'Should he upbraid.'
Olivia, Miss Vincent, in which she will introduce 'Smart young Bachelors.'
Rosa, Mrs C. Hill. John of Paris, Mr Osbaldiston.
Grand Chamberlain, Mr Williams. Pedrigo Potts, Mr Vale. Philip, Mr Ransford.

After which, a Dramatic Sketch from 'Netley Abbey,' called

YARD-ARM AND YARD-ARM.

Oakland, Mr Gough. M'Scrape, Mr D. Pitt.

Gunnel, Mr T. P. Cooke, who will introduce his popular Song of "Bound 'Prentice to a Coasting Ship," and his celebrated Hornpipe.

To which will be added the First Act of

LA PEROUSE.

Umba, Mademoiselle Rosier. La Perouse, Mr C. Hill. Kanko, Mr Honner.
Negaski, Mr Asbury. Potepataw, Mr Webb. Chimpansee, Mr G. Wieland.

A GRAND MUSICAL PASTICCIO.

To conclude with the Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FOULAHS.

[By Mr. W. Barrymore.]

Emily Worthy, Miss Scott. Laura, Miss Bell. Ora, Madame Simon.
Captain Worthy, Mr D. Pitt. Old Worthy, Mr Gough.
Jean Phillipe Gastineau, Mr Honner. Rigid, Mr Asbury. Maline, Mr Webb.
Sergeant, Mr Hobbs. Henry, Miss Ellis. Cato, Mr C. Hill.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Barnett. Jeremy, Mr H. Cooke. John, Mr Davis.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

After which, a Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballad of

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'Farren.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Mrs Wells. Mrs Mac Toddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Porteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

To conclude with a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

[By Mr Bernard.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Figaro;' Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering;' and Winter's Overture to 'Il Ratto di Proserpina.'

Astley's Amphitheatre. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

Cooke's Equestrian Circus, Great Windmill St. Haymarket.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon —M. Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

Coburg Theatre.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant —The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

Royal Pavilion Theatre.—Orphan of Hindostan—A Pill for Portugal.

Published by J. Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; by J. Chappel; E. Wilson, Royal Exchange; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street; W. Kennett Corner of Bow street, Covent Garden; E. Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand; also by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 238.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8, 1831.

TRIAL OF MR CARPENTER.*

It may not be known to all our readers, that Mr Carpenter, a short time since, commenced a series of irregularly-issued publications, commenting upon matters in Church and State, and incidentally containing news, with the avowed object of evading the Stamp Act, and bringing the question at issue with the crown lawyers, if the latter should resolve to try it. They have done so, and Mr Carpenter has lost his cause.

Mr Carpenter, in a long, ingenious, and spirited defence, the style of which was nevertheless truly characterised by the Attorney-General as 'mild and becoming,' began with honestly repeating his avowal that he had intended to evade the provisions of the Stamp-Act. He then argued, that his publication could not be considered as the 'newspaper' it was charged to be: first, because a newspaper was a periodical publication, and his publication was not issued regularly, which he assumed to be necessary to constitute periodicality; secondly, because it always had a different title, and therefore could not be assumed to be the same work: thirdly, because it did not invariably contain what is called news: fourthly, because when it did, the news was not complete, that is to say, there was not all that was expected in a newspaper: and fifthly, because the news that appeared in it could not properly be so called, inasmuch as it had previously appeared in the daily papers. Other arguments were scattered throughout his defence, or rather were systematically put; for in all respects the defence was as complete a one as it could be, consistently with the grounds on which it went. But we do not err, we believe, when we state, that the five positions just mentioned comprise the whole spirit of Mr Carpenter's reasoning.

We do not happen to know Mr Carpenter; but from what we have seen of his writings, we believe him to be a very honest as well as clever man; and we have every reason in the world to agree with him as to the iniquity and absurdity of the act against which he contends. We shall therefore readily be believed when we add, that we are sorry to be obliged to differ with him on the present occasion; and to think, that however honourable and laudable in his intention, and perfectly right on the side of justice, he did not make out his case in point of law.

The Lord Chief Baron expressed an opinion, that a newspaper did not even imply a periodical publication. We are of that opinion too; otherwise the word 'news' and the word 'periodical' would have something in common, which they manifestly have not. Nobody however supposes, that when a man issues news of any public kind in a certain shape, he does not mean to give us more of the same kind of intelligence; and granting the Lord Chief Baron's opinion to be a refinement, upon which no law officer would act (which of course we believe it to be) still we hold that Mr Carpenter made two fatal mistakes, in supposing, first, that the difference of title in his publications deprived the law officers of the right of considering them part of the same work; and secondly, that in order to be periodical, a work must be issued at regular intervals. It is to be recollected, that Mr Carpenter, when he began publishing his letters addressed to various people (for in that manner the publication was designated) avowed that they were intended to evade the provisions of the Stamp Act, and he taught the public to expect them from time to time. We remember well, that the moment we saw this avowal, we pronounced our opinion that it would prove fatal to him; because it was only avowing, in other words, that he would do the thing objected to, but escape by means of a name. Now the jury are judges of the intention as well as the fact,—of the spirit of the case as well as the letter of it; and we always thought, that when the point came to be contended by the lawyers, Mr Carpenter would be sufficiently condemned (in a legal sense) out of his own mouth. With regard to regularity of publication, it has certainly as little to do with periodicality (we use this term for want of a better) as the word period, in typography, has to do with sentences of equal length. The periods, or intervals of measurement, in a page of text, are quite irregular. Time is measurement; but measurement does not imply equidistance; and therefore to constitute a periodical publication, it is sufficient that it should appear at different periods, not at regular ones. It is true, periodical publications are in the habit of being so regular, that the two ideas have become associated; but they are not the less distinct in point of fact; and the Stamp Act says nothing even about periodicality, except that the work must be published at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days. It is clear therefore, that supposing that interval not be to be exceeded, it does not signify how irregular the portions of time may be in the course of it. As to the news not being the sort of news contemplated by the Act, because the daily papers had already told it, and because it did not comprise all the news that the public might look for, we acquit Mr Carpenter of disingenuousness on this head, because he was contesting matters of literality, and meeting the law in its own way; but surely news is news to all who have not heard it before, or not had it related to them in the way which they consider as putting them in possession of it. Readers of this kind constitute the great multitudes that take in the Sunday papers, all of which call themselves newspapers, one of them emphatically the 'News;' and Mr Carpenter assuredly addressed his publication to such as in general see no daily papers, many of them perhaps not even a Sunday one. For a similar reason, it does not signify whether such readers get all the news of the week or not. Few papers perhaps give all the news they might, certainly not one, taking the word in its most extensive sense: and in a word, the term 'news' does not imply 'all' news, any more than the fruit in Covent Garden market implies every possible species of that eatable.

But Mr Carpenter asks, why his publication was to be attacked by the law, seeing that other publications were tolerated, which violated the provisions of the Stamp Act? and among them, (though we are sure with no unkind or insidious feeling, but with as honest a sense of justice as induced him to speak well of it) he mentioned The Tatler. We never mince a matter of truth; and we shall not mince this. The Crown lawyers might unquestionably have often attacked us if they chose, for violating the letter of the law: for though there is some inconsistency between the provisions of the Stamp Act on these points, perplexing to the law as well as to those who are to obey it, it is contrary to those provisions, not merely to publish news, but to comment on any matter in Church and State. But the Crown lawyers have attacked Mr C. and they have left us alone. They have so; and the reasons are, we conceive, first, that we neither do publish any news for news' sake, at least not to any such extent as to make our paper worth looking at for it, touching upon it only incidentally and very rarely: second, that we never professed any intention of contesting the point with the Stamp-office, though the office knew our opinions upon the subject, and have been often told it; third, because if Mr Carpenter had succeeded, it might have materially injured the revenue: we do not say unjustly; we think otherwise; but certainly in such a manner as the present state of the law does not allow its officers to contemplate: and fourth and last,—perhaps most of all,—(for this must not, in honesty, be concealed) because Mr Carpenter is supposed, with whatever truth, to be one of those writers who push their views of alteration in Church and State farther than we do;—who make strong criticisms on the conduct of men in power in a less measured tone, perhaps (we say it in no spirit of unkindness, nor even of disapprobation, for there must be workers of various sorts in times of change) with a less considerate eye to the evidences they have in common with all men;

* Report of the Trial of Mr William Carpenter in the Court of Exchequer, on Saturday, May 14th, 1831, for publishing a Number of Political Letters and Pamphlets, charged to be Newspapers, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. 4to, pp. 12. Carpenter.

Digitized by Google

and who therefore provoke resentment in a more personal degree, and rouse the struggle which they avowedly challenge.

Now we have not the less respect for Mr Carpenter on these accounts, believing him, as we do, to be both an honest and an honourable man,—a man of a good nature as well as an open speech. Neither (from what we have seen of his writings) do we believe him to carry his notions of what is desirable for the common good further than we do. Neither again, do we hold him in less estimation for challenging the Stamp-office to a fight, and seeing which of the two shall beat. We hold him in more. We have avowed (with all due distinction between the office itself, and those of its members with whom we happen to have come in contact) that we should have done as much ourselves, could our resources have enabled us. But if Mr Carpenter, in the greater good fortune of his health and possessions, or his freedom from injuries in former battle, chose to make preparations for securing a combat, and we did not so, he cannot wonder that the adversary took him at his word, and was resolved to see which should put the other down.

There is one great reason why we are the less anxious to fight any more of our old legal battles, and to repose upon the exertions of others;—and that is, that we look upon reformation, and the best and utmost reformation too, as secured to the world by the consequences which will inevitably, though gradually, flow from the late glorious events in France. We do not say that there is no more need of courage and patriotism. We think there is, and that it will as assuredly be realized as the other consequences. But thinking, nevertheless, as we do, and acting as we have formerly done, it may be allowed to be in no dishonest spirit of consideration for others, that we are content to be comparative lookers-on, discountenancing still (as far as we can) the hankerers after old abuses, honouring and applauding those who resist them, and out of an involuntary stock of many thoughts, supplying food for hope, and consolation to all men.

For the rest, to return a moment to the case before us, we cannot but express our sorrow at seeing a man like Sir Thomas Denman compelled, or thinking himself compelled, by his office, to assist the provisions of an Act hateful to his knowledge and his feelings, and protested against by himself, in no common terms, when he was out of office. But seeing, as we do, that all improvement is a thing gradual, and believing Sir Thomas to be one of those who neither wish to prevent its quiet increase, nor could prevent it if they did wish, we are glad that he, instead of a fool or a knave, was in office, to contest the point in question with Mr Carpenter; and from the amenity of this unusual Attorney-General, as well as from the resolution of Mr Carpenter, we draw the most favourable omens for the approaching downfall of the Act itself, and the certain progress of that human good, which, with whatever differences upon minor points, must be dear to both of them.

ERRATUM in yesterday's article on the 'Royal Society of Literature:'—Among other mistakes of the press in this article, owing to the hurry of the hand-writing, was a very ludicrous one, which gave the reader the important intelligence, that "we" had requested Mr "Malthus" to accept a place in the Pension List. The passage should have been, "Mr Mathias might be requested to accept a place," &c.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. IV.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

W. COLLINS, R. A.—W. DANIEL, R. A.—A. COOPER, R.A.

WE shall dispose of this triad speedily. Not that we hold the artists constituting it in particular odium or contempt, but that, sincerely speaking, their works suggest but little for us to say. It is moreover better, we think, to condense our opinions, occasionally, than to fatigue the reader with matters of secondary interest. We could occupy his attention with an infinite quantity of small talk—now, or at any time—when in fact we had nothing to say; but such experiments are dangerous, and should be eschewed. The man who expatiates is lost.—Feeling this very sensibly, we turn our eyes upon Mr Collins.

Mr Collins is a painter of exceeding merit, as far as he goes. But his range is not wide, and his subjects are not of paramount interest. He is a 'limitary cherub.' The touch of ten Ithuriels would never change him from what he is. Thoroughly believing in the metempsychosis, we apprehend that Mr Collins must originally have been of the shrimp or lobster species, or perhaps the crab—except that he does not go backward. Would you know him from any other painter, you have nothing to do, but to walk strait into the principal room at Somerset-house, and you will there see his works, with sum qualis eram upon each, written in plain pictorial characters. Anybody who knew him, when he first emerged from the shrimp state, or cast off the lobster chrysalis, will detect him in a moment. His companions are always with him, constant friends, whom no change of opinion nor prosperity can banish. They are even now before our eyes:—Two little boys, two lobsters, one boat, one rock, one slip of sea-sand, one shrimp-basket, one man holding ditto, and one very handsome slice of blue water, and you have all the riches that he possesses.

And yet with these meagre materials, he will always paint a good and sometimes a fine picture. He is a master of his pencil, touches delicately and colours well. He does not for the sake of effect, play tricks in his pictures, as Mr Constable does. He never spots and dots his pictures with points of white or any other colour. He never gives us reason to imagine that a mad cat had been sneezing over his works, but paints rationally and honestly. His effects are produced by fair painting, and not by trickery of any sort. We only lament that he does not allow his mind to expand and attempt something more than hitherto—but probably he knows his own talent best. In the present Exhibition, he has (and indeed he has once or twice before) quitted his marine residence and taken a pedestrian tour inland. It was in this excursion, we apprehend, that he painted 'The Venturesome Robin,' No 25, and 'The Morning Bath,' No. 138. They are like all his pictures, very clever, but unfortunately they possess little elegance, and are totally deficient in interest.

We like to look at Mr Daniel's pictures. We do not consider him by any means a first-rate artist. But he carries us away to the Ganges and the Jumna—he takes us over the Ghauts and through the matted forests of Hindostan—he shews us the elephant, as sagacious as man; the crocodile, armed from top to toe; the diamond-eyed antelope; the rhinoceros and the buffalo; and from out the dark green shadow of the jungle, his Boa comes hissing and curling upwards like a solid wreath of grey smoke, ready to dart upon the frightened peasants who have disturbed his solitary reign. There is one fellow cutting with a hatchet at his tail—another projects an arrow at his eye—a third falls flat—flat 'on the grunsel edge'—while the soaring sinuous monster, apparently heedless of all, takes measure of his victim and prepares calmly for his fatal spring. Another instant, and Shabreez Ali Cawn has a sash about his waist, that nothing can ever unlose till he be dead! Poor fellow! Great is the mourning in Ceylon or Baher! Bushels of rice are consumed in the mere insanity of grief. Huge vessels of jaghery are poured down the throats of the sons of Siva; and for four-and-twenty hours, the disconsolate Reza forbears to put on her most brilliant dresses, and scorns to think of a second husband!—The reader who recollects Mr Daniel's picture of the Boa-constrictor, which was exhibited about three years ago, will join with us in our lamentations for Shabreez Ali Cawn.

Mr Cooper is great on four legs; but he stands indifferently on two. His men are common place, but his mixtures of bipeds and quadrupeds are clever, and his horses are meritorious fellows. We would not stand within an ell length of his celebrated trotting-roan for the finest Koklani specimen that ever was exported from sandy or stony Arabia. We should write no more critiques after such a collision. All the flattering things that we intend to say of our artist and his brothers of the brush would perish prematurely.

Mr Cooper is rather exclusive in his subjects. He is the painter of the Tudor and Stuart period, and seldom, except in the cases of portraits, ascends to the ages of chivalry, or comes down to modern times. Mary Queen of Scots forms one of his two subjects this year; the other consists of 'Two Spaniels, the property of Mr So and So.' These are his Alpha and Omega. But he is fondest of the Commonwealth, Cromwell, 'our chief of men,' Ireton and Fairfax; Cavaliers and Roundheads figure impartially in his imagination, and all of them have the bravest horses possible. There is a grey one that beats Wouvermans' white steed out and out; a dapple of considerable merit; besides browns and bays whose pretensions are indisputable. Mr Cooper throws them into groups, puts a wild sky about them—frowning faces—and flashing swords, and the result is sometimes imposing enough. He falls short, indeed, of the tear and struggle of Rubens, of the intense encounter of Leonardo da Vinci (whose 'Battle of the Standard' is known to everybody), but he nevertheless forces his figures into the melée boldly, and exhibits the 'rough strife' that distinguished the downfall of Charles Stuart, with a perseverance that deserves success. We cannot do better, on quitting Mr Cooper, (wishing him at the same time that success, which he is so sure to obtain) to introduce him to some verses addressed to his hero, by a man who was as anxious as our artist to identify himself with 'the immortal rebel' who once held the sword of England in his grasp, and maintained the renown of the country, abroad and at home, with as much effect as though he had been an 'anointed king.'

TO THE LORD GENERAL CROMWELL.

'Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude,
Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
To peace and truth thy glorious way hast ploughed,
And on the neck of crowned fortune proud
Hast reared God's trophies, and his work pursued,
While Darwen's stream, with blood of Scots imbued,
And Dunbar field resound thy praises loud,
And Worcester's laureat wreath. Yet much remains
To conquer still; peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war: new foes arise
Threatning to bind our souls with secular chains;
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose Gospel is their maw.'

[No. V, will contain J. M. W. TURNER, R. A., T. STOTHARD, R. A., and J. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

EIGHTH AND LAST CONCERT, MONDAY, JUNE 6.

ACT I.

Sinfonia, No. IV. - - - -	Beethoven.
Aria, Madame Stockhausen, 'Non paventar,' (Il Flauto Magico) - - - -	Mozart.
Sextuor, Piano Forte, Flute, Clarinett, Horn, Bassoon, and Double Bass, Mrs Anderson, Messrs Nicholson, Willman, Platt, Mackintosh, and Dragonetti - - - -	Onslow.
Terzetto, Signor Rubini, Signor Lablache, and Mr E. Seguin, 'Or che la sorte.' (Guglielmo Tell) -	Rossini.
Overture, 'Der Alchymist,' (first time of performance)	Spohr.

ACT II.

Sinfonia, No. VI. - - - -	F. Ries.
Duetto, Madame Stockhausen and Signor Lablache, 'Segui oh cara' (Faust) - - -	Spohr,
Quartet (by desire) two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, Messrs Mori, Watts, Moralt, and Lindley	Haydn
Scena. Signor Rubini, 'Vicin mi sta! (Euryanthe) -	C M von Weber.
Overture, 'Les deux Journées." - -	Cherubini.

Leader, Mr Weichsel.—Conductor, Mr Bishop.

No subject for introductory remark suggesting itself, we commence at once with the performance. The symphony by Beethoven is that one, which the unscientific musician may retrace in his memory from its singular commencement, with a pizzicato note of the whole band, and a sustained note on the horns; the effect is both original and agreeable. The whole symphony is a magnificent composition, but the adagio has perhaps never been surpassed for the intense pathos of its melody and the rich character of its scoring. This movement would have been encored, had not the performers hurried on to the minuet and trio. This banker's-clerk manner of getting through the business of an English concert is a constant check to the enthusiasm of real amateurs.

Madame Stockhausen, who we regretted to observe was feeble and indisposed, sang the well known air of the 'Queen of Night,' from the 'Zauberflöte,' with her accustomed and laudable fidelity to the text; and, notwithstanding the disadvantage in which she was placed, with undiminished accuracy of intonation: the level excellence of her tone, the purity of her style, and the certainty with which she fulfills whatever she undertakes, will always render Madame Stockhausen a valuable acquisition in a concert.

Mr Onslow's sextuor, which we heard for the first time upon the present occasion, is a composition of very high character. It bears throughout evident marks of a worthy ambition. If the hypercritic should say that this ambition urges the author to adopt thoughts bordering upon whimsicality, the better-spirited judge will augur from this yearning after originality the finest of results—a solid, well earned, and mature fame—for there is plenty of staple to work from. The second movement—an adagio, we conceive—was the most acceptable to our taste, both from its design, symmetrical construction, and musician-like treatment; also, perhaps, from our predilections naturally leaning to that class of writing. How gratifying is the sight of an independent gentleman (within prospect, indeed, of a peerage) working away, as if for his maintenance, with all the industry and enthusiasm of a young German graduate that has a capel meistership in prospect; and at the same time how different, and how exquisite the train of thoughts and sensations that pass through such a brain, compared with those of a patrician dog or horse-breeder, or of him whose whole noons or nights are employed in lounging or lolling, with a quizzing-glass stuck to his eye—the common feat of a watchmaker, and the only effort of dexterity which lifts him into a comparison with that useful artisan.

We never hear one of the better movements from the 'Guillaume Tell,' but we regret that Rossini did not earlier begin to show what he could do in the higher walks of his science. Almost all the choruses, in that opera, the finest duet between Tell and Valter, and the trio that was performed upon the present occasion are noble works of art, both for the construction of the melodies, and the masterly effects that the composer has thrown into accompaniments. Signor Lablache and Rubini were too loud for their companion Mr Seguin: as for Rubini, his style approaches nearer to quackery than anything we ever heard within the range of singing. His boisterous shouts and infantile pulings coming directly and suddenly in contrast with each other are positively laughable—when he is singing trash, and then only. He is the personification of forte-piano—the medium between the two extremes appears never by any chance to have entered his thoughts. With the exception of the quality of some notes in his compass, his singing affords us no gratification; it is one tissue of shout and whine, flutter and roulade. Signor Lablache afterwards, in the lovely duet from the Faust, 'Segui o cara!' sang with much better discretion. To use the intelligible phrase of a daily critic, he 'modulated his voice' with Madame Stockhausen's in an agreeable manner.

The overture to 'Der Alchymist' we should like to hear repeated. Its design and construction are both original and masterly, but we could not understand the intention of the author.

Mr Ferdinand Ries's symphony is worthy of the school in which he was educated;—Beethoven was his tutor. The minuet and trio are both original and charming movements; the adagio, though fine, did not so powerfully arrest our attention as the former, the character of which somewhat reminded us of the elder writers. The trio contained some delightful passages of imitation for the wind instruments; and the finale a spirited and most admirably worked subject, in which, like a thorough-bred German, Mr Ries granted no sinecure to any member of the band. He received enthusiastic applause from the whole room, performers and all, both at his entrance and at the conclusion of his symphony.

Paganini was in the room, and quitted it immediately after the violin quartet. He heard Mr Mori in perfection, and Paganini of all men would appreciate the exquisite feeling and execution of Mori in that lovely piece of writing. That extraordioary artist will not leave us with an unfavourable impression of our native talent, for we never heard a quartett performed in finer taste, or more genuine esprit d'accord.

Signor Rubini acquitted himself like a rational being in the scena from 'Euryanthe,' in other words was not ridiculous, a negative compliment which reminds us of the famous one on the part of Hawser Trunnion, upon which Mrs Grizzle founded all her hopes of triumphing over the old Commodore's heart. 'He was heard to observe at the club that Pickle's sister had not so much the core of a b—— in her as he imagined!'

The overture to 'Les Deux Journées' formed a noble finale crescendo to a very delightful concert. In the introductory adagio, Signor Dragonetti pulled out some of his magnificent tones with an energy that made one's heart rebound. He resorted to his famous piece of craft, of letting down his third string for the purpose of getting at the lower G.

Some of the subscribers we hear were dissatisfied that Madame Pasta did not exhibit upon the present occasion. In every point of view we think the Directors acted for the best interests, as well as for the character of these Concerts, in not engaging her. As an actress, we will yield to no one in admiration of Madame Pasta, but we would never hear her again in a concert-room, if the doing so were to be avoided. She seldom chooses to sing any but the most common productions of poor Italian writers of the modern school, and these she overloads with silly flourishes and chromatic runs; besides which, she is frequently out of tune. Her style of singing is artificial and monotonous; and to our ears her quality of voice is only redeemed when we behold her glorious features excited by contending emotions; and then, were she to out-croak Duncan's foreboding messenger, the defect would pass comparatively unnoticed. The bare circumstance of her not selecting for performance compositions in the highest school of the art, induces us strongly to question her just feeling for the beauty of music.—'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also;' and her musical wealth lies in Mercadante and Pacini. There are people too, we hear, who pride themselves upon imitating her huskiness. Imitators are sure to fix upon the defects in their models for the purpose of copying; because, not only are these the most easy of adoption, but the mimics have the instinctive sagacity to know that incompetent judges (the majority of an audience) will give them credit for inheriting the excellencies also of their prototypes. If Madame Pasta were deformed, would her mimics appear in public with a hump on their shoulders? Her huskiness is a musical deformity. Had she not been the marvellous actress she is, her accomplishments as a singer would not have been held in high estimation.

— The Haymarket Theatre opens on the 15th instant.

— Drury Lane will, it is said, next season be under the sole management of Captain Polhill. The classical opera is to be the novel feature in the new arrangements Mr Bishop as composer; Mr and Mrs Wood as vocalists; and a variety of engagements, no less likely to concentrate a strong musical force, are already announced as completed, or in course of negociation.—Atlas.

The Countess de Rossi.—Our readers will not be uninterested in the following extract from a letter from Coblenz:—'Not long ago the Countess de Rossi was here with her husband, and after the example of Pasta, has made a most liberal donation to the school of this city, for the encouragement of musical instruction. I went to the public dejeuné that was given to her on the occasion; the anxiety to see her was intense; and the shouts of applause were quite deafening when the lovely Henrietta Sontag entered the room, looking as smiling as ever—adorned with a profusion of jewels—and, I am sorry to say, supporting herself on two crutches. The Count de Rossi, on her health being drank, returned thanks for her in a feeling speech, and assured the company of her constant attachment to the art on which alone her fame depended.'

Brighton.—Why is this marine London to be preferred as an autumnal residence to other fashionable watering places?—Because, amongst numerous advantages, low spirited visitors are there not annoyed by witnessing the fall of the leaf.—Reynolds's Dramatic Annual.

A Lobster on his Travels.—A living lobster was a few days since taken out of a branch of the river Waveney, at Frenze, in Norfolk, and (allowing for all the flexions of the stream) nearly 40 miles from the sea. It was preserved, being still alive, and has been seen by many persons.—Norwich Mercury.

The Upas Tree.—At Baitenzorg we saw in the gardens of the governor a small upas tree. It is five feet high, and as many years old, having a straight stem, with a few twigs, and leaves upon them at the top. The leaves are very rough, serrated at the edge, and of a deep green colour. It is from the bark of the roots (as we understand) that the famous poison is extracted, by a process known to the natives only, and kept by them as an invaluable secret of mischievous knowledge. The tree grows nowhere to perfection except towards the eastern extremity of the island, where it sometimes attains the height of an hundred and fifty feet. It is unnecessary now to say, that its presence produces none of the blasting effects formerly and fabulously attributed to it. We were permitted to take away several leaves from this plant, which we plucked with our naked fingers with impunity. From the footstalks a white milky sap exuded.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

Digitized by Google

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

To prevent confusion with other correspondents who write under signatures of H 's, we shall assign to the author of the verses on the American Indian, his other initial G.

The lines of J. H. do credit to his feelings, but are not equally well written

We should have been glad to relate the circumstance communicated to us respecting a foreign singer in the second letter of a CONSTANT READER; but have abstained, not knowing whether he would deem it a trespass on his friend's confidence

The letter sent us by the author of the verses in the Emissary has been unfortunately mislaid.

The questions of C. D. M. shall be answered in a day or two.

White Conduit House shall have due honour paid to the lustre of its announcements.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Tancredi.—Kenilworth.
DRURY-LANE.—The Iron Chest.—Tableaux Vivans—The Battle of Waterloo.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Historical Play, in Five Acts, called
ALFRED THE GREAT; OR, THE PATRIOT KING.
[By Mr KNOWLES.]
The Music by Mr T. Cooke.

English—Elswith, Miss Huddart. Maude, Mrs C. Jones.
Alfred, Mr Macready. Oddune, Mr J. Vining. Oswith, Mr H. Wallack.
Edric, Mr Younge. Egbert, Mr Thompson. Conrad, Mr Hammerton.
Kenrick, Mr Cooke. Edwy, Mr Yarnold. Oswald, Mr Honner.
Arthur, Mr Eaton. Edgar, Mr Bland. Edwin, Mr Fenton. Arnold, Mr Cathie.
Danes—Ina, Miss Phillips. Edith, Miss Faucit.
Guthrum, Mr Cooper. Amund, Mr S. Jones. Haldane, Mr Howard.
Oscar, Mr C. Jones. Otho, Mr Yarnold. Soldier, Mr Howell.

In the course of the Evening, His Majesty's Grand Accession March,' (by Mr T. Cooke); Mozart's Overture to 'Cosi Fan Tutte;' and Winter's Overture to 'Tamerlan.'

After which,
X. Y. Z.
[By G. COLMAN, the Younger.]

Maria, Mrs Newcombe. Mrs Mouser, Mrs Broad. Betty, Mrs Webster.
Dora Mumwell, Mrs C. Jones. Captain Galliard, Mr Cooke.
Grubbleton, Mr W. Bennett. Neddy Bray, Mr Liston. Doddle, Mr Hughes.
Roscius Alldross, Mr Tayleure. Ralph Hempseed, Mr Webster.

To conclude with a Musical Piece, in Two Acts, called
THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.
[By Mr KENNEY.]

Fatima, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Irza, Miss Faucit. Aboulifar, Mr Thompson. Arzan, Mr Bland.
Alibajou, Mr Webster. Bowbell, Mr Liston. Gimbo, Mr Harley.

To-morrow, Who Wants a Guinea; The Soldier's Widow; and The Battle of Waterloo.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of
THE PROVOKED HUSBAND.
[By VANBRUGH.]

Lady Townly, Miss F. Kemble. Lady Grace, Mrs Chatterley.
Lady Wronghead, Mrs Gibbs. Miss Jenny, Miss Nelson. Trusty, Mrs Daly.
Mrs Motherly, Mrs Tayleure. Myrtilla, Miss Phillips
Lord Townly, Mr C. Kemble. Sir Francis Wronghead, Mr Bartley.
Mr Manly, Mr Abbott. Squire Richard, Mr Meadows. Count Basset, Mr Baker.
John Moody, Mr Blanchard. Poundage, Mr Barnes. Williams, Mr Turnour.
James, Mr Mears. Constable, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Comedy, Onslow's Overture to 'L'Alcade de la Vega.'

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called
NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled
BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.
[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,)" Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

To which will be added an entirely new Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled
"S W I N G."

Lucy, Miss Vincent. Landlady, Miss Rumens.
Daniel Roper, Mr Vale. Timothy Sidewing, Mr C. Hill. Jokely, Mr Honner.
Jorum, Mr Webb. Frank, Mr Rogers. Justice, Mr Gough.
Prompter, Mr Emden. Constable, Mr Asbury.

To conclude with an Historical Drama, in Five Parts, entitled
NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.
The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Madame Bertrand, Madame Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Katty O'Neal, Madame Simon. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
English:—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

R. GRAVES, CHEAP AND FASHIONABLE TAILOR,

In submitting the following Prices, confidently asserts, that Gentlemen will find every garment made by him is from the BEST WEST OF ENGLAND SAXONY PATENT FINISHED CLOTHS, and equal in Fit and Workmanship to any that can be produced.

	£.	s.	d.
Fashionable Medley Coloured Dress Coats	2	10	0
Extra Saxony ditto	3	5	0
An Assortment of the fashionable Mulberry.
Quilting Waistcoats, from the newest patterns, of the finest quality	0	12	0
Silk Valencia	0	12	0
Patent Anglo Merino Trowsers, in Mixtures, Drabs, and Checks, from 16s. to	1	1	0
Fashionable Le Roi Jean	1	1	0
Ditto Checked Drill 12s. to	0	18	0

Anglo Merinos, Dulls, Cantoons, &c. in a great variety of new patterns.
213, HIGH HOLBORN.
No connection with any other House.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.

MINTER'S SELF-ACTING AND RECLINING CHAIR.
BY THE KING'S LETTERS PATENT.

G. MINTER begs to acquaint the Nobility, Gentry, &c. that he has invented an EASY CHAIR, the positions or elevations of which are so numerous, that the number is quite indefinite, say from one to one thousand, and are obtained by a slight pressure of the back, which not only reclines the back of the chair, but raises the back part of the seat, thereby causing a proper inclined plane, which supports the weakest part of the back at any and every position. When you rise, the back follows you, and should you stop, the back immediately stops; and all this action is obtained without any spring, rack, or other machinery whatever.

G. Minter particularly recommends it to Invalids for its simplicity: if even they have lost the use of either of their hands or legs, they can obtain any position of themselves without any attendance, or exertion on their own part. The chair is made by the Inventor only, in a variety of plain and elegant shapes, at his manufactory, 26 PRINCES STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE (opposite Coventry street), and are sold as cheap as a common fixed easy chair of the same pattern, which is impossible in any other reclining chair, on account of their complicated construction, and which subjects them to be often out of repair, and even dangerous.—G. M. is confident any person honouring him with an inspection of his Chair, will be sufficiently convinced of its superiority over all others. It is also made portable for travelling, and will pack in a case only fourteen inches deep. It is warranted to act perfect fifty years.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL.

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Rustic Olympics.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called
YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.
In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled
MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Barnett. Jeremy, Mr H. Cooke. John, Mr Davis.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

After which, a Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, founded on the admired Ballad of
AULD ROBIN GRAY.
[By Mr M'FARREN.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Miss Wells. Mrs MacToddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Porteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

To conclude with a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called REFORMATION.
[By Mr BERNARD.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to 'Figaro;' Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering;' and Winter's Overture to 'Il Ratto di Proserpina.'

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of
KING RICHARD THE THIRD.
Duke of Glo'ster, Mr Kean.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon —M Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant —The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—Miser of Madrid—Outlaw's Oath.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Orphan of Hindostan—A Pill for Portugal—Clari.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 239.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1831.

LIGHT AND COLOURS.*

LIGHT is perhaps the most wonderful of all visible things; that is to say, it has the least analogy to other bodies, and is the least subject to secondary explanations. No object of sight equals it in tenuity, in velocity, in beauty, in remoteness of origin and closeness of approach. It has no 'respect of persons.' Its beneficence is most impartial. It shines equally on the jewels of an Eastern prince, and on the dust in the corner of a warehouse. Its delicacy, its power, its utility, its universality, its lovely essence, visible and yet intangible, make up something godlike to our imaginations; and though we acknowledge divinities more divine, we feel that ignorant as well as wise fault may be found with those who have made it an object of worship.

One of the most curious things with regard to Light, is, that it is a body, by means of which we become sensible of the existence of other bodies. It is a substance; it exists as much in the space between our eyes and the object it makes known to us, as it does in any other instance; and yet we are made sensible of that object by means of the very substance intervening. When our enquiries are stopped by perplexities of this kind, no wonder that some awe-stricken philosophers have thought further enquiry forbidden; and that others have concluded, with Berkeley, that there is no such thing as substance but in idea, and that the phenomena of creation exist but by the will of the great mind, which permits certain apparent causes and solutions to take place, and to act in a uniform manner. Milton doubts whether he ought to say what he felt concerning light:—

> 'Hail, holy Light, offspring of Heaven first-born,
> Or of the eternal coeternal beam,
> May I express thee unblamed? since God is light,
> And never but in unapproached light,
> Dwelt from eternity, dwelt there in thee,
> Bright effluence of bright essence increate.'

And then he makes that pathetic complaint, during which we imagine him sitting with his blind eyes in the sun, feeling its warmth upon their lids, while he could see nothing:—

> 'Thee I revisit safe,
> And feel thy sovran vital lamp; but thou
> Revisit'st not these eyes, that roll in vain
> To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn.'

The author of the book which has given rise to these reflections does not enter upon speculations of the same sort. Perhaps it is a pity that scientific writers do not comprise a little more poetical and philosophical illustration in their pages. They might do it without omitting any part of their science; and undoubtedly it would increase the attraction of their works. It might be as idle to wish much of a decidedly imaginative kind, as it would be to expect scientific treatises at the hands of us most unscientific reviewers: but a volume with so much science in it as the work before us, and dilating so much at the commencement upon mirrors, lenses, and grooved surfaces, with heaps of references numeral and mathematical, hardly seems to act up to the popular claims implied in its motto. Mathematical 'symbols' are indeed avoided, but not technical terms; and there is a general want of that sort of unscientific attraction, which such a man as the late Mr Edgworth, for instance, could have supplied, had he been writing on a scientific subject that he was acquainted with. Nevertheless, it is due to the author to state, not only that we have no doubt of the excellence of his book as a work of agreeable science, but that a young gentleman, who is an unscientific reader, but fond of getting what information he can upon all subjects, had the volume put into his hands the other day, and pronounced it to be an ample fulfilment of the motto, clear, comprehensive, and 'likely to anticipate every question put by the uninitiated.' The praise of youth is sometimes more desirable and just than that of older men; and it may be so in the present instance.

We proceed to give the properest of all criticisms; that is to say, to let the work speak for itself. We have always loved to realize the analogies detected by the vague instinct of feeling. Artists will find in this book, that there is more reason in their notions of hot and cold colouring, than they might imagine. By the way, it contains a good account of Newton's discovery of the prismatic colours; that is to say, of the colours which exist in light, and which are stopped or absorbed by the different substances on which it falls, so as to render them of different hues: for it need not be told a modern reader, that there is no such thing as colour inherent in bodies. It is imparted solely by the different rays of light with which they are acted upon. The sun therefore literally paints the flowers. The hues of the pink and rose literally come every day, direct from heaven. But to return to the point alluded to. The differently coloured rays into which the solar beam are divided by the prism, have been found to possess different heating powers, and the coincidence between the painter's phrases and the fact is remarkable. The following measures were obtained by Sir Henry Englefield:—

	Temperature.
'Blue	56°
Green	58
Yellow	62
Red	72
Beyond red	79.'

The phenomenon of 'accidental colours' is very curious:—

'When the eye has been strongly impressed with any particular species of coloured light, and when in this state it looks at a sheet of white paper, the paper does not appear to it white, or of the colour with which the eye was impressed, but of a different colour, which is said to be the accidental colour of the colour with which the eye was impressed. If we place, for example, a bright red wafer upon a sheet of white paper, and fix the eye steadily upon a mark in the centre of it; then, if we turn the eye upon the white paper, we shall see a circular spot of blueish green light, of the same size as the wafer. This colour, which is called the accidental colour of red, will gradually fade away. The blueish green image of the wafer is called an ocular spectrum, because it is impressed on the eye, and may be carried about with it a short time.

'If we make the preceding experiment with differently-coloured wafers, we shall obtain ocular spectra whose colours vary with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table:—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental Colour, or Colour of the Ocular Spectra.
'Red,	Blueish Green.
Orange,	Blue.
Yellow,	Indigo.
Green,	Violet Reddish.
Blue,	Orange Red.
Indigo,	Orange Yellow.
Violet,	Yellow Green.
Black,	White.
White,	Black.'—P. 304.

Here the old joke against the lawyers is realized, and white made black. The phenomenon is thus clearly explained:—

'When the eye has been for some time fixed on the red wafer, the part of the retina occupied by the red image is strongly excited, or, as it were, deadened by its continued action. The sensibility to red light will therefore be diminished, and consequently, when the eye is turned from the red wafer to the white paper, the deadened portion of the retina will be insensible to the red rays which form part of the white light from the paper, and consequently will see the paper of that colour which arises from all the rays in the white light of the paper but the red; that is, of a blueish green colour, which is therefore the true complimentary colour of the red wafer. When a black wafer is placed on a white ground, the circular portion of the retina on which the black image falls, in place of being deadened, is protected, as it were, by the absence of light, while all the surrounding parts of the retina, being excited by the white light of the paper, will be deadened by its continued action. Hence, when the eye is directed to the white paper, it will see a white circle corresponding to a black image on the retina; so that the accidental colour of black is white. For the same reason, if a white wafer is placed on a black ground, and viewed stedfastly for some time, the eye will afterwards see a black circular space; so that the accidental colour of white is black.'—P. 305.

* A Treatise on Optics. By David Brewster, L.L.D. F.R.S. L. & E. &c. &c. (Nineteenth Volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia), pp. 375. Longman.

Digitized by Google

Here follows a remarkable phenomenon, which anybody may realize. It was first observed by Mr Smith, surgeon in Fochabers:—

'If we held a narrow strip of white paper vertically, about a foot from the eye, and fixed both eyes upon an object at some distance beyond it, then if we allow the light of the sun, or the light of a candle, to act strongly upon the right eye, without affecting the left, which may be easily protected from its influence, the left hand strip of paper will be seen of a bright green colour, and the right hand strip of a red colour. If the strip of paper is sufficiently broad to make the two images overlap each other, the overlapping parts will be perfectly white, and free from colour; which proves that the red and green are complimentary. When equally luminous, or candles are held near each eye, the two strips of paper will be white. If when the candle is held near the right eye, and the strips of paper are seen red and green, then on bringing the candle suddenly to the left eye, the left hand image of the paper will gradually change to green, and the right hand image to red.'—P. 310.

Milton sublimely compares the appearance of Satan, coming from afar in the horizon, to a fleet of ships that seem to 'hang in the clouds:'—

> 'As when, far off at sea, a fleet descried
> Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial winds
> Close sailing from Bengala, or the isles
> Of Ternate and Tidore, where merchants bring
> Their spicy drugs; they, on the trading flood,
> Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape,
> Ply stemming nightly tow'rd the pole:—so seem'd
> Far off the flying Fiend.'

Perhaps Milton, who was a very learned observer, meant to imply more by this phrase, 'hangs in the clouds,' than his commentators imagine.

'On the 28th of June 1820, Captain Scoresby saw from the mast head of his vessel in the Greenland seas, eighteen sail of ships at the distance of about twelve miles. One of them was drawn out or lengthened, in a vertical direction, another was contracted in the same direction; one had an inverted image immediately above it; and other two had two distinct inverted images above them; accompanied with two images of the strata of ice. In 1822, Captain Scoresby recognized his father's ship, the Fame, by its inverted image in the air, although the ship itself was below the horizon. He afterwards found that the ship was seventeen miles beyond the horizon, and its distance thirty miles. In all these cases the image was directly above the object; but on the 17th of September 1818, M. M. Jarine and Soret observed a case of unusual refraction, where the image was on one side of the object. A bark about 4,000 toises distant was seen approaching Geneva by the left bank of the lake, and at the same moment there was seen above the water an image of the sails, which, in place of following the direction of the bark, receded from it, and seemed to approach Geneva by the right bank of the lake; the image sailing from east to west, while the bark was sailing from north to south. The image was of the same size as the object when it receded from the bark, but it grew less and less as it receded, and was only one half that of the bark when the phenomenon ceased.'—P. 259.

We conclude with an interesting series of experiments corroborative of the fine exploit of Archimedes in burning the Roman fleet. The ships of Marcellus were probably very small, little better than boats, and close to the landing-place: but we shall see what M. Pegrard thinks he could do with these terrible glass weapons:—

'A combination of plane burning mirrors,' observes Dr Brewster, 'forms a powerful burning instrument; and it is highly probable that it was with such a combination that Archimedes destroyed the ships of Marcellus. Athanasius Kircher, who first proved the efficacy of a union of plane mirrors, went with his pupil Scheiner to Syracuse, to examine the position of the hostile fleet; and they were both satisfied that the ships of Marcellus could not have been more than thirty paces distant from Archimedes.'

'Buffon constructed a burning apparatus upon this principle, which may be easily explained. If we reflect the light of the sun upon one cheek by a small piece of plain looking-glass, we shall experience a sensation of heat less than if the direct light of the sun fell upon it. If with the other we reflect the sun on the same cheek with another piece of mirror, the warmth will be encreased, and so on till with five or six pieces we can no longer endure the heat. Buffon combined 168 pieces of mirror, 6 inches by 8, so that he could, by a little mechanism, connected with each, cause them to reflect the light of the sun upon one spot. Those pieces of glass were selected which gave the smallest image of the sun at 250 feet.

'The following were the effects produced by different numbers of these mirrors.

No. of Mirrors.	Distance of Object.	Effects produced.
12	20 feet.	Small combustibles inflamed.
21	20	Beech plank burned.
40	66	Tarred beech plank inflamed.
45	20	Pewter flask 6lb. weight melted.
98	126	Tarred and sulphured plank set on fire.
112	138	Plank covered with wool set on fire.
117	20	Some thin pieces of silver melted.
128	150	Tarred fir plank set on fire.
148	150	Beech plank sulphured inflamed violently.
154	150	Tarred plank smoked violently.
154	250	Chips of fir deal sulphured and mixed with charcoal set on fire.
224	40	Plates of silver melted.

'As it is difficult to adjust the mirrors while the sun changes his place, M. Peyrard proposes to produce great effects by mounting each mirror in a separate frame, carrying a telescope, by means of which one person can direct the reflected rays to the object which is to be burned. He conceives that with 590 glasses, about 20 inches in diameter, he could reduce a fleet to ashes at the distance of a quarter of a league, and with glasses double that size, at the distance of a league.'—P. 317.

ANOTHER SERIES OF NOVELS.*

The first and second volumes of this series, containing 'The Pilot,' by Cooper, and 'Caleb Williams,' by Godwin, were noticed in The Tatler at the time of their publication. The third volume contained 'The Spy,' by Cooper. The novel which forms the present volume is considered one of the best of its author, and has long been extensively popular. The celebrated patriot Kosciusko is the real hero of the tale; and the author in a new preface, has stated some particulars respecting his visit to this city, which are interesting, because the subject of them is so.

'General Kosciusko, the justly celebrated hero of Poland, came to England on his way to the United States; having been released from his close imprisonment in Russia, and in the noblest manner too, by the Emperor Paul, immediately on his accession to the throne. His arrival caused a great sensation in London; and many of the first characters of the time pressed forward to pay their respects to such real patriotic virtue in its adversity. An old friend of my family was amongst them; and whose own warm heart encouraging the enthusiasm of ours, he took my brother to visit the Polish veteran, then lodging at Sabloniere's Hotel, in Leicester square. My brother, on his return to us, described him as a noble-looking man, though not at all handsome, lying upon a couch in a very enfeebled state, from the effects of numerous wounds he had received in his breast by the Cossacks' lances after his fall, having been previously overthrown by a sabre stroke on his head. His voice in consequence of the induced internal weakness, was very low, and his speaking always with resting intervals. He wore a black bandage across his forehead, which covered a deep wound there; and indeed his whole figure bore marks of long suffering.'

The author states that her brother's description of the hero, and her own contemplation of other victims of similar misfortunes, first suggested to her the story.

'To have made him the ostensible hero of the tale, would have suited neither the modesty of his feelings nor the humbleness of my own expectation of telling it as I wished. I therefore took a younger and less pretending agent, in the personification of a descendant of the great John Sobieski.'

The Poles and Poland form the staple of this romance; and while that brave people are struggling for their rights, a narrative embodying some of their past struggles will derive an adventitious interest.

A new prospectus, prefixed to this volume, states that the proprietors 'have purchased the copyright of that body of English Fictions, originally printed by Mr Ballantyne, under the immediate superintendence of Sir Walter Scott; with Biographical and Critical Memoirs by him.' In consequence this series will not be restricted, as at one time intended, to living authors, but embrace the best stories, without restriction to any period.

The getting up of this volume does not differ materially from its predecessors, which we have spoken of favourably,—with some reservation as to the plates.

* Standard Novels, No. IV. Thaddeus of Warsaw, by Miss Jane Porter. Complete in one volume. Colburn and Bentley.

TRANSLATION OF GREEK AND ROMAN CLASSICS.*

Among the numerous republications of standard works with which the press is at present teeming, the present series is entitled to particular commendation, as it puts into the hands of a large and intelligent class of readers, at a cheap rate, combining neatness and correctness, the most valuable works of antiquity, rendered in a great degree native to English apprehensions by successful translation. The works hitherto published are Demosthenes, Sallust,

* The Family Classical Library. Vol. XVII. Horace, Part II, and Phædrus. Colburn and Bentley.

Digitized by Google

Xenophon, Herodotus, Virgil, Pindar, Anacreon, Tacitus, Horace, and Phædrus; Juvenal and Persius are to follow next. Engraved busts of the authors precede their respective works.

The volume just published contains translations of some of the choicest pieces in Horace, by a variety of eminent writers and scholars of past and present times, among whom we observe the names of Swift, Bentley, Porson, Chatterton, Byron, and Procter.

MUSIC.

PAGANINI.

THE talents of PAGANINI having at length been submitted to the observation of an English audience, the result has satisfied everybody that he is entitled to his celebrity, on the solid ground of his superiority in his art over all other performers. As he will doubtless be for some time one of the Lions of the day, we may be excused for returning to the subject of his first appearance on Friday last. The person of PAGANINI has been described in the daily newspapers. We agree with the Herald, that he bears a considerable resemblance to the Rev. EDWARD IRVING. The resemblance is chiefly in the general look of the head, the superabundance of black hair, and the manner in which it is disposed about the sides of the face, and towards the shoulders. He is not however so tall as the Reverend Gentleman, nor has he the same appearance of muscular strength. The features, too, we suspect to have little or no resemblance, although, from the distance at which we saw him, we can give no positive opinion. His enthusiasm in his art is well known, and it is said to be strikingly displayed in his countenance as he plays. His manner of entering the stage and bowing to the audience have no other gracefulness than that which arises from a desire to perform mere routine inoffensively; he no doubt considers that his title to the consideration of his visitors rests upon much higher accomplishments. As a violinist, the great beauty of PAGANINI is, that while he carries scientific skill to an extent hitherto supposed to be impracticable, he at the same time renders even that transcendant skill subordinate to the expression of natural emotions, without doing which it would be but an exalted mechanism. In many passages, the tone of the instrument had all the expression of well-chosen words, as effectually suggesting the ideas of remonstrance, supplication, melancholy, or chastened joy; and there was one passage in particular, towards the end of the concerto, in which, aided by the merit of the composition (also PAGANINI's) the hearer was fairly enveloped in delight. You heard as it were behind hills, a gentle piping, increasing in loudness as it continued, and at length awakening into emulation the voices of numerous birds. The effect was perfect, and the applause involuntary and vehement. There can be no doubt that the merits of PAGANINI were but partially unfolded by this his first appearance, and that many a fresh surprise and delight are yet in store for his admirers. What may be his forte cannot therefore be pronounced, but we guess that it will be found in the tender and pathetic. In such, at least, on Friday, he seemed most capable of subduing his audience to the corresponding feeling. His reception has been truly described as enthusiastic; differences about prices of admission were forgotten; and there seemed to be no room but for expressions of admiration; sometimes evinced by clapping of hands and audible exclamations of wonder, at others by the less equivocal testimony of a silence, deepening as it was prolonged, and fearing to disturb by the slightest whisper the exquisitely fine drawn notes of the musician.

His second Concert is to be to-morrow evening.

MADAME MARA.—This lady is still living at Revel in Russia. On the celebration of her 82nd birth-day lately, between 70 and 80 of the most distinguished individuals of the town and its neighbourhood collected to receive her on the occasion of a public banquet given the ci-devant cantatrice. The pleasures of the scene were greatly enhanced by the performance of an ode written by Goethe, in which he retraced the enthusiasm produced by her first appearance in Metastasio's oratorio, 'S. Elena al Calvario,' in the year 1771, when Goethe heard her for the first time. She was then plain Mademoiselle Schmeling, and he a stripling student of 22. The ode was set for four voices by Hummel; but before it was performed, she received a finely-embellished copy of it from a daughter of Kotzebue. After the banquet, a public concert was given in the evening, and of this Madame Mara was again the delightful prima donna. The two compositions were repeated with increased effect before a crowded audience, by some of her own pupils and friends.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

CURIOUS THEORY.—Mr Clarkson, who lately lectured at the Mechanics' Institution, 'On the Origin, Progress, and Prospects of Mankind,' is about to deliver a lecture at Clapham, on Negro Slavery, during which he proposes to investigate the question of the moral and intellectual competency of the Negroes; the causes of their difference in colour and physical organization from the red and white varieties of the human species; and the theory, hazarded in a few quarters, of their having originated civilization.

'THE RULING PASSION.'—A paragraph thus headed, the other day found its way into the papers, narrating the escape of a criminal from the hulks at Woolwich, and his having, 'the same night,' broken into a house to procure wearing apparel. If the writer had recollected, that to enable a convict effectually to escape, it was necessary he should get rid of his prison garb, and be clothed like other folks, the phenomenon might have been accounted for, without the supposition of an innate propensity to steal.

THE FLAME AND THE TALLOW.—'I am always ashamed to see myself so near to thee,' said the flame to the tallow. The tallow answered: 'I thought thou wast ashamed of losing me, because then thou always disappearest.' 'Foolish grease,' replied the flame, 'it is true that I shine only as long as I live upon thee, but I am ashamed of letting it be known.'—Pestalozzi.

THE LADIES AND THE REFORM BILL.—A female correspondent, in a provincial paper, suggests, that as for some time past all attentions to the ladies have been forgotten in the engrossing return of the Reform Bill, about which alone she says the other sex can talk, in order that the fair sex may receive some recompense for their past injuries, and at the same time participate in the general exultation as soon as possible after the Bill shall have passed into a law, a Reform Ball be given by the chivalrous and patriotic gentlemen of every city throughout the United Kingdom.

ASTRONOMY.—Sir J. South has completed his revolving observatory. It is composed of cedar wood, moved by a variety of wheels, and weighing altogether six tons, yet a power of sixteen pounds will move it. The mechanism of this part is the invention of Brummell. jun. The celebrated twelve-inch object glasses of Guineaud, are in the hands of Tully, the optician, to fit them to a tube of twenty feet in length, constructed by Troughton; it is moved by clock work, and thus follows the course of a planet, allowing the same facility of observation that could be afforded were the star a stationary object. Planets have been subjected to observation by this glass with a magnifying power of 1,400. The observatory, altogether, is said to be most perfect, and science will, no doubt, owe obligations to Sir J. South, which we hope public encouragement wil repay.—Atlas.

NOT YET.—The waters rose higher and higher, and yet there was no hope for the village, except by opening the dike which protected the park, and abandoning all its partridges, and hares, and stags to the fury of the waves.—The tenantry stood entreating their landlord. 'Not yet,' was his answer. The danger increased, and the people knelt down before him, and cried: 'We shall all perish with our wives and our children, unless you permit the dike to be cut open.'—But the landlord loved the beasts in the park, and the people in the village he knew not. Their prayer, therefore, appeared to him a guilty indifference to the preservation of his park, and their kneeling before him a reprehensible importunity. He shook his head and said angrily, 'Not yet;' and once more, 'Not yet' was on his lips, when the dike broke, and the waters filled the park and swallowed up both beast and man.—Pestalozzi.

SINGULAR CASES OF INABILITY TO DISTINGUISH COLOURS.—Mr Harris, a shoemaker at Allonby, was unable from his infancy to distinguish the cherries of a cherry-tree from its leaves, in so far as colour was concerned. Two of his brothers were equally defective in this respect, and always mistook orange for grass green, and light green for yellow. Harris himself could only distinguish black and white. Mr Scott, who describes his own case in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' mistook pink for a pale blue, and a full red for a full green. All kinds of yellows and blues, except sky blue, he could discern with great nicety. His father, his maternal uncle, one of his sisters, and her two sons, had all the same defect. A tailor at Plymouth, whose case is described by Mr Harvey, regarded the solar spectrum as consisting only of yellow and light blue; and he could distinguish with certainty only yellow, white, and green. He regarded indigo and Prussian blue as black.—Treatise on Optics, by Dr Brewster. (Cabinet Cyclopædia, Vol XIX*).*

A lady, writing of Sir Thomas Lawrence's liaisons, says, 'He could not write a common answer to a dinner invitation, without its assuming the tone of a billet-doux; the very commonest conversation was held in that soft low whisper, and with that tone of deference and interest, which are so unusual, and so calculated to please. I am myself persuaded, that he never intentionally gave pain. He was not a male coquette; he had no plan of conquest. All I know of his attachments was the ill-fated and never-to be-defended—affair. Ill-fated and indefensible indeed was this affair. Sir Thomas had carried his attentions to an exemplary young lady so far, that it required, on her part, the utmost magnanimity and highest exertion of fortitude and generosity to subdue her feelings, when he declared himself the warm and open admirer of her sister. The painful sacrifice was however made, and the courtship of the other proceeded to the time for the settlement of the day of marriage. The parent of the lady had agreed to relieve Mr Lawrence of all his pecuniary embarrassments, when his wayward fancy too palpably reverted to his first attachment. He was of necessity forbidden further intercourse with the family, or at least with that branch of it. The pure, the excellent, and beautiful girl sunk into the grave with wounded pride and broken spirits, the deplored victim of his caprice. She was allied to a family more celebrated than any extant for talents of a peculiar description, and was the daughter of a lady whose genius in her high profession was probably never equalled, and who with that genius combined a beauty and a physical perfection that we can never expect again to see realised. Lawrence was probably the more to be pitied of the two. From the day of her death to that of his own, he wore mourning, and always used black sealing wax.'—Life of Sir T. Lawrence.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

THE LATE MRS. SIDDONS.

THIS celebrated actress, who died yesterday at an advanced age, made her first appearance at Drury-lane Theatre in the year 1775, in the character of Portia in the Merchant of Venice. During her long theatrical career she appeared in all the leading characters of the tragic drama, including even Juliet and Imogen. But although even in these she no doubt evinced talent, as she advanced in life, she prudently restricted herself to characters better calculated to display her peculiar excellences. Her commanding presence and masculine cast of intellect were best adapted to the expression of the energies of the loftier passions, and the conventional grandeur of elevated rank. Accordingly, it was in such characters as Queen Katherine, Lady Constance, and Lady Macbeth, that she made the most powerful impression and was altogether without a rival. In a family, many members of which have been distinguished by their talents for the stage, her pre-eminence was beyond all question.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Alfred the Great.—X. Y. Z.—The Illustrious Stranger.
COVENT-GARDEN.—The Provoked Husband.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera, in Two Acts, entitled

IL DON GIOVANNI.

[By MOZART.]

Donna Ottavia . . . . . Madame Pasta.
Donna Anna . . . . . Madame Castelli.
Donna Elvira . . . . . Madame Meric Lalande.
Don Giovanni . . . . . Signor Santini.
Leporello . . . . . Signor Lablache.
The Ghost . . . Signor De Angeli.
Don Ottavia . . . . . Signor Curioni.
Masetto . . . . . Signor Gubilei.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Signor Costa.
In which Mademoiselle Taglioni will dance 'The Tyrolienne.'

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss Inverarity. Clorinda, Miss Cawse. Thisbe, Miss Hughes.
Fairy Queen, Miss H. Cawse.
Felix, Mr Wilson. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. Penson.
Alidoro, Mr G. Stansbury. Dandini, Mr Morley. Pedro, Mr Keeley.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Asor and Zemira; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Opera of

THE SLAVE.

[By Mr MORTON.]

Zelinda, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'The Mocking Bird,' and 'Pity and protect the Slave.'
Stella Clifton, Miss Vincent, with the song of 'The Tartar drum.'
Miss Von Frump, Madame Simon. Mrs Lindenberg, Miss Nicol.
Governor of Surinam, Mr Gough. Colonel Lindenberg, Mr Ede.
Captain Malcolm, Mr Edwin, in which he will sing 'My Native Highland Home,' 'The Bay of Biscay, O!" and the Duet, 'In joyful peace disarming,' with Miss Somerville. Captain Clifton, Mr Honner. Fogrum, Mr Vale.
Mathew Sharpset, Mr C. Hill. Sam Sharpset, Mr D. Pitt.
Somerdyke, Mr Almar. Secretary, Mr Maitland. Provost, Mr Hobbs.

After which, the Petite Drama, entitled

"NO!"

Lady Doubtful, Madame Simon. Deborah, Miss Nicol.
Maria, Miss Somerville, in which character she will introduce 'The Village Bells.'
Sir George Doubtful, Mr D. Pitt. Commodore Hurricane, Mr Williams.
Frederick, Mr Edwin. Smart, Mr Rogers. Andrew, Mr Gough.

In the course of the Evening, a Variety of Singing.

To conclude with A New Broad Comic Operatic Farce, in Two Acts, entitled

SHARPS, FLATS, AND NATURALS.

Sharps—Susan Nightingale, Miss Somerville. Miss Margery Muff, Madame Simon.
Merton, Mr C. Hill. Skip, Mr Rogers. Whip, Mr Lee.
Flats—Mrs Dorothea Quibble, Miss Nicol.
Justice Quibble, Mr Williams. Major Bluster, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Servant to Justice Quibble, Mr Hobbs.
Naturals—Peggy, Miss Vincent. Caroline, Mrs C. Hill.
Master Jeremias Quibble, Mr Vale. Joe Nibs, Mr Asbury. Stubs, Mr Webb.

TRANSLATION OF HORACE.
In 2 vols. small 8vo. bound in cloth, with a Portrait and Memoir, price 9s.
HORACE, TRANSLATED BY DR FRANCIS,
In which are introduced Translations of different parts by

Dryden.	Johnson.	C. A. Wheelwright.
Pope.	Chatterton.	H. Hall Joy.
Swift.	Addison.	J. Cam Hobhouse.
Porson.	Lord Byron.	R. Montgomery.
Bentley.	Croly.	J. Merivale.
Milton.	Barry Cornwall.	Leigh Hunt.
Cowper.	Ralph Bernal.	Rev. J. Mitford.
Cowley.	Archd. Wrangham.	&c. &c.

Printed and published by A. J. VALPY, M.A., Red Lion-court, Fleet-street; and sold by all Booksellers.
This Translation forms Vols. 17 and 18 of the FAMILY CLASSICAL LIBRARY, in which have already been printed Translations of Demosthenes, Sallust, Xenophon, Herodotus, Virgil, Pindar and Anacreon, Tacitus, and Theophrastus, with 50 Characteristic Engravings.
Any Author may be had separate, at 4s. 6d. per number.
No. 19 will contain a New Translation of JUVENAL, with PERSIUS, by Sir William Drummond.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

WHO WANTS A GUINEA?

[By COLMAN, the Younger.]

Fanny, Mrs Waylett, who will introduce the Ballet of 'Come dwell with me!'
Amy, Miss Faucit. Mrs Glastonbury, Mrs C. Jones.
Torrent, Mr Dowton. Sir Larry M'Murrough, Mr Vining.
Barford, Mr Cooper. Henry, Mr J. Vining.
Solomon Gundy, Mr Liston. Jonathan Oldstirt, Mr Farren.
Andrew Bang, Mr Harley, who will sing, 'The Nightingale Club.'
Boy, Miss Poole. Hogmore, Mr Tayleure. Carrydot, Mr Hughes.
Heartly, Mr Younge.

In the course of the Evening, Auber's Overture to 'La Muette de Portici;' and Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischutz.'

At the End of the Play, A Comic Address in the Character of Mawworm, by Mr Liston.
Master Cooper, will perform on the Violin, a Favourite Air, with Variations.
After the Comedy, A CONCERT.

After which,

TABLEAUX VIVANS.

Suggested by and illustrating A. Scheffer's beautiful Print, called
THE SOLDIER'S WIDOW!
The whole composed and arranged by Mr W. BARRYMORE.
The Action of the Scene will be confined solely to the expressive Movements of Rossini's beautiful Overture to 'Guillaume Tell,' which will be pourtrayed in character, by Mrs W. Barrymore, as The Soldier's Widow.

The whole to conclude with

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

French—Da Costa's Wife, Mrs Webster. Marinette, Miss Phillips.
Rose, Miss Butline. Jeannette, Mrs Broad.
Napoleon, Mr J. Vining. General Frimont, Mr C. Jones.
General Dusheme, Mr H. Williams. Maladroit, Mr Beason Hill.
Guillot, Mr Honor. Antoine, Mr Howel. Jacques, Mr Eaton.
Jean da Costa, Mr Webster.
English—Mary Cameron, Miss Crawford. Duke of Wellington, Mr Younge.
Lord Hill, Mr Hengler. Duke of Brunswick, Mr Smith.
Prince of Orange, Mr Williams. Marquis of Anglesea, Mr Cooke.
Corporal Standfast, Mr Yarnold. Robert Thompson, Mr Green.
Molly Maloney, Mr Porteus.
Prussians—Phedora, Miss Huddart, Delia, Miss Ballin.
Kouac, Mr Bland. Petran, Mr Cooke. Dolitz, Mr Fenton.
Bredawski, Mr T. Blanchard.

To-morrow, The Legion of Honour; Charles the Twelfth; and Tom Thumb.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Barnett. Jeremy, Mr H. Cooke. John, Mr Davis.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

To which will be added, a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[From the French, by Mr BARNETT.]

Mrs Properly, Miss Wells. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Andrews. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
Thomas, Mr Barnett. And Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with a Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, called

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Miss Wells. Mrs Mac Toddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Porteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi;' Winter's Overture to 'Zaira;' and Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon —M. Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant —The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—Miser of Madrid—Outlaw's Oath.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Orphan of Hindostan—A Pill for Portugal—The Miller's Maid.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº. 240.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10, 1831.

PESTALOZZIAN SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.*

THE name of PESTALOZZI is one which is more generally known than the causes of its celebrity. It is associated with the idea of improvement in education, and of a peculiar system; but of the nature of the improvement, or the system, little is understood. We opened the book before us with an earnest desire to become better acquainted with this benevolent man, and his ideas on the important subject which he had so much at heart; but after a patient perusal of the volume, we understand little more of his system than before. In the character of the man, we find less, perhaps, to admire, than we had ancicipated,—but yet more to love. A general love of his fellow-beings, and zealous desire to serve them, were, from early youth, the spring and aim of every action.

In a periodical paper, called the 'Swiss Journal,' he wrote essays on various public abuses:—'On the temptations which surround females of the lower classes, and on the severity of the law against them, especially in cases of infanticide, contrasted with the impunity of their seducers;—on the abuse of the law-forms for defeating the ends of justice;—on the want of even-handed justice between the rich and the poor, the man of connexions and the man without connexions;—on the oppressions exercised in levying rents and tithes on church property;—on the demoralizing effect of the game-laws in France before the Revolution;—on the hypocrisy of liberal sentiments among the privileged classes, and their indifference to the real sufferings of the people;—on popular education,' &c.—To education he looked, as the only effectual means of remedying these abuses; and he desired that education should be, not only more general and liberal, but more facile. He saw that much time was lost in the repetition of mere verbal lessons, which were repeated by children, by rote, and which had no clear ideas attached to them; and he thought that they were thus urged forward, before they were sufficiently grounded in the rudiments of knowledge. He believed that by a greater degree of attention on the part of the teacher, and by encouraging the children to ask questions, and to exercise their minds as well as their memories, they might be led to make a greater and surer progress with less pain—or even with pleasure—to themselves. He took into his house a number of children of the poorest classes, chiefly orphans,—and he commenced the experiment. Unhappily, his means were limited, and in the earnestness of his desire to benefit as many children as possible, he involved himself in difficulties, which his ignorance and carelessness of all matters of business unfitted him to cope with; and he was obliged to break up his establishment. His repeated failures, and repeated renewals of the experiment, under the most unfavourable circumstances, evince the most extraordinary perseverance. For a long time, he was jeered at as an absurd enthusiast. All these obstacles to success made him melancholy, and during the intervals between the several experiments which he made at Newhoff, Stontz, Burgdorf, and Yverdun, he occasionally expressed himself in a strain of complaint, but never of despair. The following passage, written towards the close of his painful life, is peculiarly touching.

'Thousands pass away, as nature gave them birth, in the corruption of sensual gratification, and they seek no more.

'Tens of thousands are overwhelmed by the burdens of craft and trade; by the weight of the hammer, the ell, or the crown, and they seek no more.

'But I knew a man who did seek more; the joy of simplicity dwelt in his heart, and he had faith in mankind, such as few men have; his soul was made for friendship, love was his element, and fidelity his strongest tie.

'But he was not made by this world, nor for it; and wherever he was placed in it, he was found unfit.

'And the world that found him thus, asked not whether it was his fault, or the fault of another: but it bruised him with an iron hammer, as the bricklayers break an old brick to fill up crevices.

'But though bruised, he yet trusted in mankind, more than in himself; and he proposed to himself a great purpose, which to attain, he suffered agonies, and learned lessons such as few mortals had learnt before him.'

Pestalozzi was capable of great conceptions; he saw what was to be done, but he could not explain his plan to others; he had no talent for detail, and when he endeavoured to reduce his general views to systematic order, he became vague and unintelligible. Dr Biber, who undertakes to explain his meaning, is in some passages yet less intelligible than Pestalozzi himself; and it does not appear to us that his work will much avail for practical purposes. While reading the volume, we felt as if we were walking in the midst of a fog, through a fine country, of which we could only obtain some tantalizing glimpses here and there. The interest of the memoir, with which the work begins, hinges so much upon the method of education which engrossed the whole powers of Pestalozzi, that we regretted it had not been prefaced by some explanation of this method. It is not explained at all. We look upon the volume rather as curious than useful; though it contains much valuable matter, which, had it been separated from the mistakes and changes made by the author, his friends, and his adversaries, might have furnished some important hints to parents and teachers. The memoir of Pestalozzi has such an air of impartiality; his errors are so naturally and charitably accounted for, and his virtues so fairly appreciated, that we were sorry to see, in some other parts of the volume, expressions of bigotry unworthy of the author's better sense and better feelings. He thinks it necessary to apologize for speaking of the 'goodness of nature,' as if it were an impiety; and lest it should give such offence as to 'militate against whatever good may be effected by the present volume,' writes two long pages to explain his reasons for using the term:—

'It will be found throughout the writings of Pestalozzi, and many others of his countrymen, that a great stress is laid upon what is by them termed "nature;"—this term occurs in a variety of phrases, such as, "the voice of nature,"—"the goodness of nature,"—"the law of human nature,"—"the pure impulse of nature,"—and others of the like description. Now it so happens that the term "nature," in this acceptation, clashes most unfortunately with the meaning attached to it, with reference to the condition of the human soul, in the theological language of English divines,' &c.

In a former work, entitled 'Christian Education,' Dr Biber has expressed himself with an intolerance quite at variance with Christian charity, and he allowed himself to speak of the heads of the Hazelwood school in the most harsh and even abusive terms, because they propose to consult the wishes of the parents in the religious instruction given to the boys in their establishment. Dr Biber may be assured that such mistakes will tend more to injure the success of his works, than anything he could say in favour of nature, human or divine. There is so much good sense and good feeling in both the volumes, as to make us deeply regret those passages which are calculated to weaken the author's influence with his readers. And those who would be the most likely to benefit by what is good in them, would be the first to take umbrage at a want of charity so much at variance with their general tenor.

* Henry Pestalozzi, and his Plan of Education; being an Account of his Life and Writings; with copious Extracts from his Works, and extensive Details illustrative of the Practical Parts of his Method. By E. Biber, Ph. Dr. 8vo. pp. 468. Souter.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES IN INDIA.

Sketches of the Danish Missionaries on the Coast of Coromandel. By the Rev. E. W. Grenfield, M.A. 12mo. pp. 152. Rivingtons.

THIS little volume gives us the history of the Christian Missionaries sent to India by the King of Denmark in 1706, and the progress of Christianity among the natives, from that period until the year 1814, when Calcutta became an episcopal see. It appears that the early Missionaries were disinterested and pious men, sincere in their religious faith, and believing it necessary to salvation,—who, in genuine compassion for the many human beings, destined, as they conceived, to eternal torments,—left their native country, and struggling against poverty and contempt, perseveringly studied the language of those parts of the coast to which they resorted, for the purpose of instructing them in that faith which alone could save them. Whatever we may think of their mistakes, and of the irreverend notions of the Deity which such opinions imply; we cannot but feel a strong interest in the proceedings, successes, and distresses, of those truly kind-hearted and amiable men. The chief difficulty they encountered arose from the contradiction of the lives of many Christians residing in India, with the doctrines taught by the Missionaries. The Brahmins said, 'We do not see your own people living conformably to what you teach; now, pray what benefit is all your instruction, if it does not reform the lives of your own people?'—It seems these good-hearted men were not expert teachers, or they would here have impressed upon them the necessity of faith, as of paramount importance, and shewn that good works were but a very secondary consideration. They did not properly explain this. Even when some who were half-converted, conscientiously hesitated from a fear that they should not be able to act up to the purity of the doctrines inculcated by their Danish friends,—they did not secure their proselytes by this assurance. To confess the truth, the early Missionaries lay themselves open to the suspicion of laying undue stress upon good works, and including them in the necessary means of salvation;—but for this, we should have believed that they feared to lose the little influence they had gained in the minds of the Indians, by promulgating this convenient doctrine. And, when it was explained to the Brahmins at a later period, it appears not to have struck them with instant conviction; for as we are told, in the 'Danish Christian Missionary Conferences,' published in 1812,—(a volume which we commend to the reader's notice, if he be not already acquainted with it)—one of them replied, 'Then you think that it is by the strength of his faith, and not by his virtuous conversation, that a man will be saved.—Well, sirs, we look to you and your religion with great respect, and believe, notwithstanding what you have to-day told us, that it contains good and wise precepts; which, if a man follow conscientiously, he will do as well being a Christian, as he would were he a follower of our persuasion.'

Digitized by Google

Mr Grenfield tells us little or nothing of the conferences of the Missionaries with the Indians; his volume is a series of memoirs of the principal Missionaries, and appears to be little more than a compilation from the MS. records of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. By one short specimen of the Brahmins' manner of reasoning, it seems, indeed, that they did not consider the Christian faith much more rational than the Missionaries did theirs. They admitted that it might be very well adapted for Europeans; but, said they,—'As Christ in Europe was made for you, so here our God Vischnu was born for us. As you hope for salvation through Christ, so we hope for salvation from Vischnu. To save you one way, and us another, is one of the pastimes and diversions of the Almighty. Every one may be saved by his own religion, if he does what is good, and shuns what is evil.' He observed also, 'that he did not see how baptism and faith could influence his actions, or promote the forgiveness of sins.' He was bidden to go home and pray to the Lord to enlighten his mind,—and so—according to our author—his 'cavils' were silenced and confuted.

It is remarkable that, although the Danish Missions, commonly so called, were chiefly supported by, and under the direction of, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the difficulties of the service were so great, and the profits so small, that they had much trouble to find assistants and substitutes, as the duties increased, and the early Missionaries died, or returned to Europe. The few who did go, were Danes. The first Englishman who went to India in this capacity, was a Mr Clarke, who, upon the offer of a more profitable appointment, suddenly left his employers in the lurch, immediately after his arrival at Calcutta. The climate, perhaps, conspired with the smallness of the salaries, to deter our beloved countrymen from venturing there in the service of the Society. We do not find that there is any difficulty in finding successors to the see of Calcutta.

It is not our design to enter upon the question of the amount of benefit conferred upon the Indians by their Christian teachers; but to them we may attribute the calling the attention of the Brahmin, Ramohun Roy, to the subject of religious enquiry; and, from the influence over his countrymen of this extraordinary man, who, throwing off the shackles of prejudice, honestly seeks the truth, we believe and hope that much good will result. Praise is due to them also for their attention to the education of youth; since they liberally opened schools for the instruction of the natives, whether or not converted to the Christian faith.

The biographical character of this volume will render it interesting to persons not generally curious on the subject of the Christian Missions.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF LODGE'S ILLUSTRIOUS PORTRAITS.

We applaud Messrs Harding and Lepard for the liberal plurality of their ticket. They discriminate better than many, between what is good and what is not good, that is to say, to their interest, or against it. The user of a single ticket, weary with his solitary journey to the place of exhibition, meeting most probably none but strangers, having no one to converse with, flagged in spirits, and disgusted with his task, is little disposed to be pleased with what he sees. Can he, unless he is the most inured of all the lovers of truth, prevent this from having an effect upon his feelings,—upon his criticism? But he who has a double ticket offers the half to his 'friend;' his friend is pleased; he communicates a share in his feelings to the critic; they talk on their way, and on entering the room, express, if it be possible, their satisfaction to one another. Does this have no effect on the criticism? Whether it has or not, we were agreeably disappointed by Mr Lodge's Portraits. We expected no great gratification from a collection of small water-colour copies of portraits. But the characteristic faces belonging to old names familiar to us, and the physiognomical light (so to speak) which they throw upon history, immediately engaged our attention. The admirable style, too, in which these drawings are executed (of which, however, the engravings give by no means a perfect idea) is no small earnest of their authority, and the copious catalogue is an instructive addition to the entertainment.

One of the first persons we meet with is Henry VIII,—

'Quella bestiaccia,
Tanto crudele, dolorosa, infame,'—

and a few of his wives. How one regrets that such faces as Anne Boleyn's, so animated, so nice-natured, so like her letters, and Catherine Parr's, the most attractive of matrons, should be wasted on his great putty face. The remarkable resemblance his son bears to him makes one doubt, if Edward had not died, whether he would not have outlived his good character; there is the same flat broad squareness of face, petty character of mouth, and pluffy swelled eyes, like a boxer's. We forgot to notice whether the portrait of Queen Elizabeth wanted the shadow under the nose, which she is accused of having desired painters to omit in her portraits, observing, 'I have no black mark under my nose.'

He that sees Wolsey's face will no longer wonder at the power he acquired. In this room, too, is the great Duke of Ormond, a most prudent-looking man. We cannot help thinking that Walker's portrait of Oliver Cromwell, of which the one here is a copy, is less like than Lely's. It wants both the asperities and the humanities of the other.

In the Second Room we are greeted by Fulke Greville, and near him the man he boasted for a friend, Sir Philip Sydney, whose appearance so well answers to his fame. His sister is a blighted saint. In the same groupe are the jolly Catherine of Braganza and her husband, 'who never said a foolish thing, and never did a wise one!' His history illustrates the latter assertion, his face the former. A little farther on is Nelson, with his dreary energetic face. And this reminds us of the execrable arrangement of these portraits. At the entrance of the room is Sir Philip Sidney, near him Charles the Second, soon after Nelson, and in rapid succession, Locke, Newton, Sir Joseph Banks, and Sir Thomas More! In a series of portraits, surely everything requires that they should be in chronological order. The gradations of the costume, the style of painting, and the progress of history, are all unhinged by a distorted arrangement like the one before us.

[We find this exhibition so much more interesting than we expected, that we shall return to it, and probably give some longer notices.]

[The 'Living Painters,' No. 5, containing Messrs Turner, Martin, Daney, and Stothard, will appear to-morrow.]

VAUCLUSE.

Scrambling among the rocks I now stood before the celebrated fountain of Vaucluse. At the distance of a few yards rose above me the huge bald rock I have mentioned, its front inclining a little forward from the perpendicular; and about half way up, springing from two fissures, hung two fig-trees, green and flourishing. In front, the under part of this rock showed a white arch, the entrance to a cavern; and beneath the arch slept, dark and deep, the fountain of Vaucluse. I made my way down the rock that inclines upwards from the water, that I might look into the cavern. The rocky chamber of the fountain appeared to me, as far as the gloom permitted me to ascertain its size, to be about thirty yards in diameter; and the roof in most places from ten to fifteen feet above the surface of the fountain. The water is perfectly tranquil, there is no boiling up or swelling out as from a spring—this, as well as the apparent blackness of the water, being owing to its great depth.

Digitized by Google

The fountain has often been sounded, but ineffectually—not because it is bottomless, but probably because the force of the spring bursting upwards, added to the inefficiency of the instrument used, has prevented the lead from reaching the bottom. That it is of great depth, is, however, indisputable. I remarked, in descending to the brink of the fountain, a slight violet odour, which I at first imagined arose from the water; but upon looking more narrowly at the rocks, I found it proceeded from a deep red vegetable substance which grew upon them—I think the Byssus jolithus of Linnæus. The fountain of Vaucluse presents a totally different aspect at the season when I saw it, and when it was seen after a continuance of heavy rain. In dry weather, it is, as I have described it, a smooth deep fountain, confined to its rocky chamber; and when in this state, it escapes by subterranean passages into the bed of the Sourgue. When the fountain is high, these passages are insufficient, the cavern is no longer visible, for the water reaches the roof, and pours into the bed of the river in the form of a cascade. In this state, however, it must lose that character which is to me its chief attraction—that charm of stillness, placidity, and depth, which hangs over its rocky basin. The cascade may be fine, but I am sure I should have felt disappointment, had I seen it thus. Nothing that I have ever seen has so much exceeded my expectations as Vaucluse. * * * * * By the side of the river, there is a little garden, and a meadow, which are called by the inhabitants, the Garden of Petrarch. A high rock rises about it, on the southern side, and there is a natural grotto in the rock, about thirty feet long, and fifteen feet wide, which is also called the Grotto of Petrarch; and probably both the garden and the rock are justly named; for their features agree with the description given by Petrarch himself of his retreat. He says, in one of his Latin Epistles, 'On one side my garden is bounded by a deep river; on another by a rugged mountain, a barrier against the noon-day heats, and which never refuses, not even at mid-day, to lend me its friendly shade; but the sweet air reaches me through all obstables. In the distance, a surly wall makes me inaccessible to both man and beast.'—Conway's Switzerland, France, &c.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— It is said that the Philharmonic Concerts have been deprived of the presence of Royalty solely by the want of proper accommodation — Herald.

— We understand, that although Mr Alexander Lee and Captain Polhill, the proprietors of Drury Lane Theatre, have paid 45,000*l.* on account of the theatre, still they are losers to the amount of 1200*l.* on the speculation of the season. Both parties, we are informed, are able to satisfy all demands against them.—Daily Paper.

Editorial Puissance.—The Philadelphia Gazette says,—'Editors in common are individuals of nerve. Not to mention the cumbrous masses of humanity that, in countless cases, fill the Editorial chairs throughout the country, we can safely aver that Editors usually possess corporeal puissance. Sometimes they seem pale, and worn with intense thought: but let them be aroused, and a power like that of Laocoön's serpents will be found in their red right hands.

'Though feeble wights they seem, of sallow hue,
Certes who bides their grasp, will that encounter rue.'

Rossini at Madrid.—We are informed by the Correo de Madrid, that on the day of Rossini's arrival last month, the Barbiere di Seviglia was ordered, and a box bespoke for il Maestro; but when the King arrived to witness the performance, Rossini quitted his box, and, appearing in the orchestra, took on himself the direction of the opera. No commentary can do justice to the applause with which this 'spoiled child of Europe,' as the people of Madrid term him, was crowned.—Harmonicon.

A Tahitian Custom.—A few days ago, a man of low rank, sent a great black hog through the district, with an intimation to all whom it might concern, that he wanted thirty-six fathoms of cloth. The carcase was carried from house to house, but no one would receive it, nor could any company of neighbours be persuaded to take the bait, tempting as it was, the practice being, in such a case, that whosoever tastes of the flesh is bound to do his proportion of the work, or furnish his quota of the commodity required. Undiscouraged by his ill-luck, and determined to try all fair means of obtaining his object, the owner forwarded his pig to the king, who not being at home at the time, the queen received it, and ordered it to be cooked. A number of women who had themselves rejected the overture, hearing of her majesty's acceptance of it, and knowing that she must manufacture the whole quantity of cloth with her own hands, unless voluntary assistance were given, aroha'd her, that is, they had compassion on her, which they shewed, first by going to her, and partaking of the dressed hog, and then by making each a portion of the quantity demanded, which was thus soon completed, and sent to the poor man's house.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

Gross Mockery of Justice.—The Queen of Madagascar was ill, and was supposed to have been poisoned by some of her female attendants. A number of these were brought to the ordeal of each having one joint of one finger, then another of the same, and so on from finger to finger, and from the fingers to the hands, and from the hands to the wrists, the wrists to the elbows, and the elbows up to the shoulders,—chopped off in succession (even to the mutilation of the whole body in case of contumacy) so long as the sufferer could endure the torture, that is, till she confessed the crime of which she was only suspected, whether guilty or not, when she was of course put to death at once. Thus there was no alternative between being murdered by inches or by one merciful blow, the mercy not being shewn till the wretch was thus proved to be a criminal, and deserving of none.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.—[The last sentence must not pass unnoticed: the author can scarcely mean to say that any criminal, however proved to be such, is undeserving of mercy.]

— Charles X has great hopes of being appointed a justice of the peace in Canton.—Figaro.

Singular Property of Phosphorus.—One of the most remarkable facts, is that discovered by M. Thenard. He found that phosphorus, purified by repeated distillations, though naturally of a whitish yellow colour when allowed to cool slowly, becomes absolutely black when thrown melted into cold water. Upon touching some little globules that still remained yellow and liquid when he was repeating this experiment, M. Biot found that they instantly became solid and black.—Treatise on Optics, by Dr Brewster. (Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, Vol. XIX.)

APPALLING FAMINE IN IRELAND.

By a recent calculation the dreadful fact is ascertained, that there are in the county of Mayo one hundred and sixty thousand four hundred human beings in danger of perishing by famine. Similar wretchedness is taking place in the counties of Galway and Donegall. People are endeavouring to support life on nettles and seaweed, mothers are wailing for their crying children, families are stretched upon sick beds trying to die patiently. IN THE NAME OF GOD how can the British Nobility sit still in their chairs when they read of these things, and not rise up and offer their THOUSANDS in aid of their fellow-creatures! How can the BISHOPS sit still, and shamefully endure to have wealth at their bankers'! We respect many members of the present GOVERNMENT, and admire its general spirit, but we must express our DEEP ASTONISHMENT that it does not take instant measures for sending off ship-loads of assistance to Ireland. Why will they have us to ask whether there are such scenes as this in America?—The inhabitants of Chelsea, to their great honour, have raised a subscription from door to door, and are to have a sermon in furtherance of it next Sunday.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—Il Don Giovanni—Kenilworth.
Drury-Lane.—Who Wants a Guinea?—Tableaux Vivans—The Battle of Waterloo.
Covent-Garden.—Cinderella—Napoleon Buonaparte.

There is such a general and just sense of the merits of the great actress lately deceased, that we do not feel ourselves called upon to speak at large upon the subject. Mrs Siddons excited admiration; but it was in a line of tragedy which does not induce the memory to dwell upon it with any particular fondness; and as a private person, she lived retired, and drew upon us for little personal sympathy. 'She, queen-like, from her state inclined not.' The popular idea of her partook of the sovereignty of her brother John Kemble, though with less stiffness. It was said of an actress in former days, that in a fit of delirium she expressed herself in blank verse respecting the creation of a new batch of peers:—

'Ah, ah! And so they make us lords by dozens!'

We have heard it said of Mrs Siddons (we know not how truly) that being told of a young clerk in an office, who had got shut up in it when his brother clerks went away, and was described by a foreigner as being locked up in the bureau, she exclaimed, with habitual dignity,

'Alack-a-day! Poor youth, how gat he there?'

We believe she did not say much in ordinary; nor act up, in what she did say, to the expectations of her admirers. Nor was she bound to do so. It was enough, as Mr Hazlitt said, that she was Mrs Siddons. Her business had been with the thoughts of others;—her praise consisted in giving them a noble utterance. It procured her the right of being silent, together with an ample fortune, a good old age, and a line of enviable panegyrists all her life long, from Mr Hazlitt to Dr Johnson. Sir Walter Scott has recorded his admiration of her more than once. Mr Hazlitt has said many fine things of her. Dr Johnson's compliment is well known. She came to visit him one day, when there were not chairs enough in his room. 'You see, Madam,' said the Doctor, 'wherever you come, there is a dearth of seats.'

Mrs Siddons had a talent for sculpture. The head of her brother Charles, which is to be had in the shops, was of her modelling; and she made a striking profile of herself in a medallion.

Digitized by Google

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.—We understand that the following appointments have been lately made by the council of this institution:—The Rev. W. Otter, A.M., to be Principal of the College, and Lecturer in Divinity; L. J. Ventouillac, Esq. to be Professor of French Literature; A. Bernays, Esq. of German Literature; M. Gabriele Rosetti, LL.D. of Italian Literature. We have also been informed, that the late Mrs Duppa has bequeathed a legacy of 1.000l. clear of all charges, to the College; and that Mr Sharon Turner has presented the library with a copy of his valuable publications in English History.

— I cannot resist the temptation of giving a few extracts from the Latin Epistles of Petrarch, less generally known than his sonnets, descriptive of his manner of life in the solitude which he had chosen:—'The only woman whom I ever see is a black servant, dry and withered like the desarts of Lybia. Here, neither the harmony of human voices, nor of instruments, reaches my ears. I hear only the lowing of cattle, the bleating of sheep, the warbling of birds, and the murmuring of waters. I am silent from morning till night, for I have no one to speak to. The people, who are occupied in cultivating their vines, or mending their nets, understand not the charms of conversation, nor the sympathies of life. I often content myself with sharing black bread with my valet, and I enjoy it. This man reproaches me with the severity of the life which I lead; but as for me, I find it easier to accustom myself to the simple food of the poor, than to a more artificial way of life. Figs, grapes, walnuts, almonds.—these are my delight. My table is also graced with the fish that abound in my river; and it is one of my greatest pleasures to watch the fishermen draw their nets, and to draw them myself. All about me is changed. I used to dress myself with care; now you would believe me a labourer or a shepherd. My house resembles that of Fabius, or of Cato. I have but a valet and a dog. The house of my servant adjoins my own. I call him when I want him, and when I have no need of him, he returns home.'—Conway's Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees. Vol. II.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg pardon of AGIS. We received his packet; but a press of business hindered us from paying due attention to it at the moment, and for a day or two it has escaped our memory, owing to the same cause. He shall hear of it as soon as possible.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama of

CHARLES THE TWELFTH.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Ulrica, Miss Faucit. Eudiga, Mrs Waylett.
Charles the Twelfth, Mr Farren. Triptolemus Muddlewerk, Mr Harley.
Major Vanberg, Mr Cooper. Adam Brock, Mr Liston.
Gustavus, Mr J. Vining. Colonel Reichel, Mr Cooke.

In the course of the Evening, Lindpaintner's Overture to 'Joko;' A. Lee's Overture to the 'Invincibles;' and Rossini's Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algieri.'

After which, a new

DIVERTISSEMENT SUISSE.

Composed by Monsieur Simon. In which will be danced a PAS DE DEUX, by M. Gilbert and Mlle. Rosalia Guet; and the celebrated TYROLIENNE, from the Ballet of 'Guillaume Tell,' by M. Lefebvre, Mlle. Kaniel, and Mlle. Taglioni, with full Chorus, and Corps de Ballet. Madame Pasta will sing 'Di Tanti Palpiti,' from the Opera of 'Tancredi;' and a favourite Air, from the Opera of 'Medea.'

To which will be added, a New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]
The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

To conclude with the Burletta of

TOM THUMB.

Queen Dollalolla, Mrs C. Jones. Huncamunca, Mrs Faucit.
Frizaletta, Mrs East. Plumante, Miss Vallancy.
King Arthur, Mr Dowton. Lord Grizzle, Mr Liston. Tom Thumb, Miss Poole.
Noodle, Mr Yarnold. Doodle, Mr Salter.
Ghost of Gaffer Thumb, Mr Bishop. Merlin, Mr Fenton.

To-morrow, William Tell; Deaf as a Post; The Portrait of Cervantes.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Miss Cawse. Lesbia, Miss H. Cawse. Zemira, Miss Inverarity.
Rosedelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulia, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

After which a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Napoleon Buonaparte; Gipsy Father; and The Waterman.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LA CHANSON; OU, L'INTERIEUR D'UN BUREAU.

Comédie Vaudeville en Un Acte.

Eugénie, Madame Gamard. Bellemain, M. Gamard.
M. de Valcour, M. St Aubert. Dumont, M. Prèval. Un Huissier, M. Granville.
Victor, M. Alfred.

Suivi de

ANTOINE; OU, LES TROIS GENERATIONS.

Pièce en Trois Epoques, Mêlée de Chant, par MM. Melesville et Braxier.
Léon, Mlle. St Ange. La Marquise de St Valier, Madame Prèval.
Clémentine, Mlle. Florval. La Comtesse de Moirmont, Madame Baudin.
La Baronne de Lornes, Mlle. Corra. Henriette, Mlle. Jamain.
Madeline, Madame Gamard.
D'Antoine, M. Potier. Le Marquis de St Valier, M. St Aubert.
Le Vicomte de Chailly, M. Laporte. Le Président de Chatenay, M. Arnaud.
Leblanc Père, M. Prèval. Le Conseiller, M. Alfred.
Le Chevalier de Mirecourt, M. Paulin. Un Valet, M. Granville.
Placide, M. Gamard. Bertrand, M. Pelissié. François, M. Guenée.
Leblanc Fils, M. Cloup.

On finira par

WERTHER.

Vaudeville et Un Acte, du Théatre des Variétés.
Charlotte, Madame Prèval. Werther, M. Potier. Volmar, M. Alfred.
Albert, M. Cloup. Frits, M. Gamard. Loustick, M. Guenée.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,)" Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

After which, A MUSICAL MELANGE.

To conclude with an Historical Drama, in Five Parts, entitled

NAPOLEON, THE VICTIM OF AMBITION.

The Music by Mr J. M. Jolly.

French.—Madame Bertrand, Madame Matilda. Madame Montholon, Miss Jordan.
Katty O'Neal, Madame Simon. Fanchon, Mlle. Rosier.
Frisk, Mrs C. Hill. Juliana, Miss Vincent. Katty O'Neal, Mme. Simon.
Bumbong, Miss Rumens.
Napoleon, Mr Osbaldiston. Bertrand, Mr C. Hill. Marmont, Mr Almar.
Sergeant Snitch, Mr Vale.
English:—Miss Balcomb, Miss Somerville.
General Sir Hudson Lowe, Mr Gough. Mr Balcomb, Mr Young.
Capt Sterling, Mr Edwin.
In the Allegory.—Justice, Miss Scott. Ambition, Mr Almar.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Barnett. Jeremy, Mr H. Cooke. John, Mr Davis.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

To which will be added, a New Farcetta, called

DOUBLE OR QUITS.

[From the French, by Mr BARNETT.]

Mrs Properly, Miss Wells. Mrs Anna Maria Podger, Mrs Garrick.
Miss Ellen Temple, Miss Andrews. Captain Somerton, Mr Forrester.
Thomas, Mr Barnett. And Mr Augustus Podger, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with a Domestic Drama, in Three Acts, called

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

[By Mr M'FARREN.]

Jenny, Mrs Evans. Dame Fairly, Miss Wells. Mrs Mac Toddy, Mrs Garrick.
Marian, Mrs Saville.
Auld Robin Gray, Mr Keppel. Jamie, Mr Forrester. Sandy, Mr Marshall.
Archibald Tillyvallock, Mr Munroe. Farmer Fairlie, Mr Porteus.
Patie, Mr G. Lejeune. Dougal, Mr Willing. Simon, Mr Davies.
Paul Bowbell, Mr Wilkinson.
Gipsies—Elspeth, Miss Dix. Ronald, Mr Spencer. Gabriel, Mr G. Smith.
Gilbert, Mr H. Cooke. Elshie, Mr Barnett.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi;' Winter's Overture to 'Zaira;' and Bishop's Overture to 'Guy Mannering.'

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

KING LEAR.

King Lear, Mr KEAN.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon —M. Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant —The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—Miser of Madrid—Outlaw's Oath.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Orphan of Hindostan—A Pill for Portugal—Clari.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 241.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1831.

SHAKSPEARE'S SONNETS, AND A NEW ANECDOTE OF HIM.

No sooner had we put forth our ingenuous expostulation with Mr Moxon, for not sending us his edition of Shakspeare's sonnets, than with a celerity of movement, to be equalled only by the grace of it, a copy comes flying into our hands. Monday's TATLER could hardly have been seen by him, before Monday's morning brings us the handsome result, bound withal in perfect good taste, and as truly lettered. Moxon! thou art a bookseller worthy of thine authors, and we prophecy much unusual good of thee,—much finer Lintot, and superior Tonson. It was not to everybody that we could have put that remonstrance; but thou hast a tact and an elevation;—thou canst discern the difference between the sordid view, and the choice impulse.

Mr Moxon's edition of these Sonnets* is beautifully printed in a small volume in duodecimo, a sonnet to each page; and it is accompanied by those of Milton, making altogether a book of 186 pages, fit for the pocket. The Italian portion of the sonnets of Milton is judiciously retained. Whether Cowper's translation of them was the best to be had, may be doubted; but they are better than none. A short introduction to the volume is headed by an apposite Sonnet on the Sonnet, from the pen of Mr Wordsworth, containing what may be called the biographical history of this species of poem. He characterizes the sonnets of Shakspeare as the 'key' with which he 'opened his heart.'

All the miscellaneous poems of our great dramatist, notwithstanding his fame, and their truly Shaksperian merits, seem to have remained in obscurity almost ever since the age in which they were published, though at that time they appear to have gained him more applause from public writers than his plays. One of the great reasons of this neglect is undoubtedly that distinction drawn in mens' minds between the drama and every other species of writing, which induces booksellers to publish the plays 'of an author without his poems;' and another was the great fame attained by the author in that larger shape. Multitudes are acquainted with the Fairy Queen of Spenser, who are not aware that he wrote a great many sonnets; and even the sonnets of Milton are probably unknown to thousands of the readers of Paradise Lost. Some have thought, or affected to think, the sonnets of Shakspeare not worth perusal. Steevens the commentator, an acute observer up to a certain point, but who could write like an idiot when he got beyond it, pronounced of them, and of the 'Poems' in general, that 'the strongest act of parliament,' framed on purpose, could not compel people to read them, they are so inferior even to the smallest poets of the time. What is more curious is, that editors who have combated this opinion, and printed the poems, do not appear to have read them. In Mr Chalmers's edition, there is a complaint, that we are nowhere, in Shakspeare's works, let into any of the secrets of his domesticity,—of his friendships, his amusements, his private character, &c. whereas his sonnets present us with some remarkable evidences to the contrary: and this brings us to the new anecdote we have announced, which is contained in a valuable work that has just appeared from the pen of Mr Payne Collier, entitled The History of English Dramatic Poetry, and Annals of the Stage.† We shall notice Mr Collier's work further on Monday. It is no common production of the kind; and as it will doubtless attract a good deal of attention, especially from those who are critical in dramatic writing, and interested in the character of Shakspeare, we shall take this opportunity of saying a word or two on a subject which in these prying times will not be overlooked. The anecdote itself, such as it is, is a bit of scandal. We are far from objecting to Mr Collier for finding it. He does it in a perfectly just and honourable spirit: and among the usual readers of theatrical anecdotes, it will be looked upon as more in unison with the poet's character for wit, than calculated to do his memory any very violent disservice.

Among other novelties which he has brought forward, it was Mr Collier's good fortune, or rather the reward of his industrious research, to meet with a Manuscript Diary, which appears to have been kept by a barrister, and which includes original anecdotes of Shakspeare, Spenser, Tarleton, Ben Jonson, Marston, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others. Some of these anecdotes, he observes, 'are in their nature comparatively trifling, but, as has often been said, trifles become important when connected with the lives of distinguished men.' The MS. is in the Harleian Collection (No. 5353) and excepting by the writer of the catalogue, 'seems to have remained in that collection entirely unexamined.'

In this Diary, says Mr Collier, is 'a personal anecdote regarding our great dramatist, which possibly may serve to explain a good deal that has been obscure in his Sonnets. Much has been said, at different times, on the moral character of Shakspeare, as if in this respect he were far superior to the manners of the time in which he lived; and Boswell, in the last edition of his works, expressly observes, "We may lament that we know so little of his history; but this, at least, may be asserted with confidence, that at no time was the slightest imputation cast upon his moral character." This statement has reference to such of Shakspeare's Sonnets, as, taken literally, and, as I apprehend, not a few of them ought to be taken, indicate that Shakspeare was not, in this respect, more pure and perfect than most of his contemporaries. I think it extremely probable that some of those Sonnets were composed for other people, who could not write them for themselves, and who wished to make a favourable impression; but others undoubtedly have a personal allusion to himself, and the difficulty is now to separate one from the other. If we may believe the plain import of his 69th sonnet, in particular, he was at one period in love with a female who was not very chary of her reputation:—

> "But why thy odour matcheth not thy show,
> The solve is this—that thou dost common grow."

And he over and over again laments the disgrace brought upon himself by his misconduct: in his 112th sonnet he says,

> "Your love and pity doth the impression fill,
> Which vulgar scandal stamped upon my brow."

Again, in his 121st sonnet, beginning, "'Tis better to be vile than vile esteemed," he exclaimed,

> "No—I am that I am; and they that level
> At my abuses, reckon up their own;"

while, in his 131st sonnet, he tells the female, on account of whom he had been attacked,

> "In nothing art thou black, save in thy deeds;
> And thence this slander, as I think, proceeds:"

So that although it may be very true, that no imputation upon his moral character had been discovered from extraneous sources, when Steevens or when Boswell wrote, yet, if we are to believe himself, although a married man, with a wife and family at Stratford, he was not immaculate. The difficulty of reconciling much that is contained in the sonnets has arisen from an amiable desire to think Shakspeare's moral and poetical character equally perfect. If, in the course of my enquiries, I have been unlucky enough (I may perhaps say) to find anything which represents our great dramatist in a less favourable light, as a human being with human infirmities, I may lament it, but I do not therefore feel myself at liberty to conceal and suppress the fact.

'Whether the anecdote in question be true or untrue, whether it were a mere joke or the invention of "vulgar scandal," it comes recommended to our notice upon tolerably good authority. Nicholas Tooley was one of the actors in Shakspeare's plays, and belonged to the company of the Globe Theatre in 1596; and it is very possible that the author of this Diary had met with him at some ordinary in London, and had heard from him the story in question, as we find the words "Mr Tooley" subjoined at the end of it, as the person from whom the writer had received it.

'"March 13th, 1601.

'"Upon a tyme when Burbadge played Rich. 3, there was a citizen grewe so farre in liking with him, that before shee went from the play, shee appointed him to come that night unto hir, by the

* The Sonnets of Shakspeare and Milton. 12mo pp. 186. Moxon.

† The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the Time of Shakspeare, and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. By J. Payne Collier, Esq. F.S.A. In three volumes 8vo. Murray.

Digitized by Google

name of Rich. 3. Shakspeare, overhearing their conclusion, went before. * * * * * * Then message being brought that Rich. the 3 was at the dore, Shakspeare caused returne to be made, that William the Conqueror was before Rich. the 3.—Shakspeare name Willm.—Mr Tooley."

'This may have been (as I have said) a mere slanderous invention, a harmless joke, or a plain truth; and it is not to be forgotten, in reference to the value of Tooley's authority, that he had been the apprentice of Richard Burbadge, and might have had the story from that distinguished performer, who was himself a party in it.'—Vol. I, p. 329.

Our new anecdote, it must be confessed, is a better bon mot than story. The lady's love was not worth the trick, even as a matter of gallantry. However, every little addition to Shakspeare's history is valuable, though the anecdote throws no new light upon the Sonnets. The Sonnets themselves tell much more.

The plain truth, we suspect, with regard to Shakspeare's private life, would be found to amount to this;—that the same good-humoured casuistry which enabled him to regard the errors of his fellow-creatures with a kind eye, conspired, with lax habits of education, to allow him to indulge himself in such licenses of the times as he found prevalent among his brother actors; but did not prevent, nevertheless, frequent misgivings, and the self-resentment due to the nobler impulses of his nature. The wonderful intellect which we all know he possessed, and the singular sweetness of nature, which not only seems attributed to him by his contemporaries, but which is very evident in the Sonnet before us, would not permit him to grow insensible to the finer parts of virtue, either in their gracefulness or their social necessity; and in fact, while we have, in these Sonnets, proof positive that he not only had a mistress during his marriage, but that she was a woman of openly licentious life, and even worthy of being pronounced by him his 'bad angel,' and that he loved her nevertheless, and allowed all her license, yet we have equal proof that he often lamented his passion, and that his feelings in every other point were singularly child-like, and what is termed in these days 'romantic.' The Sonnets record a 'friend' of his, of whose perfection of nature he speaks in the strong hyperbolical language common to that age, and with all the enthusiasm of a school-boy. The female seduces this Grandison of a friend, which our author takes very unkindly of her, but still forgives; and she appears to have got the charitable poet into so much trouble, that at one time he thought proper to avoid any public recognition of Grandison, lest he should mix him up with the bad company she kept. The Sonnets, which were not given to the world, we believe, till after the poet's death, are dedicated to this exalted personage by the publisher, under the title of 'Mr W. H.,' which have strangely been supposed by some to be an anagram for Henry Wriottesley, Earl of Southampton, a known friend of Shakspeare's, and the romantic adherent of Essex. The person, whoever he was, is represented in the Sonnets, among his other perfections, as possessing 'birth;' but not to insist on the improbability of the anagram, it is not likely that a nobleman, besides having his initials twisted, would be styled 'Mister.'

It is to be recollected after all, that we have no proof of the authenticity of all these sonnets. Some, nay, very many, are as manifestly Shaksperian, as the poetry in his plays; but the publisher may have done what he pleased with them. Some, as Mr Collier suggests, may have been written for other persons. In all, we are strongly to keep in mind the manners of the times, and to do for Shakspeare what he did for mankind,—put upon them the handsomest constructions. Their beauties are so exquisitely beautiful, so full of the kindest feelings, the deepest love of nature, the most refined and disinterested sentiment, that we owe to their author all the generosity we can shew him, and are bound to imagine that even his bad woman must have had some strange inconsistent qualities about her to redeem her character. In that respect, they present us with a sort of poetical Manon L'Escant.

Curious particulars of a minor kind may be gathered from these poems. They prove, satisfactorily at least to us, that Shakspeare was lame; that he rode on horseback, and could startle us and himself with thrusting a spear in the poor beast; that he did not write the sonnet, as commentators have supposed, when he was young; and that he hated his profession of a player, and thought it had hurt even his mind. The first seventeen are written to persuade his friend to marry, that so good a race might not be lost. It is not improbable, we think, that this person may be discovered by diligent enquiry among the W. H.'s of peerages and old books. We have a notion, from the multitude of apparent playings upon the words of a similar sound, that his name was Hugh or Hew. What sweet, and what grand things there are in these poems!

'Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May.
* * * * * *

'Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain-tops with sovereign eye, &c.
* * * * * *

'That thou art blam'd, shall not be thy defect,
For slander's mask was ever yet too fair:
The ornament of beauty is suspect,
A crow there flies in heaven's sweetest air.
* * * * * *

'That time of year thou mayest in me behold,
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang
Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruin'd choirs in which the sweet birds sang.
* * * * * *

'Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds;
And bends with the remover, to remove;
Oh no; it is an ever-fixed mark,
Which looks on tempests and is nevershaken.'
* * * * * *

And take the following entire sonnet, as evincing the perfection of tenderness:—

'No longer mourn for me when I am dead,
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
Give notice to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it: for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
O if, I say, you look upon this verse,
When I perhaps compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love ev'n with my life decay:
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
And mock you with me, after I am gone.'

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. V.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.—J. MARTIN—FRANCIS DANBY, A.—THOMAS STOTHARD, R.A.

If man be the most wilful of animals, Mr Turner is the most wilful of men. And yet he is a painter, not of talent only, but of genius—a rare endowment, however liberally distributed amongst artists and authors by the false oracles and prophets of the time. Were half the sugared words true with which some of our critics try to sweeten the disappointments of their favourite writers, the world would be full of geniuses. We hear of 'a young man of genius'—of 'a rising genius'—of 'unquestionable genius'—of 'considerable genius'—and of works which 'betray genius'—and fifty other confectionary phrases, which serve no end but to treble the natural vanity of our heroes of the pencil and the goose quill, and to delude the simple public. There is not one 'young man of great genius'—no, nor one old man of great genius, amongst a million men. It is all a mistake; and posterity will find it out, if indeed we have not begun to make the discovery already.

But Mr Turner is a man of a different stamp. He is, by general assent, a person of eminence in his line, and in our estimation he is super-eminent. He has invention, power, experience, and an elevated view of his art, beyond any of his cotemporaries,—nay, beyond any English landscape-painter whatever. We assert this, notwithstanding his wilful, mad, inflamed pictures—notwithstanding his vain contempt of all opinion—notwithstanding, in short, his present disease (opthalmia or calenture) which leads him into the most marvellous absurdities and audacities of colour that painter ever ventured on—perhaps tempts him into the belief, that under the raging heat of his reds and blues and yellows, which belong only to the dog-days, there lurk the coolness of April, the greenness, freshness, and beauty of his native valley. This is very melancholy; but we trust that a timely application of blistering and phlebotomy may arrest the current of his disorder; and in the meantime we will endeavour to preserve him as he was, in our recollection.

Did the reader ever see the early pictures of Turner? or his drawings, done in his best time (after he had cast off the pettiness of his first style, and before he commenced those freaks of colour with which he is now content to amaze the public?) Or did he ever see his Liber Studiorum? If not, he is not acquainted with this extraordinary artist. Nothing comes amiss to him. The temples of Jove and Cybele are not too lofty; the Dutch fishing-boat is not too mean. 'He is not one, but Legion.' More sublime than

Digitized by Google

Claude; less savage, yet grander than Salvator Rosa; and more beautiful, if less simple in his scenes, than are the vernal landscapes of Gaspar Poussin, Mr Turner must be esteemed, even by his enemies, as a painter of no common merit.

> 'Whate'er Lorraine light-touched with soft'ning hue,
> Or savage Rosa dashed, or learned Poussin drew'— comes within the compass of his pencil, besides many things which those great men never attempted. Some of his landscapes, such as 'the Solway Moss,' 'Rizpah,' &c. force Rembrandt upon our thoughts, with no unfavourable comparison, however, for our artist. They are grand, dreary, sterile things, which must impress any one. At another time, his picture glows with all the flush and fever of Rubens; or outblazes the setting suns of Claude. We have, then, 'a fishing-boat off the Dogger Bank,' 'the Sands at Yarmouth,' or 'Cutting the Painter,'—all done in a style that would make Cuyp die the death of envy. His management of light and shade is wonderful, and therefore it is that his works tell so much better than others when engraved. His broad, bold masses—his trees and columns, thrown up in the very middle of his pictures his castle-crowned hills, which stand up like dark giants between you and the evening light—all tell of 'I dare!'—and all equally shew the powerful and ambitious man. One thing only we seem to want,—repose. Far excelling, in our opinion, any of the Italian painters, in vastness and sublimity, we yet often, when contemplating his works, seem to miss the amenities of Claude, or long to wander among the green paths and pastoral solitudes which distinguish, like a perpetual spring, the gentle labours of Gaspar Poussin.

Mr Martin entertains a more limited view of Nature. He has one grand idea; and if the invention be his own, he may rest content with having done one thing, that no one before him accomplished, or even attempted; but he has no variety. His simple landscapes, —when he ventures on such things, which he does in his drawings, —are absolutely worthless; but when he gets amongst his Egyptian, or Roman, or Babylonian visions, then he becomes great. He builds up column after column, dome beside dome, terrace after terrace, till one grows dizzy at the sight. We are introduced to Belshazzar and Semiramis,—we behold Nebuchadnezzar 'in his habit, as he lived,'—we are lost in wonder at the populous, endless multitudes which throng about those gorgeous places, of which now not a square foot of granite or sandstone remains:—

> 'Such throngs of old were never known to stream
> From Babylon or Susa, nor when last
> The Assyrian met the Mede, and marked the bounds
> Of empire by the gates of Nineveh:'

If Ninus or Semiramus had their thousands, Mr Martin has his tens of thousands. If they had palaces ten stories high, Mr Martin builds up twenty stories. This is the simple secret of his grandeur, —the accumulation of materials, the exaggeration—we do not mean this in its offensive sense—the exaggeration of fact. Mr Martin takes an unit and multiplies it by a million, and it becomes great. He extends a league to twenty, and—out of the mere necessity of preserving the perspective—grows up aerial distances, winding waters, rising hills, blue peaks, and mountains which blend and are finally lost in the white clouds afar off. And so he goes on, and so let him go on, so long as he has materials at hand to construct his pictures, and the public have the disposition to buy. We do not admire Mr Martin as an artist so intensely as some persons, but the fault may lie in ourselves, perhaps, as much as in Mr Martin.

Mr Danby began well, but he has proceeded indifferently. As a mere painter, he has more skill than Mr Martin; but he is inferior to him in imitation. There was something striking in his 'Sunset,' with the wreck floating beneath a crimson sun,—something grand in his 'Red Sea;' but he appears to us now to fall off. His 'Golden Age' in the present Somerset House Exhibition, ought to be called 'The Pink Age,' or perhaps 'The Age of Brass.'

We have left ourselves scarcely any room to speak of one of the very first artists that ever adorned this country; we mean Mr Stothard. Taking into consideration his invention and grace, and (covert) humour, he is, in our opinion, at the top of the English Historical School. He is deficient somewhat in the masculine qualities of an historical painter, and latterly he has degenerated into manner; but taking him altogether, we do not know his equal in England. He is said to be the author of nearly five thousand original designs (most or many of which are engraved). We cannot vouch for the number of his designs, but we can attest the excellence of hundreds,—some of them equal, we do not fear to say, in grace and feminine beauty, to Raffaelle himself. If Mr Fuseli was like Michael Angelo (which his admirers say) Stothard resembles 'the prince of painters,' and moreover comes much nearer to him than Fuseli did to his archetype. We will give ourselves pleasure, some of these days, by speaking fully and sincerely on the merits of this fine old simple-minded man. He may be pushed aside and thought little of by his juniors perhaps, whose brazen figures and ostentatious academical studies may dim for a time the modest and delicate forms of the octogenarian artist, but his deeds will live and be looked at, as models by future painters, when the swarms of pretenders will be forgotten.

[No. VI. will contain HILTON—HOWARD—ETTY—and EASTLAKE.]

MUSIC.

SIGNOR PAGANINI'S SECOND CONCERT.

THIS astonishing being gave his second Concert last evening, at the Opera-House. The confirmation of the incredible reports that had preceded him to this country having been more than realised upon his first performance last Friday, the doors of the theatre, upon the present occasion, were crowded long before their opening, and in the course of a few minutes, the first rush filled every unengaged place in the house. Upon sitting down to record an account of the feats of this evening, we feel equally incompetent as upon the first hearing, to convey any adequate idea of the performer's amazing accomplishments. Notwithstanding the satisfactory proofs we have had to the contrary, it is difficult to shake off the impression that we have been in the presence of a supernatural being. So many requisites towards forming a complete musician are combined in his mind and person, that we can conceive a millenium to elapse before the same qualities may unite again. He has a fine and original genius in composition, a pure and exquisite tone, a most impassioned expression, and an execution so miraculous, that all who have once heard him will henceforward hesitate before they doubt an impossibility. His performance upon the present occasion consisted first of a concerto of three movements, an introduction, an adagio (not of so fine and severe a character as the one we heard last Friday) and a brilliant finale. The second consisted of a military rondo introducing the preghiera from 'Pietro l'Eremita,' performed solely upon the fourth string; and the last a series of astounding variations upon the well-known melody 'The Carnival of Venice.' Although he thus occupies so considerable a space in the evening's entertainment, the attention to a solo performance, far from flagging, increases with his playing, until it amounts to a climax of enthusiasm. Never did we expect to come away from an hour and half's concerto on the violin with a refreshed and eager spirit, yet such has been the case this evening. Verily he hath a Devil.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE AMERICAN INDIAN.

He was fresher from the hand
That formed of earth the human face,
And to the elements did stand
In nearer kindred than our race.
In many a flood to madness tost,
In many a storm has been his path,
He hid him not from heat or frost,
But met them, and defied their wrath.

Then were they kind—the forests, there
Rivers and still waters paid
A tribute to the net and spear
Of the red ruler of the shade.
Fruits on the woodland branches lay,
Roots in the shaded mould below;
The stars looked forth to teach his way,
And still earth warned him of the foe.

A noble race; but they are gone
With their forests, wide and deep;
And we have built our homes upon
Fields where their generations sleep.
Their fountains slake our thirst at noon,
Upon their hills our harvest waves,
Our lovers woo beneath their moon,
And all still pay a tribute to their graves.

G.

'SINDBAD THE SAILOR.'—As an instance of the universal popularity of the Arabian Nights, we observe that there is an American brig, trading to Mexico, the name of which is Sindbad; given it, no doubt, in honour of the celebrated fictitious voyager, whose adventures have become as interesting to us as truth. The name of the Captain is Millar. We congratulate him on his good taste; and hope he will escape as prosperously through all his perils, as the godfather of his vessel.

— The papers inform us, that Mr Wordsworth the Poet has been appointed Stamp-distributor for the Carlisle district.

Digitized by Google

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

There is spirit in the lines by W. T. H., entitled 'Yes, our flag has defied;' but we should be loth to thrust them in the teeth of our countrymen, while they are promising to make such amends for their former subserviency.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Charles the Twelfth—Legion of Honour—Tom Thumb.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—Napoleon Buonaparte.
FRENCH PLAYS.—La Chanson—Antoine; Ou, Les Trois Générations—Werther.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of
MEDEA.
[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled
LA BAYADERE.
[Composed by M. DESHAYES.]
The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Musard.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile. M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertram.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Historical Play of
WILLIAM TELL.
[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss Huddart. Anneli, Miss Russell. Agnes, Miss Faucit.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnem, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lutold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr Macready. Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge.
Erni, Mr Cathie. Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke.
Waldman, Mr Hughes. Michael, Mr Cooper. Jaghell, Mr J. Vining.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford, Mr Robinson, Mr Price, and Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Guillaume Tell,' Cherubini's Overture to 'Les Deux Journees,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni.'

After which,
COMFORTABLE LODGINGS.

Antoinette, Miss Chikini. Madame Pelagie Bonassus, Mrs C. Jones.
Sir Hippington Miff, Mr Liston. Capt. Bonassus, Mr W. Bennett.
Bombardier Babillard, Mr Tayleure. Rigmarole, Mr Harley.
Monsieur de Caché, Mr Andrews. Roué, Mr Webster.
Dorville, Mr Howard. Gregory, Mr Hughes.

To conclude with the Farce of
X. Y. Z.
[By COLEMAN the Younger.]

Maria, Mrs Newcombe. Mrs Mouser, Mrs Broad.
Betty, Mrs Webster. Dora Mumwell, Mrs C. Jones.
Captain Galliard, Mr Cooke. Grumbleton, Mr W. Bennett.
Neddy Bray, Mr Liston. Doddle, Mr Hughes.
Roscius Alldross, Mr Tayleure. Ralph Hempseed, Mr Webster.

On Monday, Simpson and Co. The Brigand; Turning the Tables; and Quadrupeds.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.
NEW COMIC ANNUAL.
In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus.' Scena, Tim Wasp. and 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called
YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.
In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine characters.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled
BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.
[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,)" Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, the Musical Drama, in Two Acts, entitled
JOHN OF PARIS.
[By Mr POCOCK.]

Princess of Navarre, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'Should he upbraid.'
Olivia, Miss Vincent, in which she will introduce 'Smart young Bachelors.'
Rosa, Mrs C. Hill. John of Paris, Mr Osbaldiston.
Grand Chamberlain, Mr Williams. Pedrigo Potts, Mr Vale. Philip, Mr Ransford.

To conclude with the Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, in Two Acts, entitled
THE FOULAHS.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

Emily Worthy, Miss Scott. Laura, Miss Bell. Ora, Madame Simon.
Captain Worthy, Mr D. Pitt. Old Worthy, Mr Gough.
Jean Phillipe Gastineau, Mr Honner. Rigid, Mr Asbury. Maline, Mr Webb.
Sergeant, Mr Hobbs. Henry, Miss Ellis. Cato, Mr C. Hill.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.
MINTER'S SELF-ACTING AND RECLINING CHAIR
BY THE KING'S LETTERS PATENT.

G. MINTER begs to acquaint the Nobility, Gentry, &c. that he has invented an EASY CHAIR, the positions or elevations of which are so numerous, that the number is quite indefinite, say from one to one thousand, and are obtained by a slight pressure of the back, which not only reclines the back of the chair, but raises the back part of the seat, thereby causing a proper inclined plane, which supports the weakest part of the back at any and every position. When you rise, the back follows you, and should you stop, the back immediately stops; and all this action is obtained without any spring, rack, or other machinery whatever.

G. Minter particularly recommends it to Invalids for its simplicity: if even they have lost the use of either of their hands or legs, they can obtain any position of themselves without any attendance, or exertion on their own part. The chair is made by the Inventor only, in a variety of plain and elegant shapes, at his manufactory, 26 PRINCES STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE (opposite Coventry street), and are sold as cheap as a common fixed easy chair of the same pattern, which is impossible in any other reclining chair, on account of their complicated construction, and which subjects them to be often out of repair, and even dangerous.—G. M. is confident any person honouring him with an inspection of his Chair, will be sufficiently convinced of its superiority over all others. It is also made portable for travelling, and will pack in a case only fourteen inches deep. It is warranted to act perfect fifty years.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called
NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schoenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

After which a New Drama, in Two Acts, called
THE GIPSY FATHER.
[By the Hon. Mrs. NORTON.]

Rose Franklin, Miss E. Tree. Mary Barwell, Mrs Lovell.
Dolly Dolittle, Mrs Tayleure. Clara, Miss Hughes.
Gipsy Woman, Mrs Daly. Lucy, Miss Hunt.
Barwell, Mr Warde. Richard Barwell, Mr G. Bennett.
Simon Salubrious Dolittle, Mr Keeley. Edwards, Mr F. Matthews.
Judge Franklin, Mr Evans. Jem Hartshorn, Mr Meadows.
William and James, Miss P. Horton and Miss Kendall.
First Gipsy, Mr Turnour. Clerk, Mr Irwin. Servant, Mr Heath.
Previous to the Drama, Von Weber's Overture to Preciosa.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of
THE WATERMAN.
[By Mr DIBDIN.]

Mrs Bundle, Mrs Tayleure. Wilhelmina, Miss Hughes.
Tom Tug, Mr Wilson, who will sing 'The Bay of Biscay O!'
Bundle, Mr Blanchard. Robin, Mr Keeley.

The Waterman to conclude with 'Rule Britannia,' by Mr Wilson, Miss Cawse, and Chorus.

On Monday, Azor and Zemira; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

The Nautical Drama, entitled
BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

The Overture and Music selected from DIBDIN'S Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr BLEWITT.
Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, Mr T. P. Cooke. The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilson.

In the course of the piece, Mr T. P. Cooke will introduce a Comic Song, and dance his celebrated Hornpipe.
At the end of the Drama, a Fantasia on the Violin by Mr Blagrove.
And the celebrated Laughing Trio, 'Vedasi via di Qua,' by Miss Dix, Mr Bennett, and Mr E. Seguin.

After which a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called REFORMATION.
[By Mr BERNARD.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwaring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

After which (by particular desire) the Gipsy Scene from Auld Robin Gray, introducing Bishop's celebrated Glee, 'The Chough and Crow.'

To conclude with a New Comic Operetta, called
PECCADILLOES.
[By Mr RAYMOND.]
The Music composed by Mr G. Cooke.
Donna Laura, Miss Dix. Donna Lorenza, Miss Andrews. Florine, Mrs Humby.
Don Frederick, Mr E. Seguin. Don Valerio, Mr Bennett.
Musquito Panza, Mr Green.

In the course of the evening, Cherubini's Grand Overture to 'Anacreon,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflotte.'

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Feats of Horsemanship—The Liliputian Stud of Burman Ponies — Equitation by the Infant Roscius — Williams's Feats of Jumping—Taplin's Act of the Drunken Dragoon—M. Hengler, Miss and Master Cooke on the Tight Rope—Gymnastics—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis, the Maid-Servant—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Farmers' Daughter.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Frozen Hand—Miser of Madrid—Outlaw's Oath.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Orphan of Hindostan—A Pill for Portugal—The Miller's Maid.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 12 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 242.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1831.

ANOTHER NUMBER OF THE ALDINE POETS.*

We noticed the peculiar features of this collection of the Poets in our remarks on its edition of Collins (Tatler, Nos. 9 and 10.) Since then we have not had the work in our hands till the present Number, which is the first volume of Pope, and is printed and put forth as elegantly as the Collins. The portrait, however, after Vanloo, is hard; and the 'Original Memoir' (to use the term in the general advertisement) is nothing but a compilation. Indeed the author (Mr Dyce) modestly disclaims the praise of having attempted much more: nor must it be concealed, that many of the more ambitious biographies of the poet, stuffed out with flimsy theories or critiques, are far less desirable than the good chronological series of anecdotes, the unpretending gossiping account, with which the editor has here furnished us.

Besides a bad common-place head of Thomson, which we saw to the volume of his Poems in a shop-window, we have one more fault to find with this otherwise engaging series of publications. The Aldine Poets are gentlemen of such unequal pretensions, that the genuine readers of poetry will be obliged to decline taking in the whole series, if the selection does not become more judicious. No. 11 contained the 'Poems of Sir Thomas Wyatt,' who, though a very clever man, was no poet; and No. 6 was devoted to 'Kirke White,' who, though a clever youth, and amiable, only became popular for a time, because he was recommended to the undiscerning by the editorship of Mr Southey, who has a suspicious trick of patronizing authors of mediocrity. The 'Earl of Surrey's Poems' were a different matter. Cowper is good. Beattie may possibly deserve collection, though we are not sure of it, not having seen his book many years, and then not having been able to get through it. Burns, Thomson, and Collins are excellent; and everybody will be glad to see the never-ending urbane popularity of Pope, the prince of poets of the drawing-room.

* The Poetical Works of Alexander Pope. Vol. I. 12mo. Pickering.

UNITARIAN BIOGRAPHY.*

The contents of this volume are extracted from some posthumous volumes of sermons written by Unitarian clergymen, and appear in a form more likely to attract the attention of the general reader. None but Unitarians would be likely to seek the biography of these ministers, in the original volumes; but many readers would peruse these short memoirs with pleasure, considering the subjects of them not as ministers, but as men. There are three classes of readers of biography—those who take an interest in the lives and actions of celebrated individuals; those who will read of no men but of their own way of thinking; and those who are willing to read of anybody, because he is a fellow-creature. The two latter classes will both be interested in these volumes. The celebrity of its heroes has not, perhaps, extended beyond the sect to which they belonged; they all died young. Mr Buckminster was only twenty-eight, and the other two yet younger. The former is described as an infant prodigy; we find him studying Greek and Latin at four years old, and ready for the University at twelve. His brother says of him,—

'He was seldom willing, while a child, to leave his books for any amusement; and my father was so much afraid that close application would injure his health, that he used to reward him for playing with boys of his own age, and would often go with him to persuade him, by example, to take part in their sports. I have no recollection that, while we were children, he ever did anything that was wrong. He had always the same open, candid disposition that marked his manhood; nor can I recollect any time when I did not feel the same confidence that whatever he did was right, the same affection and respect which made the last years I spent with him so happy. * * * * * I have heard my dear father say, that he never knew him tell an untruth, nor prevaricate in the least.'

His biographer tells us, that Mr Buckminster's mother was a woman of an elegant and cultivated mind, and that though she died while her son was yet in early youth, he had received impressions from her instruction and example, which no time could efface. He was always earnest to act up to what she would have hoped and expected of him. This appears to us an interesting fact, and reminds us how many have been the instances of good and great men who have been happy in such a mother. The weaknesses, indeed, as well as the strength of men, have been traced to maternal influence; but this only the more strongly shews the importance of cultivating the minds of women, that the influence may be good instead of evil. We suspect the biographer of some little partiality in his estimate of the talents of this young minister, when he speaks of the "splendid gifts of fancy," &c.—the rather, from the terms in which he speaks of a letter descriptive of a little tour in Switzerland, which he made in 1806, for the benefit of his health. There are, no doubt, some interesting points in this letter, but it does not answer to our expectations from a "mind of the highest order," a man of "brilliant genius." If the author's portrait is a just one, Mr Buckminster must indeed have been a prodigy; for he is represented as possessing almost every virtue, in an eminent degree, and uniting in himself certain qualities generally considered as incompatible. In the letter before mentioned, the young invalid gives a melancholy sketch of the destruction of several villages by the fall of a large portion of the mountain of Bossberg:—

'About five o'clock in the evening of the 3rd of September, a large projection of the mountain of Rossberg, on the north-east, gave way, and precipitated itself into this valley; and in less than four minutes completely overwhelmed the three villages of Goldan, Busingen, and Rathlen, with a part of Lowertz and Oberat. The torrent of earth and stones was far more rapid than that of Cava, and its effects as resistless and terrible. The mountain in its descent carried trees, rocks, houses, everything before it. The mass spread in every direction, so as to bury completely a space of charming country more than three miles square. The force of the earth must have been prodigious, since it not only spread over the hollow of the valley, but even ascended far up the opposite side of the Rigi. The quantity of earth, too, is enormous, since it has left a considerable hill in what was before the centre of the vale. A portion of the falling mass rolled into the lake of Lowertz, and it is calculated that a fifth part is filled up. On a minute map you will see two little islands marked in this lake, which have been admired for their picturesqueness. One of them is famous for the residence of two hermits, and the other for the remains of an ancient chateau, once belonging to the house of Hapsburg. So large a body of water was raised and pushed forward by the falling of such a mass into the lake, that the two islands, and the whole village of Seven, at the southern extremity, were, for a time, completely submerged by the passing of the swell. A large house in this village was lifted off its foundations and carried half a mile beyond its place.'

The more melancholy details of this catastrophe, we do not think it necessary to extract. We shall conclude with the following observations on the contents of the albums kept at the inns in the passes of the Alps:—

'In the album of the Grand Chartreuse, Gray, on his way to Geneva, recorded his deathless name, and left that exquisite Latin ode, beginning, "O! tu severi religio loci;" an ode which is indeed "pure nectar." It is curious to observe in these books the differences of national character. The Englishman usually writes his name only, without explanation or comment. The Frenchman records something of his feelings, destination, or business; commonly adding a line of poetry, an epigram, or some exclamation of pleasure or disgust. The German leaves a long dissertation upon the state of the roads, the accommodations, &c. detailing at full length whence he came, and whither he is going, through long pages of crabbed writing.'

The memoir of Mr Thatcher contains some remarks upon Cape Town, where he went in search of health; from thence, he went to Paris, and afterwards to Moulins, where he died at the age of two and twenty. The concluding memoir is of minor interest.

* Biographical Memoirs of the Rev. T. S. Buckminster, S. C. Thatcher, and John Emery Abbot; Deceased American Unitarian Ministers. 8vo. pp. 96. Hunter.

Digitized by Google

NOBLE OUTLAWS.

[It is curious to see princes and nobles leading the life of bandits in the woods. The following description of the situation of Bruce and his followers, after a defeat, reminds one of Robin Hood, although their mirth was, perhaps, somewhat less genuine.] 'These,' says a delightful contemporary writer, (Barbour) 'for many a day after this, led the life of outlaws, often exposed to all the extremity of want in the mountains, their only food being the venison which they occasionally caught in the chase, and their drink the water from the rock; nor did they dare to descend into the low country, for the body of the people, ever precarious in their attachment, were now against the king, and willing once more to place themselves under the English protection.' In this manner did Bruce conceal himself in the hills, till the greater part of his followers were dispersed or broken down by misery; and at last receiving intelligence that his brother Nigel, with his queen, and accompanied by the wives and sisters of his few followers, had arrived at Aberdeen, with the determination to share their perils rather than take the chance of falling into the hands of the enemy, he ventured from his strongholds, and meeting them in that city, conducted them in safety into the heart of Breadalbane. The condition of the king at this moment, and the life which he was compelled to lead, were precarious in the extreme, but included abundance of that keen excitement and adventure, which carry with them a certain charm even for the sufferers, and, by rousing the interest of the people, disposed them once more to favor his cause. The presence, too, of the women, who dwelt in the woods with their husbands, brothers, or fathers, gave a romance and a devotion to the cause; whilst the men were absent at the chase, or engaged in an expedition of plunder, the hands that had been little accustomed to such common labours, prepared the food, and washed the linen, and spread for carpets, in the caves where they had taken refuge, the skins of the animals caught in hunting; and filial love or conjugal affection, whilst it soon led to skill in these menial services, softened for awhile the bitterness of privation and disappointment. It was at this time that the success and ingenuity of the good Sir James Douglas, then a very youthful knight, deserved to be so admirably and graphically described by the ancient biographer of Bruce. 'At this season,' says he, 'they were greatly distressed for want of meat, and James of Douglas was ever busy and on the alert to procure provisions for the ladies; and many ways had he of getting it. Sometimes he would bring them venison; sometimes he cunningly wrought gins, with which he caught pike, salmon, trout, eels, and par. Sometimes he would go on a foraging party, and then every man tried to get the most he could, but none were of such assistance to the ladies as Sir James, although the King, by his cheerful and humorous stories, and his constant activity, proved also a great comfort to them. Such was their mode of life, as they harboured in Breadalbane, and slowly retreated till they reached the head of Loch Tay. [After several skirmishes, in which Bruce and his party were obliged to retreat before the enemy, when several of his friends were seriously wounded, and he himself displayed almost superhuman strength, the description of their distressed condition is thus resumed:]—It was now the month of August, and as the winter approached, the miseries of cold and famine were coming nearer every day, and the thoughts of what they might yet be called upon to suffer, produced a great sinking of heart in his party. Their shoes were already worn off their feet, and their place had been supplied by sandals rudely formed of the untanned skins of the deer and other animals, and even these, torn and decayed, hardly protected their feet. During the summer, it had not been difficult to support themselves by fishing and the chase; but when the ground was covered with snow, and the rivers and the mountain-streams were chained by frost, to be supplied from these sources must become precarious and almost impossible. Besides, Douglas, the brave and skilful knight, whose activity and ingenuity had hitherto never failed of success, now lay languishing under a deep and dangerous wound. And if such trials made a serious impression upon the courage of his soldiers, their effects on the feebler constitutions of the women who accompanied them may easily be conceived. It was absolutely necessary, however, that they should press forward (towards the Lennox); and amid these complicated distresses, the only man whose spirit never sunk for a moment was the King. Calm, thoughtful, and unshaken by his repeated defeats, he anticipated every difficulty, and out of the scanty resources which were left him, exerted himself to the utmost to provide against it. Having secured himself from the pursuit of the enemy, as the night approached, it became necessary to look for shelter; and Bruce, who knew the country, found time to despatch an advanced party, who took possession of a large cave at the head of the glen of Balgahidder. Fires were kindled, which dispelled the close subterranean damps from their wild retreat; skins and furred cloaks were spread on the floor, beds of heather and moss hastily piled up against the walls, and the small allowance of provisions which remained, had been cooked for supper, when the king arrived with his wounded knights and faithful women; and having carefully stationed his watches to prevent a surprise, he unbuckled his armour, and courteously entreated them all to eat their meat with thankfulness, and retire to their repose. Nothing escaped his kind and tender care; the wounded were tended by his own hands—the queen and her ladies conducted, with expressions of admiration for their love and devotedness, to the rustic couches which had been prepared for them; the meanest page or servant was addressed with cheerful and even jocular expressions; and as his knights sat round the fire, and talked over the events of the day, Bruce, whose memory was stored with the literature of the times, amused them by anecdotes drawn from the pages of old romance. 'Whatever happens,' said he, 'never despair. Think always that, although it is now our lot to suffer, God may yet relieve us, as he has done many, who were yet harder bested than we; and who, through God's grace, accomplished the purpose which they had on hand. If the heart be once discomfited, and cast down, the strength of the body sinks along with it; therefore, dear friends, I beseech you, be of good heart, and all will yet go well.' But although the king bore himself thus cheerfully to his friends, it was evident,—in the simple words of his ancient biographer, that he figured to make better cheer than he felt,' for his cause became every day more desperate, and the spirits of his men were fast sinking under their misfortunes.—Lives of the Scottish Worthies.

MUSIC.

The Harmonicon for the present month, in noticing the Seventh Philharmonic concert has fallen into an awkward mis-statement of facts. The following is the passage to which we allude. 'Haydn's fifth symphony in C minor made ample compensation for the other, (Spohr's) and was executed in the most spirited finished style, the trio in C obtaining an encore for the sake of Lindley's obligato part in it.' Now we feel confident that Mr Lindley would be the first to acknowledge that he never played this trio so indifferently before an audience, as upon the occasion aluded to; but the curious part of this account is to come. The trio was not encored. A lapse of this nature would pass unnoticed, if the Harmonicon did not itself set the example every month of spying into the failings and self-commitments of other journalists in reports of music. The rebuke of the most patient of men is written on every page of their criticisms: 'No doubt ye are the people, and wisdom will die with you.' The valuable portions of the Harmonicon are the unpretending character of its biographies, and agreeable personal anecdotes.

"For Glorious Freedom."

We have been favoured with the copy of a New National Song, bearing this title, composed by Charles Walther, the words by Mr T. H. Stirling. If we cannot conscientiously recommend this piece as entitled to a station among the higher ranks of musical composition, it may nevertheless justly claim a place among the most respectable productions of the present day.

EXPOSTULATION AND CANDOUR.

(FROM THE FRENCH.)

— Unfaithful girl! After such favours too!
Such bliss! To think that you should love another!
— Favours! Lord bless the man! I've done for you
No more than I'd have done for any other.

E.

— A certain lady of quality carried her purity so far, as warmly to rebuke her librarian for putting the male and female authors together on the same bookshelves.

Curious Relic of Antiquity.—During the progress of some excavations recently making in a paddock at Grimsby, belonging to Lord Yarborough, for the purpose of erecting stables, the foundation of an old stone wall was discovered. In the wall are a few carved stones, capitals of pillars, and some that have evidently been intended for the span of an arch; and this makes it probable that they were taken from the ruins of St Mary's Church, which, becoming dilapidated in the reign of Henry VIII, its materials were appropriated to the reparation of private houses. It is certain that a dwelling-house occupied this site so early as the reign of Edward III, and was inhabited by one of the priests of a chantry which was coeval with the foundation of St James's Church; for, by an endowment still preserved amongst the records of the Corporation, it appears that Edmund de Grimsbye, one of the Clerks in Chancery, and the King's Assessor in the county of Lincoln, endowed a chaplain of this chantry, commonly called Rayner's Chantry, as having been founded by a person of that name, with seven shops and certain lands in Grimsby (septem shopas duodecim acras t're et quinq' acras prati cum p'tim in Grymesbye qui de nobis tenent' in lib'um burgag'), in the 19th year of that King's reign; and from the Inquisitiones ad quod Damnum of the 16th and 20th of the said reign, we learn that the same individual gave to each of the two Chaplains of the chantry a dwelling-house, and certain other property, out of his own patrimonial estates, for the maintenance of themselves and their successors. One of those houses occupied the site now excavated, and the other was situated where the free-school stands. A Nuremberg token has been turned up: on the obverse is a globe and cross; and on the reverse three crowns, and the same number of fleur de lis placed alternately in circle. The legend on each side is the same: viz.: HANS: SCHVLTES: NORNB.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THEATRICAL ATTRACTIONS.—Four twin children—all "born at a birth," are being exhibited at one of the Philadelphia theatres, in opposition to her Elephantine Highness the Princess of Siam The latter is conceded to be the weightiest attraction, though her friends are apprehensive that her rivals may prove "too many" for her.—New York Gazette.

THEATRICAL CHAT.—Kean goes from the City Theatre to that of Richmond: he gets 50*l.* a night at the Milton street Theatre.

Pearman is doing well in the West Indies; and Madame Fearon has so struck the people of the Havannah, that she is making money as fast as she can count it.

The Adelphi, which may be styled the Ambigu, opened on Saturday night with the French company, having undergone many changes since last season, and been occupied by five different companies within the year.

Madame Vestris is engaged at Dublin.

John Reeve goes to the English Opera Company, to supply the place of Keeley, who takes a provincial trip.

The English Opera Company commences about the 4th of July.

A new comedy is preparing for the Haymarket, called the School for Coquettes, by Mrs Gore.

Mrs Waylett returns to the Queen's Theatre.

Liston is engaged at the Olympic, at 25*l.* per night.

Covent Garden closes on the 26th. and Drury Lane on the 13th.

The Haymarket opens on the 15th.

— The dissolution of partnership between the lessees of Drury Lane Theatre, cancels all engagements previously made; it is said that some, who thought themselves secure for three seasons, mean to contest the point. Mr Sinclair leaves Drury Lane;—he has had tempting offers both from Italy and America. Mr Cooper applied to Paganini to perform for his benefit. If three hundred guineas were demanded, it was a most magnificent way of declining!

— In consequence of Mrs Orger's indisposition. Mrs Newcombe undertook the part of Madame La Ronde in The Legion of Honour, on Monday evening, at short notice, and repeated it on Friday. From the same cause, and the impossibility of immediately finding a substitute in the character of Sally Mags, the farce of X. Y. Z. was played instead of Deaf as a Post, on Wednesday.

— Kean has taken the Richmond Theatre for two years, and intends to open it with a superior company, occasionally acting himself. A new two-act piece is in preparation for the Haymarket Theatre, by Planché, taken from La Fille d'Honneur, in which Mademoiselle Mars was so greatly admired. Miss Taylor is to be the heroine of the English version, and Mr Farren the merchant. The new interlude, entitled The Widow Bewitched, with which that theatre is to open on the 15th, is from the pen of Mr Percy Farren.

USE OF A RED-HOT POKER.—During the attack made last week at Whitehaven, by the colliers in Lord Lonsdale's mines, on the Reformers, while celebrating his Majesty's birth day, the gentlemen of the assailed party did considerable execution among the assailants, by coming out into the street armed with red hot pokers, which they, remembering the example of Bailie Nicol Jarvie, had prepared within doors for the purpose.

THE POLES.—In 1315, the Swiss threw off the yoke of Austria; in 1609, the Dutch released themselves from Spanish bondage; and 1782 was the era of American independence. Why should not the Poles be equally successful in 1831?—Atlas.

— There is a sort of harmless liars, frequently to be met with in company, who deal much in the marvellous. Their usual intention is to please and entertain; but as men are most delighted with what they conceive to be truth, these people mistake extremely the means of pleasing, and incur universal blame.—Hume.

ARISTENETE.—The Nestor of French Literature, Felix Nogaret born at Versailles in 1740, closed his long career on Thursday last, and was interred at Père-la-Chaise. He was known by the name of the French Aristnetus, and may be said to have expired in the breach, since his last production—which was a pamphlet, half in prose and half in verse, intitled "Aristenete, à M. Noiret,"—is dated January 1831. He had published a few weeks before, a declaration of war against the Romantiques. The Classiques have lost in him their Dean.—Atlas.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The periodical meeting of this society took place on the 7th inst. at their great room, in Regent-street. Dr Henderson in the chair. There were forty different species of rose, in full bloom; four varieties of the horse chesnut; several varieties of the honey-suckle; lupins and peonies in perfection. But the most fragrant of all the flowers was an aerides cornutum. Lord Carnarvon sent from his garden at High Clere some noble rhododendrons, and other beautiful and rare shrubs, which he had cultivated with complete success. Mr Young, of Epsom, Mr Groom, and Mr Donald, each sent some choice shrubs and flowers; and Mr Welstead favoured the society with a basket of delicious black Hamburgh grapes, which were highly appreciated by the ladies.

JOHN JACKSON, R.A.—This accomplished artist died on Thursday week, of pleurisy, in his fifty-third year, at his house, St John's-wood. He was a distinguished portrait painter, as our readers are well aware, and divided with Sir T. Lawrence that field of art. He was as excellent in the strength of dignity of his male portraits, as the knight was in the soft, graceful, and delicate beauties of his female subjects. His father was a village tailor in Yorkshire, and his son commenced his career in that unambitious profession. Lord Mulgrave, who caught by chance a glance of one of the youth's untutored sketches, chalked on his lordship's hall-table, saw the power of his genius, and resolved to foster it. He sent him to London, introduced him to Fuseli, then to the Academy, where his rapid progress in drawing enabled him soon to become a painter. He rose rapidly to excellence, and with Beechey, Lawrence, and others, shared the public favour in his art. His portraits of Gandy, Woollaston, and Flaxman, are much admired. Some of his portraits are among the ornaments of the British school, and in one or other of their characters equal the efforts of the most distinguished artists.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea—La Bayadere.
DRURY-LANE.—William Tell—Comfortable Lodgings—X. Y. Z.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Napoleon Buonaparte—The Gipsy Father—The Waterman.

KING'S THEATRE.

MADAME PASTA, in MEYER'S interesting opera of Medea, attracted here on Saturday night, a very numerous and elegant audience, which filled the pit at an early hour. As we have lately spoken of this performance, we need not enter now into any particular criticism. Let it suffice to say that she displayed all her wonted power; exhibiting with her own peculiar vividness, all the terrific effects of the dark passion which takes possession of the breast of Medea, converting her almost into a demon; almost,—for gleams of human feeling, nearly to the last, break through the surrounding blackness, and discover the woman and the mother under all. To these natural touches, Madame PASTA is always faithful, and it is this which constitutes her pre-eminence. She gives herself up to the impulse of the character whatever it may be, and for that very reason keeps close to the truth of nature. She never forgets that the personation of every character, (supposing the author to have done his part well), however it may be moulded by artificial habits and external causes, involves primarily the personation of the human being subjected to them, and therefore it is that her audiences feel themselves impressed as by a real character, not reciting the thoughts of another, but uttering as occasion prompts the suggestions of her own soul.

After the play, followed the ballet of La Bayadere, in which Mademoiselle TAGLIONI delighted the house by the superior ease and gracefulness of her dancing.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

THESE pleasant gardens are occasionally so acceptable a relief to our usual in-door amusements, that one regrets when their peculiar capabilities are not turned to the best advantage. The managers, this season, have done wisely in dispensing with the performance of any dramatic piece; such as on former occasions produced the very undesirable effect of collecting in the hottest weather a concourse of people, who, for the most part, suffered more annoyance from the heat than they derived pleasure from the interlude. There is still an equal diversity of entertainments, the better for being all in the open air; the vocal corps, if inferior to the season when Madame VESTRIS and other stars deigned to shine there for a few nights, is better than it was last year and the year before; and the illuminations among the trees are still there to remind us of the fairy tales which delighted our youth, and of the time when the first view of their splendour struck us like enchantment. Time has sobered down much of this sort of feeling in us; but the critics, whom the schools round London will soon liberate from their studies, will know how to appreciate its truth. But to proceed. There is little to be said of the music or the songs; neither struck us as particularly meritorious; the visitors, however, seemed pleased, albeit they listened in a very tranquil spirit of approbation, satisfied as much at the conclusion as at any part. An intermixture of some favourite old airs might be found an agreeable variety to the vocal performances.

Michel Boai, the Chin Melodist, is an extraordinary phenomenon; everybody should hear and see him once, if it be only that they may not at any time despair of finding melody where they least have cause to expect it. He strikes his chin with a vigour and perseverance that will take no denial; if melody be there, it is clear that he will have it out; never did man show more willingness 'to do what he likes with his own.' We liked him best in the shorter pieces; his performances, when long continued, are of a nature to tire; they reminded us of drawing of corks, and that operation is apt to become tantalizing when not followed by the pouring out of wine. Joel, the Altonian siffleur, perambulates the gardens, imitating the blackbird, the lark, &c. in a way which might excite the envy of the inferior among those charming vocalists, if envy could be supposed to reside in the breasts of those whom we know but by their powers of pleasing.

Digitized by Google

The Views, if all are as good as those of Brighton and the Eruption of Vesuvius, the only two we had a good opportunity of looking at, are compositions of considerable merit; but we would recommend that they should be left longer open for inspection. Many have no opportunity of seeing them within the time now limited. The fire-works, which commence at half-past eleven, are very magnificent; their combination with the watery element is an improvement of late years, which adds greatly to their effect. They seemed to please everybody. Besides the entertainments we have mentioned, there are some clever optical illusions, and between the acts of the Concert, the Singers of the Alps sang some of their native airs in a very unambitious but agreeable manner. We should be glad to see these gardens obtain that patronage from the public which might encourage the proprietors to make increased exertions to gratify it.

AMPHION'S HOUSE-BUILDING.

In times of old, when time was young,
And poets their own verses sung,
A verse could draw a stone or beam,
That now would overload a team;
Lead them a dance of many a mile,
Then rear them to a goodly pile.
Each number had its different power;
Heroic strains would build a tower;
Sonnets, or elegies to Chloris,
Might raise a house about two stories;
A lyric ode would slate; a catch
Would tile; an epigram would thatch. Swift.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A Comedy, in Two Acts, called

SIMPSON AND CO.

Mrs Bromley, Miss Chester. Mrs Simpson, Mrs Faucit.
Mrs Fitzallan, Miss Faucit. Madame La Trappe, Mrs Orger.
Mr Simpson, Mr Farren. Mr Bromley, Mr Cooper.
Foster, Mr Honner. Servant, Mr Eaton.

In the course of the Evening, A Comic Address, in Character of Mawworm, by Mr Liston. The Song of 'The Humours of Moulsey Hurst; or Down the Road to the Mill,' by Mr Harley.

After which the Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Ottavia, Miss Faucit. Maria Grazie, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge. Nicolo, Mr Webster. Fabio, Mr Hughes.
Albert, Mr H. Wallack. Theodore, Mr J. Vining.
Alesandro Massaroni, Mr Wallack.
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford. Spoletto, Mr Bland.

To which will be added a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To conclude with a Comic Extravaganza, called

THE QUADRUPEDS.

Abrahamides, Mr J. Reeve, in which Character he will give Imitations of Mr Kean, Mr Macready, and Mr Farren; and introduce a new Parody on 'Away, away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Cherry Ripe.'

To-morrow, The Legion of Honour; The Illustrious Stranger; Turning the Tables; and Masaniello.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Grand Opera, in Three Acts, called

AZOR AND ZEMIRA; OR, THE MAGIC ROSE.

The whole of the Music composed by Louis Spohr.

[Adapted by Sir GEORGE SMART.]

Fatima, Miss Cawse. Lesbia, Miss H. Cawse. Zemira, Miss Inverarity.
Rosadelle, Miss Lawrence.
Saggarah, Ulin, and Marmouna, Misses Horton, Harrington, and P. Horton.
Azor, Mr Wilson. Scander, Mr Morley.
Ali, Mr G. Penson. Nigromant, Mr Evans.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Noppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbruun (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Cinderella; The Omnibus; and Teddy the Tiler.

KENT'S GINGER BEER,

Sold in half-pint bottles at 1s. 9d. per dozen,

Also his TONIC GINGER BEER, highly carbonated, which will be found the most agreeable mode of exhibiting sulphate of quinine, and is so compounded as to sit easy on weak stomachs, in many cases where tonics in any other form would be liable to be rejected. Sold in half-pint bottles at 6s. 6d. per dozen, stamps included.

ÆRATED LEMONADE, an agreeable beverage, and an excellent substitute for saline draughts, in cases of fever, &c. Sold in half pint bottles at 2s. per dozen; and SEIDLITZ GINGER BEER, which combines all the properties of the common Seidlitz water, and Ginger Beer, sold in half-pint bottles at 5s. per dozen, stamps included.

Prepared only by T. KENT, Manufacturer of Domestic Chemical Preparations, No. 5. Borough Road near the Obelisk.

The above articles are sent to any part of London, free of expense. Letters to be post-paid.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LES PROJETS DE MARIAGE.

Comédie en Un Acte, de M. A. DUVAL.

Rosaline, Mlle. Jamain.
Pedro, M. Laporte. M. Cazini, M. Préval. Germencey, M. Pelissié.
Belmont, M. Alfred. Un Domestique, M. Granville.

Suivi de

LE BOURGUEMESTRE DE SARDAM.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes de MM. MERLE et BOIRIE.

Marie, Mlle. Florval.
Van-Bet, M. Potier. Pierre Premier, M. Pelissié. Pierre Flimann, M. Laporte.
Lefort, M. Cloup. Le Marquis de Châteauneuf, M. Paulin.
Le Comte de Hogen, M. Guenée. Un Officier Hollandais, M. Arnaud.

On finira par

LE BENEFICIAIRE.

Le Jokey de Zéphirine, Mlle. Corra. Madame Lessouffié, Mme. Baudin.
Palma, Mlle. Jamain. Zéphirine, Mlle. Florval.
Bénéficiaire, M. Potier. M. de la Tirade, M. Pelissié. Dubémol, M. Alfred
M. Desrosiers, M. Guenée. M. Golden, M. Laporte.
Eugène, M. Paulin. Un Regisseur, M. Cloup.
Le Domestique de Dubémol, M. Granville.
Le Domestique de la Tirade, M. Arnaud.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, a Drama, entitled

DAMON AND PYTHIAS.

Hermion, Miss M. C. Poole. Calanthe, Miss Scott. Phygenia, Miss Vincent.
Eudosia, Miss Somerville. Arria, Miss Rumens.
Rygcia, Madame Simon. Lyphrasia, Miss Jordan. Listea, Miss Nicol.
Damon, Mr Osbaldiston. Philistrius, Mr Almar. Damocles, Mr Gough.

To conclude with a new Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Georgiana Dorio, Miss M. C. Poole Babbia, Miss Vincent.
Arabella, Mlle. Rosier. Rosa, Miss Somerville.
Count di Dorio, Mr Gough. The Marquis Sapparino, Mr C. Hill.
Count Fernando, Mr Edwin. Sancho, Mr Vale.
Ladroni, Mr Rogers. Old Jeromo, Mr Webb.
A Pas Seul, by Mlle. Rosier, introducing the Brigand's Military Exercise.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

The Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

The Overture and Music selected from DIBDIN'S Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr BLEWITT.

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, Mr T. P. Cooke. The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilson.
In the course of the piece, Mr T. P. Cooke will introduce a Comic Song, and dance his celebrated Hornpipe.

After which, a Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

[By Mr KEPPELL.]

The Music composed by Mr H. P. Hill.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Mrs Saville.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

CITY SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE,

MILTON STREET, FORE STREET.

Mr COLMAN'S Play of

THE IRON CHEST.

Sir Edward Mortimer, Mr Kean.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Napoleon Buonaparte.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Feats of Horsemanship — The Russian Courier—Liliputian Napoleon—Vaulting Mr J. Cooke's Exercises—Parisian Montrosities —The Flying Gymnasiast — Mr Wells's Performances — The Youthful Roscius — Greek Flag Dance—Dragon of Rhodes.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Google

No. 243.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14, 1831.

OLD ENGLISH STAGE.

The book that occasions this heading of our article will be the envy of many an antiquary; for besides being complete in its antiquities, and consisting of three thick volumes octavo, all written upon such matters as have got reputation for the Reeds and Ritsons at no greater expense than comparative pamphlets, it has brought divers new things to light, and is full of the most conquering corrections of its predecessors. If anything could have made the Ritsons and Giffords ashamed of themselves for the airs they gave themselves on that head, here is the work that might have done it. Malone himself turns out to have been a lax fellow in comparison with Mr Collier,—culpably careless in his decisions, and immoral in his dates.

'When I commenced my researches, nearly twenty years ago,' says Mr Collier, 'I was discouraged on all hands by those who imagined that Malone, Steevens, Reed, and Chalmers had exhausted the subject; and that, in the harvest they had reaped, they had not left even gleanings behind them. Nevertheless, seeing how many deficiences remained to be supplied, I persevered in the collection of materials. I obtained admission into the State Paper Department, the Privy Council Office, and into the Chapter House, Westminster; and I soon discovered in those depositories many valuable original documents, throwing a fresh, clear, and strong light upon some of the most obscure parts of the history of our stage and drama. Among these were unopened patents to different companies of players, and original accounts of the royal revels from the early part of the reign of Henry VIII.; while the unexamined books of the domestic expenses of our Kings and nobility, from the reign of Edward II downwards, provided me with a great variety of novel and interesting details.

'These sources of information had not been open to general search, and I was therefore not much surprised to find that a great deal had escaped discovery, but when I came to examine the manuscripts in that great national receptacle, the British Museum, to which everybody could easily obtain access, I was astonished at the quantity of substantial materials which had remained there undetected. From the Burghley Papers scarcely a single fact had been procured, although nearly every volume contained matters of importance; and the Harleian, Cottonian, and Royal M.S.S. had been only cursorily and hastily inspected. In these I met with letters from and concerning our most notorious poets, the predecessors and contemporaries of Shakspeare; and in a diary, kept by an intelligent Barrister, who lived while our great dramatist was in the zenith of his popularity, I found original and authentic notices of him, Spenser, Jonson, Marston, and other distinguished authors of the time. It occupied me some years to go through the voluminous collections in the Museum, but I never had occasion to regret the mis-spending of a single hour so employed.'—P. 8.

The work, which has been thus long and industriously in hand, presents us with an entire History of English Dramatic Poetry up to the time of Shakspeare (a thing never attempted before); Annals of the Rise and Progress of the English Stage, that is to say, year by year, or in divisions comprising those years; and an account of the old theatres, playhouses, and their appurtenances, the actors, audiences, goods and chattels, payments, &c.; in short, a complete history of everything relating to the theatres up to a certain point. Mr Collier has given analyses, not only of the more regular dramatic productions, hitherto partially known, that preceded those of Shakspeare, but of the principal Miracle-plays and Morals (as he teaches us more properly to call 'Mysteries' and 'Moralities') that gradually merged each into the other, till the legitimate drama bore upon wider views of human sympathy, and the scene became the representation of real life.

We shall not undertake to give an elaborate, or even a regular account of Mr Collier's work. We have carefully inspected it: we give it great faith; and shall put it on our shelves as our stock-book of reference: but we profess only, as critics, to give it the testimony of our good opinion, to make a few extracts from it of the more amusing matter, and to offer a note or two here and there.

The famous old Countess of Desmond, who lived till God knows when, and danced with Richard III at the court of his brother Edward, said that, with the exception of Edward, he was the handsomest man there. Mr Collier has found another lift for his character, or at least thinks he has, in a fondness for music; though the mode in which it is exhibited is somewhat of the roughest. 'In the second year of his reign,' he issued, it seems, 'a most arbitrary order for impressing singing men and children, even from cathedrals, colleges, chapels, and houses of religion, for the purpose of affording him amusement. The order is quoted in a note. 'Subsequent monarchs,' observes the author, 'were not reluctant to follow the precedent thus, perhaps, for the first time set.' The conclusion drawn, however, both on that point, and on Richard's love of music, appears to us the hastiest in Mr Collier's book, and is by no means a 'favourable specimen' of it. Wise usurpers generally try to be popular. Richard is understood to have been a clever and good king, though he got at his crown badly; and we should doubt whether he set the example of this strange kind of impressment. He most likely found it to his hand, a common custom. Nor does it follow that because he gave the order, he was particularly fond of music. It might only have been a royal matter of course. We do not mean to imply that he could not have been fond of it. There are two sorts of lovers of music; one, who sympathise with all good things; and another, who like any luxury that tickles their senses, purely on that account; who take a concert as they would snuff or perfumes. Furthermore, Richard might have had a refined as well as a superficial love of music, whether he was the man or not that has been represented; for men are inconsistent beings, and it would be hard if a bad man had not something good in him. Henry VIII was fond of music. Nay, Nero himself. All we mean to say is, that Richard's order proves nothing but itself. The monarchs who continued to press children into the choir, up to the time of James I, are not all to be supposed to have cared about the matter. Children were 'purveyed,' as it was called, as people purveyed milk and cheese. We learn from a note to Chalmers's 'Farther Account of the Early English Stage,' that, 'as late as the accession of Charles I, drummers were pressed for the army.' But we are not to suppose Charles fond of drums; any more than William IV, albeit a sailor, is given to the cultivation of press-gangs.

Our ancestors were much fonder of plays than we, doubtless owing to the comparative dearth of amusement from other liberal sources. Speaking of the beginning of the sixteenth century, Mr Collier tells us, 'So much were players in request about this period, and so fashionable an amusement had theatrical exhibitions become, that it was usual, on the celebration of a joyous event in a family of distinction, either to have a play represented by the performers attached to the family, or to hire them for the purpose.' In Croft's Excerpta Antiqua, is a detailed account of a banquet, play, and mask at the house of Sir John Nevell, of Chevet, on the marriage of his daughter, in January, the 17 Henry VIII., to Roger Rockley. If a person of rank gave a banquet, it was often preceded by an interlude; or (as the name implies) a dramatic performance represented in the intervals of the entertainment.

On the other hand, 'the Corporation of London,' partly out of a dislike of the trouble occasioned by the apprentices who frequented them, and partly, no doubt, out of an instinct of want of refinement, and of jealousy of court manners, shewed themselves, it appears, from a very early period, 'inimical to stage-plays.'—'Prior to April 1543, they had adopted regulations for their suppression within the boundary of the city;' and they never afterwards cordially admitted them. They were, in fact, always trying to keep them out. It was this that gave rise to the erection of play-houses outside the walls, in lieu of the inns and other make-shifts before used for theatrical representations; and hence the Globe theatre on the other side of London bridge, and the theatre in Blackfriars (near the present Apothecaries' Hall) at both of which places the works of Shakspeare came out. When Burbage, and our great dramatist, built the latter theatre, they were opposed even by the inhabitants of Blackfriars, at that time the West End of the town, on account of the noise and inconvenience. But the Court protected them, and the Chamberlain too, though they set up their tents close by the latter's house. In fact, the company were the Crown's servants, and could hardly have been opposed but by the Puritan faction, then beginning to show themselves among the great as well as the small. The two other theatres existing at this time, namely, the 'theatre' emphatically so called, probably because it had been the only one, and the playhouse called the 'Curtain,' were in Shoreditch. The Globe, which belonged to the same company as the Blackfriars, was the summer theatre, to which the gentry went in their boats. When it became unpleasant to go by water, the actors came over to Blackfriars. This neighbourhood, by the way, was fashionable up to the period of the civil wars. Vandyke, who was the court painter, and married a lady of quality, lived and died there.

Digitized by Google

[To be continued.]

PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATE SOCIETY.

THE 'Parliamentary Candidate Society' has just put forth a pamphlet which is entitled to some notice at the present crisis: it contains the original address of this Society, published in March last; an answer which was made to its opponents, and published also; some observations on the difficulties which it nevertheless continued to experience; an account of what it has performed in spite of those difficulties, and still intends to perform; and a specimen of one of its schedules for obtaining information, filled up.

The Society confesses that it found enemies among the friends of Reform, as well as the opponents; and it speaks of misrepresentation and calumny. Some of its original committee withdrew their names. The great objection made to it, both among friends and enemies, was, that it took upon itself 'an unwarrantable interference with the conduct of public men.'

'The people,' says the pamphlet, 'had so long been considered and used as mere tools, to make members of parliament, and members had so long possessed the power of acting as masters over the people, that what at some former period would have been admired and applauded, as proof of the honesty and independence of Englishmen, was now considered as little better than an arrogant revolt of slaves against the domination of their absolute governors.'

This is true, and we doubt not that the Society has done good, and will do more: but the pamphlet overlooks two of the reasons which induced men to hesitate before they gave it their approbation. One is, the doubt whether it might not be turned to purposes of scandal, of personal party malice, and of inquisitorial prying:—the other, the doubt whether the individuals composing the Society had all an equal right to set themselves up as public censors, or were such men as others would be honestly willing to gift with the privilege of prying into their concerns. Many men who may have no objection to a public censorship of this kind, or even to the degree of private censorship which it implies, and which the unfilled schedule (by the way) implies much more than a filled specimen, may yet have reasonable objections to such and such persons for their inquisitors, and not on accounts attributable to self-love or to a dread of the examination. They may feel, in the first place, and on the very ground of their love of liberty, a dislike to anything in the shape of an inquisitorial combination; and they may feel a more especial dislike to undergo the chance of objection from men themselves objectionable, perhaps on the score of the very things they profess to advocate. We confess, that when the first pamphlet of the society was put into our own hands, we felt an impulse of objection to it on both these accounts: and the consequence was, that we said nothing about the society. Upon seeing the pamphlet before us, we are compelled to say, that we think the society is of use; but still we cannot think all its constituent parts as warrantable as the entire body. We like some of its members, but we plainly confess we dislike others. We think even that the latter have no business to some forward as overseers of public virtue, having been as great aristocrats, and even time-servers after a certain fashion, as anybody: and we dislike the reason which the schedule of enquiry gives for questions, the answers to which might surely be as awkward to some of the members if made public, as the publicity of what they chuse to make known must be to the candidates who are 'shewn up.' Nevertheless, we again allow that the society is of use; and so we must rank it among that class of utilities, numerous enough in the present condition of society, which are acknowledged to be far more beneficial than pleasant.

What the Society has succeeded in effecting is stated as follows:—

'It has carried on an extensive and useful correspondence with reformers in various parts of the country.

'At the request of many bodies of electors, the Committee have forwarded statements, and published accounts, of the speeches and votes of their former representative since the general election in 1826, and in some instances for a much longer period; and they have reason to conclude, that both in preventing the enemies of reform from again soliciting the suffrages of electors, and in inducing electors to refuse them where they have ventured to solicit their suffrages, the Society has assisted in promoting the public good.'

For the present, in consequence of the close of the elections, the labours of the Society are suspended. What the members mean to do hereafter, is thus told us:—

'In continuing their labours, they will carefully observe, and daily note, the conduct of all the members of the newly elected parliament, during the great struggle about to take place for the present salvation and future permanent advantage of the people, who compose this noble commonwealth; and when the time shall arrive, that our good and gracious and patriotic King shall again, by a dissolution of the parliament, "appeal to the sense of his people," they will, without prejudice or partiality, publish an accurate account of the attendance, the absence, the speeches and votes of the members of the House of Commons; and when any discussion or decision of any national importance takes place, of the numbers of members present at such discussion and division.

'The misconduct of a representative may be of two general descriptions. 1. He may speak or vote contrary to the public welfare; or, 2. He may abstain from either speaking or voting on the side of the people. The latter is the least ostensible, but the most insidious mischief. The absence of a member is as much a dereliction of his duty, as it would be were he to oppose himself directly and actively to measures intended for the public benefit.

'The Society will therefore notice such conduct. The public will then know, not only when a member did mischief in a direct way, but when, by neglecting his duty, he did his utmost to permit others to do so.'

The following is a specimen of a schedule filled up, much, no doubt, to the comfort of the gentleman inside. (The space for 'Miscellaneous Remarks' mentioned in the plan of the schedule, is, it may be observed, omitted.)

'Josias Du Pré Alexander, M. P. for Old Sarum. Has sat in Four Parliaments.

'Connections.

'Related to the Earl of Caledon, and the Bishop of Meath. Has a brother and nephew Directors of the East India Company.

'Is, with his brother, James Alexander, and Lord Caledon, a proprietor of the pocket borough for which he sits.

'The whole number of houses in the borough is—NONE.

'The greatest number of electors polled within the last 30 years is—EIGHT.

'The actual number of electors is—The proprietors.

'He is a Director of the East-India Company; and has 4 stars, or 20,000l. value of stock, and the family and partners about 70,000l. Exclusive of law and marine appointments in India, and the nominations to the establishment of the India House, with the patronage connected with shipping and trade, the East-India Company disposes of yearly appointments to India, which appear, by returns laid before Parliament, to have been on an average as follow:—

'An appointment to China, worth say -	£10,000
68 civil appointments to India, worth say 5,000l. each - - -	340,000
460 military, clerical, and medical appointments, worth say 500 each -	230,000
	£580,000

'This patronage is divided as follows; namely, the President of the Board of Controul, the Chairman and Deputy-Chairman of the Court of Directors, each two shares; and the Directors generally, one share each; making altogether 28 shares. Each Director's share may thus be estimated at 20,000l. a year, or thereabouts.

'Profession.

'A merchant.

'Politics.

'High Tory; a silent supporter of all administrations except the present. Friendly to monopolies.

'Published Works.

'Public Acts.

'Parliamentary speeches—None.

'*Votes.

'1830. Nov. 15.—Against Sir H. Parnell's motion respecting the Civil List.

'1831. March 22.—Against Lord John Russell's Reform Bill.

'April 19.—Against Reform on Gen. Gascoyne's motion.'

"* It is of great importance to the community that the attendance or non attendance of every member should be known, and especially that the votes he gives should be published. It is only in a few cases that any such publication is made, and then it is generally confined to the minority. A member may therefore sit in the house during his life, and vote for every measure obnoxious to the general welfare, without having his vote recorded. This evil will, we may hope, be remedied by a reformed parliament."

Digitized by Google

TO THE TATLER.

THE NEW ANECDOTE OF SHAKSPEARE.

DEAR MR TATLER,—I have not read Mr Collier's 'History of Dramatic Poetry to the time of Shakspeare,' &c. The encomium you pass upon the work in this day's paper, I shall not therefore dispute; but having already read in print the anecdote of Shakspeare which you quote, and comment upon as new, I must demur to its novelty.

The anecdote you will find already printed in the second column of the ninth page of a life of Shakspeare, prefixed to a prolegomena to Shakspeare's Works, published by Sherwood and Co. in 1825.

Should Mr Collier have communicated the materials for that life, he is entitled to the merit of having discovered the anecdote, should it not have been before published. If he did not, he reaps the reward, in your praise, of another man's labours.

Your's obediently, Mr Tatler,

A CONSTANT READER.

Saturday, 11th June 1831.

VIEW FROM THE GARDENS OF THE TUILERIES.

The garden front of the Tuileries, heavy and incongruous as it is when analyzed by architectural taste, is unquestionably magnificent. The view from it is unrivalled as a scene of artificial beauty. The eye ranges over broad terraces, crowded with a pleasure-loving population; walks interspersed with flower-gardens, and fountains, and shady groves, where some antique statue is encountered at every turn. From the central position the prospect is uninterrupted for a distance of several miles, and is terminated by the grand arch of the Barrière de Neuilly. The southern terrace is bounded by the quays and the river, and the northern by the splendid buildings of the Rue de Rivoli, from which street the garden is separated, not by a dark wall, but by a handsome open railing. We at once see that, whatever the French may have wanted in real political freedom, the out-door pleasures of the people have been abundantly consulted, even by their most arbitrary monarchs. It was the freedom of access to objects of taste and beauty which alone made the old regime endurable. The people in some degree participated in the pride of the monarch; and thus his splendour veiled his oppression. The respect which the French pay to the monuments of art, in which the humblest man feels a pride, presents a humiliating contrast to the barbarous mutilations which some, even of those who pretend to be refined, amongst ourselves, inflict upon the works of taste of which they are occasionally permitted to have a glimpse by the possessors. The reason is evident. We have too few institutions which offer such freedom of access, as the gardens of the Tuileries and the gallery of the Louvre. The people have had no public property to respect; and they are therefore deficient in that branch of national education. Even the monuments of our illustrious dead are closed against them, except upon the payment of contemptible fees, and under the watch of an ignorant exhibitor. The evil is sustaining some remedy. — Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Vol 10, Part 1.—Paris and its Historical Scences.

NOBILITY SPRUNG FROM TRADE.

(Lately quoted by the HERALD, from an old Newspaper.)

Pennant, in his 'History of London,' page 397, gives a curious list of some of our principal Noble families who owe their origin to trades, honest or dishonest, in the following words, viz.—"I beg leave here to remind several Noble Peers, of their industrious forefathers."

John Coventry was an opulent mercer of the city of London, and Mayor in 1425; a most spirited magistrate. From him is descended the Earl of Coventry.

The family of Rich, Earls of Warwick and Holland, arose from Richard Rich, an opulent mercer; Sheriff in 1441.

The Holles, Earls of Clare and Dukes of Newcastle, sprung from Sir Wm. Holles, Mayor in 1540, son of Wm. Holles, citizen and baker.

Sir Thomas Leigh, Mayor in 1558, furnished the Peerage with the addition of two, viz.—Leigh, Earl of Chichester, and Leigh, Lord Leigh of Stonely.

The Bouveries, Earls of Radnor, descend from Edward Des Bouveries, an opulent Turkey merchant; died in 1694.

Lord Ducie was descended from Sir Robert Ducie, Sheriff in 1620, Mayor in 1631, banker to Charles I., and afterwards created a Baronet.

Paul Bayning, Sheriff in 1593, was father of Paul, created Viscount Bayning.

The Cranfields, Earls of Middlesex, rose from Lionel Cranfield, a citizen, bred up in the Custom-house. The Duke of Dorset is descended from Frances Cranfield, heiress of the third Earl.

The Noble family of Ingram, Viscount Irwin (now represented by the Marchioness of Hertford), were raised in the reign of Elizabeth, by Hugh Ingram, citizen and tallow-chandler.

Sir Stephen Brown, Mayor in 1431, was a grocer, and gave us another Peer in the person of Sir Anthony Brown, created Viscount Montague in 1554.

The ancestor of the Legges, Earls of Dartmouth, was Mayor of London in 1347 and in 1357, having in his trade of a skinner attained great wealth.

Sir Geoffry Bullen, Mayor in 1458, was grandfather to Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltshire, father to Anna Bullen, and grandfather to Queen Elizabeth; the highest genealogical honour the City ever possessed.

Sir Baptist Hicks, mercer, founded the Peerage of Camden.

Sir W. Capel, draper, Mayor in 1503, founded the Noble family of Capel, now Earls of Essex.

Edward Osborne, Mayor in 1683, was ancestor of the Dukes of Leeds.

Michael Dormer, mercer, Mayor in 1542, produced the future Lords Dormer.

From Sir William Craven, merchant taylor, Mayor in 1611, sprung the Earls of Craven.

Lord Viscount Dudley and Ward descended from W. Ward, a wealthy goldsmith in London, and jeweller to the Queen of Charles I.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

FINE ARTS.—We are informed by a correspondent, that the first Exhibition of the NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS will take place in the Spring of 1832; the objects which the Society have in view having met with the approbation and concurrence of some of the leading patrons, and many of the most distinguished artists. The Society is patronised by Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex.

THE BANYAN TREE. — The natives of Tahiti have a tradition that the seed of this gigantic plant was brought by a bird from the moon. —Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

— The more men refine upon pleasure, the less will they indulge in excesses of any kind; because nothing is more destructive to true pleasure than such excess.—Hume.

INSTINCT OF SPIDERS.—It has been observed, that some spiders with an instinctive sagacity, select, as the place of greatest security from disturbance, the lids of the poor boxes in churches.—Dr Mitchell's Lecture on Animal and Vegetable life.

THE NE PLUS ULTRA OF STILLNESS.—The stillness was so deep on the first night of his (Paganini's) concert, that a single piece of wax dropping from the side of a candle on the stage, had an effect absolutely startling.—Examiner.

— The Albanese, like the modern Romans, pursue their avocations out of doors; even the attentions of courtship are carried on with amusing publicity at the house door; or the Zitella, leaning out of a first-floor window, listens complacently to the loud and passionate pleadings of her enamorato in the street below.

GHOSTS.—The neighbourhood in which the eight men were lately poisoned by eating patties containing arsenic, has, it is rumoured, been ever since haunted by the ghosts of the deceased. At night they are overheard talking with each other, and expressing their dissatisfaction that no respect has been shewn to their manes. The inhabitants have therefore contributed to have a service performed by the Taou-sze during three days and three nights. It is the popular belief, that this service elevates the departed spirits from the shades below to a state of happiness.—Canton Register.

GALLANTRY OF THE BOROUGHMONGERS.—A lady of the Blue (reform) party at Whitehaven, having felt some curiosity to see the preparations for the Lowther dinner there, soon after the election, went into the Granary-yard of the Castle, where it was laid out, accompanied by a friend of the opposite party; when in the yard, the Rev. Mr Lowther rudely ordered her to quit the place. As a recompense, the Chairman at the reform dinner in the town, a few days after, proposed the health of the 'Blue Belle of Whitehaven, who had the "audacity" to go and see 900 anti-reformers eat yellow beef.' He believed it was the only thing of the kind seen in England, and a lady might have been fairly excused her curiosity in going to witness such a rare sight.—Evening Paper.

THE OAK AND THE GRASS.—One morning, the Oak said to the Grass which grew under its branches, 'Thou art very ungrateful not to acknowledge the blessing which thou enjoyest, of being covered in the frost of winter with the leaves which I shake off in autumn.'—But the Grass replied, 'Thou deprivest me, with thy branches, of my share of sun, dew, and rain, and with thy roots of my portion of nourishment from the ground; boast not, therefore, of the alms-giving of thy foliage, with which thou art obliged, for the sake of thy own roots, to cover my lingering existence.'—Pestalozzi.

EMULATION EXTINGUISHED BY PERFECTION.—Perhaps it may not be for the advantage of any nation to have the arts imported from their neighbours in too great perfection. This extinguishes emulation, and sinks the ardour of the generous youth. So many models of Italian painting brought into England, instead of exciting our artists, is the cause of their small progress in that noble art. The same, perhaps, was the case of Rome, when it received the arts from Greece.—Hume's Essays.

DREAMS.

All dreams, as in old Galen I have read,
Are from repletion and complexion bred;
From rising fumes of indigested food,
And noxious humours that infect the blood.
Choler adust conjects the blood with fear,
Then black bucks toss us, and black devils tear;
In sanguine airy dreams aloft we bound,
With rheums oppressed, we sink in rivers drown'd. Dryden.

Digitized by Google

— An Irishman asked one of the New Police the reason why he wore the white mark round his arm? 'It is to show that I am on duty,' replied the policeman. 'Och, and it's that you tell me; by the powers I was thinking it was to let you know your right arm from your left.'

A GIFT SHOULD BE GIVEN FREELY.

Who gives constrain'd, but his own fear reviles;
Not thank'd, but scorn'd; nor are they gifts, but spoils. Denham.

— INDUSTRY, KNOWLEDGE, and HUMANITY are linked together by an indissoluble chain, and are found, from experience as well as reason, to be peculiar to the more polished, and what are commonly denominated, the more luxurious ages.—Hume.

THE BRUTALIZING EFFECTS OF SLAVERY.—A poor Negress who is a slave in this colony (the Mauritius) with great labour and long parsimony had saved as much money as would purchase a human being. She had a daughter, a slave like herself. What did she? She purchased that daughter of their common owner, and set her at liberty, being content to remain in bondage, for the pleasure of seeing her child walking at large, with shoes on her feet, which are here the badge of freedom among people of colour, no slave being permitted to wear them. Soon after the bargain had been completed, the affectionate mother happening to come into a room where this daughter was sitting, very naturally and unconsciously sat down beside her, as she had been wont to do. A moment or two afterwards, the daughter turned round in a rage, and rebuked her, exclaiming, 'How dare you sit down in my presence? Do you not know that I am a free woman, and you are a slave? Rise instantly, and leave the room.'—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.—[It is no less difficult than painful to give credit to an incident like this.]

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY-LANE.—Simpson and Co. — The Brigand — Turning the Tables — The Quadrupeds.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Azor and Zemira—Napoleon Buonaparte.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Les Projets de Mariage—Le Bourguemestre de Sardam—Le Bénéficiaire.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA BAYADERE.

[Composed by M. DESHAYES.]
The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Musard.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile. M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertram.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, called

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

[Adapted from the French, by Mr PLANCHE.]
The Music by Mr A. Lee.

Madame La Ronde, Mrs Orger. Isabeau, Mrs Waylett.
Philippe Galliard (aged 102), Mr Farren.
Jerome Galliard, his son, Mr Dowton. Pierre Galliard, his grandson, Mr Liston.
Antoine Galliard, his great grandson, Mr Bland.
François Ledru, Mr Harley. Horace Galonné, Mr B. Hill. Hector, Miss Poole.

After which, a Musical Piece, in Two Acts, called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Fatima, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Irza, Miss Faucit. Aboulifar, Mr Thompson. Arzan, Mr Bland.
Alibajou, Mr Webster. Bowbell, Mr Liston. Gimbo, Mr Harley.

To which will be added a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss Faucit. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. Jones.
Patty Larkins, Mrs Orger. Mr Knibbs, Mr Hughes. Mr Thornton, Mr J. Vining.
Jack Humphries, Mr Liston. Jeremiah Bumps, Mr Cooper.
Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr Vining.

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

MASANIELLO.

[By M. AUBER.]

Elvira, Miss Byfeld. Fenella, Mrs W. Barrymore. Inis, Miss Chikini.
Masaniello, Mr Sinclair. Don Alphonso, Mr T. Cooke. Pietro, Mr Bedford.
Ruffino, Mr Bland. Lorenzo, Mr Howard. Moreno, Mr Yarnold.

A Spanish Bolero, by Mr Gilbert and Mlle. Rosalia Guet.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL,

In Three Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—Songs, 'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—Songs, 'The Omnibus,' and 'The Country Concert.'

PART III.—Song, 'Thames Sailing Match.' Scena. Song, 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

In the Press, and to be embellished with
A whole Length, as LADY RANDOLPH,

THE THEATRICAL MEMOIRS OF THE LATE MRS SIDDONS.

Orders received by Mr CHAPPLE, the King's appointed Bookseller, Royal Library, Pall-mall.

R. GRAVES, CHEAP AND FASHIONABL TAILOR,

In submitting the following Prices, confidently asserts, that Gentlemen will find every garment made by him is from the BEST WEST OF ENGLAND SAXONY PATENT FINISHED CLOTHS, and equal in Fit and Workmanship to any that can be produced.

	£.	s.	d.
Fashionable Medley Coloured Dress Coats	2	10	0
Extra Saxony ditto	3	5	0
An Assortment of the fashionable Mulberry.
Quilting Waistcoats, from the newest patterns, of the finest quality	0	12	0
Silk Valencia	0	13	0
Patent Anglo Merino Trowsers, in Mixtures, Drabs, and Checks, from	16s. to	1	1 0
Fashionable Le Roi Jean		1	1 0
Ditto Checked Drill	12s. to	0	18 0

Anglo Merinos, Dulls, Cantoons, &c. in a great variety of new patterns.
313, HIGH HOLBORN.
No connection with any other House.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss Inverarity. Clorinda, Miss Cawse. Thisbe, Miss Hughes.
Fairy Queen, Miss H. Cawse.
Felix, Mr Wilson. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. Penson.
Alidoro, Mr G. Stansbury. Dandini, Mr Morley. Pedro, Mr Keeley.

After which, the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Lodger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Zooney, Mr Power.

To conclude with the Farce of

TEDDY THE TILER.

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly. Oriel, Miss Lawrence. Flora, Miss Nelson.
Julia, Mrs Brown. Ladies, Mesds. Perry and Appleton.
Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans. Henry, Mr Duruset. Frederick, Mr Baker.
Bombardine, Mr Henry. Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour. Tim, Mr Addison.
Teddy Mulowney, Mr Power. Stiff, Mr Mears.
Apewell, Mr Irwin. Constable, Mr Fuller. Richard, Mr Heath.

To-morrow, The Chancery Suit; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comedy of

THE HYPOCRITE.

[By BICKERSTAFF.]
Doctor Cantwell, Mr Williams.

After which,

THE BARBER OF SEVILLE.

Rosina, Miss Somerville. Count Almaviva, Mr Hunt.
Doctor Bartolo, Mr Williams. Figaro, Mr Latham.

To conclude with

CHARLES THE SECOND.

[By HOWARD PAYNE.]
Mary, Miss Somerville.
Charles the Second, Mr Osbaldiston. Capt. Copp, Mr Williams.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

The Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

The Overture and Music selected from DIBDIN'S Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr BLEWITT.

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, Mr Forrester. The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilson.

After which, a Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacit, Mr G. Smith. Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

To conclude with a New Romantic Legend, in Two Acts, entitled

THE SPIRIT OF THE MIST.

[By Mr KEPPELL.]
The Music composed by Mr H. P. Hill.

The Lady Adela, Miss Dix. Rosabelle, Mrs Evans. Nerissa, Mrs Saville.
Unaria, Sylph of the Waters, Mademoiselle Josephine.
Albert, Mr Keppell. Baron Claudio, Mr Cooke. Don Carlos, Mr Lejeune.
Alberto, Mr G. Smith. Pedrillo, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Mysterious Tailor.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Feats of Horsemanship — The Russian Courier—Lilliputian Napoleon—Vaulting—Mr J. Cooke's Exercises—Parisian Montrosities—The Flying Gymnasiast—Mr Welle's Performances — The Youthful Roscius — Greek Flag Dance—Dragon of Rhodes.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Outlaw's Oath—The Miser of Madrid—The English Paganini—Frozen Hand.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Bianca; or, the Italian Wife—A Pill for Portugal—Orphan of Hindostan.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 244.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1831.

OLD ENGLISH DRAMA.*

[Continued from Yesterday.]

THE following curious extracts, relative to the anti-theatrical spirit in the City, are made by Mr Collier from certain reports sent occasionally to Lord Burghley by Fleetwood the City Recorder, a very lively personage for one in that office. The Lord Mayor in 1584 wanted to suppress the two theatres in Shoreditch, which appear at this period to have been the occasion of a good deal of disturbance.

'Upon Whit sondaye,' says Fleetwood, 'there was a very good sermond preached at the new churche yard nere Bethelem, whereat my Lo. Mayor was with his brethren; and, by reason no playes were the same daie, all the citie was quiet.

'That night (Monday) retorned to London, and found all the wardes full of watches: the cause thereof was, that very near the Theatre or Curten, at the time of the playes there, lay a prentice sleping upon the grass, and on (one) Challis at Brostock dyd turn upon the too (toe) upon the belly of the same prentice; whereupon the apprentice start up, and after words they fell to playne blowes.

'Upon Weddensday one Browne, a serving man in a blew coat, a slashing fellowe, having a perrilous witt of his owne, entending a sport if he cold have brought it to passe, did at the Theater doore quarrell with certain poore boys, handicraft prenteses, and shooke some of them; and lastly he with his sword wounded and maymed one of the boyes upon the left hand; wherupon there assembled nere a M. people.

'Upon Soundaye my lord sent two Aldermen to the court, for the suppressing and pulling downe of the Theatre and Curten. All the Lords were therunto, saving my Lord Chamberlain and Mr Vyce but we obteyned a letter to suppresse theym. Upon the same nyght I sent for the quenes players, and my Lo. of Arundel his players, and they all willinglie obeyed the Lords letters. The cheefest of her highnes players advysed me to send for the owner of the Theatre, who was a stubborne fellow, and to bynd hym. I did so; he sent me word that he was my Lo. of Hunsdens man, and that he would not come at me, but he would in the monying ride to my Lord. Then I sent the under sheriff for him, and he browght him to me; and in the end I shewed hym my Lo. his masters hands, and then he was more quiet; but to die for it he would not be bound. And then I mynding to send him to prison, he made sute that he might be bounde to appere at the Oier and determiner, the which is to morowe, where he said that he was sure the court would not bynd hym, being a Counselors man. And so I have graunted his request, where he shalbe sure to be bound, or else ys lyke to do worse.

'An old mucision of the Quenes had this last night meretricem in his lectulo: one Alen a constable, being homo barbatus, took theym. The Italian most violentlie tore of Alens berd, and said he might have a wenche in his chamber, because for that he was the Quenes man. Alen now is become a Marques under my Lo. Mayor, and hath bound the Italian to answere at the next gaole delyverie.' —P. 258.

Fleetwood, says Mr Collier, 'was himself a natural son; so that he might be disposed to treat the Queen's old musician caught with meretricem in his lectulo, with the less severity.'

We have already given a story of Shakspeare afforded us by another lively lawyer, or a person supposed to be such, who kept a Diary of the Pepys order, now first brought forward by Mr Collier. Some further extracts from this Diary will at once amuse the reader, and give a good specimen of the author's intelligence and research:—

'First with regard to Shakspeare. The period when he wrote his Twelfth Night, or What You Will, has been much disputed among the commentators. Tyrwhitt was inclined to fix it in 1614, and Malone for some years was of the same opinion; but he afterwards changed the date he had adopted to 1607. Chalmers thought he found circumstances in the play to justify him in naming 1613, but what I am about to quote affords a striking, and at the same time a rarely occurring, and convincing proof, how little these conjectures merit confidence. That comedy was indisputably written before 1602, for in February of that year it was an established play, and so much liked, that it was chosen for performance at the Reader's Feast on Candlemas day, at the Inn of Court to which the author of this diary belonged—most likely the Middle Temple, which at that date was famous for its costly entertainments. After reading the following quotation, it is utterly impossible, although the name of the poet be not mentioned, to feel a moment's doubt as to the identity of the play there described, as the production of Shakspeare.

'"Feb. 2, 1601 [2.]

'"At our feast we had a play called Twelfth Night, or What You Will, much like the Comedy of Errors, or Menechmi in Plautus, but most like and neere to that in Italian, called Inganni. A good practice in it to make the steward believe his lady widowe was in love with him, by counterfayting a letter as from his lady, in general terms telling him what she liked best in him, and prescribing his gestures, inscribing his apparaile, &c., and then, when he came to practise, making him beleeve they tooke him to be mad.'"

'At this date, we may conclude with tolerable safety, that Shakspeare's Twelfth Night had been recently brought out at the Blackfriars' Theatre, and that its excellence and success had induced the managers of the Reader's Feast to select it for performance, as part of the entertainments on that occasion. There is no reason to suppose that any of Shakspeare's productions were represented for the first time anywhere but at a theatre. The Comedy of Errors, noticed in the preceding extract, was no doubt also Shakspeare's work mentioned by Meres in 1598, and not the old History of Error, performed at Hampton Court in 1576-7. The Menechmi, likewise spoken of, was of course the play of Plautus, as translated by W. W., and printed in 1595. Should the Italian comedy, called Inganni, turn up, we shall probably find it the actual original of Twelfth Night, which, it has been hitherto supposed, was founded upon the story of Apollonius and Sylla, in Barnabe Rich's 'Farewell to Militarie Profession,' twice printed, viz. in 1583 and 1606. It is remarkable that this is the only notice of a play throughout the Diary; and although the author of it went much into company, he does not appear on any occasion to have visited a public theatre. He was very regular in his attendance at church, both at the Temple and St Paul's, and inserts long accounts of the preachers and their sermons.'—P. 257.

Here follows the story we gave in our paper of Saturday. Mr Collier then proceeds:—

'Ben Jonson is only once mentioned in the same Diary, but the date and circumstances are both remarkable. It is known that he wrote nothing between his 'Poetaster,' in 1601, and his 'Sejanus,' in 1603; and in the interval, Decker produced his 'Satiromestix,' in ridicule of Ben Jonson; and as far as we can now judge, it was popular. Ben Jonson, therefore, seems in consequence to have withdrawn himself temporarily from the theatre, between 1601, when "his comic muse had proved so ominous" to him, and in 1603, when he tried "if tragedy had a more kind aspect." The following short paragraph accounts for him in the interval:—

'"Feb. 12, 1602.

'"Ben Jonson, the poet, now lives upon one Townesende, and scornes the world." So Overbury.'

'Townesende was probably some person who admired Jonson's genius, and thought that justice was not done to him by the public. The meaning of the addition, "So Overbury," is, evidently, that Sir Thomas Overbury, then a Student of the Middle Temple, was a narrator of the fact.

'John Marston was an author of Satires in 1598; and his play of Antonio and Melida was printed in the year in which he is noticed in the 'Barrister's Diary.' His Malecontent had, however, been written more than two years earlier, and he seems to have attracted a good deal of attention. The subsequent paragraph is very characteristic of its coarseness.

'"Nov. 21, 1602.

'"Jo. Marston, the last Christmas, when he danced with Alderman Mores wives daughter, a Spaniard born, fell into a strange commendation of her wit and beauty. When he had done, she thought to pay him home, and told him she thought he was a poet.—"'Tis true," said he, "for poets feigne and lie, and soe did I when I commended your beauty, for you are exceedingly foule."'—P. 333. . . . . .

'The following anecdote respecting Spenser has never before been told on such good authority, although it has been long known by tradition. It is disbelieved by Mr Todd, in his Spenser, i, lxvii, edit. 1805.

'"May 4, 1602.

'"When her Majestie had given order that Spenser should have a

* The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the Time of Shakspeare: and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. By J. Payne Collier, Esq. F.S.A. 3 vols. 8vo. Murray.

Digitized by Google

reward for his poems, but Spenser could have nothing, he presented her with these verses:—

'"It pleased your Grace upon a time,
To graunt me reason for my rhyme;
But from that time until this season,
I heard of neither rhyme nor reason."'

'The barrister's informant in this instance was a person of the name of Touse, to whom he often refers as his voucher.

'An epitaph upon Spenser is thus given:—

'"In Spenserum.

'"Famous alive, and dead, here is the ods,
Then god of poets, now poet of the gods."'

The following does more credit to his adversary than to Sir W. Raleigh, but not much to either:—

'"December 30, 1602.

'"Sir W. Rawly made this ryme upon the name of a gallant, one Mr Noel:—

'"Noe L.

'"The word of Denial, and the letter of fifty Makes the gent's name, that will never be thrifty."

'And Noel's Answer.

'"Raw Ly.

'"The foe to the stomacke, and the word of disgrace, Shews the gent.'s name with the bold face."

There are several very coarse jokes regarding Sir John Davies; the following may be quoted:—

'"April 10, 1603.

'"Jo. Davies reporteth that he is sworne the king's name; that the K. shewed him great favours: inepte, he slanders while he praises."

'Regarding the death of Queene Elizabeth, the subsequent particulars derived, as will be seen, from the most authentic sources, are contained in the MS. Diary to which I have been so much indebted. The short concluding paragraph, regarding the ring and Lord Essex, is particularly worthy of notice:

'"March 23.—I was at the Court at Richmond to heare Dr Parry, one of her Majestie's Chaplens preach, and be assured whether the queene were living or dead. I heard him, and was assured she was then living. * * * These were present at his sermon. The Archbishop of Cant. the L. Keep. the L. Treasuror, L. Admirall, L. of Shrewsbury, E. of Worster, L. Gray, Sir Willm. Knollys, Sir Ed. Wotton, &c.

'"I dined with Dr Parry in the Privy Chamber, and understood by him, the Bishop of Chichester, the Deane of Canterbury, the Deane of Windsore, &c. that her Majestie hath been by fits troubled with melancholie some three or four months; but for this fortnight extreame oppressed with it, in so much that she refused to eat anything, to receive any phisicke, or admit any rest in bedd, till within these two or three dayes. Shee hath been in a manner speechless for two days: very pensive and silent since Shrovetide, sitting sometimes with her eye fixed upon one object many hours together; yet she always had her perfect senses and memory, and yesterday signified by the lifting up of her hand and eyes to heaven, a sign which Dr Parry entreated of her, that shee beloved that faith which she hath caused to be professed, and looked faithfully to be saved by Christ's merits and mercy only, and no other meanes. She took great delight in hearing prayers, would often at the name of Jesus lift up her hands and eyes to heaven. She would not hear the Archb. speaks of hope of her longer life, but when he prayed and spoke of heaven and those joys, she would hug his hand. It seems she might have lived yf she would have used means, but shee would not be persuaded, and princes must not be forced. Hir physicians said she had a body of a firm and perfect constitution likely to have lived many years: a Royal Majestie is not privilege against death.

'March 24.—This morning, at about three o'clock, her Majestie departed this life, mildly like a lamb, easily like a ripe apple from the tree: cum levi quadam febre, absq. gemitu. Dr Parry told me that he was present, and sent his prayers before her soule; and I doubt not, but that she is amongst the royal saintes in heaven, in eternal joys.

'April 4.—Dr Parry told me the Countess Kildare assured him, that the queene caused the ring, wherewith she was wedded to the crowne, to be cut from her finger some six months before her death; but wore a ring which the E. of Essex gave her, unto the day of hir death.'—P. 335.

[To be continued.]

VALUE OF A NAIL.—We have been told that the first nail ever seen in this island was taken from a boat at Raitea. It was a spike-nail, and brought hither by its fortunate possessor as something of rare value. And so it proved, for he made no small gain by lending it out for hire to canoe-builders to bore holes in the sides of their planks. Afterwards another lucky fellow got hold of a nail, and not knowing how such a thing came into existence, he shrewdly conjectured that it must have been formed by a process of vegetation. Wherefore, to propagate so valuable an exotic, he planted his nail in the ground, but waited in vain for the blade, the bud, the blossom, and the fruit. This man is still living, and has not heard the last of his speculation, being often reminded, to his no small chagrin, of the folly by which he acquired at least one piece of knowledge.—Tyerman and Bennet's Voyages.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. VI.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

WM. HILTON, R.A.—WM. ETTY, R.A.—H. HOWARD, R.A. C. L. EASTLAKE, R.A.

MR HILTON never offends us. He is never extravagant, and never mean. He exhibits occasionally instances of really fine colour, and adopts interesting subjects for his pencil. What then is it that we want?—We have some difficulty in answering the question with precision. But we feel that something is wanting in this artist's works, to place him on the foremost level. His is the 'aurea mediocritas.' He is first in the second class of art, ranking below the great masters, but at the same time taking a creditable station. Perhaps he reminds us too often of the Italian painters. This, did it force us merely into a comparison with them, might amount to a high compliment to Mr Hilton; but that is not the case. It is not that he is as good as they are; but simply that he resembles them. We have caught ourselves, more than once, thinking of Guercino, of Andrea del Sarto, of Raffaelle, of Rubens, &c.; when standing before Mr Hilton's pictures; and we therefore cannot help thinking that the source of his inspiration must sometimes lie in their inventions. It must not be understood that we rate Mr Hilton low in reference to his brother artists. On the contrary, he occupies a high place amongst them. As a serious historical painter, he has—(with the exception of Mr Stothard's and Mr Haydon's best things)—done as much as any cotemporary painter that we can at present call to our recollection. He is decidedly a more effective artist than Mr Briggs, or Mr Etty, or Mr Howard, although the last named gentleman has sometimes excelled him, we think in graceful design. Mr Hilton has two pictures in Somerset House this year. One is 'The Angel releasing Peter, No. 168,'—the other, 'Sir Calepine rescuing Serena, No. 64.' The first of these reminds us, either from similarity of subject, or some other cause, of Raffaelle, and our artist suffers in consequence. The picture, of which the idea is taken from Spenser is, to our fancy, better. There is not, indeed, much expression in the heads; but the figure of Serena, for colour, harmony, and effect, is one of the loveliest things that the Exhibition affords; there are other parts of this picture which are also entitled to praise.

MR ETTY is an artist of great reputation. We can testify to his excellence as a colourist on former occasions, and indeed to his general merits as a painter. But we do not think that he is at present in the right road to fame. We wish we could set him right. He has abandoned his Venetian style, we perceive, and taken up—we know not what. It is as though he had grafted some of the defects of the Bolognese school on those of Leonardo da Vinci's. To our unsophisticated vision, his Scripture subject of this year (as well as that of last year) is very indifferent, even in colour. It is hard, black, and equally devoid of grace and meaning. Mr Etty's academical studies are beautiful, but they are not sufficient for a picture, and in this picture he does not even preserve the colour which he learns at the Life Academy. He who once was as gorgeous as summer, is now reduced to lamp-black and an ambiguous hue, in which a cold yellow and dirty brown seem struggling for pre-eminence. We would rather see Mr Etty again in his peacock plumage, when he caught sight of Cleopatra sailing down the Cydnus, or when he painted 'Dan Cupid,' just after his sparkling wings had been dipped in the rainbow.

There are one or two paintings of merit in Somerset-House at present, by this artist, which ought not to be passed over. One is 'No. 170, Sabrina,' from Milton's Comus. The reader who recollects this nymph will be delighted to repeat the beautiful words in which the poet invokes her:—

'Sabrina fair!
Listen, where thou art sitting
Under the glassy, cool, translucent wave,
In twisted braids of lilies knitting
The loose train of thy amber-dropping hair.'

The painter, or the poet who prints the Somerset-House catalogue, has improved Milton's version, by throwing the two first lines of the above extract into one! This is economizing space with a vengeance.

With the exception of our friend Sabrina, Venus, and an occasional Cupid or two, the whole of Mythology seems to have become the domain of Mr HOWARD. He is proprietor of Iris and Ceres, of Narcissus and Echo, of Hylas and Hyacinthus. The 'Towered Cybele,

Mother of a hundred gods,'— is his, and all upwards to Jove. Then again, he is the historian of Fairy-land, exhibiting Oberon to us, and Titania, and all

'That Pygmæan race
Beyond the Indian mount, and faery elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest side
Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees,'

when Sir John Barleycorn, vanquisher of the wits of men, takes his

Digitized by Google

clownship by the ear, and shews him the greenwood haunted; or when the Spirit of Potheen dances from stalk to stalk, till Shamus O'Raffarty forgetteth that he is in the region of potatoes, and seeth nothing but 'good people' in the crowd of shillelah-bearers who dog his steps, with anything but amicable intentions, from the neighbouring 'wake.'

All this is, by common assent, Mr Howard's; but we can imagine far other things to exist in these parts than what Mr Howard has discovered. He is by no means deficient in occasional elegance—(his Titania, sleeping under a large lily or Narcissus flower, in the moonlight, is beautiful)—but he wants that air and extreme grace, and, as it were, impalpable beauty, which such a superhuman theme demands. Raffaelle, in his Cupid and Psyche, and Mr Stothard, in a few of his early drawings, seem to be the only artists who have had imaginations delicate and powerful enough to apprehend and overcome the difficulties of this subject.

We must wait a little longer before we venture to pronounce on the merits of Mr Eastlake. We are exceedingly disposed to yield him a very high place in modern art. What he wants is effect, and a more natural style of colour. At present, his pictures are too like faded frescoes. What he has is—beauty, expression, elegance, and simplicity; and he has these, we think (now that Mr Stothard is passed) in a degree beyond any other person in the Royal Academy. We hope good (and why not great?) things, from Mr Eastlake. Let him take care not to disappoint us. His 'Italian Family, No. 78,' notwithstanding the defects that we have alluded to, is a delightful picture, and possesses a combination of qualities that we do not observe in any other picture in the Exhibition of the present year.

[No. VII will contain "The Portrait Painters." viz. Sir M. A. Shee, Sir W. Beechey, Messrs Wilkie, Phillips, Jackson, Pickersgill, Reinagle, Chinnery, Norton, and Rothwell.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A Wifely Duty.—To partake secretly, and in her heart, of all his joys and sorrows, to believe him comely and fair, though the sun hath drawn a cypress over him..... She must shine round about with sweetness and friendship, and she shall be pleasant while she lives, and desired when she dies.—Jeremy Taylor.

Chinese-English.—A Chinese lad who had learned a little English, the other day gave his master a pleasant specimen of his proficiency: 'Master,' said he, 'the dog have five childs: three of them be bulls, and two be cows.'—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

— The spirit of the age affects all the arts; and the minds of men being once roused from their lethargy, and put into fermentation, turn themselves on all sides, and carry improvements into every art and science. —Hume's Essays.

Monarchy and Republicanism.—However perfect the monarchical form may appear to some politicians, it owes all its perfection to the republican; nor is it possible that a pure despotism, established among a barbarous people, can ever, by its native force and energy, refine and polish itself. It must borrow its laws, and methods, and institutions, and consequently its stability and order, from free governments. These advantages are the sole growth of republics.—Hume.

Counsel for a Bride and Bridegroom.—Every little thing can blast an infant blossom; and the breath of the south can shake the little rings of the vine, when first they begin to curl like the locks of a new-weaned boy: but when by age and consolidation they stiffen into the hardness of a stem, and have, by the warm embraces of the sun and the kisses of heaven, brought forth their clusters, they can endure the storms of the north, and the loud noises of a tempest, and yet never be broken: so are the early unions of an unfixed marriage; watchful and observant, jealous and busy, inquisitive and careful, and apt to take alarm at every unkind word. After the hearts of the man and the wife are endeared and hardened by a mutual confidence and experience, longer than artifice and pretence can last, there are a great many remembrances, and some things present that dash all little unkindnesses in pieces.—Jeremy Taylor.

Random-Shot of a Gamekeeper.—At a time when party-spirit ran high, Sheridan went on a shooting excursion into the Highlands, and being near the estate of Lord Melville, asked permission of the gamekeeper to let him shoot an hour or so upon it. The man consented, and when they were in a wild part of the mountain, began to speak of politics, not knowing the person to whom he addressed himself; but mentioning Sheridan's name with great energy, he exclaimed, 'Deil hae my saul, if I could see the rascal, an I would not break every bone in his body.' Sheridan, of course, took the hint, and concealed his name from so formidable an adversary.—Bennett's Albanians, &c.

Aristocracy and Standing Army.—It may perhaps be asked why Booth could go to the tavern, and not to the oratorio, with his wife. In truth, then, the tavern was within hallowed ground, that is to say, in the verge of the court: for of five officers that were to meet there, three besides Booth were confined to that air, which hath been always found extremely wholesome to a broken military constitution. And here, if the good reader will pardon the pun, he will scarce be offended at the observation; since how is it possible that, without running in debt, any person should maintain the dress and appearance of a gentleman, whose income is not half so good as that of a porter? It is true that this allowance, small as it is, is a great expense to the public; but if several more unnecessary charges were spared, the public might perhaps bear a little increase of this without much feeling it. They would not, I am sure, have equal reason to complain at contributing to the maintenance of a set of brave fellows, who, at the hazard of their health, their limbs, and their lives, have maintained the safety and honour of their country; as when they find themselves taxed to the support of a set of drones, who have not the least merit or claim to their favour; and who, without contributing in any manner to the good of the hive, live luxuriously on the labours of the industrious bee.—Fielding's 'Amelia.'

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

King's Theatre.—Semiramide—La Bayadere.
Drury-Lane.—The Legion of Honour—The Illustrious Stranger—Turning the Tables—Massaniello.
Covent-Garden.—Cinderella—The Omnibus—Teddy the Tiler.

My dear Mr Tatler,—As the ten nights for which the French company have engaged the Adelphi Theatre are to conclude the professional labours of M. Potier, I would fain recommend your readers not to let them pass away unheeded. Those who have seen this excellent actor will need no persuasion to go and see him again; those who have not, should hasten to do so, before he retires. I saw him last season in the character of Antoine, in the piece of that name; afterwards played, in the English version, by Farren. The public could not determine which was the finer performance. Both were painfully true in their representation of the mental darkness and occasional gleams of intellect, together with the bodily weakness of extreme age. On Monday evening I went to see M. Potier in Le Bourgmestre de Sardam, which has been performed at the English theatres, I think, by the title of Peter the Great, or 'Twould puzzle a Conjuror. He represented the Burgomaster himself, a character decidedly comic, an ignorant man in office, who, from his desire to know everything, never succeeds in obtaining the knowledge of anything, and goes blundering in the dark through various intrigues and absurdities. Nothing could be more natural; yet, Mr Tatler, it was not that mere dry representation of nature, to which you have objected in some of our English actors; but such as to remind one of the old adage, 'He must be a wise man, who can act a fool.' The piece represents Peter the First of Russia disguised as a ship-carpenter at Sardam, the French and English Ambassadors seeking to detect him through the disguise, and each anxious to anticipate the other in concluding with him a treaty of alliance. The English Ambassador is pourtrayed as a grave, weak person, talking mysteriously, and suffering himself to be taken in by a yet greater ignoramus than himself. He is expressively styled Lord Simpley. Why does M. La Porte (in him I suppose it originates) substitute for this name in the bills, 'Le Comte de Hogen, Suedois?' If it is from a fear of offending the English, he has chosen a very mistaken mode of averting the danger. The name of the Ambassador and his country are changed, in the bills, while the words are spoken as before, by the actors, and he himself expressly says, 'I am Lord Simpley, Ambassador from England.' This is the very way to put objection into people's heads, whether they will or no. The English do not scruple to have their laugh at the peculiarities of the French; why should not they laugh in turn, so long as it be done in good humour? but if they make a serious matter of it themselves, the English may be inclined to do the same.

The last piece of the evening was Le Beneficiare, which has been acted in English, under the title of The Prompter. The Prompter (M. Potier), who has been thirty years in that office, is about to take a benefit. All promises well for his success, when a sudden pique induces the great leaders of tragedy, opera, and ballet, to forsake him, on the plea of illness. The Prompter visits each in turn, and by flattery, varied according to the character he addresses, succeeds in obtaining a positive promise of their attendance. The triumphant Prompter takes his station, the curtain rises, when the Manager suddenly appears, and informs him that the performance cannot proceed, on account of the absence of the inferior actors, to whom he had neglected to pay the same particular attention. It is one of those pieces which depend entirely upon the acting. M. Potier kept the audience, between laughing and applauding, in continual exercise. This actor does not, like some of our English comedians, owe his reputation to any peculiarity of face, voice, or manner; they change with every character. In the Burgomaster he was a handsome elderly gentleman, living at his ease, whose gravity carried with it an air of authority, in spite of his ignorance, and even while he made his audience laugh continually: in the Prompter he is an active-minded man, who has gone through much care, yet still preserved his disposition to hope the best. Every feature expresses habitual anxiety, yet every disappointment finds him provided with a resource. During his visits to the three great personages before mentioned, he exhibits such varied powers, that one naturally wonders at the blindness of the Manager, in not removing him from the Prompter's box to the boards. He has one great fault, indeed,—commonly so called,—he is much given to what is elegantly termed 'gagging.' M. LA PORTE has the same propensity; but whether it really be a fault in them I doubt. Certainly neither the authors nor the audience had reason to complain last night; for some of their additions were the best things said. M. LA PORTE added many ludicrous phrases of bad French, in his representation of an English Nobleman, in Le Beneficiaire, such as saying it was the custom of the English at Paris to prendre une boite on a benefit night, &c.

Digitized by Google

Before I take leave of M. POTIER, Mr Tatler, I will tell you an anecdote I heard of him a short time since:—A gentleman on the Drury Lane establishment invited him to see that theatre; and they went together, one morning in the course of last season. M. POTIER was struck with the box entrance, which he declared he had never seen equalled for magnificence, in any theatre. He was then led through certain private passages, and brought suddenly upon the stage. He stretched his arms to the right and left, thrust them forward, shrugged his shoulders, and gave his companion to understand, that the theatre was of a hopeless size, and that he disapproved of the extent, as much as he admired the grand entrance of the house. I am sadly afraid, Mr Tatler, that the French have better actors than we have; for when we see their best, I don't know where we are to look for their equals. I know of no actor on the English boards, so truly and delightfully natural, as M. LA PORTE, or Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY. We observed the occupiers of the stalls indulging in enormous quantities of cakes and strawberry ice, while playing with a sleek black cat, who kept her station on one of the seats the greater part of the evening, and seemed admirably to succeed in beguiling the long intervals between the pieces.

I remain, Mr Tatler, with great respect,
Your Old Correspondent,
A. A.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Comedy of
THE CHANCERY SUIT.
[By Mr PEAKE.]

Emily Traverse. Miss E. Tree. Mrs Post, Mrs Gibbs. Mrs Snare, Mrs Pindar.
Jenny, Mrs J. Hughes. Miss Willowly, Miss Perry.
Sir Bernard Blazoncourt, Mr Egerton. Frederick Blazoncourt, Mr Abbot.
Guy Thistlebloom, Mr Bartley. Murphy O'Doggrely, Mr Power.
Jeremy Thistlebloom, (under the assumed name of Courtington) Mr Warde.
Snare, Mr Meadows. Winterfield, Mr Blanchard.

Previous to the Comedy, Rossini's Overture to 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia'

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called
NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schoenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, The Maid of Judah; and The Highland Reel.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Comedy of
THE CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE.
[By COLMAN the Elder, and GARRICK.]

Mrs Heidelberg, Mrs Glover. Miss Sterling, Mrs W. Clifford.
Fanny, Mrs Ashton. Chambermaid, Mrs Coveney. Trusty, Mrs W. Johnson.
Betty, Mrs Tayleure.
Lord Ogleby, Mr W. Farren. Lovewell, Mr Cooper.
Sir John Melville, Mr Brindal. Sterling, Mr Gattie. Brush, Mr Vining.
Canton, Mr Webster. Serjeant Flower, Mr W. Johnson.
Truman, Mr V. Webster. Traverse, Mr Coveney.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called
THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.
[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney, Mrs Coveney, Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Musical Farce of
THE REVIEW; OR, THE WAGS OF WINDSOR.
[By COLMAN, the Younger.]

Grace Gaylove, Mrs Humby. Lucy, Mrs T. Hill. Martha, Mrs W. Johnson.
Phœbe Whitethorn, Miss J. Scott.
Caleb Quot'em, Mr Harley. Mr Deputy Bull, Mr Gattie.
Captain Beaugard, Mr Brindal. Looney Mactwolter, Mr H. Wallack.
John Lump, Mr Webster. Charles Williams, Mr Newcombe.
Serjeant, Mr Coveney. Dubbs, Mr Bishop.

To-morrow, The Way to Keep Him; Killing No Murder; and other Entertainments.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.
MR ABBOTT'S NIGHT, FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

On which occasion Madame PASTA and Mlle. TAGLIONI will make their first and positively last appearance at this Theatre.

The Performance will commence with the Comedy of THE EXQUISITES. Lilias Evondale, Miss E. Tree; Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble; Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott; Gosling, Mr Keeley; Strut, Mr Power. In Act II, Madame TAGLIONI will dance the celebrated 'Tyrolienne,' from the Opera of 'Guillaume Tell,' and the admired 'Pas,' from 'La Bayadere.' In the course of the Evening, Madame PASTA will sing 'Il soave e bel contento,' and a favourite Air. 'Should he upbraid,' by Miss INVERARITY, and the Glee, 'My Father Land,' (from the 'Romance of a Day,') by Miss HARRINGTON, Messrs TEXT, IRWIN, BENEDICT, and SHERRIFF. After which, the Farce of THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS. To conclude with the Musical Farce of THE WATERMAN.

Tickets and Private Boxes to be had of Mr ABBOTT and Mr NOTTER, at the Box Office, Hart-street.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par
LE CI-DEVANT JEUNE HOMME.
Comédie en Un Acte, en Prose, de M. MERLE.

Madame de Blainville, Mlle. St. Ange.
Ci-devant Jeune Homme, M. Potier. Florville, M. Pellissié.
Floricour, M. Paulin. M. Sombreuil, M. Préval. La Branche, M. Laporte.
Grugeon, M. Gamard. Poupart, M. Guenee. M. Carrick, M. Arnaud.

Suivie de
LE CHIFFONNIER: OU, LE PHILOSOPHE NOCTURNE.
Vaudeville nouveau en Cinq petits Actes, par MM. THEAULON et ETIENNE.

Madame de Verseuil, Mlle. Jamain. Madame Gerval, Mme. Bandin.
Céline, Mlle. Florval.
Chiffonnier, M. Potier. Ernest d'Arleville, M. Alfred. Alfred, M. Paulin.
M. Gripefort, M. Préval. M. Chapoulard, M. Cloup.
Un Garde du Commerce, M. Guenée. Un Valet, M. Granville.

On finira par
LES ANGLAISES POUR RIRE.
Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. SEVRIN et DUMERSAN.

Aspasie, Mlle. St. Ange. Goton, Mme. Gamard.
M. Menu, M. Potier. M. Coclet, M. Laporte. M. Copeau, M. Cloup.
M. Fusin, M. Gamard.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled
BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.
[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, a Dramatic Romance, in Two Acts, called
THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS.

Helena di Rosalvi, Miss M. C. Poole. Claudine, Miss Jordan.
Jacinthe, Miss Rumens. Rosa, Miss Nicol. Genevieve, Miss Vincent.
Felix, Mr Osbaldiston. Rosalvi, Mr D. Pitt. Jeronymo, Mr Young.
Marco, Mr Lee. Florio di Rosalvi, Miss Ellis. Baptista, Mr Webb.
Julio di Rosalvi, Master F. Carbery. Juan, Mr Tully.
Pietro, Mr Collier. Fabricio, Mr Fone.

To conclude with the Historical Drama of
WILLIAM TELL.

Austrians—Anneli, Miss Vincent. Agnes, Miss Scott.
Gesler, Mr D. Pitt. Sarnam, Mr Almar. Struth, Mr Hobbs. Braun, Mr Rogers.
Rudolph, Mr Lee. Lutold, Mr Richards.
Swiss—Emma, Miss M. C. Poole. William Tell, Mr Osbaldiston.
Albert, Miss Ellis. Waldman, Mr Webb. Michael, Mr C. Hill.
Melctal, Mr Gough. Erni, Mr Nelson. Verner, Mr Maitland.
Furst, Mr Young. Jagheli, Mr Honner. Pierre, Mr Ransford.
Theodore, Mr Asbury.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

For the Benefit of Mr E. Seguin.
A New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.

With Handel's celebrated Music, newly arranged by Mr C. Potter.
Galatea, Miss Dix. Eudora, Mrs Saville. Doris, Mrs Garrick.
Acis, Mr Bennett. Damon, Mr Marshall. Ulysses, Mr Spencer.
Lysander, Mr G. Lejeune. Telemon, Mr Munroe. Faunus, Mr G. Smith.
Polyphemus, the Fiend of Mount Etna, Mr E. Seguin.

After the Opera, A Pas de Deux, by Mlle. Clara and M. Emile.

After which, A CONCERT by Madame Mesge and Madame Raimbaux, Signor Curioni, and Signor Lablache. And 'The Wolf,' by Mr G. Smith.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, of
BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.
[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.
Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, (with the Original Song and Hornpipe) Mr Forrester.
The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Mysterious Tailor.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Feats of Horsemanship — The Russian Courier—Lilliputian Napoleon—Vaulting—Mr J. Cooke's Exercises—Parisian Montrosities—The Flying Gymnasiast—Mr Wells's Performances — The Youthful Roscius — Greek Flag Dance—Dragon of Rhodes.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Outlaw's Oath—The Miser of Madrid—The English Paganini—Frozen Hand.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Jane Shore—A Pill for Portugal—Orphan of Hindostan.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 245.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1831.

OLD ENGLISH DRAMA.*

[Continued from Yesterday.]

At the beginning of the second volume, Mr Collier favours us with some extracts from another diary of the Pepys order, kept by Sir Humphrey Mildmay, who appears to have been a leisurely gentleman, of an appetite for pleasure more strong than delicate, going about 'seeking what he might devour,' whether plays, books, barmaids or cherry-bounce. He had a wife, who it seems complained of him, notwithstanding the conscientious manner in which he itemed his expenditure:—

			£.	s.	d.
'"21 Jan.	1631.	To the wanton nurse at M. Langhorne's	0	1	0
		To Mother Gill, a poor naughty woman	0	1	0
14 July,	1632.	To a pretty wenche at Paule's Wharfe	0	1	0
10 Nov.		To Thomas of the stall of Cozeninge	0	1	6
27 Nov.		At a Tavern with Anne Cressy	0	0	8
12 April,	1633.	To Mr John Percy for Rhemishe Testament	0	8	0
10 May,		To Ducke Lane for popishe books	0	3	0
26 June,		To a purse for ballets	0	1	0
22 July,		Expences at a cherry-garden	0	2	0
1 Nov.		To Hunnis, fiddler at Brentwood	0	2	0
8 Jan.		To Nathl. for making of me merry, and to others at the same time at Much Hadam	0	2	0
19 Mar.	1633.	To a bookseller, for the Converted Jew	0	5	0
14 July,	1634.	To a tavern with a Bona	0	1	0."

—Vol. II. p. 41.

'Two of the items in this MS.' observes Mr Collier, 'are particularly curious, in connexion with the family and name of Shakspeare. They run thus:—

			£.	s.	d.
'"31st of May,	1633.	To Mr Shakespere his man Jo. for one per of spurres with bosses, &c. this last of May	0	9	0
4 Dec.		To Jo. at Mr Shakespere's, for one per of spurres	0	2	6"

'There are many notes in the margin of this account book, and opposite the first of these entries are placed these remarkable words; 'no player now;' as if the Shakespere here mentioned had once been a player, or at least had some connexion with players. What relation, if any, this Shakespere might be to William Shakespeare, my researches have not enabled me to ascertain. I have been able to learn however, that he bore the Christian name of Shakespeare's father, John, and that he was dead in 1637. By a Privy Seal dated 16 December, 13 Car. I., orders were given to the Lord Treasurer to pay to Mary Shakespeare, widow and executrix of John Shakespeare, our late Bittmaker deceased, the sum of £1692. 11s. due to her late husband. He must have been a man of considerable substance to allow so large a debt to be incurred. The Privy Seal is in the Chapter House Westminster.'—P. 42.

As this Shakespeare had been a player, might he not be the person alluded to in a passage often quoted by the curious, and repeated by Mr Collier, which is naturally supposed to have been aimed at our great dramatist? The passage is in Robt. Green's Groats-worth of Wit, published in 1592, and is as follows:—

'"There is an upstart crow beautified with our feathers, that with his tiger's heart, wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes Factotum, is, in his own conceit, the only Shake-Scene in the country."

'Here,' says Mr Collier, 'the words "upstart crow beautified with our feathers," clearly mean, that Shakespeare in 1592, had gained a reputation by altering and amending the plays of preceding dramatists;" and he thinks, that the supposition of Malone, respecting Shakespeare's not having become an original dramatic author, until 1593, "gives full point" to the charge thus "peevishly and enviously brought against him." By this, and other arguments, Mr Collier has undoubtedly given great corroboration to a conjecture already well grounded: nor does the character of Shakespeare for modesty and gentleness prove anything against the application of the libel, since the better his qualities, the more angrily would envy try to misrepresent them. Still, as there was another Shakespeare, who had been once a player, and from the dates before mentioned might have been a player at the time here pointed out, it might be worth while to consider whether the passage does not apply to him, especially as his name was John, and the Shake-Scene here carped at is called a 'Johannes Factotum.'

While we are on the subject of Shakespeare, we will mention a 'Rime,' spoken of in Mr Collier's third volume, (p. 276) and which our great poet is said to have written upon the wine at the Mitre, a Tavern in Fleet Street:—

'Mr Thorp, the enterprising Bookseller of Bedford Street, is in possession of a MS. full of songs and poems, in the handwriting of a person of the name of Richard Jackson, all copied prior to the year 1631, and including many unpublished pieces by a variety of celebrated poets. One of the most curious is a song in five seven-line stanzas, thus headed:—

'"Shakespeare's rime which is made [at the Mitre in Fleet Street."

'It begins "From the rich Lavinian shore," and some few of the lines were published by Playford, and set as a catch. Another shorter piece, is called in the margin,

'"Shakespeare's Rime.

'"Give me a cup of rich Canary wine,
Which was the Mitre's [drinks] and now is mine;
Of which had Horace and Anacreon tasted,
Their lives as well as lines till now had lasted."

'I have little doubt that the lines are genuine, as well as many other songs and poems attributed to Ben Jonson, Sir W. Raleigh, H. Constable, Dr Donne, J. Sylvester, and others.'—Vol. III. p. 275.

We agree with Mr Collier in thinking these lines genuine, but we think we have heard them before. There was a letter in Tuesday's Tatler, shewing that the anecdote of Shakespeare which we repeated as new from our author's work the day before, had transpired to the public five or six years ago. As Mr Collier, however, has been about his work these twenty years, it is possible that the anecdote might still have come through the channel of his researches, and that a similar cause might have left these lines upon our memory. The catch 'From the rich Lavinian shore,' is well known, but we do not sufficiently recollect the words to be able to speak to the merits of the writing. There is a beautiful old glee, the words of which contain such an exquisite delicacy of sentiment, that in spite of want of finish in the writing, we have often thought they might have been Shakespeare's. It begins

'Since first I saw your face, I resolv'd
To honour and renown you"—

'When Davenant presented his comedy of the Wits for license, to Sir Henry Herbert, Master of the Revels to Charles the First; Sir Henry Herbert "crossed out many exclamations that struck him in the light of oaths." Through Endymion Porter, Davenant complained to the King of this exercise of authority, and on the 9th of January, the King called the Master of the Revels before him, and desired that he should allow such words as faith, death, and slight to stand, "as asseverations only, and no oaths." Davenant,' continues Mr Collier, 'was in considerable favour at this date, which might induce the King to take especial interest about his play. Notwithstanding this royal decision against him, Sir Henry Herbert made the following memorandum in his office book, shewing that he was "convinced against his will:"—

'"The King is pleased to take faith, death, slight, for asseverations and no oaths, to which I do humbly submit, as my master's judgment; but under favour conceive them to be oaths, and enter them here to declare my opinion and submission." '—P. 57.

Charles would probably have thought nothing of the words in question, by whomsoever written. When his son, Charles II, was rebuked by some conscientious clergyman, for using so many oaths in his conversation, he declared that he was nothing in that matter

* The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the Time of Shakspeare: and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. By J. Payne Collier, Esq. F.S.A. 3 vols. 8vo. Murray.

Digitized by Google

to what his father had been. "Your Martyr," said he, "was the man for swearing." This irreverent speech may be taken cum grano: but the melancholy fate of Charles I, has unquestionably thrown a gravity over his memory, which was not borne out by the manners of his court.

At page 80, Mr Collier has traced to its author, the 'often repeated and supposed anonymous description of a Giant Fishing.' The description is in Davenant's Britannia Triumphans:—

'This day (a day as fair as heart could wish)
This giant stood on shore of sea to fish:
For angling rod he took a sturdy oak,
For line a cable that in storm ne'er broke:
His hook was such as heads the end of pole
To pluck down house ere fire consumes it whole;
His hook was baited with a dragon's tail,
And then on rock he stood to bob for whale.'

'This was first stolen,' says Mr Collier, 'by the anonymous author of the burlesque, Hero and Leander, 1653. 8vo.' Dr King took the second and fifth couplets, and appropriated them as an epigram, which is to be found in his works. We mention this, because it reminds us of a similar plagiarism by another Tory wit, Sprat, Bishop of Rochester. In Sprat's poems, is a ludicrous epigram on a dwarf thrown by an ant. This comes from the following verses in the works of Crashaw:—

'ON NANUS MOUNTED UPON AN ANT.
'High mounted on an ant, Nanus the tall
Was thrown, alas! and got a deadly fall;
Under the unruly beast's proud feet he lies,
All torn; with much ado, yet ere he dies,
He strains these words: "Base Envy, do laugh on,
Thus did I fall, and thus fell Phaeton."'

Davenant, by the way, seems to have thought that there was something particularly ludicrous or mock-heroical in the omission of the article before his nouns, as in some of the lines of his 'Angling Giant.' In his works, there is a poem of some length (the 'Long Vacation'), in which scarcely an article is admitted.

Some of the old Miracle Plays or Pageants, analysed by Mr Collier, are very curious. We have selected one or two specimens for the reader's amusement:—

'CREATION OF THE WORLD. REBELLION OF LUCIFER, DEATH OF ABEL.—The first Play, or Pageant, of the Widkirk collection includes the Creation, with the rebellion and expulsion of Lucifer and his adherents. The Deity thus commences:—

'"Ego sum alpha et o
I am the first, the last also.
Oone god in majestie,
Mervelus of myght most,
Fader and son and holy goost
On god in trinyte."

The work of creation is then begun, and after the cherubim have sung, the Deity descends from his throne and goes out: Lucifer usurps it, and asks the Angels—

'"Gay felows, how semys now me?"

The good and bad Angels disagree as to his appearance; but the dispute is terminated by the return of the Deity, who expels Satan and his adherents from heaven. Adam and Eve are then created in Paradise, and this piece ends with a speech from Satan, lamenting their felicity: of the temptation and fall of man, we hear nothing, the second play relating to the murder of Abel. It is opened by Cain's ploughboy, called Garçon, with a sort of prologue, in which, amongst other things, he warns the spectators to be silent. It opens thus:—

'"All hayll, all hayll, both blithe and glad,
For here com I, a mery lad.
Be peasse youre dyn, my masters bad,
Or els the devill you spede. . . . . .
Felowes, here I you forbede
To make nother nose ne cry:
Whoso is so hardy to do that dede,
The devill hang him up to dry."

Cain enters with a plough and team, one of his mares being named "Donnyng;" he quarrels with the Garçon because he will not drive for him; after which Abel arrives, and wishes that "God may speed Cain and his man." . . . . . The murder afterwards takes place, and Cain hides himself:—

'"Deus. Cayn, Cayn!
Cayn. Who is it that callis me?
I am yonder, may thou not se.
Deus. Cayn, where is thy brother Abell?
Cayn. What askst thou me?—I trow, in hell;
At hell, I trow, he be:
Who so were there then myght he see."

'Cain having been cursed, calls the boy and beats him, "but to use his hand:" he acknowledges that he has slain his brother, and the boy advises running away, lest the "bayles us take." This is followed by some gross buffoonery, Cain making a mock proclamation, "in the King's name," and the boy repeating it blunderingly after him. Cain sends him away with the plough and horses, and ends the pageant with a speech to the spectators, bidding them farewell for ever before he goes to the devil. This brings us, in the Widkirk Plays, to Noah's Flood.'—Vol. II, p. 157.

'NOAH'S FLOOD.—The third Widkirk Pageant is entitled Processus Noe cum filiis. After Noah has lamented the sinfulness of the world, God is introduced, repenting that he had created mankind, instructing Noah how to build the ark, and blessing him and "his fry." Noah's wife is of a very quarrelsome disposition, and they have a contest in the commencement, in which both swear by the Virgin Mary: her complaint is, that her husband does no work for his family; and he soon afterwards sets about the Ark, which is completed on the spot in nomine patris, et filii et spiritus sancti. He then warns his wife of what is about to happen, and invites her on board:—

'"Noe. Raine as it is skill,*
Here must us abide grace;
Therefore wif, with good will,
Come into this place.
'"Uxor. Sir, for Jak not for Gill,
Will I turn my face,
Till I have on this hill
Spon a space
On my rok.
Well were he might get me·
Now will I downe set me,
Yet reede I no man let me,†
For drede of a knok.
'"Noe. Behold to the heven.
The cataractes all
They are open, full even
Grete and small;
And the planets seven
Left has their stall.
Thise thoners and levin‡
Down gar ‖ fall
Full stout,
Both halls and bowers,
Castels and towers. §
Full sharpe are thise showers
That renys ¶ about;
Wherfore wife have done,
Come into the ship fast.
'"Uxor. Yei, Noe, go clout thy shone,
The better will thai last."

'The wives of their sons intercede in vain, and Noah is at last obliged to threaten his wife with the whip.

'"Noe. In fayth, for your long tarrying
You shall lyk on the whip.
'"Uxor. Spare me not, I pray thee;
But even, as thou thynk
Thise grete words shall not flay me.
'"Noe. Abide dame, and drynk
For betyn shalt thou be:
Are strokes good, say me?"

'They then begin a new conflict, the wife not taking her castigation at all patiently; she gets the worst of it, and wishes her own husband dead, and the same good luck to all the wives among the spectators: Noah, on the other hand, warns all husbands to chastise their wives before they become too headstrong. The matter is accorded to the intervention of the sons, and ultimately they all go on board: three hundred and fifty days are said to pass while Noah and his family are conversing in the rain. A raven, and then a dove, are sent out, and the play ends with the debarkation from the ark.'—P. 161.

* As it is fit.
† Yet I advise no man to hinder me.
‡ Thunders and lightning.
‖ Make.
§ 'Noah's description of the falling flood is by no means unpoetical:—"Behold the heavens! All the cataracts, both great and small, are open, and the seven planets have quitted their stations. Thunders and lightenings strike down the strong halls and bowers, castles and towers."
¶ Runs.

[To be concluded on Saturday.]

God, and the good, know to forgive, and save.—Ben Jonson

SPANISH DILIGENCES.—The Spanish Diligences are the best in the world; they are extremely commodious, well cushioned and well hung, and are admirably contrived for the exclusion of both heat and cold. Like the French diligences, they have a coupé, in all respects as good as a post-chaise, and generally they have no rotonde; they are drawn by seven, eight, or nine mules, according to the nature of the road, and travel at the rate of seven miles an hour. The conductors are remarkably civil; and in punctuality as to the hours of departure and arrival, and in every arrangement that can conduce to the comfort of the passengers, there is no room for improvement. When a passenger secures his seat, he receives a paper from the bureau, specifying the precise place he is to occupy; and when he delivers his baggage, he is presented with a receipt for the articles delivered, and for which the proprietors are responsible. The price of places in the Spanish diligences varies greatly.—Spain in 1830.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

[KING'S THEATRE.—A dramatic and musical entertainment, under the superintendence of Signor Pistrucci and Mr Wigley, took place in the Concert-room of this theatre on Monday evening. It was exceedingly well attended. The performance commenced with Pellico's Italian tragedy, entitled Eufemio di Messina, which was extremely well represented. Signor Pistrucci gave some specimens of his powers as an improvisatore, which afforded considerable amusement. The topic suggested was Punchinello, and he showed great readiness and comic power.—Daily Paper.

— Paganini is engaged to perform before their Majesties at the Queen's concert on Friday. There is a rumour afloat about the Opera-house, that Paganini has already lost his heart, and offered his hand to the lady who stole it. She is said to be a pupil of Signor De Begnis, and in her 16th year.—Globe.

— A letter from Paganini to a German professor gives an account of the profits of this celebrated violinist in the year 1829. At Vienna, 3,250*l*.; at Prague, 580*l*.; at Milan, 1,250*l*.; at Bologna, 1,300*l*.; and at Genoa, 1,150*l*. There are many people (des gens) who would be contented with his profits at Genoa (de Genes).—Furet de Londres.

— Some of the actors of the French Theatre talk of making a dramatic tour to Scotland after the close of the season. The management has already twice tried its fortune unsuccessfully in this part of Great Britain.—Furet de Londres.

THE PRIVILEGE OF THE FISHES.—The fishes of a pond complained that they were, more than their neighbours in other ponds, persecuted by the pikes. Whereupon an old pike, who was the judge of the pond, pronounced this sentence:—'That the defendants, to make amends, should in future, permit every year two common fishes to become pikes.'—Pestalozzi.

POLITICAL HOROSCOPE.—'This poor invalid will soon die,' said Joe,—'Oh, no,' replied Harry, 'there is not the slightest danger for his existence:'—and he rested his argument on the solidity of the constituent parts of the skeleton.—Pestalozzi.

LOVE OF BEAUTY, FINITE.—It is an ill band of affections to tie two hearts together by a little thread of red and white: and they can love no longer, but until the next ague comes; and they are fond of each other but at the chance of fancy, or the small-pox, or child-bearing, or care, or time, or anything that can destroy a pretty flower.—Jeremy Taylor.

ROYAL DIGNITY.—The favourite Queen presented herself to her husband, according to etiquette, wrapped round with a piece of native cloth, so long and broad that she was almost hidden under the folds, like a caterpillar beneath its web. To array herself in this unwieldy robe, the cloth had been spread out on the ground, when, beginning at one end, she threw her body across it, and rolled over and over, from side to side, till she had wound the whole round her. After she had shown herself thus apparelled in 'the presence,' her Majesty lay down again upon the floor, and unrolled the cloth, by reversing the process of clothing, she then gathered it up, and presented the bundle to the King.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

STARVATION IN IRELAND.—It has been suggested by a respectable cotemporary, among the modes by which considerable and easy additions might be made to the fund for the relief of the starving poor of Ireland, "that every Irish Bishop should be called upon, each individually, and separately, and formally by the Committee, for some distinct contribution. [The Bishop of Derry gave the sum of 25*l*.—about 3*s*. for every hundred pounds of his income!]—2. That the sum subscribed for a piece of plate to poor Queen Caroline, after the termination of the proceedings against her, and about which nothing has been since heard, should now be appropriated to this other cause, not less interesting to British humanity.—3. That the fund which was raised by subscription after the passing of the Catholic Bill, and called a fund for completing the "Wellington Testimonial," near Dublin, about which fund no more has since been heard (although we believe it amounted to 2 or 3,000*l*.) than of the "Queen Caroline Fund," should now be demanded by the subscribers, and applied to this sacred purpose of feeding the hungry poor.—If there be good sense or usefulness in any of the above suggestions, there is not a moment to be lost."—[We think the above suggestions admirable, and agree with the writer, that not a moment should be lost.]

ANCIENT COINS.—A few days ago, a labourer found three ancient silver coins, in a field near Armagh; they are now in the possession of Mr Corry. The oldest belongs to the Saxon King Athelstan, who ascended the throne of England in 925. In the centre of the obverse is a cross, and round it is inscribed Athelstan Rex Tot Brit—(Athelstan King of all Britain.) The reverse has also a cross in the centre, and the legend, Eliaf, Moneta Lund Civitt—(Eliaf, Mint-master of the City of London.) This King was the first in England who placed the title, 'King of all England,' on his coins, which he did in 928, after he defeated the Danes. The second coin belongs to Wolstan, Archbishop of York in 930, but cannot be easily deciphered. The third, and most curious, was minted for Anlaf, the Danish King of Northumberland; on the obverse, is the rude figure of a bird with the wings extended; it is supposed to be the raven, the well-known symbol of the Danes, and round it is Anlaf Cynyng; Anlaf King. The reverse has a small cross in the centre, and the legend, Athelward, Minetric, or Mint-master. This Anlaf was the son of Sitric, King of Northumberland; after his father's death he was driven out of the kingdom by Athelstan in 925; he came to Ireland, and having received assistance from the Irish, Welsh and Scotch, he invaded Northumberland in 938, and was defeated by Athelstan in the battle of Brunenburgh, fought in that year; he came back to Ireland, and in 942, when Edmond ascended the throne, aided by Olaus, King of Norway, he succeeded in obtaining possession of all that part of England which lay north of the great Roman road. The above coin, in all probability, was minted in that year. Having been obliged to lay heavy taxes on his subjects, to pay the King of Norway for the troops lent him, he lost their affections, and was obliged to fly the kingdom in 945. He was recalled by the Danes in 949, but did not treat his subjects better than before; he was finally expelled by them in 952, and came to Ireland, where it is believed he died.—Newry Examiner.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—The Chancery Suit—Napoleon Buonaparte.
HAYMARKET.—The Clandestine Marriage—The Widow Bewitched—The Review.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Le Ci-devant Jeune Homme—Le Chiffonnier—Les Anglaises pour Rire.

HAYMARKET.

THIS chearful, companionable theatre, where we see the actors as at the other end of a room, and where the heat itself becomes more endurable than at other houses, because the audience are prepared by the cheerfulness to make the best of it, opened for the season last night with the Clandestine Marriage and other entertainments, among which was a new farce, entitled The Widow Bewitched; or, Love at Fault.

We have criticised on a former occasion the Clandestine Marriage, and Mr FARREN'S Lord Ogleby. The new farce turns upon the stratagem of a gallant Colonel (Mr FARREN) for trying the fidelity and sentimentality of his young wife (Miss SYDNEY.) The Colonel, who is twenty years older than the lady, has been in the wars in India. He has been absent some time, we know not how long, but long enough to make the interval formidable to his elderly imagination; and so in order to give the lady a few additional reasons for disliking him, in case she has acquired any (for her's is the tenderest of unequal matches) he first has intelligence given her of his decease, and then claps a patch on his eye, and a stick under his left leg, and introduces himself to her as Major Jones, the bosom friend of his late self. The lady receives him in such a manner as to convince him that she is as faithful and as sentimental as ever; for in the course of their conversation respecting the deceased, she goes down on her knees in the ardour of describing how she used to beg his pardon when she had been giddy, and the Major in a transport of delight resumes the Colonel a little too hastily, for, without explaining himself,, he clasps her in his arms. The paragon of young widows is highly offended, and to his exceeding delight, forbids him the house. Still he does not explain himself, and this gets him into a scrape with the lady's brother (VINING) of whose existence (we know not why) he is ignorant, and who acting the part of husband in the house, is found by him sitting over a luncheon of hock and fowl, and puts him in a paroxysm of jealousy. A scene is taking place in consequence, when the lady comes in, and having found out from the landlord of the inn where he put up who the Major is, gives the cue to her brother, who agrees to join her in punishing him. They accordingly cut jokes on his wooden leg, make love to one another, waltz, run against him, and perform other intolerable vagaries, till the poor Colonel's feelings are wound up to the highest pitch of exasperation, and he bursts out with an explanation. He thinks fit however to apologise to the supposed new husband for having abused him under the circumstances, then renounces the giddy lady, and is going to make his exit, when the latter recalls him, and the truth is made known. The scene of the kneeling, which was made too serious in the first instance, is prettily repeated; the Colonel, an enraptured penitent, takes his generous girl in his arms; and the male sex among the audience are thus dismissed with an intimation, that they deserve to have the best, handsomest, and youngest wives possible, even though they should make the most ungenerous and lying experiments upon the poor womens' generosity and truth. This, of course, is not the author's intention; but a moral does not stop just where an author pleases; and such is the final amount of his intended rebuke to old Colonels. He justly rebukes the assumption implied in a trick of this sort; but the very supposition that a man who practised it could afterwards be endurable, shews that habit of assumption on the part of the 'unfair sex,' which pervades their whole treatment of women, and shews that they have yet got to travel a great way before they get out of their barbarisms in that matter.

The plot of this farce, it will be observed, is founded upon that of The Deuce is in him; nor is the comparison to its advantage, for it is not managed with equal address. The graver parts are pushed too far, and border too much on the tragic. It is not deficient, however, in sprightliness and situation, and by the help of FARREN's and VINING's acting (the latter of whom we were glad to see again) will probably run a little while. There is an air of natural good-humour and cordiality in VINING, which we always liked; and he has diminished, we observe, his tendency to make too many comments with nods of the head; which was a help to effect, that spoiled a better one.

Digitized by Google

There was a little bit of a Corporal Trim part for WEBSTER, but too little to require notice.

Miss SYDNEY, who acted the lady, came from the establishment of Madame VESTRIS, and we understand has been much paragraphed in the newspapers, as having been—we must not say a bone of contention, but a pretty piece of flesh and blood of contention,—between divers houses. These flourishes of trumpets are a pity. If an actress is really calculated to make a sensation, she does not want them: and if she is not, they injure her before long. We have little recollection of Miss SYDNEY at the Olympic; but what little we have is, we believe, favourable. She does not want promise, especially in her mode of suddenly answering a question, or putting one; which was sometimes very natural and off-hand. And there is a smartness in her general manner; a little elaborate, perhaps; but that may have been owing to her new first appearance. As a singer, however, we should not augur much from the song she sang last night, accompanied by herself on the piano. The accompaniment, or rather prelude, for there was little enough of the other, was well enough, and just what a young lady might have been expected to do, who plays the piano-forte; but her voice was thin and not very melodious, and there was too much of the piano and the forte—the mere loud and soft—in her singing. Miss SYDNEY has a trim waist, and a piquant carriage with her; and being of the old Colonel's mind in those matters, we need not add that we wish her well.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

For the Benefit of Mr Wilson.

The Grand Opera of

THE MAID OF JUDAH; OR, THE KNIGHTS' TEMPLARS.

The whole arranged and adapted to the English Stage, by M. R. LACY.

The Music by Rossini.

Saxons.—Cedric, Mr Morley. Ivanhoe, Mr Wilson. Wamba, Mr Keeley.
Gurth, Mr Farley. Robin Hood, Mr Baker. Little John, Mr Jones.
Friar Tuck, Mr Bartley.
Normans.—Sir Lucas de Beaumanoir, Mr Evans.
Sir Brian de Boisguilbert, Mr Warde. Sir Maurice de Bracey, Mr G. Stansbury.
Albert de Malvoisin, Mr Henry. Damian, Mr Holl. Herald, Mr Irwin.
Warder, Mr Turnour.
Jews.—Rebecca, Miss Inverarity. Isaac, Mr Egerton.

In the course of the Evening, a Variety of VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

To conclude with the Musical Farce of

THE HIGHLAND REEL.

[By O'KEEFE.]

Moggy M'Gilpin, Miss Taylor. Jenny, Miss Hughes.
M'Gilpin, Mr Blanchard. Sandy, Mr Wilson. Shelty, Mr Keeley.
Charlie, Mr Henry. Captain Dash, Mr Baker.
Serjeant Jack, Mr G. Stansbury. Laird of Raasy, Mr Turnour.
Croudy, Mr Evans. Apie, Mr Heath. Benin, Master Harvey.

To-morrow, The Exquisites; The Hunter of the Alps; and The Waterman.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Comedy of

THE WAY TO KEEP HIM.

[By Mr MURPHY.]

The Widow Belmour, by A Lady. Mrs Lovemore, Mrs Faucit.
Muslin, Mrs Tayleure. Mignionet, Miss J. Scott. Lady Constant, Mrs Ashton.
Furnish, Mrs Coveney. Maid, Miss Barnett.
Sir Bashful Constant, Mr W. Farren. Lovemore, Mr Cooper.
Sir Brilliant Fashion, Mr Vining.
William, Mr W. Johnson. Sideboard, Mr Coveney.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney, Mrs Coveney, Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of

KILLING NO MURDER.

[By Mr HOOK.]

Mrs Watchett, Mrs Tayleure. Nancy, Miss J. Scott. Fanny, Mrs T. Hill.
Buskin, Mr Harley. Sir Walton Wilton, Mr Gattie.
Bradford, Mr Coveney. Apollo Belvi, Mr Webster.
Tap, Mr Bishop. Servant, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Marriage of Figaro; Spring and Autumn; and other Entertainments.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Miss INVERARITY begs leave to announce that her BENEFIT will take place on TUESDAY next, the 21st June.

On which occasion Mr BRAHAM has kindly consented to perform.

The Performances will commence with the Comic Opera of LOVE IN A VILLAGE. Rosetta, (her first appearance in that character) Miss Inverarity; Madge, (for this Night only) Miss Taylor; Young Meadows, Mr Wilson; Hawthorn, Mr Braham. A favorite Solo on the Flute, by Mr Nicholson, and a Fantasia on the Violin, by Mr Murray. In the course of the Evening, the following Vocal Entertainments: 'Whence can you inherit,' 'My Heart's my own, my Will is free,' Miss Inverarity; 'There was a Jolly Miller once,' 'We all love a pretty Girl under the Rose,' 'Friend of my Soul,' (the Poetry by T. Moore, Esq.) Mr Braham; 'Tyrant, soon I'll burst thy Chains,' Miss Inverarity; 'If doughty deeds my Lady please,' (Composed by F. Dunn,) Mr Wilson; 'When thy Bosom,' Mr Braham and Miss Inverarity; 'There was a Golden Time,' (accompanied by himself on the Pianoforte) and 'The Bay of Biscay O,' Mr Braham. To conclude with a Melo-Drama called THE MILLER AND HIS MEN.

Tickets, Places, and Private Boxes to be had of Miss INVERARITY, 7 Buckingham street, Strand, and at the Box-Office, Hart street.

BEALE ON THE SPINE.

OBSERVATIONS ON DISTORTIONS OF THE SPINE AND LIMBS.

By LIONEL BEALE, Surgeon, Author of a Treatise on Deformities.

Published by J. WILSON, 16 Princes-street, Soho; price 5s.

"This production, if it contained nothing but the judicious advice for managing deformities of children's legs, ought to have a place in every medical library."—Medical and Surgical Journal.

"This book merits general perusal; Mr Beale's remarks on stays, tight lacing, &c. are excellent."

"The valuable practical remarks with which this work abounds shew that the author has paid peculiar attention to the causes, &c. of spinal distortions and deformities in general."—Gazette of Medicine.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL,

In Three Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—Songs, 'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—Songs, 'The Omnibus,' and 'The Country Concert.'

PART III.—Song, 'Thames Sailing Match.' Scena. Song, 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, the Drama, in Five Acts, entitled

VIRGINIUS! THE ROMAN FATHER.

Virginia, Miss Vincent. Servia, Miss M. C. Poole.
Appius Claudius, Mr D. Pitt. Caius Claudius, Mr Honner. Marcus, Mr Almar.
Virginius, Mr Osbaldiston. Dentatus, Mr Williams.
Icilius, Mr C. Hill. Numitorius, Mr Gough. Lucius, Mr Lee. Titus, Mr Webb.
Servius, Mr Rogers. Cneius, Mr Maitland. Publius, Mr Asbury.

To conclude with the Farce of

MONSIEUR TONSON.

[By Mr MONCRIEFF.]

Madame Belgarde, Madame Simon. Adolphine de Courcy, Miss Vincent.
Monsieur Morbleu, Mr C. Hill. Tom King, Mr Honner.
Jack Ardourly, Mr Maitland. Mr Thompson, Mr D. Pitt.
Rusty, Mr Webb. Useful, Mr Rogers. Nap, Mr Gough. Trap, Mr Asbury.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Diz. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lefeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Spltzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Aulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford.
Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with a Comic Interlude, in One Act, called

REFORMATION.

[By Mr BERNARD.]

Ellen Feelove, Miss Andrews. Mary Mayflower, Miss Forster.
Miss Matilda Manwayring, Mrs Garrick.
Mr Farringdon, Mr Munroe. Francis Feelove, Esq. Mr Porteus.
Sam Slap, Mr Marshall. Dick Dashington, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Mysterious Tailor.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Feats of Horsemanship — The Russian Courier—Lilliputian Napoleon—Vaulting—Mr J. Cooke's Exercises—Parisian Montrosities—The Flying Gymnasiast—Mr Wells's Performances — The Youthful Roscius — Greek Flag Dance—Dragon of Rhodes.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis—Black-eyed Susan—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Pilot.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Outlaw's Oath—The Miser of Madrid—The English Paganini—Frozen Hand.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Jane Shore—A Pill for Portugal—Orphan of Hindostan.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 246.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17, 1831.

PROPOSED NEW SCRIPTURAL STATE OF SOCIETY.*

THIS curious little pamphlet is a singular mixture of good sense and simplicity;—of universality and literal-mindedness. The Kingdom of Christ, in our author's opinion (and in the most enlarged sense of the phrase we agree with him), is that improved state of society to which things are now tending. He endeavours to shew what is wanting to its completion; and speaks of the necessary changes, and their immediate feasibility, as he would of opening a window to admit the fresh air. Great changes do undoubtedly come sometimes in an easier and quicker manner than the world looks for, as late events have edified it by shewing; but individuals, however strong their will, cannot obtain their sudden and triumphant termination by fixing men's minds upon any particular doctrine, or means of change, the letter of which they feel instinctively forced to give up at the very outset.

'As Society (says our author) makes fresh steps in improvement, the Gospel meets the demands of Society, by discovering itself under improved aspects: and the superstition and bigotry with which an imperfect view of its nature and design once invested it, pass away when that view becomes more perfect by the gradual development of God's designs in the moral government of the earth. Society is undergoing changes and modifications perpetually. . . . . But as there is a Governor of the world, so there is a certain destination to which that Governor has appointed that Society should arrive, both as to its moral and temporal condition. And as there is a certain destination which that Governor has appointed, so there is a certain revelation of the will of that Governor, with reference to that destination; and this will is called the Word of God. The Word of God then teaches us to look forward to a state of Society which shall supersede all other states of Society that have ever existed since the world began. It declares to us, with an authority which none can controvert, that the "kingdom of God,"—"the kingdom of Christ,"—"the kingdom of Heaven," names which this state of Society bears, from its transcendant excellence,—shall break in pieces and swallow up all other kingdoms. . . . . No other weapon than God's spirit—the conviction which God shall superinduce upon men's minds, of the excellence, and fitness, and expediency of this kingdom, as calculated to meet all the moral, intellectual and temporal demands and necessities of the age in which it shall be produced, shall be employed in its realization. The exigencies of the age then in which we live, do call for such a sweeping reform in the administration of the affairs of nations, that nothing short of a complete dissolution and reorganization of the old systems of Government, can satisfy these exigencies. The time is now fast arriving, when men will neither require, nor will they wear those trammels and restraints which the presumption of power has so long imposed upon them to little or no purpose but the degradation of their moral and intellectual dignity.'

In the same strong language the author proposes the doing away with 'all authority and power,' with 'all civil or ecclesiastical usurpation,' with war and violence; and he speaks of these things as to be done with a wish:—next Friday, for example.

'Let men but remove the scaffolding of civil government, the kingdom of Christ is already formed. What are the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, but the deacons of the ancient church attending to its temporalities?—and what the parish minister, but the angel, bishop, presbyter, or elder of the ancient church, were he elected by the free suffrage of the congregation? Wherever there is a congregation and edifice for public worship, let that be an independent government for the settling of all private causes, &c.'

To say nothing of the probable duration of peace and harmony, we should fear that this close connection with the church would but ill ensure a freedom from ecclesiastical usurpation. But the worst of it is what the author does not appear to perceive, the difficulty of abolishing the civil government. It so happens that we cannot unite the heads of all the dignitaries into one, with one wish, and chop it off with another. There is no violence to be used, and if we should politely invite the King, Lords, and Commons to come and be hanged in a gentle manner, they might, like Barnardine, reply 'I will not die to-day, by any man's persuasion.'—What then is to be done? If we invite them merely to step out of office, and become private individuals of the several congregations, it is not improbable but they might decline the invitation.

There is a great deal of truth about governments in the following startling passage; but does our author think that if governments by 'Parishes' were to take place tomorrow, there would be no jealousies among them? And as to violence and bloodshed, does he forget that Robespierre's government was the government of a Parish? We grant that men, by and by, will see the feasibility of governing themselves in a better manner than has hitherto been done; and that small divisions of the community will have a great deal more to do with the matter than they have now; but this is not to be effected at a jerk, like the unsettlement of a tyrant. You may shake off an oppression, sooner than acquire a good habit; though unquestionably the getting rid of the one is a vast help to the growth of the other.

'Men are not kept together by law and government so much as by their mutual interests or a sense of expediency. A sense of decency, of propriety, of honour, controls their interests. The higher tone of religion regulates that sense of decency, of propriety, and of honour. Law and government require more often to be checked by the subjects for whom their provisions are intended, than the subjects require to be checked by them. The customs too, and habits of society, are always more powerful than the laws, and will hold men together when the laws will not, for the laws are generally made against the customs and habits of society to supply their deficiencies. A dissolution of the government, therefore, need never be a dissolution of society. Were all the governments of Christendom abolished at a stroke to-morrow, such an excision might be nothing more than an abolition of so much taxes, and so much useless expenditure. There would be no occasion for the creation of any fresh forms of government, when, as men are now organized in Christendom, there are already sufficient materials in the local authorities of its parishes, or in the separate congregations of its parishes, for all the purposes of government. The Kingdom of the Parishes, or the Kingdom of the Congregations, without either army or navy, and with its local tribunals of the parish churches for their parliaments, would be a much more economical and efficient kingdom than any kingdom in existence. And what have law and government done? Perplexed society, both in its internal and foreign relations—plunged the world in bloodshed—sat like an incubus upon its resources—meddled in matters which would have "worked" best when left alone to themselves—very often justified iniquity and oppression—perverted justice—and divided states by the intestine jealousies which they have created. It is the natural dependence of man on man, increasing with the descent of the scale in the successive grades of society, which binds them together more efficaciously than laws or governments. Those who compose the lowest grade of society are most interested in preserving its peace, as any little derangement of its mechanism may throw them out of a participation of its resources, through the precarious tenure by which they hang on to the system. It is the impression which they receive from their more independent superiors, which more often drives them to rebellion than any agitating cause of their own creation. It is the rulers of the earth, who have been more prone to "destroy the earth," than that collection of men, whom their oppression or restless ambition have roused into existence, which are generally designated by The Mob. The kingdom of Christ, or that new state of society which the divine mind of our Lord Jesus Christ contemplated, will remove all the causes which tend to disturb the general peace of the world. It will not indeed abolish the orders of kings and priests, it will extend these dignities to every one. It will not make laws nugatory, it will establish them the more by engrafting them in men's hearts. A congregational resolution, which its subjects have made themselves, will be more binding on their consciences and conduct, than any laws which have been made for them by others, when enforced by all the terrors of the civil sword. And if a man "neglect to hear the congregation," when society is so constituted, "let him be a heathen or a publican," and he will so hate himself, that like Judas, he will perform the work of capital punishment himself.'

The conclusion here made respecting Judas, is a little hard upon Judases. Why should there be such men in the 'New State of Society?' Or if such, why should they be forced to

* Outlines of a Plan for the Formation of a New State of Society, on the Doctrines and Principles of Christ's Kingdom, as laid down by our Divine Master, in the Word of God. 8vo. pp. 14. Hunter.

Digitized by Google

hang themselves, instead of being encouraged to know better? There seems a lurking 'violence' of some sort in a disputant, when men are congratulated on the prospect of seeing a fellow-creature saving them the trouble of executing violence upon him, by doing it himself! In short, we agree in praying with our author that the 'kingdom of heaven' may 'come,' but we object, that he reads the meaning of it too narrowly. He forgets that the best nut may have had a husk with it, the retention of which is not at all necessary to the enjoyment of the kernel; and also, that a best nut does not imply that there may have not been a hundred others, all good of their kind, and convertible into the same sweet blood which the other is to perfect.

The author is not altogether unprepared for some little opposition; but as he is firm in his position that there is to be no physical violence, we must wait until the people have learned how to 'remove the scaffolding' without it. That time and knowledge may ultimately effect this, and sooner than is suspected, we think not only possible, but in the inevitable course of things. Meanwhile, we may improve upon the author's view of the New State of Society, so as to render it more durable, without being less just, or less benevolent. We recommend the reader who takes an interest in the advancement of human good, to read the pamphlet itself, or at least the first ten pages. The writer appears to be an honest man; and much of the language he utters is itself an evidence of the progress of which he speaks. The rest will shew, that he has also his proportion of defect the other way. He thinks he has advanced more than he has.

MR JAMES'S NEW NOVEL.*

THERE is much talent in the present volumes, but little interest. It is dangerous to attempt engrafting a serious fictitious interest upon historic characters: the truth of one part destroys the illusion of the other. The struggle of kings and princes for power and conquest are ceasing every day to awaken sympathy; and when we see Philip so flattered, that his very vices are elevated into virtues, when we see his pride and love of power veiled over with a pretence of conjugal affection, we cannot lend ourselves to the deceit. Had Mr James placed two fictitious characters in the situation of Philip and Agnes, their sorrows would have drawn tears from our eyes. As it is, all the interest of the work is concentrated in Agnes, whose frank, true, and generous love (borne out by history, for it is understood that she died of grief, at being separated from her husband) led us to pity her that she had bestowed it on a king. The portraiture of this charming woman made us regret that the author said so little of Isadora, who is scarcely anything but an oft-repeated name. We have all the dramatis personæ of chivalry—brave knights, damsels in distress, sturdy squires, a faithful gallant, and gallant page, and—what we suspect to be the author's favourite character—a juggler, whose mind having become twisted by the deformity of his nose, assumes a mask of folly to conceal his knavery, and, by the exercise of its mischievous propensities, influences the fate of thousands. One good lesson may be found in these volumes:—that the poor contemned vassals have, indirectly, no less power over the destinies of the rich, than the rich have over theirs; and are therefore not to be scorned and trampled upon with impunity. The work gives us, no doubt, a faithful picture of the manners of the times, but we cannot acquiesce in Mr James's opinion, that it is his best. We do not think it equal to 'Darnley' or 'Richelieu.' We have no room for any extracts that could be given with advantage, with the exception of the following note:—

'The only titles of honour known in those days were, Monseigneur, My Lord; Illustres Seigneurs, applied in general to an assembly of Nobles; and Beau Sire, or Fair Sire, which was not only bestowed upon Kings, on all occasions, but even as lately as the reign of St Louis was addressed to God himself. Many prayers beginning "Beau Sire Dieu" are still extant.'

Though, from a want of familiarity, it seems more irreverend, it is not really more so than the same use of the word Lord. In the present volumes, the expression "the Lord King" is repeatedly used, as if in direct imitation of the Lord God. We never read of these strange analogies, but we think of the never-to-be-too-often-repeated opinion of the clergyman respecting the last moments of James I; namely, that the King was so pious, there seemed to be a considerable intercourse going on "between their Divine and Human Majesties."

* Philip Augustus; or the Brothers in Arms. By the Author of Darnley, De L'Orme, &c. 3 vols. 12mo. Colburn and Bentley.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND MR ALLEN.*

THE author of the pamphlet mentioned below, who appears a well-meaning man, not wanting in perseverance, speaks in strong terms of the evil tendency of a general pauperism of the married peasantry; and proposes, that instead of relief from the parish, every industrious man should be furnished, on his marriage, with a cottage, and such a portion of land as, with the aid of his wife, he might cultivate without interfering with his regular daily labours. He asserts that the expense would be less than is now expended in poor's-rates; and makes answer to the anticipated objections of the Malthusians. The author does not appear to be a man of education, but he has good sense and kind feelings; and if his phrases sometimes appear a little high-flown, his motives are evidently not selfish ones. The plan was first proposed, by letter, to the Duke of Wellington, who not only did not promote it, but seems to have thought that the mere publication of the letter would be a mischievous proceeding. His Grace first refused his assent to the publication, on the plea that assent would imply approbation; but when the author informed him that he should publish it without his assent, and with his reply annexed, the Duke peremptorily forbade so enormous a committal of his opinions.

'The Duke positively refuses his consent to Mr Allen's publishing anything written by him If Mr Allen publishes, notwithstanding this prohibition, the Duke will take the steps upon the subject which he may be advised to take.'

Such is the Duke's answer to Mr Allen's last letter. If his Grace's admirers be judicious, we suspect they will advise him to take any step, rather than the one which points to the house of his Grace's attorney. Public men should write nothing on public subjects, which could not endure and even court publicity. And as to dignity, if dignity is consulted by answering every one who writes a letter, it is no less consulted by letting the world see that everybody is worth answering. The world is in progress towards the inevitable arrival of that time, when every man will have what the author of this pamphlet desires, or at least its equivalent; and the Duke, by his opinions on Reform, has rendered it, unfortunately, of little consequence, what he thinks on the matter.

* A Plan for Benefiting the Agricultural Labourers. 8vo. pp. 45. Effingham Wilson.

SIDDONIANA.

When Mrs Siddons visited Dr Johnson, he paid her two or three very elegant compliments. When she retired, he said to Dr Glover, 'Sir, she is a prodigiously fine woman.' 'Yes,' replied Dr Glover, 'but don't you think she is much finer on the stage, when she is adorned by art?'—'Sir,' said Dr Johnson, 'on the stage art does not adorn her; nature adorns her there, and art glorifies her.'

'Mrs Siddons,' said Lord Byron, 'was the beau ideal of acting; Miss O'Neill I would not go to see for fear of weakening the impression made by the Queen of Tragedians. When I read Lady Macbeth's part, I have Mrs Siddons before me; and imagination even supplies her voice, whose tones were superhuman, and power over the heart supernatural.'

Sir Joshua Reynolds never marked his name on his pictures, except in the instance of Mrs Siddons's portrait as the Tragic Muse, when he wrote his name upon the hem of her garment. When Mrs Siddons first saw the picture in its finished state, she went near to examine the pattern of this, which appeared to be a curious classic embroidery, such being, at that time, much in fashion, and she then perceived it contained his name; when making the remark to Sir Joshua, who was present, he very politely said, 'I could not lose the honour this opportunity offered to me for my name going down to posterity on the hem of your garment.'

'At Calais,' says Kelly, in his Reminiscences, 'we went to Dessein's, made an excellent dinner, and passed the night there. We took our route the next morning for Lisle, and got to dinner at St Omer. At the hotel where we dined, the landlady told us that Madame la grand actrice Anglaise Siddons had just dined, and quitted the house not more than a quarter of an hour before our arrival. I asked the landlady what she thought of Mrs Siddons? She said she "thought her a fine woman, and thought she made it her study to appear like a Frenchwoman; but," added the landlady, "she has yet much to learn before she arrives at the dignity and grace of one." After this speech I could find nothing palatable in her house.'

Mrs Siddons was less taciturn in private society than is generally imagined by those who had infrequent opportunities of seeing her. She sung many simple ballads with infinite taste; and, when in very limited society, she introduced a peculiarly dry humour into those amusing trifles. On one occasion, at the house of her late brother, Mr John Kemble, the writer of this remembers Mrs Siddons singing Sheridan's ballad of 'Billy Taylor' with irresistible drollery.

Digitized by Google

FUNERAL OF MRS SIDDONS.—On Wednesday morning, at the early hour of nine o'clock, there was an immense assemblage of persons of all ranks in Upper Baker street, Regent's park, to witness the funeral of this celebrated actress. About ten o'clock the hearse and mourning coaches began to assemble at Mr Harris's, the Globe, corner of the New road and Baker street. At half-past ten o'clock the signal was given for the mournful procession to move. The coffin, which had a covering of rich purple velvet, was placed in a hearse drawn by four horses, followed by two mourning coaches and four, containing the relatives of the deceased lady; afterwards fourteen mourning-coaches, drawn by two horses, each coach containing four gentlemen mourners belonging to the theatres; two gentlemen's carriages brought up the procession. The cavalcade proceeded along the Park road, Regent's park, up the Alpha road, through Prince's street, to Paddington Church, where, after the funeral rites had been performed, the body was deposited in a vault at a quarter before twelve o'clock. The immense number of persons assembled to witness the funeral could not be less than 5,000.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— An arrangement has been entered into by Mr Young, with the proprietors of Covent-Garden Theatre, for the purpose of repeating a certain number of his most popular characters, previous to his taking his final leave of the stage.

— Madame Vestris, now in Dublin, has kindly offered her services in any dramatic entertainment which may be performed for the benefit of the famishing Irish.

— A worthy Churchwarden of Canterbury, a few days since, excused himself by note from a dinner party, by alleging that he was 'engaged in taking the senses of his parish.'

— A tailor, who, like many of his fraternity, was an habitual drunkard, alleged, by way of excuse, that he found it good for a stitch in his side.

— The Princess of Salms has published a poem, entitled, 'An Epistle to absolute Monarchs,' which is full of the spirit of liberty; and, considering that the Princess moves among the circles to which she addresses her epistle, it is one of the most extraordinary among the recent and present proofs of that fellowship which the governing party think it their interest to feel or affect for the people.—Evening Paper.

SPLENDID DONATION.—As good deeds ought to be known and justly appreciated, and as some confusion has arisen in names, it may not be unacceptable to the public to be informed, that the Lady who has so bountifully given 4,000*l.* to the suffering Irish, is Mrs Palmer, who has 30,00*l.* a year in Mayo, the mother-in law of Mr W. Mackinnon, M.P. for Lymington.

GRANDILOQUENT.—The following specimen of the anti-climax, is from a Mobile (Alabama) paper of May 3; and commences thus, viz.:—'All hail!—Sunday morning, at about four o'clock, one of the prettiest storms ever exhibited in Mobile was witnessed. The wind blew from the northwest, like the last trump. Lightning decorated the mantle of night with golden chains, and unrolled and spread out all over the earth, her sheets of fire. Hail fell—sparkling in the light—like diamonds from the clouds—and about as big as a piece of chalk!—New York Gazette.

'ENTICEMENT.'—The editor of the National Gazette ends an elaborate definition of the above word with the following authority. It is comprised in an anecdote of a sailor, who giving his testimony in a Boston Court, about an assault and battery, stated that Jack (the traverser) had powerfully enticed Sam (the complainant). Jack's Counsel asked him to explain what he meant by the word entice. 'What do I mean, Sir?' said the honest tar. 'Why, Sir, I mean this—Jack took a devilish big handspike, and drove it plump in Sam's back; that's what I calls enticing.'—New York Gazette.

FLYING FISH.—This fish has many enemies in both elements, rapacious fishes and birds of prey. Our mate told us that he once saw a man-of-war eagle—an albatross (diamedea exulans)—pounce downward upon a flying fish, while at the same instant a thunny, or albicore, sprang from below to seize it. Neither seemed to see the other, and so eagerly did they aim at their common prey, that the thunny's head bolted into the open beak of the albatross. The latter struggled hard to carry off its unexpected prize, which, however, proved too weighty, and fell back into the water. Meanwhile the flying-fish escaped with life from both the deaths that threatened it.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

A STRANGE VOICE.—The mate on duty ordered some of the youths to reef the main-topsail. When the first got up, he heard a strange voice saying, 'It blows hard.' The lad waited for no more; he was down in a trice, and telling his adventure. A second immediately ascended, laughing at the folly of his companion; but returned even more quickly, declaring that he was quite sure that a voice, not of this world, had cried in his ear, 'It blows hard.' Another went, and another; but each came back with the same tale. At length the mate, having sent up the whole watch, ran up the shrouds himself, and when he reached the haunted spot, heard the dreadful words distinctly uttered in his ears,—'It blows hard.' 'Aye, aye, old one, but blow it ever so hard, we must ease the earings for all that,' replied the mate undauntedly; and, looking round, he espied a fine parrot perched on one of the clues, the thoughtless author of all the false alarms, which had probably escaped from some other vessel, but had not previously been discovered to have taken refuge on this.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

The Court's a school, indeed, in which some few
Learn virtuous principles; but most forget
Whatever they brought thither good and honest.
Trifling is there in practice; serious actions
Are obsolete and out of use. Custom of the Country.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—The Maid of Judah—The Highland Reel.
HAYMARKET.—The Way to Keep Him—The Widow Bewitched—Killing No Murder.

HAYMARKET.

A LADY made her first appearance on the stage last night, as the Widow Belmour in the pleasant, easy comedy of the Way to Keep Him. We did not see her, however, in the most trying scene of this not very trying part, and would rather postpone our judgment till another time. FARREN performed admirably in Sir Bashful Constant, particularly in the scene of the buckles with Sir Brilliant, and the other where he observes his wife reading the letter, and works himself up into an extasy of suspense. There is no man like FARREN for winding up a feeling of this kind to its height, till he topples over in a paroxysm of incapability.

FRENCH PLAYS AT THE ADELPHI.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—The audience at the Adelphi Theatre, on Wednesday evening, was not a full, but it was a merry one. More visitors might have made the proprietors merrier, and possibly the actors; but the adage would scarcely have applied before the curtain. During the first and last piece, there was a continued rippling of small laughter, that was worth going to hear, for its own sake. It is seldom we hear the English so lively; yet the audience had nevertheless an English aspect in other respects. But how is it that an actor like POTIER does not fill the house? I acknowledge it might render it somewhat warmer, yet I should like to see justice done to his talents. I believe the truth is, that the French company did not "draw" at the Adelphi before. The theatre is not a convenient one. The lower front boxes, and the stalls, are the only places really comfortable. There is a sort of dungeon behind the former, where the vapour bath may be taken without extra expense; and above, seats, having neither backs nor cushions, and being inconveniently distant from the high front which it is necessary to peer over to see the stage, are by no means inviting to ladies. Gentlemen, too, have no objection to be at their ease at a place of entertainment. The gallery is considered as an upper tier of boxes, and the admissions are charged accordingly, without any correspondent accommodation. Now, whatever name the French management may choose to give it, the English well know that it is a gallery. Box visitors are not disposed to sit there; gallery visitors are not disposed to pay so much for admission. The consequence is, that it is all but empty. I was rather surprised to see the pit so well occupied, for the screens which divide it from the stalls are somewhat aristocratic. In short, Mr TATLER, to begin with the Manager,—I think he has made some great mistakes. And now to speak of the hero of the Adelphi Nights. The first was a short piece in one act, called Le Ci-devant Jeune Homme, in which he played a kind of French Lord Ogleby to admiration. Nothing could have been better than the manner in which he reconciled the feebleness of age, with the wilful indolence of a fashionable lounge, and gave to the physical exhaustion consequent upon undue exertion, at his time of life, the air of a languor resulting from youthful dissipation. One step more, and the youth would have appeared too real;—one step less, and the acting would have been imperfect. In the second piece, Le Chiffonier, his character is a serious one. A young advocate having, by the examination of certain documents, discovered that a merchant of the name of Francval had been unjustly implicated in a charge of fraud, by which he had lost both his reputation and his property, voluntarily undertakes to plead his cause in court, and succeeds in reversing the sentence. It is after an interval of fifteen years, and the merchant is supposed to be dead. He is, however, close at hand in the disguise of a chiffonier, whose business it seems to be, to wander about at night, to seek and restore lost property. Under this disguise, he has opportunities of doing signal service to the young advocate, on whom he finally bestows his daughter, with a handsome fortune. The daughter, who has been placed under the care of an elderly woman in the father's confidence, maintains herself by her industry as an embroideress; and he, in the character of a friendly neighbour, occasionally undergoes the painful pleasure of seeing and conversing with her. On one occasion she sings a little ballad which relates his own history, concluding with the melancholy fact, that in consequence of the infamy attached to his name, he keeps himself concealed, and dares not even to embrace his own child. While the daughter sings this as a mere fiction, the father is deeply agitated;—the words haunt him, and presently he repeats the concluding lines;—she corrects him, and to set set him right, sings them again, when he breaks away from her in uncontrollable emotion. To describe the acting of M. POTIER in this character, I shall not attempt. It appeared to me liable to the old objection made against GARRICK,—that he only did just what any man so circumstanced would do. In the last piece (which I have seen before) I did not like M. POTIER so well as M. PERLET. Two of the characters in this piece disguise themselves as English ladies. PERLET and PELISSIE endeavoured to soften the voice, and really to imitate women; which is more consistent with their wish to deceive the old man, into whose house they are endeavouring to introduce themselves as lodgers, than the manly tones which POTIER and LA PORTE retain, in strong contrast with their dress and demeanour, which appeared feminine enough. It might be more comic perhaps—or rather, more farcical;—it was certainly less natural. From the front of the house M. LA PORTE, in his large hat and ringlets, looked not unlike Mrs ORGER. The resemblance was not very striking when the hat and ringlets were thrown off. My great amazement was, that he could for a moment have looked like a pretty woman. I speak of the face only; I do not mean to compare him with the lady in person or carriage. But I am running to great length. Farewell, Mr TATLER; you must be impatient to arrive at the signature.

Digitized by Google

Yours, truly,

A. A.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We thank SIWEL; but his communication hardly belongs to our journal.

We respect the zeal of AGIS, and the talents undoubtedly possessed by the author on whom he writes; but they were not manifested in their best way on the occasion referred to; and we think the author will be glad by and by, that the subject has been dropped.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

For the Benefit of Mr Abbott.

The Comedy of

THE EXQUISITES.

[By DON TELESFORO DE TRUEBA Y COSIO.]

Mrs Stockland, Mrs Gibbs. Harriet, Miss Nelson.
Lilian Evondale, Miss E. Tree. Kitty, Mrs Keeley.
Lord Castleton, Mr C. Kemble. Count Valmore, Mr G. Bennett.
Lord Belcourt, Mr Parry. Hon. Frank Cecil, Mr Abbott. Melton, Mr Wrench.
Gosling, Mr Keeley. Sir Benjamin Bonus, Mr Bartley.
Mr Stockland, Mr Egerton. Thornton, Mr Henry.
Timothy Oldstyle, Mr Blanchard. Strut, Mr Power.

In Act II, Madame Taglioni will dance the celebrated 'Tyrollienne,' from the Opera of 'Guillaume Tell,' and the admired 'Pas,' from 'La Bayadere.'

In the course of the Evening, Madame Pasta will sing 'Il soave e bel contento,' and a favourite Air.—'Should he upbraid,' by Miss Inverarity. And the Glee, 'My Father Land,' (from the 'Romance of a Day,') by Miss Harrington, Messrs Tett, Irwin, Benedict, and Sheriff.

After the Comedy, the Drama of

THE HUNTER OF THE ALPS.

Felix, Mr Abbott. Rosalvi, by a Gentleman.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of

THE WATERMAN.

[By Mr DIBDIN.]

Mrs Bundle, Mrs Tayleure. Wilhelmina, Miss Cawse.
Tom Tug, Mr Wilson, who will sing 'The Bay of Biscay O!'
Bundle, Mr Blanchard. Robin, Mr Keeley.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Opera of

THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.

Countess Almaviva, Miss Land. Susanna, Miss Wells.
Barbarina, Mrs T. Hill. Marcellina, Mrs Coveney.
Count Almaviva, Mr Vining. Antonio, Mr J. Cooper. Fiorello, Mr Huckel.
Figaro, Mr Harley. Cherubino, Mrs Humby. Basil, Mr Bishop.
Notary, Mr V. Webster. Sebastian, Mr Moore.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney, Mrs Coveney, Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Comedy of

SPRING AND AUTUMN; OR THE BRIDE AT FIFTY.

Mrs Rattle, Mrs W. Clifford. Clara, Mrs Ashton.
Mrs General Dartmouth, Mrs Glover.
Sir Simon Slack, Mr W. Farren. Major Osmond, Mr Brindal.
John, Mr Coveney. Rattle, Mr Cooper.

To-morrow, The Heir at Law; with Lodgings for Single Gentlemen; The Waterman; and The Widow Bewitched.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LES PLAIDEURS.

Comédie en Trois Actes, en Vers, de RACINE.

Isabelle, Mlle. Jamain. La Comtesse, Madame Baudin.
Dandin, M. Potier. Léandre, M. Alfred. L'Intimé, M. Laporte.
Chicaneau, M. Cloup. Petit Jean, M. Préval. Un Souffleur, M. Granville.

Suivie de

L'HOMME DE 60 ANS; OU, LA PETITE ENTETEE,

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. DARTOIS et SIMONIN.

Angélina, Mlle. St. Ange. Honorine, Madame Gamard.
L'Homme de 60 Ans, M. Potier. Eugène, M. Alfred. Bernard, M. Cloup.
Folleville, M. Paulin. François, M. Arnaud. Un Domestique, M. Granville.

On finira par

LE CUISINIER DE BUFFON,

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. MERLE, ROUGEMONT, et SIMONIN.

Gertrude, Madame Préval. Perrette, Mlle. Jamain.
Guénot, M. Potier. Bexon, M. Cloup. Pot-de-Vin, M. Preval.
Julien, M. Guenée. Un Domestique, M. Arnaud.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, a Romantic Drama, called

THE PROPHET OF THE MOOR.

[By Mr ALMAR.]

Catherine Gray, Miss Somerville Crazy Ruth, Miss M. C. Poole.
Honor Jeykel, Miss Jordan. Dame Hetty Horner, Miss Nicol.
Elkanah White, Mr Osbaldiston. Colonel Launce Leolyn, Mr C. Hill.
Ralph Gayton, Mr Williams. Hal Hardenbrass, Mr Honner.
Dwarf Stephen, or Stephen Poynet, Mr Almar. Haveril Horner, Mr Gough.
Master John Horner, Mr Vale. Oliver Brown, Mr Lee.
Goliah Goodbody, sen. Mr Asbury. Goliah Goodbody, jun. Master Frank Carbery.
Piers Talbot, Mr Edwin. Joey Stokes, Mr Rogers. Thomas Green, Mr Hobbs.

To conclude with the Musical Drama, in Two Acts, intitled

JOHN OF PARIS.

[By Mr POCOCK.]

Princess of Navarre, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'Should he upbraid.'
Olivia, Miss Vincent, in which she will introduce 'Smart young Bachelors.'
Rosa, Miss Nicol. John of Paris, Mr Osbaldiston.
Grand Chamberlain, Mr Williams. Pedrigo Potts, Mr Vale. Philip, Mr Ransford.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, intitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.

Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Asim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, of

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, (with the Original Song and Hornpipe) Mr Forrester.
The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Mysterious Tailor.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Enchanted Chair—Rob Roy—Minuet and Quadrille—Lubin and Annette—The Turkish Troops—Vaulting Evolutions—Pegasus—Harebell—Countess of Liliput—Corde Volante—Gambols—Cupid and Zephyr—The Turkish Defence—Fireworks.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis—Black-eyed Susan—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Pilot.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Outlaw's Oath—The Miser of Madrid—The English Paganini—Frozen Hand.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

THEATRE SANS SOUCI, LEICESTER SQUARE.—Love in Humble Life—Jocko—Reconciliations.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUS, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 33 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 247.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1831.

OLD ENGLISH STAGE.*

The fourth Widkirk pageant, which relates to the sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham, is of a strain so far superior to the two already noticed, that it appears as misplaced in their company, as a tender beauty among a set of alehouse buffoons. Mr Collier gives the following interesting analysis of it. It would be worth while to know the author, for it is written by a man of genius, and possesses genuine pathos.

'The father and son,' says Mr Collier, 'are accompanied on their way "forth of towne" by two boys and a jackass, whom before the sacrifice they leave behind. When Abraham is about to slay his son, Isaac exclaims:—

'" The shynyng of your bright blade
It gars me quake for ferde to dee.
'" Abraham. Therefore groflyng† thou shalt be layde;
Then when I stryke, thou shalt not se."

'In order to delay the fatal stroke, Abraham pretends that he has lost something, and turning away, says very tenderly:—

'" What water shotes in both myn eeyn!
I were lever than all worldly wyn,
That I had for hym onys unkynde
But no defawt I faund hym in.
I wold be dede for hym or fynde;
To slo hym thus I thynke grete syn."

'or, in other words,—"What water shoots into both mine eyes! I should have been more glad than of all worldly gain, if I had found him once unkind; but I never found him in fault. I would willingly die or endure suffering for him: to slay him thus I think a great sin."

'The Angel prevents the blow, but Abraham will not talk, even with the heavenly messenger, till he has released and kissed his son.

'The Chester play treats this story even more pathetically, and, as a contrast, it is opened with a comic prologue by a person who calls himself "Gobbet on the Greene." It ends thus:—

'" My name is Gobbet on the Greene,
With you I may no longer bene.
Farewell, my lordings, by dene,
For letting of your playe."

'The following is a part of the dialogue between Abraham and Isaac:—

'" Isaacke. Yf I have trespassed in any degree,
With a yarde you may beate me.
Put up your sworde, yf your wil be,
For I am but a chylde.
'" Abraham. Oh, my deare sone, I ame sorye
To doe to thee this greate anoye.
God's commaundement doe must I,
His workes are aye full mylde.
'" Isaacke. Woulde God, my mother were here with me,
She woulde kneele downe upon her knee
Prayinge you, father, yf yt might be,
For to save my life."

'Isaac expresses his readiness to submit to the will of God, and reminds Abraham that he has other sons at home whom he may love. Abraham "wrings his hands," and declares himself almost out of his senses for grief. Isaac on his knees asks his father's blessing, and requests him to hide his eyes, that he may not see the sword when it is raised to strike him. Abraham entreats him not to add to his agony, and calls upon Christ to have pity upon him. The stage direction at the close is: "Here let Abraham make a sygne, as though he would slaye and cut off his head with his sworde, then let the Angell come and take the sworde by the ende, and staye it."

'In the course of this piece we meet with the first mention of the Expositor (sometimes also called the Doctor), who makes several explanatory addresses to the audience. A messenger delivers an epilogue, in which he announces the subject of the next play.

'The Coventry Pageant, which relates, like those of Widkirk and Chester, solely to the sacrifice of Isaac, is much inferior. There is one natural touch in it, however, which deserves notice; during the whole day Abraham is dumb with grief at the comtemplation of the sacrifice he is compelled to make; and Isaac remarks, unconsciously and innocently,—

'" Fayre fadyr, ye go ryght stille;
I pray you, fadyr, speke unto me."'—Vol. II, p. 165.

We thank Mr Collier for the analysis of these Widkirk and Chester pieces, and for the quotation from the Coventry. All the touches of pathos, to which he points our attention, are of the right heart-felt order, and would not have been unworthy of Chaucer. Everybody who has any feeling, must recognize the truth and beauty of Abraham's expression about the tears coming into his eyes; of his wish that the boy had been sometimes unkind to him; of his remaining silent towards the angel, till he has released and kissed his son; of Isaac's telling him (in the Chester Pageant) that he might beat him if he had done anything wrong, but ought not to use a sword; of the poor boy's wish that his mother were present, to beg his life; of Abraham's wringing his hands, and declaring himself almost out of his senses for grief; Isaac asking his father's blessing, and then the father begging him 'not to add to his agony,' and calling 'upon Christ to have pity upon him.' The author of Lear and King John might have had 'the water shooting into his eyes' at the reading of passages like these.

We have been well acquainted with Christmas carols in our time, but do not remember the following pretty fancy, which Mr Collier tells us is to be found in a popular one. It is in a Coventry Pageant:—'Mary, seeing a cherry-tree, longs for some of the fruit; and Joseph tells her, that he who is the father of her child may procure it for her. The tree instantly bows down to her hand.'

The following is a specimen of the short work which Mr Collier makes of the dicta of the most assured of his predecessors:—

'Gifford designates the Vice, "the buffoon of the old Mysteries and Moralities," as if he had figured in the Miracle plays represented at Chester, Coventry, York, and elsewhere. Malone, also, in a passage before alluded to, speaks of him as the "constant attendant" of the Devil in "the ancient religious plays." Theobald, in a note on the words, "the formal Vice Iniquity" in Richard the Third, asserts that before the period of the Reformation, there was hardly an old play without a Devil and a Vice. The fact is, that the Vice was wholly unknown in our religious plays, which have hitherto gone by the name of Mysteries, and to which Gifford, Malone, and Theobald refer.' .... 'With regard to "Moralities," it is certainly true, that in the most ancient moral plays, characters of gross buffoonery and vicious propensities were inserted for the amusement and instruction of the audience; but although we hear of 'the fool' in Medwall's Interlude, performed before Henry VIII in 1516, such a character seems very rarely to have been specifically called "the Vice," anterior to the Reformation.'—P. 266.

[To be continued.]

* The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the time of Shakspeare: and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. By J. Payne Collier, Esq. F. S. A. Three vols. 8vo. Murray.

† Grovelling on his stomach.

DREADFUL FAMINE IN IRELAND.

The spectacle of indifference presented by the Nobility of the United Kingdom, at this present crisis of death and misery in the sister island, is perfectly disgusting. Our countrymen were angry with Bonaparte for calling them a 'shop-keeping nation.' The Nobility, we suppose, would not be angry (for nothing moves them) at being called a money-keeping Nobility; but such they are: and all the rich, as a body, are included in the designation. They have their tens of thousands a-year, their twenty thousands, their fifty thousands, their hundreds of thousands; and they deny themselves no luxury under the sun, not even that of keeping thousands in their strong boxes, while humanity wants a meal. Let no one hereafter talk of the generosity of the 'upper classes' in England.

A Correspondent of the Times recommended, the other day, that the 'Wellington Testimonial Fund' should be applied to the salvation of the poor starving Irish. A 'Member of the Committee' for that fund answers the letter, and says the recommendation could not be taken, because granting that every subscriber but one should sanction the measure, it would be in the power of that one 'to file a bill in Chancery, not merely for the recovery of his subscription, but to compel a specific performance of the object proposed when he paid his money.' This may be true, though it would not be very likely. But there is one person concerned, who could turn the fund to this beneficial object by a single word. Why does not the Duke of Wellington recommend it? He would raise himself a monument by the action, much nobler than any that the Fund could give him.

Digitized by Google

The following is something to the purpose. Another correspondent, in a style of striking brevity and feeling, writes to the Editor of the same paper:—

'Sir,—Our fellow-creatures in Ireland are starving.

'Cannot every individual give something?

'The population of London alone is 1,500,000. If every person would give only 6*d.*, 37,500*l.* would at once be collected, and yet not above half that sum has yet been raised. Let no one refuse to give something, be it but a penny. How many could save 1*d.* per day? and this done by each person in London, for one day, amounts to 6,250*l.* Let us all do our uttermost, and that instantly: delay is death to our fellow-creatures. C. J.'

Yes: think of this last sentence. A ball is announced for the 4th July, at Drury Lane theatre, for the relief of the starvers, and the King and Queen are to be there. This is very well: but what are the starvers to do in the mean time? A paragraph in the same paper informs us, that 'the average price of potatoes in Ireland is 2*d.* a stone (14lb.) that is, 3½lb. for a halfpenny, enough to support a man for a day; and yet this halfpenny cannot be had in Erris and other parts where famine rages.'

An inhabitant of Regent street, the other day, offered to keep a subscription-box in his shop-window, for the collection of passing charity. If the same generous person had time to procure the establishment of similar boxes in three or four different parts of the metropolis, and books were opened at each place for the receipt of sixpenny and shilling subscriptions, or subscriptions not exceeding half-a-sovereign, a good sum perhaps might be obtained at once. But again we say, what are the nobility about, and why do they not come down with their thousands? The inhabitants of Chelsea have done themselves immortal honour by paying into the General Committee at Cornhill the sum of 450*l.* as their 'first instalment.' We shall hold that district in double respect henceforward, and feel a pleasure in going through it.

FINE ARTS.

THE LIVING PAINTERS. No. VII.

'Dost thou love pictures? We will fetch thee strait
Adonis, painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea, all in sedges hid.'—Taming of the Shrew.

THE PORTRAIT PAINTERS.

SIR M. A. SHEE, SIR W. BEECHEY, MESSRS JACKSON, REINAGLE, WILKIE, PICKERSGILL, CHINNERY, MORTON, AND ROTHWELL.

A Portrait is a species of mirror, in which the merits of Nature are carefully reflected, and her defects altogether shut out. It is the art of painting unlikenesses—the art of aggrandizing small things—the art, in a word, of flattering agreeably and profitably, at the expense of nothing but truth. This last—the auri sacra fames—is the grand inspiration; the former—the flattery—is the secret of success. The improvement in arts and manufactures is in proportion to the profits resulting to individuals; but the profits would not ensue, were not other individuals pleased. We might paint gods and angels to all eternity without getting a maravedi by them, did they not profess to resemble Mr, Mrs, or Miss Lackwit, and to transmit the imaginary excellence of that illustrious family to the admiration of 1930. We are somewhat backward in acknowledging our great uncle Brick-bat, smeared faithfully upon canvass by the downright pencil of Kneller. We hesitate to confess our descent from figures fit to be scarecrows, which the malignity of provincial 'professors' has caused to be hung up in our oaken galleries; but the beauties of Sir Thomas we bow to in an instant, and admit them the more readily and gratefully, because he has faithfully avoided all the deformities of nature.

When Titian painted, he had heads to paint that were, in themselves, sufficient to illuminate his pannels with grandeur and beauty. The very costume of his time was enough to constitute a gorgeous picture. The ample folds of silk and velvet, the hats crowned with feathers, the flashing, formidable eyes (in which the noble and the cut-throat * mingled so harmoniously) the mighty beards, and lastly, the fine rich tone which the complexion and the hair presented, are scarcely to be called accessories; they in fact made up the main value of the picture. What a contrast does our meagre, close, square-cut dress afford! We are in fact nothing more than a series of obtuse angles, disguised by kerseymere and broad-cloth; and our only result, when sitting for our pictures, is to stultify the artist by the innumerable points and difficulties which our ill-dressed figures present. When the Doge Grimani, or the Senator Lanfranco, or any other Grandee of Italy or Spain, came before Titian or Velasquez, he came properly accoutred. He came duly loaded with twenty yards of Genoa velvet, a handsome proportion of the finest silk, his belt, and his sword, and above all his beard, over which came glancing a couple of eyes (like those of the eagle or the rattlesnake), whilst his whole aspect wore a look of command, and said, 'Come, paint me!'—There was no alternative. He was set down, accordingly, 'in his habit, as he lived;' and a very pretty picture he made, as we all know. Instead of this, we have now a slice of a man (five feet ten by fifteen inches) who runs up the middle of the picture like a hop-pole, and divides the canvass into a couple of hemispheres, which the puzzled painter is then bound to fill. In this extremity, he looks round his 'studio'—he examines very narrowly the economy of his friends' sitting rooms—he purchases two yards of flowered silk, or venerable damask, at the bazaar of Mordecai Levi, dealer in clothes ancient and modern,—and at last pounces upon a jar or inkstand—hangs his before-mentioned silk or damask across a chair, and the portrait is then worked up into rapid perfection. His brother artists applaud; the sitter (sufficiently flattered) is delighted; and the arts—remain in statu quo. No sudden incursion of new ideas disturbs the settled equanimity—the old, approved, aristocratic, system of picture-manufacturing. And, in fact, what do the Academicians want? They 'Want no change, and least of all such change,' as a fresh, vigorous, imaginative artist would bring upon them. What would become of their sleepy portraits? their hard and staring heads? their idle, endless, dull, unprofitable repetitions of each other? their stupid thefts from ancient masters? their blind, arrogant, oracular decisions in favour of themselves? Why, all would go down to the dust. Ay; notwithstanding the unanimity of the English in favour of English art, their pictures would immediately take a secondary station. They would become 'respectable' pictures, and they themselves 'creditable' artists—than which, as we well know, there is nothing more damning and dishonouring. They have indistinct visions of this their fate, no doubt; else why do they go on railing at their betters in art? Do they think that they can make themselves superior, merely by imagining that they are so? Do they think that they can keep their works impefishable—unmelted,

'By thinking of the frosty Caucasus.'

Let them be assured, that this is a mistake altogether. The great painter must think, and labour, and look at nature; he must give his imagination way, and let his reason guide him (the two are quite reconcileable); he must study, and combine, and be patient and sincere in his desire to attain what is good; and he must moreover strip himself of prejudice and envy and all the other disqualifications which interfere with success. It is not sufficient to sit simpering or scowling in the midst of one's own achievements,—nor to sneer at the Flemings and Italians, and imagine that one's own school is the best of all possible schools, and one's self at the top of the topmost form. This may injure others a little; but it will do no good to ourselves.

We have not left ourselves a great deal of space in the present number to speak of the English portrait-painters in detail. Nor is there a necessity for this. They have much in common with each other, both of what is vicious as well as valuable; and a few general remarks might almost serve for all. They are, for the most part, good painters, but indifferent artists; that is to say, they are dextrous with the brush, and frequently shew skill in their effects; but in design and invention and expression, we think, they too often fail.

Sir Martin Archer Shee has hitherto been known better for his verses than his pictures. His 'Rhymes on Art' have obtained for him some reputation, and his agreeable qualities more. He has always had the good word of all persons. This, we believe, was the secret of his elevation to the President's chair. As an artist, he was not considered equal to some other Academicians; but for courtesy, good manners, and all gentleman-like qualities, he was beyond most, and inferior to none. We, at first, murmured a little at his elevation; but we are now satisfied that the Academicians were right, and that he will do credit to their choice. In truth, he may already be said to have done this; for one of his pictures—we are ashamed to have forgotten the name of the portrait—is one of the best pieces of art in the present Exhibition. He seems to have set himself to work in earnest, in order to show his electors what he could do. This appears to us to be the true way of requiting them, and of vindicating himself.—Sir William Beechey is fallen into the 'sere and yellow leaf.' He was never much of an artist; and now his portraits bear the defects of servility, superadded to the crudeness which marked his early works. He has passed from youth to age, without arriving at maturity. It is surely time for him to desist. Of Mr Phillips, we have already spoken; he is an agreeable artist, with more refinement than any of his brother Academicians who devote themselves to this branch of art. Mr Jackson is—or rather was (for, we are sorry to see that he is dead) a painter of merit; somewhat deficient in elegance and finish, but generally effective, and shewing that he could colour well when he pleased.

* Lege, 'soldier.'

Digitized by Google

Mr Pickersgill, to our mind, possesses less real claims to distinction than any portrait-painter of equal reputation. His fame exceeds immeasureably his deserts, which are moderate enough. This artist may be referred to as one of those who paint every part of man to perfection, except his head! and who may fairly be put upon an equality with those ingenious artists who used, in former days, to furnish our old friend Mrs Salmon with the wax figures that enabled her to contest the palm so successfully with her jealous brethren at Somerset-House. We have heard that the late Mr Dawe was in the habit of vindicating his claim to be an industrious man by painting dolls, by the gross, for the toy-shops. We imagine that it may have been by some such gradation that Mr Pickersgill arrived at his present eminence. There are three pictures by this artist in the present Exhibition; one, of Lord Lyndhurst, has the 'outward visible form' of the late Chancellor (which indeed it is barely possible to miss), but it wants that lurking expression that we have so often remarked in his face, and which used eternally to remind us of some of the curious faces that we have seen peeping through the leaves in the paintings of Nicolo Poussin. The Portrait of Mr Bulwer is not, we trust, a likeness of that clever author. To us it seems like a man whose faculties are muddled with beer; and the Portrait of Mr Charles Kemble (which wants altogether the fine chivalrous air of that excellent actor) is one of the most dismal instances of what the 'human face divine' may be reduced to by the want of taste in the artist. It should be called 'The Weeping Butcher,' and sent off to Smithfield without delay.—Mr Reinagle is an admirable landscape-painter; and we are sincerely sorry to see him perplex himself with portraits. It is quite clear that his talent does not lie that way.—Mr Chinnery is the first painter in the Celestial Empire. He resides at Canton, and sends us over a cargo of portraits in company with our Congou and Twankay. He is an artist of great talent. We have seen some productions of his formerly, which appeared to exhibit as fine a style as that of any of his cotemporaries, without exception. We speak, however, from a recollection not very recent, and we may therefore be deceived.—We have not forgotten Mr Morton's Portrait of his present Majesty, which was exhibited last year. It was a picture of unquestionable talent, and was, we think, the very best likeness that we have seen of our excellent King and Illustrious Reformer. There is something in the broad open look of William the Fourth that we like to look upon. He has none of that pinched, painful, jealous expression that we have seen in the faces of some kings. He has not the long, lean, bigotted look of Charles the Tenth, nor the bullet-head of Alexander; he is not like his late Majesty, 'as stiff as stone;' nor like Ferdinand nor Miguel in—thank God!—in anything. We are not advocating our Monarch's claims to beauty, to which he has no pretensions, and which (to a man at least) is a mighty indifferent matter, after all; but we are willing to think that he has a bold, open, and honest look, which we trust he will continue to give proof of on every occasion, when the welfare of England shall demand it.—Mr Rothwell is the last on our list; and he is far from the worst. In fact, he appears to us to be the most promising portrait-painter of the present time. His style is broad, vigorous, graceful, and natural, and he has an eye for colour. His family picture (except a young girl playing on a guitar, which is full of elegance) is not so good as his portraits; but his portraits have great breadth, character, and general excellence. If we are not mistaken, Mr Rothwell and Mr Phillips must take the lead in portrait—(for Mr Wilkie, whom we shall speak of more particularly hereafter, will return, we hope, to his old subjects). They will probably 'divide the town' at first; but, eventually, we think the younger artist (Rothwell) will take the post of honour. These prophecies are, it must be confessed, somewhat perilous, and subject us occasionally to disappointment; but we will venture one upon the present occasion.

[No. VIII will contain Messrs Leslie, Briggs, Jones, Allan, Brockedon, and Clint.]

MUSIC.

1. 'The Flag that brav'd a Thousand Years.' A National Song, sung by Mr H. Phillips, at the Oratorios and Public Concerts. The poetry by W. H. Bellamy, Esq. The music composed by S. Nelson. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

2. 'Come dwell with me.' A Ballad sung by Mrs Waylett, in the grand Musical Performances at the Theatres-Royal, Covent Garden and Drury Lane. The poetry by T. Haynes Bayly, Esq. The music composed by Alex. Lee. (Goulding and D'Almaine.)

3. 'Every Man's Song, or, Let Each Reform One.' Written by the Author of the 'Wreath,' &c. &c. Composed by L. Sharpe. (Goulding and D'Almaine).

4. 'Why sure there never met.' Laughing Trio, written and adapted to Martini's celebrated Terzetto; and the Symphony and Accompaniments composed by J. Addison. (Goulding and D'Almaine).

The Composers of the three first-named of the above pieces have doubtless consulted the prevailing taste of the English audiences, who attend oratorios, musical farces, and public dinners. They are precisely the order of composition to be immediately appreciated by all classes, and to be encored by the majority. Without affecting a complacent superiority in musical refinement, we can honestly say that we shall never look them in the face again; and that we should prefer hearing no ballads at all, to the hearing of such ballads. A thousandth repetition of any of the unpretending little melodies of Linley, or Shield, or Storace, would, to our taste, be positive variety, compared with an encore of any of the above-named. The first upon the list is utterly commonplace in melody, and defective in accent; as for instance on the words 'emblem,' and 'thousand.' The second, we can conceive Mr Lee writing off, as he would a free admission. There is not a single new idea in the melody; the accompaniment is like a first lesson, and as for the bass, it is one of the most meagre affairs we ever beheld; one note to a bar, that of course the key note, alternating with a fourth. The third piece is of that class that we have heard Mr Charles Taylor upon occasion sing at corporation or city company's feasts. The fourth on the list is a new adaptation and arrangement of the celebrated terzetto by Martini, that was, we believe, frequently sung at the oratorios last season, and never without being encored.

As the reader can derive neither pleasure nor profit from learning the character of such compositions as those just alluded to, and as it is far more grateful to our feelings to approve than to condemn, we propose in future naming those only that in our opinion will tend to promote a correct taste in music. Those pieces, therefore, that we decline noticing, the publishers may receive back by application at the office of the Printer.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent-Garden.—The Exquisites—Hunter of the Alps—The Omnibus.
Haymarket.—The Marriage of Figaro—The Widow Bewitched—Spring and Autumn.

A Correspondent asks how it is that we do not criticise benefit nights. The answer is simple;—tickets are not admitted on benefit nights, and we go in with tickets. It has long been understood between Editors and Managers, that however independent the former choose to be in their criticisms, the convenience of tickets is a matter of mutual accommodation; because any notice is better than none, and many notices are valuable in proportion. For a long time, when we wrote theatricals, years back, in another paper, we did not avail ourselves of this understanding: and we confess that had we remained rich enough, after our twenty years' war in favour of Reform, we should have acted as we did then. Had we got rich, we would have gone further. Dii boni! what a splendid example of superiority to all human ticket should we not have set! How glad the box-keepers should have been to see us! How Mr Massingham should have blessed us, and himself! What tickets should we not have bought; what benefit-nights patronised; what charming faces have dressed in golden smiles! Mr Abbott should have felt the warmth of our presence last night, because he is a good fellow; and Miss Inverarity, next Tuesday, should have looked (if possible) the sweeter, and sang with a more cordial breath. Us the hackney coachmen should have blessed; and much link-boy should have awaited us. The very actors we objected to, should have found somehow a salve for their wound, so happy should have been our criticism: yea, all should have welcomed our advent but the old fruit-women, whose apples at three-pence a-piece we hate, because of the hypocrisy of their staid faces, and the filthiness of their decency.

The mystery of tickets is a curious one, and might amuse the public if unravelled. Paganini, they say, was astonished when he found that it was expected of him to admit 'sixty gentlemen of the press' for nothing. The plea for the non-admission of tickets on a benefit-night is, that the persons admitted for nothing might possibly keep out those who would pay. Such a possibility there is, on nights when it might be death to squeeze in; but this seldom happens; and a distinction might surely be made, in favour of those who take frequent and admiring notice of theatricals. It is because we reckon ourselves, upon the whole, good-natured critics, and such as are more accustomed to like than condemn, that we have allowed ourselves to use this accommodation. We are sorry, for the reputation of our beloved countrymen, to add, that those who are the most liberal of it, are the foreign theatres among us. The French Theatre, in this respect, sustains the generous politeness of the national character; and the Italian is as liberal as the house ought to be, that contains the divine Pasta and all the emotion she excites. We heard the other day, by the bye, of some impious Goths who hissed her on one of the benefit-nights at Drury Lane!! May they never know any better.

Haymarket.

There were two first appearances here last night, in the opera of the Marriage of Figaro; a Miss Land, as the Countess Almaviva, and Miss Wells, from the Dublin Theatre. We have only room to state that they were both favourably received, and will reappear in the same parts on Tuesday next.

Digitized by Google

'A GREAT MORAL LESSON.'—To-day the Duke of Wellington, according to annual custom, presents to the King a tri-coloured French flag, as the trophy of his career, and the symbol of what was 'put down' at the Battle of Waterloo. On the same day, and on all other days, France presents a thousand tri-colour flags to all the world.

DIVINE RIGHT.—It is said in a book lately published, that if the doctrine of legitimacy or divine right were attended to, the crown so deservedly worn at present by our Royal Reformer, ought to be taken from his head, and given to the Duchess of Buckingham or the Marquis of Stafford. How the pretensions of the Noble Marquis are made out, we cannot say. The Duchess is the representative of Henry Grey, Duke of Suffolk, and his wife Francis, who was eldest daughter of the famous Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, that married Mary, Queen Dowager of France, sister of Henry VIII.

A HUMAN PRIVILEGE.—Brutes never make themselves ridiculous; that is the peculiar prerogative of man. The former, in their strangest vagaries, act according to nature; while the latter, in trying to go beyond her, render themselves contemptible in the eyes of others, just in proportion as they excel in their own.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

A LUDICROUS ANECDOTE.—A young native gentleman, an officer at Cannonmore, one evening, looking at his watch to ascertain the time, found that it had stopped, he having neglected to wind it up. Anxious, however, to know what o'clock it was, and recollecting that Captain B. had just constructed a very excellent sun-dial, he called for a lantern and candle, that he might see what hour it was by the new and strange chronometer of which he had heard so much.—Tyerman and Bennet's Missionary Travels.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Opera Seria, in Two Acts, of

MEDEA.

[By MAYER.]

Medea, Wife of Jason . . . . Madame Pasta.
Creusa, Daughter of Creontes . . . . . Miss F. Ayton.
Ismenes, Confidant of Medea . . . Mlle. Feliani.
Creontes, King of Corinth . . . . . Signor Lablache.
Ægeus, King of Athens . . . Signor Rubini.
Jason . . . . Signor Curioni.
Tideus, Confidant of Creontes . . . Signor Deville.
Two children of Jason and Medea.
Corinthians, Maidens, Priests, Followers of Ægeus, Guards.

To conclude with a New Ballet, in One Act, entitled

LA BAYADERE.

[Composed by M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Auber, arranged by M. Musard.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré, Mlle. Taglioni, M. Lefebvre, M. Emile. M. Simon, M. Hunt, M. O'Brien, and M. Bertram.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Play of

THE STRANGER.

[By KOTZEBUE.]

Mrs Haller, Miss F. Kemble. Countess Winterstein, Mrs Chatterley.
Annette, Miss H. Cawse. Claudine, Miss Perry. Charlotte, Mrs Gibbs.
Susan, Mrs Daly. Hannah, Miss Brown.
The Stranger's Children, by Miss Carson and Miss Hunt.
The Stranger, Mr C. Kemble. Count Winterstein, Mr Duruset.
Count's Son, Miss Kendall. Baron Steinfort, Mr Warde. Tobias, Mr F. Matthews.
Francis, Mr Farley. Solomon, Mr Bartley. Peter, Mr Meadows.

Previous to the Play, Mehul's Overture to 'D'Adrien.'

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

A Comic Piece, in one Act, called

LODGINGS FOR SINGLE GENTLEMEN.

Mrs Greville, Mrs T. Hill. Maria, Mrs Ashton.
Mrs Prattle, Mrs Glover.
Captain Postlethwaite, Mr Vining. Colonel Stanmere, Mr Brindal.
Trusty, Mr Webster.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney, Mrs Coveney, Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To which will be added, the Comedy of

THE HEIR AT LAW.

[By G COLMAN.]

Deborah Dowlas, Mrs Glover. Caroline Dormer, Mrs Ashton.
Cicely Homespun, Mrs Humby.
Daniel Dowlas, Mr W. Farren. Dick Dowlas, Mr Vining.
Doctor Pangloss, Mr Harley. Henry Morland, Mr Brindal.
Stedfast, Mr W. Johnson. Zekiel Homespun, Mr Webster.
Kenrick, Mr H. Wallack.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of

THE WATERMAN.

[By DIBDIN.]

Mrs Bundle, Mrs Taylcure. Wilhelmina, Mrs T. Hill.
Tom Tug, Mr Bianchi Taylor.
Robin, Mr Harley. Bundle, Mr Gattie.

On Monday, The Goldsmith; Paul Pry; Monsieur Tonson; and The Widow Bewitched.

R. GRAVES, CHEAP AND FASHIONABLE TAILOR,

In submitting the following Prices, confidently asserts, that Gentlemen will find every garment made by him is from the BEST WEST OF ENGLAND SAXONY PATENT FINISHED CLOTHS, and equal in Fit and Workmanship to any that can be produced.

	£. s. d.
Fashionable Medley Coloured Dress Coats	2 10 0
Extra Saxony ditto	3 5 0
An Assortment of the fashionable Mulberry.
Quilting Waistcoats, from the newest patterns, of the finest quality	0 12 0
Silk Valencia	0 13 0
Patent Anglo Merino Trowsers, in Mixtures, Drabs, and Checks, from	16s. to 1 1 0
Fashionable Le Roi Jean	1 1 0
Ditto Checked Drill	12s. to 0 18 0

Anglo Merinos, Drills, Cantoons, &c. in a great variety of new patterns.
313, HIGH HOLBORN.
No connection with any other House.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL,

In Three Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—Songs, 'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'
PART II.—Songs, 'The Omnibus,' and 'The Country Concert.'
PART III.—Song, 'Thames Sailing Match.' Scena. Song, 'Harlowe Bush Fair.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

After which, A MUSICAL MELANGE.

To conclude with the Play of

THE STRANGER.

[By KOTZEBUE.]

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. Poole, Countess Winterstein, Miss Scott.
Charlotte, Miss Vincent. Savoyard, Miss Somerville, with the original Ballad, 'I have a silent sorrow here.'
The Stranger, Mr Osbaldiston. Count Winterstein, Mr Honner. Peter, Mr Vale.
Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Solomon, Mr Williams. Francis, Mr C. Hill.
Tobias, Mr Gough. The Count's Son, Master F. Carbery.
The Stranger's Children, Misses Clarke and E. Clarke.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, intitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.

Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, of

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, (with the Original Song and Hornpipe) Mr Forrester.
The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. — Mazeppa — Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Mysterious Tailor.

COBURG THEATRE.—Martha Willis—Black-eyed Susan—The Napoleon of Humble Life—The Pilot.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Outlaw's Oath—The Miser of Madrid—The English Paganini—Frozen Hand.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Timour the Tartar—A Pill for Portugal—Orphan of Hindostan.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 33 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 248.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1831.

OLD ENGLISH STAGE.*

[Concluded.]

In the moral or allegorical plays (with the exception of one of a political nature, the only one of the kind, and which Mr Collier thinks was suppressed immediately after its performance—see p. 369) we find nothing particular to notice: but there is an account worth giving of an old interlude resembling a moral, called Jack Juggler, 'one of the very oldest pieces in our language founded upon a classic original.' The author acknowledges himself to have been indebted to Plautus. Mr Collier infers that the piece was written in the reign of Edward VI or Mary. 'The story,' he says, 'is by no means complicated, and there is a good deal of humour in the manner in which the few incidents are brought about.'

'Master Bongrace sends his lacquey Jenkin Careaway to his mistress Dame Coy, but Jenkins plays at dice, loiters, and steals apples by the way. Jack Juggler "the Vice," without any apparent motive but the love of mischief, watches him, and dressing himself like Jenkin, determines to try to persuade Jenkin that he is not himself, but another man. He of course finds some difficulty in his undertaking, and among other arguments resorts to the forcible, and in this case, convincing one, of blows. Jenkin is persuaded out of his identity, and makes the following comic appeal upon the subject to the audience:—

"'But, maysters, yf you happen to see that other I,
As that you shall is not verye liklye,
Nor I woll not desyre you for him purposelye to looke,
For it is an uncomparable unhappye hooke;
And yf it be I, you might happin to seeke,
And not fuynd me out in an hole weeke:
For when I was wonte to rune awaye
I used not to cum againe in lesse than a moneth or tway.
Houbeit for all this, I thinke it be not I,
For to shew the matter in dyde, trulye,
I never use to run awaye in winter nor in vere,
But all wayes in suche tyme and season of the yeare
When honye lyeth in the hyves of bees,
And all maner frute falleth from the trees,
As apples, nuttes, peres, and plummes also,
Whereby a boy may live abrod a moneth or two.
This cast do I use, I woll not with you fayne;
Therefore I wonder if he be I sertaine.
But and if he be, and you mete me abrod by chaunce,
Send me home to my maister with a vengaunce."

'His blunders and confusion on this point get him into disgrace with Dame Coy, who bestows "a cudgel blessing" upon him, and tells his master to "joll his head to a post." Even at the conclusion he has great difficulty in arriving at a conviction that he is himself, and not some other man. Besides the liveliness of some part of the dialogue, there is a decided attempt at character in the piece, as may be seen from the following description by Jack Juggler of Alice Trip-and-go, a smart maid-servant attendant upon Dame Coy:—

'"She simpereth, she prankith, and getteth without fayle,
As a pecocke that hath spred and sheweth hir gaye taile;
She minceth, she brideleth, she swimmeth to and fro;
She tredith not one here a wrye, she tryppeth like a do:
A brode in the strete, going or coming homward,
She quaverith and wardelith like one in a galliard.
She talketh, she chatteth, like a pye all daye,
And speakethe like a parat poppagaye;
And that as fine as a small silken threede,
Ye, and as high as an eagle can fle for a neade."—P. 366.

At p. 463 is a good remark on the grossness of the old play of Gammer Gurton's Needle, written by John Still, afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells:—

'I cannot entirely agree with Warton,' says Mr Collier, 'that the many indecencies and grossnesses with which his play abounds arose out of the want of polish of the age. At least Ralph Roister Doister is remarkably free from them, and it is doubtful whether in London, in this respect, people were much more refined than in the country. Gammer Gurton's Needle has this peculiarity belonging to it,—that it is, I believe, the first existing English play acted at either University; and it is a singular coincidence (which is further illustrated in "The Annals of the Stage,") that the author of the comedy so represented should be the very person who, many years afterwards, when he had become Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, was called upon to remonstrate with the minister of Queen Elizabeth against having an English play performed before her at that University, as unbefitting its learning, dignity, and character.'—P. 463.

Grossnesses may be attributed in part to the age which allows them; but the great difference in this respect between the writers of any particular age is remarkable, and was never better exhibited than in Shakspeare and his contemporaries. Our great bard, as he was the greatest, so he was one of the most delicate of all the dramatic writers of his time. The exceeding sweetness and gracefulness of his nature instinctively threw off impurities which Ben Jonson, and Massinger, and even Beaumont and Fletcher allowed themselves absolutely to wallow in; and it is observable, that what licence he allowed himself, is almost invariably on the side of pleasurable associations, and not of degrading ones.

We regret we have not room to notice the political play, which Mr Collier justly pronounces 'a most remarkable production,' and prides himself upon having discovered. The curious reader will find himself repaid by turning to the volume for it. Its boldness is of so extraordinary a nature for any period, much more for that of the Tudors, that we can only conjecture it to have been written on the supposition, either that men of influence would have excused it out of some view of their own, in furtherance of some policy of the moment; or else, that it was a violent sectarian effusion; which last perhaps is the most probable. Very likely it was both, since politics and religion were so mixed up in those times. The 'lords spiritual' are cut at without ceremony; and some 'spye' is talked of, (this looks like a cut at a favourite) who talks to the Prince against the Commons, and to the Commons against the Prince. Was it an attack on the Protector Somerset?

At page 291 of the volume we are here going through (the second) is an explanation of a word that has often puzzled us in a passage of Chaucer. The poet, in his exquisite description of the lawyer (of whom he says,

No where so busy a man as he there n'as,
And yet he seemed busier than he was) tells us, that this bustling person was a frequenter of "the Parvyse." Mr Collier, meeting with this word in an old drama, in connexion with St Paul's cathedral, has the following note upon it:—

'Parvyse means the Portico. This passage settles the doubt (see Glossary to Tyrwhitt's Chaucer, voc. "Parvis") as to where the Parvis at London was situated. It was where lawyers met for consultation, viz., the portico of St Paul's Cathedral. Pour avis would seem, therefore, a more reasonable etymology than Du Cange's Paradisus.'

In volume the third (the most interesting of the three, though it calls upon us for least notice, being upon more known subjects) Mr Collier has entered into a curious analysis of the versification of Marlow, and has successfully shown that he had greater variety of music in his lines than is commonly supposed: but we cannot agree with him in concluding, that Shakspeare gave dramatic versification but little additional variety. Shakspeare's music is among the most various in the world. Marlow's 'mighty line' (as Ben Jonson with great felicity called it) is still, generally speaking, a line standing by itself, however mighty, or varied in its might. He wrote ingots of gold; but they are still ingots, formal and separate.

We must not trust ourselves with quotations about the theatres, the actors, the payment of actors, &c. otherwise we shall never have done with the subject.

Upon the whole (if we may speak from a view of the work, which we must acknowledge to have been but a hasty and superficial one),

* The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the time of Shakspeare: and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. By J. Payne Collier, Esq. F. S. A. Three vols. 8vo. Murray.

Digitized by Google

Mr Collier may claim very high merits of 'zeal and industry;' which are all that he puts forward. He has corrected errors; he has added to the stock of facts; he has supplied a desideratum. His work has absorbed, as it goes, the best things of his predecessors, and grown to an importance and a completeness in every other respect, such as they despaired of beholding. In short, it is a novelty of its kind, a work long wanting, and will unquestionably take its stand above all others, as the standard book of reference upon all subjects connected with the stage history of England. What we miss is something more of entertainment mixed up with the style or general treatment, and a grappling with the spirit as well as the letter of the geniuses who founded our drama. The author, however, it is to be considered, does not pretend to have furnished either of these desiderata. Perhaps, at the same time, he expects, with a little too much security, that his materials will, of themselves, be as interesting to others as to the writer; and we have been mortified, in what criticism there is, to find not even an allusion to those excellent critics of later days, Messrs Lamb and Hazlitt, who have written upon the old dramatists in a spirit worthy even of those great men.

LAW VERSUS JUSTICE.

Ton-song, a Chinese Tartar, who travelled in England in the train of an Indian juggler, appeared at the Exeter assizes to prefer a charge against two individuals whom he accused of robbing him on the public road. It being necessary to swear the complainant, the judge enquired what was his religion. Ton-song, a little embarrassed by this unexpected question, thought to satisfy everybody and prevent any unpleasant consequence by answering, which he did in a mixed jargon of English and his mother-tongue, that he was of the religion of the English. But as England does not profess that happy unity of faith which the great emperor so paternally maintains in China, the judge could not admit the sufficiency of the answer; he wished the foreigner to explain something of the doctrines of his faith. 'Have you been baptised? Yes, certainly.—When? Very often; they have baptised me in every town I have passed through.' The judge not knowing what to make of so strange a witness, thought that the witness must have misunderstood him, or that he must have misunderstood the witness; he therefore sent for an interpreter and recommenced his interrogations. The interpreter, thinking that Ton-song might be a Catholic, repeated the question,—Had he been baptised? making, as he asked the question, the sign of the cross. The sign was hardly made ere the witness heartily replied in the affirmative. The judge felt relieved by this prompt acquiescense, when new explanations threw him again into embarrassment. 'Interpreter. Where were you baptised.—Ton-song. In every town in England that I have traversed.—Judge. Indeed! I am in a most afflicting perplexity; if this man was a Pagan I could administer the oath to him according to the usage of his country, but he says he is a Christian and I cannot comprehend anything of his religion.—Interpreter. Were you ever in a church? Ton-song. Never.—Interpreter. How is an oath administered in your country?—Ton-song. I don't know.—Interpreter. Do you know where men go after their death?—Ton-song. In the earth.—Interpreter. Where are your father and mother?—Ton-song. In the earth.—Judge. It is decidedly impossible to obtain an answer from this Chinese.' Let him get down. [This anecdote is translated from a French work, but we think we recollect something of the kind taking place, and moreover believe that if a similar difficulty was to occur to-morrow, the result would be the same as in the anecdote,—the poor man would get no redress for the wrong done to him. If we might comment on the news of the day, we should say something of a case in which a poor man was committed to prison because he had no means of finding bail to answer for his appearance as prosecutor against a woman who had robbed him. Luckily no reader of the account can need any comment.]

Stupendous Glass Vase.—We have enjoyed a private view, at the Queen's Bazaar, Oxford street, of a colossal glass vase, designed and constructed by Messrs Gunby and Co. of Birmingham. The dimensions of this magnificent vessel are, 14 feet in height, and 12 feet in diameter. It weighs upwards of 13,444lbs.; and is capable of containing 5,400 bottles of wine. A vessel of this magnitude, composed of such elegant material, is in itself attractive: but when this quality is combined with beauty of form, splendour of decoration, and uncommon mechanical ingenuity, it becomes an object of extraordinary interest and admiration. The prevailing colour of the vase is gold, relieved with emerald green and vermillion, the whole of which are laid on under the surface of the glass. By this contrivance, the ornamental beauty and brilliancy of the decoration are secured from the action of the atmosphere, and will remain unimpaired as long as the structure itself. To describe the decoration of this splendid work of art would occupy a considerable space, and even then the reader would form but an inadequate idea of the dazzling beauty of its appearance. Externally it is composed of compartments, inclosing rich medallions, running scrolls, and scollop shells, all exquisitely formed; the ground of the interior is a pale lavender, with a running pattern of vine leaves of vivid green. The undertaking altogether, with the taste and magnificence displayed in its construction, together with its immense value, 10,000*l*. make it one of the most attractive exhibitions of the season.—Atlas.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Amongst my fears,
To do wrong is the greatest. The Scornful Lady.

— The man but persuades himself he means to live, that imagines not the means.—The Scornful Lady.

— 'What,' said an anti-reforming priest in the neighbourhood of Maidenhead, to a gentleman who lately solicited votes for Messrs Dundas and Throgmorton, 'what would my brother the Admiral say to my father, were he to raise his hoary hairs from the grave, and reproach him with having promised his votes to such men as Dundas and Throckmorton?' —'Say?' replied the other, 'why, he would instantly desire him to return, and trouble himself no more with the affairs of this world.'—Windsor Express.

Poacher Extraordinary.—On Wednesday last, as a boy of Mr W. Kiddell's, of Heydon, was riding down a lane upon a female donkey, a hare came brushing through the hedge into the road, making a grunting noise, which the ass immediately saw, instantly floored the boy, and darted off in pursuit of the hare, and after a very short course, with a few excellent turns, she took her up at full speed, and killed her. This fact (says the Mercury) has been authenticated to us by a gentleman so respectable, that we may safely pledge ourselves for its truth, however extraordinary it appears.—Norwich Post.

— Curious Matrimonial Advertisement. — A gentleman residing in one of the principal hunting counties, of middle age and sportsmanlike manner, is desirous of uniting himself to a lady possessing a passion or field-sports. Fortune or beauty are not the object of the advertiser; the former, if any, may be settled upon the lady; and as to the latter, though not an objection, it nevertheless is not a primary object. Good-humour, a small foot, and an easy seat on horseback, are the principal qualifications required. As this is the advertisement of a fox—and not a fortune-hunter, it is hoped that no one will answer it out of idle curiosity. P.S. None with red hair need apply.—Sporting Magazine.

Cholera Morbus.—Sir Anthony Carlisle, in a letter addressed to Lord Brougham in the Times, recommends to serious attention a suggestion of Dr Ainslie's, the author of the Materia Indica. 'The Doctor,' he says, 'viewing the sudden sinking of strength, and the disordered state of the blood, as the most urgent symptoms, advises the immediate trial of inhaling a super-oxygenated air, for the purpose of revivifying the blood, until other remedies, such as ammonia, shall have time to act upon the morbid materials in the alimentary passages. I am more disposed,' observes Sir Anthony, 'to place reliance upon the immediate and often-repeated doses of ammonia, because of the attending spasms in the limbs, an occurrence which is generally connected with alimentary acidity.' The Lords of the Privy Council have transmitted to the College of Physicians a mass of statistical returns furnished to the Government by the British Authorities resident abroad, relative to the progress and present state of the Russian Cholera. The report of the Committee is expected to contain important information.

Mrs Siddons's Taste in Gardens.—We learn from a treatise on flowers by Mr Hogg, quoted in the 'Encyclopædia of Gardening,' that Mrs Siddons was fond of seeing flowers in large masses, of the same species and colour, and cultivated her garden in that style, when she lived in the Harrow road. This the writer of the treatise approves. He seems to object, however, to the profusion with which she indulged in her favourite flower, the viola amœna, common purple hearts-ease, which was showered all over the place unsparingly. And he says that there was such a profusion of evergreens, and those of the sombre cast, that there was no looking at the garden with satisfaction 'except in winter-time;' which seems a contradiction to what he says about the flowers in masses. We suspect that Mrs Siddons was a genuine lover both of flowers and trees; liked to have a good sense of colour, of the reds and purples, &c. and chose to secure foliage all the year round. To be sure she was rich enough (if we are not mistaken) to have indulged in the varieties of the seasons; but a lover of colours in the mass, and of leafiness at all times, possesses (so far) the true elements of a genuine reveller in nature.

Not so Bad.—Janin married a young and pretty wife. Soon after he met an old acquaintance, whom he had not seen for a long time. 'So, Janin, you have got married, eh! Ay, indeed, oh, if you saw her! That is good. Not so good; she has a foolish head. That is bad. Not so bad. Why? Because a foolish head and a pretty figure often please very much in our parish. That is good. Not so good. Why? Because a gentleman comes to see her very often. That is bad. Not so bad. Why? He always gives me something. That is good. Not so good. Why? Because he always sends me a good way off. That is bad. Not so bad. Why? Because if he does send me three miles he gives me enough to pay me for twenty, and I take care to enjoy myself well on the road. That is good. Not so good. Why? Because when I go out I am exposed to the wind and rain. That is bad. Not so bad. Why? Because I am used to it.'

SELF-KNOWLEDGE THE HIGHEST PHILOSOPHY.

If thou be one whose heart the holy forms
Of young Imagination have kept pure,
Stranger! henceforth be warn'd: and know that pride,
Howe'er disguised in its own majesty,
Is littleness; that he who feels contempt
For any living thing, hath faculties
Which he has never used; that thought with him
Is in its infancy. The man whose eye
Is ever on himself, doth look on one,
The least of Nature's works, one who might move
The wise man to that scorn which wisdom holds
Unlawful ever. O be wiser, thou!
Instructed that true knowledge leads to love;
True dignity abides with him alone
Who, in the silent hour of inward thought,
Can still suspect, and still revere himself,
In lowliness of heart. Wordsworth.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Medea—La Bayadere.

COVENT-GARDEN.—The Stranger—Napoleon Buonaparte.

HAYMARKET.—Lodgings for Single Gentlemen—The Widow Bewitched—The Heir at Law—The Waterman.

DEAR MR TATLER,—I went on Friday night to the Adelphi Theatre to see Les Plaideurs, of RACINE, a ludicrous satire on the courts of law, which, in many points, may apply to other countries, and other ages, than his own. The beautiful irrelevance of the long exordiums, delivered with all pomp and emphasis,—the confused haste with which the actual circumstances of the case are muttered over, on the one side,—and the ignorance 'crammed' for the occasion on the other, and unable to resume a long-winded discourse, when once interrupted,—form perhaps, a truer picture of the old French courts of law, than the author himself professed to represent. He tells us in his preface to the piece that, like Aristophanes, he had gone beyond nature, to avoid giving offence to the judges, who were the less likely to recognise themselves, when truth was a little caricatured. Be this as it may, we know that the trial of the dog for stealing a capon, was no burlesque of earlier times, and that the eloquence of their counsel had not always succeeded in preserving rats, bulls, &c. from excommunication. The history of the piece is curious, and may be new to some of your readers. RACINE having been harassed with a law-suit which wearied his patience, consoled himself by writing this satire, to which he was urged by several literati of the day, with whom he was in the habit of dining at the house of a celebrated traiteur. Every one furnished him with some hint. M. de BRILHAC instructed him in the law terms; BOILEAU gave him the scene of dispute between Chicaneau and the Countess, from a similar one at which he had actually been present; and the lady appeared on the stage in the very dress of her who had figured in it. The Secretary, with his Ciceronian commencement of his grand oration in defence of the canine culprit, pourtrayed an advocate who had used the same language in a case between a pastrycook and a baker. It might be expected that such a piece would raise enemies; one gentleman of the long robe was very loud against it. Notwithstanding MOLIERE'S admiration of it, the second representation would have been the last, had it not been performed at court, a few weeks afterwards, and made LOUIS XIV laugh in a manner which compelled the courtiers to follow his example. The King's company, delighted with this success, hastened to Paris, and wakened RACINE, purposely to inform him of it. Three carriages, in the middle of the night, rolling along a street where carriages were seldom seen by day, roused the neighbourhood; all heads were out at window; and it was generally believed that the poet was about to be punished for railing at the judges on the public stage. The next day, while he was congratulating himself upon the reception of his piece at court, all Paris supposed him to be in prison. The King's example reconciled his subjects to the necessity of laughing, and everybody enjoyed it. RACINE tells us, that their quarrel with the piece had not been that it did not make them laugh, but that it had not effected this object more seriously. MOLIERE only could afford to laugh without fear of committing his reputation.

To return to the representation of the piece on Friday evening,—it seemed to me that the principal character was that of the Secretary, acted by M. LAPORTE. The Judge, an imbecile old man, gave but little scope for the display of M. POTIER'S talents; there is no conflicting passion, no powerful emotion, no contradiction to reconcile.—I would rather have seen him in the Secretary, which, though very well acted by M. LAPORTE, would have been irresistible in the hands of M. POTIER. The audience did not seem to relish this piece so well as the modern vaudevilles. The satire is, in some points, too delicate, perhaps, for general apprehension; and the local allusions have no longer the spicy flavour they originally possessed.

A pretty little comedy followed, called L'Homme de Soixante Ans, ou La Petite Entêtée, which represents a young girl about to make herself miserable for life, by marrying an old man whom she has never seen, merely to mortify her lover, with whom she has quarrelled. Happily for her, the old gentleman, though too gallant to reject her offered hand, is wise enough to think the match not very promising; and, discovering the real state of her feelings, he contrives to effect a reconciliation. POTIER, as usual, was, for the time, the character he undertook to be. His description of the sameness of the country-life to which she would be condemned by her union with him, which he designedly represents in the least attractive light,—was admirable. Mademoiselle ST ANGE played the headstrong damsel with much grace and spirit. It was impossible not to assent to the justice of the old gentleman's compliment upon her dress. This lady is always drest in the best taste the character will admit; evincing in that respect the good sense which is observable in all she does. M. PAULIN occasionally reminds me of ELLISTON. He has, what we much want on the English stage,—the vivacity of a gentleman. He is not a 'walking gentleman,' he never looks like a statue, or like a school-boy repeating his lesson; he is present to the scene, and always ready for action, without being restless.

A. A.

HAYMARKET.

IT is the system of this theatre to make the most of the passing hour, and produce its novelties with a celerity becoming the shortness of its season. This is judicious; for whether new candidates succeed or fail, it is better for all parties that there should be a speedy decision. There were no less than three first appearances in The Marriage of Figaro, on Friday night; Miss LAND, Miss WELLS, and Mr J. COOPER. Of the former lady, who is altogether new to the stage, we shall be able to speak more decidedly hereafter, as there was an inequality in her singing the other night, which might be fairly attributed to want of self-possession, and the novelty of her situation. This appears the more likely, as she sang with much more effect as the piece proceeded, and she acquired confidence. Many of her notes are sweet and delicate, and are put forth with a visible desire to modulate them, with due regard to correct expression. Miss WELLS, (from the Dublin Theatre) has the advantage of more stage-experience. She has a full and clear voice, which she manages for the most part with great felicity, and greatly adds to the effect of her singing, by the attention she pays to her acting. Her person is inclined to plumpness, and her face, if not regularly handsome, by the aid of a pair of good dark eyes, and a good-humoured archness of expression, is infinitely more prepossessing. She seemed to make friends of the audience on a very short acquaintance, and we have no doubt the friendship will be lasting. Mr J. COOPER, from the Olympic Theatre, (and we think we recollect him at Tottenham-street) is an actor of promise. He reminds us both of EMERY and MUNDEN; but his rusticity is not so genuine as was that of the former; still less has he the exuberant humour which made MUNDEN'S drunkards so irresistibly amusing, and at the same time so like nature in its unnatural state. We do not admire Mrs HUMBY in the page; her amorousness seems to have no warrant from the sprightliness of her blood, but to be enacted because the author has so put it down.

Digitized by Google

Guilt dare not help guilt; though they grow together
In doing ill, yet at the punishment
They sever, and each flies the noise of other.
A King and No King.

TEA AND TRAVELLERS.—There are few things in which travellers' accounts are more at variance than tea. Whether they speak of the tea in its growing state, of the method of gathering, or drying, or of preparing it for use, they are continually contradicting each other. They are not agreed as to the various kinds of tea, whether they are produced by different species, gathered at different seasons, or dried by a different process. Some travellers tell us that green teas are dried on copper; others deny it. Some say that in China the tea is always kept in jars ready for use, and invariably taken cold; others affirm that it is made when wanted, and that the Chinese take it warm. They cannot even agree as to the vessel in which it is made. The most recent accounts inform us that every person has the tea made in the cup in which it is served; but accounts still vary, even in the same volume. In the travels of the Missionaries Tyerman and Bennett, we are told that, calling at a tea-house, a wooden tray was placed before them, with a tea-pot, cups and saucers, &c. In another passage, describing a marriage festival, they speak of 'the tea as usual being prepared in each cup, with hot water poured upon the leaves, and without either cream or sugar.' The fact seems to be, that it is drunk warm, and, in the more fashionable circles, is made in the cups. None seem so fully sensible of the value of tea, as travellers: Messrs Dobell, Brooke, &c. speak of it as their chief comfort, and one almost necessary to their existence.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Juliet, Miss Fanny Kemble.
Lady Capulet, Mrs Lovell. Nurse, Mrs Gibbs.
Romeo, Mr John Mason. Prince Escalus, Mr Henry.
Paris, Mr Parry. Montague, Mr Turnour. Capulet, Mr Egerton.
Benvolio, Mr Holl. Tybalt, Mr Baker. Mercutio, Mr C. Kemble.
Friar Lawrence, Mr Evans. Friar John, Mr Mears.
Apothecary, Mr Meadows.
Page, Miss Fortescue. Balthazar, Mr Irwin. Abram, Mr Heath.
Samson, Mr Fuller. Gregory, Mr Norris. Peter, Mr Keeley.

In Act I. A Masquerade and Dance.

In Act V. The Funeral Procession of Juliet, and a Solemn Dirge.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows.
Doppet, Mr Collett. Lieut.-General Count Bertrand, Mr Egerton.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Love in a Village; and The Miller and His Men.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

A Melo-Drama (founded on a Fact) called

THE GOLDSMITH.

The Countess, Mrs W. Clifford. Isabella, Miss J. Scott.
Margaret, Mrs Humby.
The President, Mr W. Johnson. Count Rosemberg, Mr Brindal.
Cardillac, Mr Cooper. Oliver, Mr Vining. Bernard, Mr Coveney.
Hubert, Mr V. Webster. James, Mr Coates.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]
The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To which will be added, the Comedy of

PAUL PRY.

[By Mr POOLE.]
Mrs Subtle, Mrs Glover. Eliza, Mrs Ashton. Marian, Miss J. Scott.
Phœbe, Mrs Humby, who will sing 'The Lover's Mistake,' and 'Cherry Ripe.'
Colonel Hardy, Mr W. Farren. Frank Hardy, Mr Brindal.
Witherton, Mr H. Wallack. Somers, Mr W. Johnson. Stanley, Mr Coates.
Harry Stanley, Mr Vining. Paul Pry, Mr Harley. Grasp, Mr Mulleney
Doubledot, Mr Coveney. Simon, Mr V. Webster. Thomas, Mr Bishop.

To conclude with the Farce of

MONSIEUR TONSON.

[By Mr MONCRIEFF.]
Adolphine de Courcy, Miss J. Scott.
Madame Bellegarde, Mrs Tayleure. Mrs Thompson, Mrs Coveney.
Monsieur Morbleu, Mr Gattie.
Tom King, Mr Brindal. Mr Thompson, Mr W. Johnson.
Jack Ardourly, Mr Bartlett. Nap, Mr Webster.
Rusty, Mr J. Cooper. Useful, Mr Mulleney. Trap, Mr Bishop.
Wantem, Mr Field. Fip, Mr Coveney.
Snap, Mr V. Webster. Servant, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, Marriage of Figaro; Speed the Plough; and The Widow Bewitched.

FRENCH PLAYS,

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LE SOLLICITEUR.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
Madame Verse, Mlle. St. Ange. Madame Durand, Mme. Préval.
Esperance, M. Potier. Armand, M. Alfred. George, M. Cloup.
Zurich, M. Guenée. Sorbet, M. Arnaud. Criardet, M. Granville.

Suivi de

LE JUIF; OU, LA FORET DE REMIVAL.

Vaudeville Anecdotique, en Deux Actes, de M. DESAUGIER.
Lucette Richard, Mlle. St. Ange. Mademoiselle Descédules, Mme. Préval.
Hortense, Mlle. Florval. Madame Simonne, Madame Bandin.
Juif, M. Potier. Charles, M. Paulin. Brillant, M. Pelissié. M. Pincé, M. Guenée.
Thomas, M. Laporte. Delaune, M. Cloup. Le Sergent, M. Arnaud.
Le Conducteur de la Diligence, M. Granville.
Rosignol, Brisetout, M. Gamard et M. Préval.

On Finira par

MONS. PIQUE-ASSIETTE.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. DARTOIS et GABRIEL.
Mme. Dalibon, Mme. Préval. Ernestine, Mlle. Florval.
Une Jeune Mariée, Mlle. Corra.
M. Pique-Assiette, M. Potier. Tricot, M. Préval. Baboulard, M. Gamard.
Victor, M. Alfred. Jules, M. Paulin. Mariné, M. Guenée.
Un Jeune Marié, M. Arnaud.

SURREY THEATRE.

The National Drama, entitled

PIZARRO.

[By SHERIDAN.]
Spaniards.—Elvira, Miss M. C. Poole.
Pizarro, Mr D. Pitt. Alonzo, Mr C. Hill. Valverde, Mr Honner.
Almagro, Mr Rogers. Davilla, Mr Asbury. Gonzalo, Mr Collier.
Fernando, Mr Tully. Centinel, Mr Young.
Peruvians.—Cora, Miss Scott. Priestess, Miss Somerville.
Rolla, Mr Osbaldiston.
Atalibe, Mr Almar. Orozembo, Mr Williams. Orano, Mr Lee. Limatro, Mr Webb.
Old Man, Mr Gough. Peruvian Boy, Miss Ellis. High Priest, Mr Ransford.

In the course of the Evening, a Medley Cantata, 'The Triple Courtship,' Miss Somerville. 'The Bay of Biscay O!' Mr Edwin.

To conclude with a Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]
The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.
Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Miss Vincent.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnathrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on "Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,") Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ulzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Koppell.
Turks.—Omar El Asim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

And OTHER ENTERTAINMENTS.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Mr J. Cooke's Acts of The Fox Hunter; Seven Characters; Xinocles the Greek—Cavalry Manœuvres—Lubin and Annette, on Three Tight Ropes—Quang Cœlis, the Attidinarian—Countess of Liliput—Mr Williams's Feats of Unrivalled Leaping—Burmese Ponies—The Countryman's Act of Horsemanship, by Master H. Cooke—Mr Wells on the Enchanted Chair—Billy Button's Disasters.

COBURG THEATRE.—Luke the Labourer—Henry the Fifth—The Pilot.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Canonbury Tower—English Paginini—The Devil at Dunmow.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Alp, the Tartar Khan—A Pill for Portugal—Blue Beard.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

No. 249.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1831.

THE STUDY OF NATURE.*

This, like a former work by the same author,—'First Steps to Botany,'—is written for the purpose of exciting in young minds a sense of the wonderful adaptation of every part of nature to its respective purposes. He observes no regular method, but supposes himself making a little excursion in the company of his young friend, commenting, as he goes, on the objects before him, and occasionally on others which are brought to his mind. He appears to think it necessary to accustom the young student to look abroad upon the wonders of nature, before he is made acquainted with any system, which might tend to confine his views. Here we are induced to think our author under a mistake. The broader views he speaks of, are not only perfectly compatible with system, but are more strongly and clearly impressed upon the mind, by its help. System assists the memory, both in receiving and retaining knowledge; and the habit of considering natural objects in their relative position to each other, enables us better to comprehend their general and individual completeness, than any heaping together of desultory facts. We do not mean to question Dr Drummond's assertion that young people are too apt to rest satisfied with the mere nomenclature of system; but that may be as well remedied by encouraging a habit of observation in connection with systematic study, as by separating two things so intimately connected, and so well calculated to assist each other. The earlier the young mind is exercised in comparing and distinguishing apparently similar objects, and ascertaining the causes of their several peculiarities, the more quick and accurate will be its powers of discrimination in after-life. This is a fact well known to naturalists, and a strong argument for combining systematic order with the earliest pursuit of natural history. If the pupil indeed were to be supposed so young, or of such in-door habits, as to be in danger of becoming a victim to formality, in learning system before anything else, we should say, 'Get him out in the fields above all things, and let him run wild among the birds and buttercups without hearing a word even of instruction.' But it is to be taken for granted, that Nature has done for him in this instance what it has done for others, and made love precede knowledge. We are glad to see that Dr Drummond has not fallen into the modern cant of depreciating Linnæus. We fully agree with him, that the botanical system of the great Swede is by far the easiest and most accurate, and consequently, the least likely to frighten or to confound the young student. Those who desire to see natural history form a part of general education, will do justice to Linnæus. Should his system be superseded by any now taught, botany will cease to be studied by any but professed men of science. It is Dr Drummond's wish that the study of natural history should be rendered attractive; and nothing can be better calculated than his own volumes, to make it so. Let him speak for himself:—

'I think one great view which every man who has time and capacity at the present day should entertain, is to combine science with useful knowledge, and to spread both as far as he can. These cannot be made too easy, and they ought, if possible, to be given in such a dress as to prove attractive and delightful to every man who can read and write. This never will be the case with dry details, however ingenious or perfect the system may be to which they relate; and, hence, notwithstanding the great progress of science as such, comparatively little taste for it has yet spread among the people at large.'

One great design of the author, in his endeavours to extend the study of nature, is, through his works, to draw the attention of the young mind towards 'Nature's God.' He advances no dogmas, holds out no particular doctrines; he does not bid youth to fear and tremble before a beneficent God;—but he says—behold his works;—see how perfect the design, how infinite the goodness visible throughout, and be grateful. This is the natural theology he inculcates. He bids the young student not to arrogate to his own species the sole possession of reason; justly reprobates the unnecessary cruelties which some naturalists have practised;—expatiates upon the entire freedom from ennui, which those enjoy who can find food for contemplation wherever they turn their eyes; and sprinkles the whole with interesting passages on various subjects, well calculated to excite the young student to further enquiry. We add a few extracts from different parts of the volume:—

'Do not suppose that I intend to inculcate the notion that all the actions of animals are the result of instinct. Let no one convince you that man is the only being on this earth endowed with reason. He is infinitely more endowed with it, indeed, than any other; but I am sure no one is making use of that inestimable blessing when he arrogates to his own species alone the entire possession of it. Never let your own pride or the theories of others blind you to the light of truth. Think for yourself, be enchained to no system, look to the operations of the Almighty in his works, and let nothing influence you to reject an item of the truth you there discover. Men have been too little accustomed to search and examine the real state of things, and then to found their opinions on the basis of observation and fact.'

In speaking of the cruelties of naturalists, who have made the cause of science their plea, the author has the following remarks upon the subject of angling:—

'With all my early recollections about me, still I cannot consider angling as an innocent amusement; or if it can with any truth be deemed so, it is when practised with artificial flies, or with salmon-roe, or some other bait without life. To use a living frog, or a a minnow, or other fish, as is often done, with the hook thrust through its skin, cannot surely be called an innocent employment. Though worms seem to have a very delicate sense of touch, and though they seem to suffer much when impaled on the hook, I am not certain that the pain they endure can be compared in intensity with that felt by animals of a higher class under the infliction of similar injuries. Still however, though we may admit that the worm transfixed by a hook may not experience excessive pain, yet it must still undergo no inconsiderable degree of suffering; and that ought to be sufficient to deter a man of sensibility and humane feelings from pursuing an amusement, if so it must be called, which is to be accomplished by the torture of a weak and helpless creature. There is something too appalling in the idea of an animal being impaled on a steel hook, and seeing it writhe in pain, and that only for our sport. In the case of a fisherman by profession, who has to depend on his own skill and exertions for his daily bread, the thing is different:—he must obtain the fish by any means his ingenuity can invent; but I must regret that so many who are under no such necessity, and especially that men of education and cultivated minds, should condescend to employ this petty employment as a recreation.'

How many miserable beings, to whom trouble itself would seem a blessing, if it offered them a sensation, might benefit by the following hint!—

'How many men of independence and leisure are there to whom life is a burthen; on whom time hangs like a weight of lead; and who are eager to plunge into any amusement that may make them forget themselves, and kill the passing time that is fleeting so rapidly to a close! How many persons have committed suicide from want of mental occupation; how many have gone mad by dreaming away their hours in reveries and foolish conceits! But what are these men, to whom time is a burden? Are they geologists, or astronomers, or chemists? Are they botanists or landscape-painters? Are they butterfly-hunters,—to use a term often spoken in derision? Are they naturalists or philosophers of any kind? We may safely, I believe, answer in the negative. No one who pursues science, is likely to complain of the tædium vitæ, the ennui of modern times.'

We are inclined to believe that a love of natural history is inherent in young minds, and that no pains would be found necessary to persuade them to the study. Not to check them, would in most cases be sufficient; and even minds a little sluggish, would be readily excited by a few such baits for curiosity to snap at, as the following:—

'Let me now turn your attention for a time to the element which composes our little streamlet and the wide-spread sea. Is it a simple substance?—No, it is composed of two other bodies joined in chemical union. And what are they? The very opposite to what

* Letter to a Young Naturalist, on the Study of Nature, and Natural Theology. By James L. Drummond, M. D. 12mo. Longman and Co.

Digitized by Google

we might a priori imagine. They are two airs, and one of them is lighter than any air known; it is the lightest indeed of all ponderable substances. The one is oxygen, that part of the atmosphere which is absolutely necessary for the respiration of man and animals, whether they live in air or water. The other is hydrogen or inflammable air, so named because it burns, and explodes when a taper or flame of any kind is applied to it. Oxygen however is as necessary to combustion as it is to respiration, and hence the inflammable air will not burn unless oxygen be present. Now observe this singular fact:—these two gases form water by their combustion, and combustion itself is necessarily dependant on one of them, the oxygen; and yet water, the product of the combustion of the two, is among the most effectual agents we can use to extinguish fire. The torrents of rain which fall during a thunder-storm are formed, in a considerable degree, at the time, by the inflammatory explosion of these two gases, or airs, from their being ignited by the electric spark or lightning passing from one cloud to another.

'At the town of Biddeford, in Devonshire, there is a long bridge of twenty-four arches across the Towridge river, near its junction with the Taw. At this bridge the tide flows so rapidly that it cannot be kept in repair by mortar. The corporation therefore, keep boats in employ to bring muscles to it, and the interstices of the bridge are filled by hand with these muscles. It is supported from being driven away by the tide, entirely by the strong threads these muscles fix to the stone-work; and by an act or grant it is a crime, liable to transportation, for any person to remove these muscles, unless in the presence and by the consent of the corporative trustees.'*

This little book, while it is calculated to fulfil the object of the author, in helping to spread a taste for the study of nature, will also be very acceptable to all whom worldly pursuits have not rendered callous to impressions from natural objects. It is one of those pleasant volumes—of which it is a pity there are not a great many more,—that bring a taste of the country into the very smoke of London, and supply us at once with a ramble and a companion. We must not forget to say that it is enlivened with a number of excellent little engravings, let in between the type, in the manner of the library of Entertaining Knowledge, &c. The work is considered rather dear, we understand; but it is better to give a good price for genuine characteristic prints, than to save a shilling or two, by having bad ones. The swallow, in one of these prints, unites in a singular degree, the look of pouting or nestling plumpness with the lurking spirit of agility. You see he could be "off" in a twinkling.

* Quoted from Daniel's Rural Sports.

JEREMY TAYLOR.*

ALTHOUGH the title of 'Divines of the Church of England' has an air of exclusiveness about it, not in accordance with the enlarged spirit of the times, we are not disposed to cavil at it or any other mode, by which the intellect of former days is introduced to public notice. This series commenced with Sherlock; Barrow followed; and the volume at present before us is the first of a selection from the works of Jeremy Taylor. It contains a pretty copious Life of the Bishop, by the Rev. T. S. Hughes, and Seven Sermons, displaying more or less the diversified excellence which distinguished their author. Taylor's father was by trade a barber, but educated so much above his rank in society as to be able to instruct his children in grammar and mathematics. When only three years of age, young Taylor was sent to a free grammar school at Cambridge; at thirteen he was admitted a sizar at Caius College; and at 21, so rapid and extensive had been his proficiency in his various studies, that he took the degree of M.A.; and shortly after he lectured at St Paul's Cathedral.

'Here he preached,' says a biographer, 'to the admiration and astonishment of his auditory; and by his florid and youthful beauty, his sweet and pleasant air, his sublime and raised discourses, he made his hearers take him for some young angel descended from the visions of glory.'

The hyperbolical strain of this passage need not make us doubt that he made a great and unusual impression. Having attracted the notice of Archbishop Laud, he derived some preferment from that prelate's patronage; but it brought him into connection with the High Church and Prerogative Party, and thence involved him in the disputes and troubles which at that time agitated the country. Taylor adhered to the King's party through all its struggles with the party opposed to Monarchy and the Church, by doing which he suffered great losses of fortune, and was two or three times imprisoned. During one of these periods of adversity, he published his 'Liberty of Prophesying,' a work which would now be deemed not sufficiently comprehensive; but at the time of its appearance it was an evident advance beyond his contemporaries, many of whom, even among those with whom he coincided generally, were offended by it. He was not one, however, to qualify his principles so as to make them palateable to the zealots of his own party, but, on the contrary, took occasion to vindicate them, by showing their conformity to reason and to the spirit of the religion which they as well as he professed.

'When,' he says, 'a persecution did arise against the Church of England, and I intended to make a defensative for my brethren and myself, by pleading for liberty of our consciences to persevere in that profession which was warranted by all the laws of God and our superiors, some men were angry, and would not be safe that way, because I had made the roof of the sanctuary so wide, that more might be sheltered under it than they had a mind should be saved harmless: men would be safe alone or not at all, supposing that their truth and good cause was warranty enough against persecution, if men had believed it to be truth: but because we were fallen under the power of our worst enemies (for brethren turned enemies are ever the most implacable) they looked on us as men in mispersuasion and error. And therefore I was to defend our persons, that whether our cause were right or wrong (for it would be supposed wrong) yet we might be permitted in liberty and impunity; but then the consequent would be this, that if we, when we were supposed to be in error, were yet to be identified, then others also, of whom we thought as ill of, were to rejoice in the same freedom, because this equality is the great instrument of justice; and if we would not do to others as we desired should be done to us, we were no more to pretend religion, because we destroy the law and the prophets. Of this some men were impatient: and they would have all the world spare them, and yet they would spare nobody. But because this is unreasonable, I need no excuse for speaking to other purposes.'

By the success of the republican party Taylor lost his preferment, and was reduced to a state of indigence, from which he was relieved by the friendship and protection of Lord Carbery, a loyalist nobleman, at whose mansion in Wales he resided some years, and composed there many of his works. He afterwards became acquainted with the celebrated Evelyn, to whose interference he owed his liberation from the Tower, where he was confined in the year 1658, for having in one of his works, prefixed a portrait of Christ in the attitude of prayer, 'a species of representation considered little less than idolatry, and prohibited by statute.' Such was the spirit of those often-lauded 'good old times,' With the Restoration Taylor's worldly prosperity in some respects returned. He was elevated to the Bishopric of Down and Connor, and made Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin; but the state of Ireland then, as now, was one of disorder, embittered by religious dissensions, the heat of which he endeavoured to allay by mild and conciliatory proceedings. He had the satisfaction of at least partially succeeding; for although the puritanical clergy, the champions of the Covenant, repelled his advances to meet them in friendly conference, the laity were less wrong-headed, and were offended at the refusal of their pastors. The incessant activity and study of Taylor's life were not without effect on his constitution, in addition to which he had to sustain many domestic calamities, the last of which was the death of one of his sons in a duel, and the irregular conduct of the other, who became the favourite companion of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. He died on the 3rd of August 1667, in the 55th year of his age.

Jeremy Taylor was twice married; his second wife was the natural daughter of Charles the First, and is said, 'to have been brought up in much privacy by some relations in Glamorganshire, to have possessed a very fine person, of which a portrait, yet preserved in the family, is a sufficient evidence, and both in countenance and disposition to have displayed a striking resemblance to her unfortunate father.'

We intended to give some extracts from the Bishop's writings, and advert more particularly to his merits as an author and a preacher, but we must defer both to another paper.

* Divines of the Church of England; with a Life of each Author, a Summary of each Discourse, Notes, &c. By the Rev. T. S. Hughes, B.D. Vol. XIII. (Jeremy Taylor. Vol. I.)

THE BOULEVARDS OF PARIS.

The most remarkable feature in the general appearance of Paris, is the inner inclosure formed by the celebrated road called the 'Boulevards.' On the north side of the river, the Boulevards follow a line nearly midway, on an average, between the river and the wall. The space which they comprehend therefore, is but a small portion of that included within the outer boundary of the city. The length of this part of the road is about 5,200 English yards, or somewhat under three miles. That on the south side of the river is of far greater extent, approaching, as it does, throughout its whole sweep, very much closer to the wall, and in some parts entirely coinciding with it. It measures about 16,000 yards, or above nine miles in length. Each of these lines, although in reality forming an uninterrupted road from its commencement to its termination, is divided into a succession of parts, each having its particular name.

Digitized by Google

The northern Boulevards are twelve in number, the southern seven. We have nothing in England like the Parisian Boulevards. They may be generally described as a road or street, of great breadth, along each side of which are planted double rows of elms. But these shady avenues do not present merely a picture of rural beauty. Rising as they do in the heart of a great city, they partake also of its artificial elegance and splendour, and are associated with all the luxuries of architectural decoration. Considered merely as a range of streets, the Boulevards are hardly rivalled by any other part of Paris. Those to the north of the river are lined on both sides, throughout their whole extent, by buildings more uniformly handsome than are those of almost any other street in the city, and by many which may be even described as magnificent. Some of these are private residences; others are shops, cafés, public hotels, and theatres. The crowds by whom so many parts of these Boulevards are frequented chiefly give to the scene its singular liveliness and brilliancy. The southern Boulevards, though equally beautiful, are far from being so much the habitual resort of the citizens; but the walks, on this very account, have a charm for some moods of mind which the others want. Another road, planted in a similar manner, has more recently been carried round the exterior walls of the city. It is distinguished from the inner Boulevards by the name of the 'Boulevards Exterieurs.'—Library of Entertaining Knowledge. Paris and its Historical Scenes.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE HEART'S REVERIE.

My friends, the blue sky, and the swelling sea,
The bee-sucked flow'r and the bird-haunted tree,
The green earth, and the ivy-covered bower
Where the winds nestle in, in this calm hour
Which I have stolen from the world to brood
O'er you, and with you, in your solitude,
(For ye all seem with spirit and feeling fraught,
And, in your voicelessness, to pause with thought),
Again I greet you—and again I find
Your beauty soothe and elevate my mind.
Dear Nature, whilst I thus commune with thee,
Thy look a pensive mother's seems to be,
I love thee with the rapture of a boy,
And, all thou givest, like a child, enjoy;
I love a flower—'tis sure to lose its hue,
But then it never promised to be true.
I love a leaf—yes, after it has strayed
With the false winds and down in death is laid.
It seems to pine for its forsaken tree,
And in that pining seems to pity me.
I love a bird, it sings and flies away,
I love it still—it made no vow to stay,
In fine, I love all things in earth and sky,
As I would love my kind—without a sigh
Into whose hearts that love I fain would pour,
Full as yon gentle sea its waves upon the shore.

SFORZA.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

ABUSE OF PRIVILEGE.—Pelisson (a French historian) was so much disfigured by the small-pox, that Madame de Sevigné said that he abused the privilege which men had of being ugly.

REPUBLICAN EQUALITY.—We copy the following from the New York General Advertiser:—A coloured man, a trader, in Charleston, S. C., recently brought a suit against a white man for debt. The book of original entries was exhibited in court; but as it had been kept by a coloured man, of course it was not admitted as evidence, and thus the honest black trader was non-suited.

CHILDREN.—No man can tell but he that loves his children, how many delicious accents make a man's heart dance in the pretty conversation of those dear pledges; their childishness, their stammering, their little angers, their innocence, their imperfections, their necessities, are so many little mansations of joy and comfort to him that delights in their persons and society.—Jeremy Taylor.

APELLES TO CAMPASPE.

I cannot paint thee while those heavenly eyes
Wear that fond languishment—that tender mien;
For, sooth, I would not have their witcheries
By prouder gazers than myself be seen.
Oh! look less lovely—look as cold as snow,
That none may, pausing on thy beauty's line
Writ on my canvass, sigh and wish to know
The fair original of my design!
Why should I mimic for the common stare
The love-lit lightning of an angel smile,
That, in my heart's fond hopelessness, I dare
To think, is meant my sorrows to beguile?
Campaspe! look as beautiful as day,
But from thy beauty take thy love away!

The Dwelling of Fancy.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON KING OF SPAIN.—The consequences of caricaturing are made evident from an important letter in the Herald of Friday, which informs the editor, 'upon undoubted authority,' that a carrier in Spain had been seized and thrown into a dungeon between Cadiz and Zeres, having been detected in the act of conveying to a gentleman of the latter place an English caricature published some months ago, and entitled 'Don-Key.' The figure represented was supposed by the zealous authorities of Cadiz to be a caricature of King Ferdinand the Seventh in his robes. The poor carrier has been in prison three months, and his mules are empounded till the liberation of their master. The last fact we have from our own private correspondent at Port St Mary's; it is not the least important part of the proceedings.—Atlas.

WATERLOO DAY.—Saturday, the anniversary of the eventful battle of Waterloo, is marked by a ceremony of the chivalric character of very peculiar interest. Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington and Prince of Waterloo holds his lands of Strathfieldsay by a tenure, the most honourable known to the feudal or modern law of arms. On the anniversary of the crown of his conquests, the last of that great series of battles in India, Portugal, Spain, France, and Belgium, which marked his extraordinary career, the great captain is bound by his tenure to present to the King a tri-coloured flag; the restoration of which, or its acceptance by his Majesty, is the token of a charter renewed. This suit and service is to mark to a grateful posterity the day when the valour of British troops and the skill of their general reached the climax of success and honour; winning, by the defeat of the Emperor in person, the last laurel from the crown that had been considered deathless. Each of Napoleon's generals, that galaxy of military talent, had in succession yielded to Wellington and English soldiers. On that day Napoleon and the imperial guard fled before them, and the ceremony we have indicated celebrates that triumph.—Atlas.

TOLLING TO KIRK.—In the old days of Scotland, when persons of property (unless they happened to be non-jurors) were as regular as their inferiors in their attendance on parochial worship, there was a kind of etiquette, in waiting till the patron, or acknowledged great man of the parish, should make his appearance. This ceremony was so sacred in the eyes of a parish beadle in the Isle of Bute, that the kirk-bell being out of order, he is said to have mounted the steeple every Sunday, to imitate with his voice the successive summonses which its mouth of metal used to send forth. The first part of this imitative harmony was simply the repetition of the words Bell bell, bell bell, two or three times, in a manner as much resembling the sound as throat of flesh could imitate throat of iron. Bellim, bellim was sounded forth in a more urgent manner; but he never sent forth the the third and conclusive peal, the varied tone of which is called the ringing-in, until the two principal heritors of the parish approached, when the chime ran thus:—

Bellim, Belellum,
Bennera and Knockdow's coming!
Bellim, Bellellum,
Bennera and Knockdow's coming!

Thereby intimating that service was instantly to proceed.—Notes to the Waverley Novels.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Romeo and Juliet—Napoleon Buonaparte.
HAYMARKET.—The Goldsmith—The Widow Bewitched—Paul Pry—Monsieur Tonson.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Le Solliciteur—Le Juif—Mons. Pique Assiette.

COVENT GARDEN.

A GENTLEMAN of the name of MASON, brother, we believe, of a Mr MASON who appeared some years back on the London boards, made his debut in the same quarter last night, as Romeo: but we feel ourselves bound in courtesy to postpone our judgment of him, as at the end of the second act, an apology was made for his extreme hoarseness, and the indulgence of the audience requested in consequence. Hoarseness alone might not be much, otherwise KEAN would have had to apologize almost every night of his performance, and so might the new actor's relation, Mr JOHN KEMBLE. But on a first night, any extraordinary access of a physical obstacle may reasonably be supposed to put all the actor's faculties to a disadvantage; and therefore we did not even stay to complete our opinion of Mr MASON. All that we shall say is, that he appears young, has an air of respectability, and a greater likeness to some of the KEMBLE connexions than to those on the stage, except in his voice, which reminded us so much at times of the high hollow tones of JOHN KEMBLE, as probably to be owing to the same physical causes, and therefore not likely to be very different at any time. This however, as we have just hinted, is no obstacle to Mr MASON'S ultimate success, if he should turn out to partake in any high degree of the better family qualifications. To our play-going ears we could not, indeed, help feeling it a recommendation. We did not admire it in his celebrated kinsman; but the sound was connected with old play-going times, and JOHN KEMBLE is gone, and we would fain hear him again if we could. He seemed to have a value for Shakspeare's lines, if he had nothing else; and he looked like our book-notions of the Catos and Coriolanuses; and even such images of fine actors are not to be had every day.

Digitized by Google

CHARLES KEMBLE, who positively grows younger and younger except in fat, and puts forth green shoots of vivacity like an everlasting juniper, acted with his usual effect in Mercutio. Why will his daughter be perverse, and insist upon suddenly bridling up and making doleful majesty of the line about the "ga-arish sun," when her praises of Romeo ought to make her full of nothing but life and spirits. The critics may have objected to her mode of delivering the line; but love, she may be assured, objects to it much more.

HAYMARKET.

'WE just dropt in' here last night to watch the proceedings of Mr Paul Pry. We hardly knew him again. The lively, bustling HARLEY had assumed his coat and was uttering his words, and doing his deeds; but unfortunately he had forgotten to drop his own peculiar quips, and nods, and knowing smiles; his abrupt and continual compression of mouth, glowing of eyes, and incessant restlessness. He was going about his work too obviously; it was broad unmasked curiosity; it had none of the sneaking subtlety of prying. It seemed a mistake altogether. The play itself is amusing, and in the principal character hits off very well a common nuisance in society. LISTON's personation of it left nothing to desire, and the remembrance of him in it is a disadvantage to any other actor.

Mrs GLOVER's Mrs Subtle is excellent, and she plays it as well as ever. Mrs HUMBY, in the waiting-maid, played, looked, and sang 'Cherry ripe'—prettily.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A FAVOURITE OPERA.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT's Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Signor Costa.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré.

M. Lefebvre, M. Emile. M. Simon, M. Antoni, and M. Venafra.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

For the Benefit of Miss Inverarity.

The Comic Opera of

LOVE IN A VILLAGE.

[By BICKERSTAFF.]

Rosetta, Miss Inverarity. Lucinda, Miss Cawse.
Deborah Woodcock, Mrs Gibbs. Housemaid, Mrs Daly. Madge, Miss Taylor.
Sir William Meadows, Mr Egerton. Justice Woodcock, Mr Blanchard.
Young Meadows, Mr Wilson. Hawthorn, Mr Braham. Eutace, Mr Duruset.
Hodge, Mr Keeley. Carter, Mr Evans. Cook, Mr Turnour.

In the course of the Evening, the Overture to 'Love in a Village;' C. M. Von Weber's Overture to 'Oberon;' and Bishop's Overture to 'The Miller and His Men.'

A Variety of VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

To conclude with a Melo-Drama, called

THE MILLER AND HIS MEN.

[By Mr POCOCK.]

Claudine, Mrs Vining. Ravina, Mrs Lovell. Lauretta, Miss P. Horton.
Grindoff, Mr Farley. Count Friberg, Mr Parry.
Karl, Mr Blanchard. Lothair. Mr Abbott. Kelmar, Mr Evans.
Kreutz, Master Watson. Riber, Mr Henry.
Golotz, Mr Mears. Zingra, Mr Norris.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Opera of

THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.

Countess Almaviva, Miss Land. Susanna, Miss Wells.
Barbarina, Mrs T. Hill. Marcellina, Mrs Coveney.
Count Almaviva, Mr Vining. Antonio, M. J. Cooper. Fiorello, Mr Huckel.
Figaro, Mr Harley. Cherubino, Mrs Humby. Basil, Mr Bishop.
Notary, Mr V. Webster. Sebastian, Mr Moore.

After which, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Comedy of

SPEED THE PLOUGH.

[By MORTON.]

Dame Ashfield, Mrs Glover. Miss Blandford, Mrs Ashton.
Lady Handy, Mrs Tayleure. Susan Ashfield, Miss J. Scott.
Sir Abel Handy, Mr W. Farren.
Bob Handy, Mr Vining. Sir Philip Blandford, Mr H. Wallack.
Morrington, Mr W. Johnson. Henry, Mr Cooper.
Farmer Ashfield, Mr Webster. Evergreen, Mr Coveney.
Gerald, Mr Mulleney. Peter, Mr V. Webster.

To-morrow, Secrets Worth Knowing; A Roland for an Oliver; The Widow Bewitched.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL,

In Three Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—Songs, 'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—Songs, 'The Omnibus,' and 'The Country Concert.'

PART III.—Song, 'Thames Sailing Match.' Scena. Song, 'Harlowe Bush Fair.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comedy of

THE HYPOCRITE.

[By BICKERSTAFF.]

Old Lady Lambert, Madame Simon. Young Lady Lambert, Miss Scott.
Charlotte, Miss M. C. Poole. Betty, Miss Nicol.
Sir John Lambert, Mr D. Pitt. Colonel Lambert, Mr C. Hill.
Doctor Cantwell, Mr Williams. Darnley, Mr Honner. Seward, Mr Maitland.
Mawworm, Mr Vale.

A Chinese Pas Seul, by Master Saunders.

After which, a Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Vale.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on 'Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,') Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

To conclude with, by desire, a Drama, entitled

DAMON AND PYTHIAS.

Hermion, Miss M. C. Poole. Calanthe, Miss Scott.
Eudosia, Miss Somerville. Phygenia, Miss Vincent. Arria, Miss Rumens.
Rygcia, Madame Simon. Lyphrasia, Miss Jordan. Listea, Miss Nicol.
Damon, Mr Osbaldiston. Dionysius, Mr D. Pitt. Pythias, Mr C. Hill.
Philistius, Mr Almar. Damocles, Mr Gough.
Melcthon, Mr Edwin. Procles, Mr Honner. Lucullus, Mr Lee.
Fabius, Mr Webb. Pellagus, Mr Young. Arcus. Mr Hobbs.
Aranthon, Mr Ransford. Naxillus, Mr Boulanger.
Petus, Mr Willmot. Executioner, Mr Thomson.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.

Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingarod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, of

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, (with the Original Hornpipe) Mr Forrester.
The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilkinson.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Slack Rope, Herculean Feats, and Jumping, by Mr Williams—Grand Horse Combat—Master Cooke's Vaulting Exercises—The Horses 'Pegasus' and 'Harebell'—The Peruvian—Double Tight Rope—Rival Clowns—Lilliputian Bonaparte—Mr J. Cooke will appear in Six New Characters—The Brentford Election.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Canonbury Tower—English Paginini—The Devil at Dunmow.

THEATRE SANS SOUCI, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Faithful Irishman—Jocko—Roland for an Oliver.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 12 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 46 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 250.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22, 1831.

SPINES AND TIGHT-LACING.*

The little work mentioned below is one which concerns not the faculty alone, but every one who has the charge of youth, from the earliest infancy to the cessation of growth. It is not encumbered with technicalities, but written in that clear, unaffected style, best adapted for a work that should be in general circulation. Albeit not much given to medical studies, we have read the book through; and though somewhat startled at the great variety of diseases referred to the spine, the reasoning seems so clear, that we cannot doubt it. How, indeed, can we wonder that, communicating with so many parts of the body, the spine, when itself diseased, should derange the whole system, and appear under various forms, according to the part affected? It seems, nevertheless, that its extensive influence has hitherto been imperfectly understood, and that further opportunities of observation are yet wanting, on the subject of what is termed spinal irritation. What renders it of vital importance that parents should be aware of its Protean disguises, is the great danger attendant upon a mistake of the complaint in some cases, and the experience necessary to distinguish it from others of which it assumes the appearance.

'A delicate, pale-faced, bloodless female,' says the author, 'complains of pains in the side, may have a slight cough, her breathing is hurried, her pulse frequent, her appetite bad, her tongue coated. A routine practitioner pronounces it a case of pleurisy, the lancet is called into play, &c. &c., foxglove or colchicum is prescribed, and that irritation which really constituted the complaint is kept up by the treatment adopted. Perhaps the symptoms are aggravated, the obstinacy of the disease calls for farther antiphlogistic remedies, and the patient dies, or falls into a state of apparent consumption. Such cases are not uncommon, and it behoves the young practitioner to endeavour to form a correct judgment with regard to them. Unfortunately the kind of cases which are seen by students, at hospitals and dispensaries, being chiefly those of the labouring classes, and for the most part inflammatory, misleads the judgment, and he commences practice with the habit of seeing inflammation at every step. His teacher and his experience both have misled him. It is often many years before the prejudices imbibed in the schools are destroyed by real experience of the diseases of a higher grade of society; but time at length convinces him that, as there is a nervous as well as a vascular system, so there are as many, and perhaps more, nervous than vascular or inflammatory diseases.'

Thus there is an acknowledged aristocracy even in disease. Nervous diseases are never found among those who live by hard labour, or by active occupation in the open air; they belong chiefly to the idle or the sedentary; and have been considered by medical men as their chief source of trouble and of profit. Mr Beale holds out a hope, that the following up of the present active enquiries into the nature of spinal irritation will throw a new light on this class of diseases. The opportunities of observation, however, are but few, inasmuch as, not being often fatal, they do not admit of post-mortem examination.

'We have enumerated many symptoms which appertain to the long catalogue of those which characterise what have been denominated nervous disorders, and if experience affirms the conclusion, that these distressing and perplexing maladies always have their causes in the spine, this will not be the most unimportant of the modern improvements in the art of healing. That such a connexion does exist in many instances, we have abundant facts to testify; numerous cases are now on record, of nervous and hysteric complaints being removed by local applications to particular parts of the spine. This class of diseases have hitherto been so perplexing, and a remedial means has so long been a desideratum, that the spine should never be neglected in such disorders. By careful observations, we shall be enabled to verify the truth of the foregoing descriptions, and determine how far we are warranted in referring nervous disorders to irritation or subacute inflammation of the spinal brain, or the communicating nerves. If we succeed only here and there in a case, we shall be rewarded for our trouble; for although these complaints are too often disregarded, and made the subject of ridicule, although they are never attended with any danger to life, yet there is no class of maladies more distressing to the sufferers themselves.'

Another strong reason why parents should be acquainted with the work, is, that it shews them how frequently children become deformed by neglect or mismanagement, and how important it is to attend to the very first symptoms of general debility. There are few cases, the author tells us, in which deformity might not be prevented or removed by early attention and judicious treatment. He gives directions for the management of weakly children, which mothers would do well to study; and asserts that the air of the most confined parts of the city of London is sufficiently pure for children to breathe without injury to health, if not confined within the house, improperly fed, &c. At a later age, he reprobates the practice of insisting upon a constantly upright position, and quotes the opinions of several authors on this subject, shewing, that where there is any weakness of the spine, this is the very mode of encouraging deformity.

'The party makes a forced effort to sit erect; in a few moments the effort relaxes, and the spine yields, the trunk sensibly sinking, the chest becoming flatted, and the back arched. When this degree of weakness exists, the spine is never safe; it is sure to yield in some direction; and the early inflection begets a long train of nervous, thoracic, and other disturbances. In such cases, whether curvature be discoverable or not, I enjoin the parties to take refuge in the recumbent posture. So long as the dorsal muscles are in action, the mischief cannot advance, and restoration of power to those muscles, by local and constitutional means, is the only effectual cure. The cure, too, is not difficult, when commenced early, and judiciously pursued. So long as the weakness continues, there is no security, save in avoiding the sitting posture, whenever the trunk cannot be fully supported. I have found a great advantage in this respect, in dispensing with the 'board,' as it is termed, and converting a common sofa into an inclined plane. This is readily done by any carpenter; a plane raised to seven or eight inches at one end, and terminating in a point being slipped under the cushion. This arrangement excites no observation,—a consideration of some moment, where the feelings are sensitive; it is always at hand, and will be used freely, when the formality and display of lying down on the board would be repulsive.'

Among the various causes of deformity, arising from a curvature of the spine, Mr Beale mentions tight-lacing. In some few instances it has been the sole cause; in others, it has been one of many; and even where actual deformity is not the result, all beautiful proportion is destroyed. There can be no grace, no freedom of action, in a body so confined; the breathing is obstructed, the digestion weakened, and the general health altogether deranged. Is it not extraordinary that any person of common sense should consent to exchange health of mind and body, a well-proportioned form, graceful motion, and the bloom of youth, all for—what?—for a waist unnaturally and frightfully small, red arms, and thick ankles!! In the hope that the consequences of this pernicious habit, as shewn by Mr Beale, may have weight with some one or more of our readers, we conclude with the following extracts, which to those who read them with the attention they deserve, cannot but be matter of serious consideration.

'Tight-lacing not only prevents a due development of the muscles by pressure, but by fixing into one immovable mass the ribs and vertebræ of the back, which, more especially in youth, should have free motion on each other, makes the whole upper part of the body a dead weight on the vertebræ of the loins, which in consequence give way to one or other side, and lateral curvature is produced . . . . . Not only does tight-lacing act directly in this manner, but indirectly it operates in diminishing muscular vigour, by impeding respiration. It is well known that muscular power bears a relative proportion to the freedom of respiration, animals having the highest development of the respiratory organs, being the most powerful in muscular force. Tight stays compress the ribs together, and prevent the play of the respiratory muscles; when applied during the growth of the body, they prevent the development of the chest, and thus lay the foundation of many pectoral diseases. . . . . The female form, at least in youth, requires no artificial aid to improve it; who would think of putting stays on the Venus de Medicis?'

* Observations on Distortions of the Spine: with a Few Remarks on Deformities of the Legs. By Lionel J. Beale, Member of the College of Surgeons, and Author of a Treatise on Deformities. 8vo. pp.100. John Wilson.

Digitized by Google

Mr Beale quotes the following passage from a work entitled 'A Comparative View of the Faculties of Man with those of the Animal World.'

'Some nations have fancied that Nature did not give a good shape to the head, and thought it would be better to mould it into the form of a sugar-loaf. The Chinese thinks a woman's foot much handsomer if squeezed into a third part of its natural size. Some African nations have a like quarrel with the shape of the nose, which they think ought to be laid as flat as possible on the face. We laugh at the folly, and are shocked with the cruelty of these barbarians, but think it a very clear case, that the natural shape of a woman's chest is not so elegant as we can make it by the confinement of stays. The common effect of this practice, is obstructions in the lungs, from their not having sufficient room to play, which, besides tainting the breath, cuts off numbers of young women in the very bloom of life. But Nature has shewn her resentment of this practice in a very striking manner, by rendering above half the women of fashion deformed, in some degree or other. Deformity is peculiar to the civilized part of mankind, and is almost always the work of our own hands.'

We fear the author speaks too truly, when he says, we think it 'a very clear case, &c., that a woman ought to have stays instead of a chest.' Yet it would be found, we believe, upon enquiry, that no woman respected for her good sense in other matters is given to this folly; and of the other sex, none but the most ignorant and coxcomical admire, or affect to admire, a female the more for resembling—we can scarcely say, an animated hour-glass. Time might hold one of them in his hand for an emblem, especially as they are for cutting their days short as well as their ribs.

It is a frequent matter of astonishment, why females should persist in tight-lacing when so much is said against it, and how it happens that they should take what is really a deformity for something handsome. The first part of this mystery is answered by the second: they think the waist produced by tight-lacing a beauty; and the reason why they think so is, that they know a small waist to be an object of admiration, and they feel that they never can persuade you it is small without forcing the smallness upon one's eyes, and thus compelling one to acknowledge it. On the contrary, we feel that if the waist were really small, so much pains would not be taken to convince us of it. But this the dear absurdities will not consider. Everyone thinks that there will be an exception in her favour. Other women, she allows, make themselves ridiculous, and attempt to impose upon us:—with her the case is different:—everybody must see that her waist is really small. Therefore she goes lacing and lacing on, till she becomes like a wasp; and everybody who follows her in the street, laughs at her.

We have seen some of these waists, of such a frightful tenuity, as to strike the least thinking observer with their ugliness. The other day there was a young lady before us in the street, whose waist literally struck you as being no thicker than a large arm. The poor girl had infallibly marked herself for death. Some of the most vital parts inside of her, must have been lapped over one another, or frightfully, not to say disgustingly, compressed into a mass. The first sensation, at seeing this phenomenon, was pain at the monstrosity; the second was vexation with the poor silly girl; the third was pity. The ground of this folly, like that of so many others, which excite in us the folly of impatience, is sympathy, however mistaken. The poor simpleton wishes for our admiration, and does not know that she has tried hard to gain contempt. We ought the less to be provoked, because in all these yearnings after social approbation, there is the germ of a great preferment for the community; since the same people, who now make themselves so ridiculous, and get so much death and disease, by pursuing false means of obtaining our good opinion, would, in a wiser state of society, be led as vehemently to adopt the true. Instead of going about half stifled, with bad livers, and ready-made Coroner's inquests, the poor dear creatures would then be anxious to shew us that they were natural healthy females, fit to be wives and mothers; and instead of having bodies like insects, that they were made like the Venus de Medicis, and the other ideal shapes of beauty; which they certainly no more resemble in their tight-laced condition, than a dice-box resembles a pear, or a pair of stays a body to love.

POETRY.

ROBIN HOOD AND HIS MERRY MEN AT SHERWOOD FOREST.

The merry pranks he play'd would ask an age to tell,
And the adventures strange that Robin Hood befel,
When Mansfield many a time for Robin hath been laid,
How he hath cozen'd them, that him would have betrayed;
How often he hath come to Nottingham disguised,
And cunningly escaped, being set to be surprised.
In this our spacious isle I think there is not one
But he hath heard some talk of him and little John;
And to the end of time the tales shall ne'er be done,
Of Scarlock, George-a-green, and Much the miller's son,
Of Tuck the merry friar, which many a sermon made
In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade.
An hundred valiant men had this brave Robin Hood
Still ready at his call, that bowmen were right good,
All clad in Lincoln green, with caps of red and blue.
His feilows winded horn, not one of them but knew,
When setting to their lips their little bengles shrill,
The warbling echoes wak'd from every dale and hill:
Their bauldrick's set with studs athwart their shoulders cast,
To which, under their arms, their sheafs were buckled fast;
A short sword at their belt, a buckler scarce a span;
Who struck below the knee not counted then a man:
All made of Spanish yew, their bows were wondrous strong;
They not an arrow drew but was a cloth-yard long.
Of archery they had the very perfect craft,
With broad arrow or but, or prick or roving shaft,
At marks full forty score they us'd to prick and rove,
Yet higher than the breast for comfort never strove;
Yet at the farthest mark a foot could hardly win:
At long-buts, short, and hoyles, each one could cleave the pin:
Their arrows finely paired, for timber and for feather,
With birch and brazil piec'd, to fly in any weather;
And shot they with the round, the square, or forked pile,
The loose gave such a twang as might be heard a mile.
And of these archers brave there was not any one
But he could kill a deer his swiftest speed upon,
Which they did boil and roast, in many a mighty wood,
Sharp hunger the fine sauce to their more kingly food.
Then taking them to rest, his merry men and he Slept many a summer's night under the green wood tree.
From wealthy Abbots' chests and churls' abundant store
What oftentimes he took he shar'd among the poor:
No lordly Bishop came in lusty Robin's way,
To him before he went, but for his pass must pay.
The widow in distress he generously relieved,
And remedied the wrongs of many a virgin grieved:
He from the husband's bed no married woman wan,
But to the mistress dear, his loved Marian,
Was ever constant known, which, wheresoe'er she came,
Was sovereign of the woods, chief lady of the game:
Her clothes tuck'd to the knee, and dainty braided hair,
With bow and quiver arm'd, she wandered here and there.
Amongst the forest wild; Diana never kuew
Such pleasures, nor such harts as Mariana slew.

DRAYTON.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— The wonders of nature lie out of the common paths: so as the very absurdity of an attempt may sometimes be prosperous.—Bacon.

— The vexation of sickness, the sweetness of life, the flattery of hope, and the commendation of friends, makes men to depend upon physicians, with all their defects.—Bacon.

MARRIAGES FOR MONEY.—Men and women change their liberty for a rich fortune, and shew themselves to be less than money, by overvaluing that to all the content and wise felicity of their lives; and when they have counted the money and their sorrows together, how willingly would they buy, with the loss of all that money, modesty, or sweet nature, to their relative! The odd thousand pounds would gladly be allowed in good-nature and fair manners.—Jeremy Taylor.

AN UGLY DISAPPOINTMENT.—A beautiful woman took Pelisson by the hand one day, as he was walking in the street, and conducted him to a house close by. Struck with her charms, he was unable to resist, and flattered himself with a very agreeable issue to this adventure. The lady presented him to the master of the House, saying: Feature for feature, like that. She then abruptly quitted, leaving the wit behind. Pelisson recovered from his astonishment, demanded an explanation of all this from the master of the house, who acknowledged that he was a painter: I have, said he, undertaken for this lady, the subject of the temptation of Christ in the wilderness. We have been disputing above an hour upon the figure that should be given to the devil, and she stept in just now to explain to me that she wished me to take you for the model.

DEJECTION.

I'll sit me down and weep!
All things have cast me from them but the earth:
The evening comes, and every little flower
Droops now as well as I.

Beaumont and Eletcher,—The Coxcomb.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—Semiramide—Kenilworth.
COVENT-GARDEN.—Love in a Village—The Miller and his Men.
HAYMARKET.—The Marriage of Figaro—The Widow Bewitched—Speed the Plough.

COVENT GARDEN.

MISS INVERARITY, like a good honest girl, who deserves to have the fine talent and the pleasure-giving face that Nature has bestowed upon her, sent us a couple of tickets for Love in a Village, which was performed for her benefit last night: so we went, and had not only the pleasure of hearing her in a new part, but of finding one of the most strongly-cast pieces of the kind we remember to have witnessed. There was herself, 'videlicet, herself,' in Rosetta: WILSON was Young Meadows: BLANCHARD, the Justice; Mrs GIBBS, his sister; Miss CAWSE, his daughter; DURUSET, the daughter's lover; KEELEY, Hodge; Madge was Miss TAYLOR; and Hawthorn was BRAHAM. This is the right sort of thing. Players are too apt to think, that one or twe good hands are not only sufficient in a piece, but are the better for having bad ones to set them off; which is as great a mistake as if a painter were to make some of his colours of the right mixture, and have the others from a painter and glazier; or as if a person who invited us to dinner should not only give us but two good dishes out of five, but the rest positively bad, and the butter rancid. It has often struck us, that if we were actors, and good ones, we would sometimes request to be put into subordinate parts, merely to shew how much might be made of them, and to encourage a spirit of good sense in this matter.

What has come to Messrs BRAHAM and CHARLES KEMBLE in their old age we know not, but the former seems of late almost as improved as the latter. We have heard of his achievements from others, and last night we saw them. He came on as Hawthorn in high style, reposing with true confidence on his gun and his rustic stoutness, and giving the song of the Jolly Miller in all the glory of its simplicity; not however without the just commentary of a few jovial digs of the fist, on the words

I care for nobody, no not I,
If nobody cares for me.

His shake on the words under the rose, was new to us, and equally to the purpose. And he acted very well indeed throughout. How is it? Is it a new kind of second childhood, as extraordinary and vigorous, as other men's are decrepid; and like the people we sometimes read of, who have a new set of teeth at sixty? Or is it young ladies' benefit nights that inspire him? The phenomenon exists somehow, and a very acceptable one it is. The galleries re-echo his potent strains with storms of approbation; and people tell one another how old he is; and marvel at his crescendo.—We could have spared the song accompanied by himself on the piano-forte. It was sung between the acts, but the singer was in the costume of Hawthorn, and the two notions did not suit. Hawthorn at a piano-forte is like a farmer in an opera-box.

Mrs GIBBS is not so good a Deborah Woodcock as Mrs DAVENPORT, but she is always good, nevertheless, after a fashion. BLANCHARD, as the Justice, wants some of DOWTON'S unction; but then DOWTON has too much of it; and we are not sure that his thinness is not more in character. DOWTON'S Justice looks as if he had run more after good dinners than pretty girls. KEELEY is an excellent Hodge. He does not give the rustic mode of speaking so well as we have heard it; but in all the rest nothing could be better. His brutality is of the most solid description, with an impudent air of tranquillity and of a foundation in reason; yet he varies the tones of his petulant sallies admirably. Almost everything he uttered produced a roar of approbation. And Miss TAYLOR surprised us with the excellence of her Madge. We did not expect her, after the way in which she allowed herself to be spoiled by her inferiors, to give herself up so completely to the nature of the character. Her jeering tones of contempt, and gestures to match it, thrusting out her head and chin, and grinding her words, as it were, into Hodge's face, were particularly excellent. We had only to find fault now and then, when she became pathetic, and when she sang the song recalling her once happy condition, during which she ought not to have smiled and acted over again her former happiness, but to have been full of the pensiveness of the contrast. It is a song to be sung in the simplest manner, with a corner of the apron held in the hand, and a tear in the eye. But her performance, altogether, is a considerable addition to her stock. What a variety of excellence has not a melo-dramatic education and common-place tragedy teachers prevented in this clever actress!

We doubt whether the English ballad style will be found to suit Miss INVERARITY so well as composition of a higher order. She is of a more chearful, revelling, and powerful spirit than it requires; and having come out of the Italian school, we doubt whether she can subject herself sufficiently to the other. There is also a pleasurable richness in the middle tones of her voice, which seems to require a greater luxuriance of emotion than the English ballad supplies. She seemed delighted to get into the merry mocking song in which she pretends to complain of the old Jusstice, and which produced a rapturous encore. We never heard her in better voice, nor saw her (to use a new phrase) in better face. Also, she was capitally well-dressed. She not only has a good person, but knows how to set it off; which is good upon good; and we will swear from her face, that she is a good, chearful-hearted girl, and deserves to send tickets to honest critics, who (between ourselves) would not go to see everybody, if they were to send dozens.

By the way, her voice goes better with BRAHAM'S than Miss PATON'S did at the oratorios. They sang a duet in the course of the piece, with great applause. After the play, there was a quartett, which we could not admire; nor can we give Mr NICHOLSON'S flute credit for much sensibility, though it is full of skill and power. We thought he was going to give us 'John Anderson my Jo,' with real simplicity; but he could not find it in his heart to let us have it without flourishes. Anderson, besides his grey locks, must, he thought, have feathers in his cap. As a variation, it might have been so; since variations upon airs are chartered vagaries; but it was hard not to let us have the real beautiful air once. BRAHAM sang 'The Bay of Biscay' with his usual effect. These intermediate performances between the play and the afterpiece closed with 'God save the King,' which produced a storm of hurras.

MUSIC IN OLD THEATRES.

THE mention of music, or minstrelsy, as an accompaniment of the old Morals, is not frequent, although songs are often introduced into them; but it is very clear that companies of players who visited monasteries and the houses of the nobility prior to the Reformation were often attended by minstrels, who are sometimes mentioned with and rewarded at the same time as the actors. . . . . .

Although various songs are introduced into Ralph Roister Doister, it nowhere appears that music was played between the acts. At the end of Act 2 of Gammer Gurton's Needle, 1566, Diccon, addressing himself to the instrumental performers, tells them, 'In the mean time, fellows, pipe up your fiddles;' and perhaps we may conclude that music was also played at the close of the other acts, although it is not mentioned. In the Two Italian Gentlemen, by Anthony Munday, (printed about 1584) the different kinds of music to be played after each act are mentioned, whether 'a pleasant galliard,' 'a solemn dump,' or 'a pleasant allemaigne.' Marston is very particular in his Sophonisba, 1606, in pointing out the instruments to be played during the four intervals of the acts:— . . . . . .

In the course of Act 5 he introduces a novel species of harmony, for we are twice told that 'infernal music plays softly.' Fiddles, flutes, and hautboys are mentioned by other dramatists, as instruments then in use at the theatres. Nabbes, in the prologue to his Hannibal and Scipio, 1637, alludes at the same time to the change of the place of action, and to the performance of instruments between the acts —

'The place is sometimes changed too with the scene,
Which is translated as the music plays
Betwixt the acts.'

Malone refers to a warrant of protection, dated 1624, by Sir H. Herbert to Nicholas Underhill and others, 'and all employed by the King's Majesty's servants in their quality of playing as musicians and other necessary attendants;' but here it is impossible to distinguish who were musicians and who attendants, and a doubt must exist whether the musicians did not sometimes perform, and vice versâ. We know that Phillippes and other actors of eminence played upon different instruments, and Pallant was a performer in the 'plat' of the second part of The Seven Deadly Sins, before 1588: possibly after he had ceased to act he became an instrumental performer in the band. The fee to the Master of the Revels for 'a warrant for the musicians of the King's Company' appears to have been 1*l.*; before this date we do not hear of any such claim by the Master of the Revels.

Digitized by Google

Dr Burney, in his 'History of Music,' quotes from a MS. then in the possession of Dr Moreton of the British Museum, an account of the preparation and performances of Shirley's Mask of Peace, in February 1633-4, in which it is said that 'the Blackfriars' music was then esteemed the best of the common musicians in London.' The shifts they were put to after the closing of the theatres in 1642 are thus humourously noticed by the author of 'The Actor's Remonstrance, 1643:'—'Our music, that was held so delectable and precious, that they scorned to come to a tavern under twenty shillings salary for two hours, now wander with their instruments under their cloaks—I mean such as have any—into all houses of good fellowship, saluting every room where there is company with, "Will you have any music, gentlemen?"'—Collier's Annals of the Stage.

— Doubts are sponges to suck in knowledge.—Bacon.

— Life or death, felicity or a lasting sorrow, are in the power of marriage. A woman, indeed, ventures most. for she hath no sanctuary to retire to from an evil husband; she must dwell on her sorrow, and hatch the eggs which her own folly or infelicity hath produced; and she is more under it, because her tormentor hath a warrant of prerogative, and the woman may complain to God as subjects do of tyrant princes, but otherwise she hath no appeal in the causes of unkindness. And though the man can run from many hours of his sadness, yet he must return to it again; and when he sits among his neighbours, he remembers the objection that lies in his bosom, and he sighs deeply.—Jeremy Taylor.

IMPERFECTION OF KNOWLEDGE.

For who knows all that knowledge contains?
Men dwell not on the tops of mountains,
But on their sides, or rising's seats;
So 'tis with knowledge's vast heights.—Butler.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Grand Opera of

THE MAID OF JUDAH; OR, THE KNIGHTS TEMPLARS.

[By M. R. Lacy.]

The Music by Rossini.

Saxons.—Cedric, Mr Morley. Ivanhoe, Mr Wilson. Wamba, Mr Keeley.
Gurth, Mr Morley. Robin Hood, Mr Baker. Little John, Mr Jones.
Friar Tuck, Mr Bartley.
Normans.—Sir Lucas de Beaumanoir, Mr Evans.
Sir Brian de Boisguilbert, Mr Warde. Sir Maurice de Bracey, Mr G. Stansbury.
Albert de Malvoisin, Mr Henry. Damian, Mr Holl. Herald, Mr Irwin.
Warder, Mr Turnour.
Jews.—Rebecca, Miss Inverarity. Isaac, Mr Egerton.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows. Doppet, Mr Collett.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, The Gamester; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Farce of

THE HAPPIEST DAY OF MY LIFE.

[By Mr Buckstone.]

Mrs Dudley, Mrs Glover. Sophia, Mrs Humby. Mary, Mrs Ashton.
Mrs Grimley, Mrs Tayleure. Mrs Taylor, Mrs Coveney.
Mr Gillman, Mr Webster. Mr Dudley, Mr Mulleney. Charles, Mr Brindall.
John, Mr Coveney. Frederick Vincent, Mr Cooke.

After which the Comedy of

SECRETS WORTH KNOWING.

[By Morton.]

Sally Downright, Mrs Glover. Rose Sidney, Mrs Humby.
Mrs Greville, Mrs Ashton.
Nicholas Rue, Mr W. Farren. Rostrum, Mr Vining. Plethora, Mr Harley.
Undermine, Mr Gattie. Egerton, Mr Cooper.
Greville, Mr Brindall. April, Mr Webster.
Valet, Mr Coveney. Butler, Mr Newcombe. Cook, Mr Field.
Coachman, Mr Bishop. Footman, Mr Coates.

To which will be added, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. Farren.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

[By Morton.]

Mrs Selborne, Mrs T. Hill. Mrs Fixture, Mrs Tayleure.
Maria Darlington, Mrs Humby.
Sir Mark Chase, Mr Gattie. Mr Selborne, Mr Brindal.
Alfred Highflyer, Mr Vining. Fixture, Mr J. Cooper.
Gamekeeper, Mr Field. Groom, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Lord of the Manor; The Green Eyed Monster; The Widow Bewitched; and Killing No Murder.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

ANTOINE; OU, LES TROIS GENERATIONS.

Pièce en Trois Epoques, mêlée de Chant, par MM. Melesville et Brazier.
Léon, Mlle. St. Ange. La Marquise de St. Valier, Madame Préval.
Clémentine, Mlle. Florval. La Comtesse de Morimont, Mme. Boudin.
La Baronne de Lorges, Mlle. Corra. Henriette, Mlle. Jamain.
Madeline, Madame Gamard.
Antoine, M. Potier. Le Marquis de St. Valier, M. St. Aubert.
Le Vicomte de Chailly, M. Laporte. Le Président de Chatenay, M. Arnaud.
Leblanc Père, M. Préval. Le Conseiller, M. Alfred.
Le Chevalier de Mirecourt, M. Paulin. Un Valet, M. Granville.
Placide, M. Gamard. Bertrand, M. Pellesie. François, M. Guenée.
Leblanc Fils, M. Cloup.

Suivi de

LE TAILLEUR DE JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU.

Comédie en Un Acte, par MM. Rougemont et Merle.
Mlle. Clairon, Mlle. Florval. Babet, Mlle. St. Ange.
Rousseaux Tailleur, M. Potier. Poisson, M. Guenée. Mentrichard, M. Préval.
Le Président, M. Cloup. Simon. M. Arnaud. Lafleur, M. Granville.

On Finira par

LES ANGLAISES POUR RIRE.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. Sevrin et Dumersan.
Aspasie, Mlle. St. Ange. Goton, Mme. Gamard.
M. Menu, M. Potier. M. Coclet, M. Laporte. M. Cepeau, M. Cloup.
M. Fusin, M. Gamard.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Romantic Melo-Drama, in Three Acts, called

BAMPFYLDE MOORE CAREW.

[By Mr D. W. Jerrold.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Bridget, Miss Vincent. Earl Moreland, Mr D. Pitt.
Nicholas, Mr Vale. Martin, Mr Gough. Bampfylde Moore Carew, Mr C. Hill.
Albert, Mr Maitland. De Leon, Mr Webb. Walter, Mr Young.
Planxty, Mr Osbaldiston. Judge, Mr Almar.

After which, a Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. Jerrold.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Vale.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Rainford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on 'Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,') Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.
A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Roder.

To conclude with the Farce of

MONSIEUR TONSON.

[By Mr Moncrieff.]

Madame Belgarde, Madame Simon. Adolphine de Courcy, Miss Vincent.
Monsieur Morbleu, Mr C. Hill. Tom King, Mr Honner.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr Haines.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Asim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berrodaed, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Meet me by Moonlight.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir George Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Drama, in Two Acts, of

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. Jerrold.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Eyed Susan, Mrs Evans. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Saville.
William, (with the Original Hornpipe) Mr Forrester.
The Admiral, Mr Porteus. Quid, Mr G. Smith.
Captain Crosstree, Mr Spencer. Lieut. Pike, Mr G. Lejeune.
Blue Peter, Mr Bennett, with Gay's admired Ballad of 'All in the Downs.'
Yarn, Mr Davies. Raker, Mr Willing. Hatchett, Mr Barnett.
Doggrass, Mr Munroe. Jacob Twig, Mr Marshall. Ploughshare, Mr Young.
Gnatbrain, Mr Wilkinson.

Astley's Amphitheatre.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

Cooke's Equestrian Circus, Great Windmill St. Haymarket.—Lubin and Annette—Mr J. Cooke will appear in Six New Characters—The King of Italy—Rival Vaulting on the Elastic Board—Countryman's Visit to the Circus—Wonderful Antipodean Performances—The Lilliputian Stud of Burman Ponies—Equitation—Extraordinary Leaping—The Yorkshire Fox-hunter—The Dragon of Rhodes.

Sadler's Wells.—Canonbury Tower—English Paginini—The Devil at Dunmow.

Theatre Sans Souci, Leicester Square.—The Faithful Irishman—Jocko—Roland for an Oliver.

Royal Pavilion Theatre.—Alp, the Tartar Khan—A Pill for Portugal—Blue Beard.

Vauxhall Gardens.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by Onwhyn, at The Tatler Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; by Chappel; Wilson, Royal Exchange; Field, Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street; Kenneth, Corner of Bow street; Turnour, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; Lloyd, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. Reynell, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 12 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. Reynell, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 251.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1831.

THE LATE KING.*

The second volume of the life of this prince maintains the character which the author acquired by the first, as an acute and entertaining historian. There is not so much about his 'hero' in it, as in the other; but there is a great deal more about a hero of a different sort,—Napoleon,—of whom he seems fond; and a good deal respecting another, who has not the same advantage in his love; to wit, the Duke of Wellington. We do not wonder at this 'respect of persons.' Napoleon had that about him, to which intellectual men, however they might fall short of worshippers, could not refuse their admiration. The Duke of Wellington's fortunes they cannot so easily account for. The former, till he made his mistakes in Spain and Russia, helped to aggrandize the character of a soldier. People saw revived in him the Cæsars and the Xenophons, and fancied that the extremes of activity and contemplation could be united in the same man. The Duke of Wellington, even before he consented to be a 'mad minister,' never could succeed in affecting the intellectual world at large in the like manner. He had nothing but partizans. We beheld in him the prudent general, the 'modern Fabius,' the man great by negation, the mechanic of armies, the future god of the police, the Grand Constable of Europe, who could avail himself of conflicting passions, and a prepared readiness of assistance, and follow up the retreating fortunes of the great outlaw, with a tipstaff representing the wooden deity of kingship. It was impossible in these refined, physiognomical times, not to see the two different men in their faces. The Duke has his merits, ever of countenance; but they are shared by thousands of clever mechanical men; and it is not scandalous to say, that those who behold it for the first time, are amazed, on the wrong side of amazement. Napoleon's face is allowed to number him among the old classical gods of the earth, who look calmly dominant upon coins and medals, and 'shew cause' why they were so famous.

Still we confess we are not disposed to think so highly of Napoleon as our author seems to do. We fear that the writer of the 'History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth' is, though in the best sense of the word, a man of the world; and for a true speculator, and even a deep politician, this is a character, we conceive, that to all great and future purposes, may be considered as 'gone by.' At least, the men of this cast that shall continue to have to do with the government of the world, are not those, we think, that will in future succeed most, or obtain the highest reputation. We think that too numerous a body of men out-speculates them; and that ambition will be found to have taken new and unlooked-for directions. We do not mean to imply, that the writer of the book before us is hostile to the enlarged views of society. But there is an air of the old diplomatic school about him; and he plainly stops short of those better opinions of human nature, which are the noblest incitement to action, the only real hopes of improvement, and go far deeper, we think, than those common notions of merit and demerit, which justly baulk the confidence of ordinary acuteness of observation. The author, though a warm Foxite, evidently thinks that cunning and insincerity belong to the very greatest men, meaning those who can mould the world with effect; and he repeats the old, and false, and we must add, shallow notion, that 'obligation and ingratitude' are 'cause and effect.' The whole secret of that mystery, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is, that obligation is seldom what it seems to be; and that the instinct of the obliged person, perplexed between the truth and the appearance, and rendering him jealous of his share of power and admiration, makes him uneasy under the dilemma. We no more dislike anything that is really good and fair, and that we are sure of being so, than we dislike roses or the summer-time. We will venture to affirm, from experience, that next to love, there is not a more enchanting sensation than the sense of being obliged by a truly open and generous nature.

Poor George III makes as ill a figure in this second volume, as in the first. No king stands a greater chance of having the public opinion of him, as expressed in his own times, reversed in that of history, and instead of a good man, being absolutely considered a bad one;—a very singular instance of vicissitude in reputation. For this he may thank the self-love of the John Bullism of his day, a wretched education, and the folly and disease he inherited from his parents. We had thought his son the worst letter-writer among princes that we remember; but the following epistle from the pen of George III, may contend with the selectest of his son's. It was written to the Princess of Wales during one of the early disputes between her and her husband. How more than ever absurd, by the way, sound the absurd formulas of royalty, on these occasions. The Princess is his Majesty's 'dearest Daughter-in-law and Niece;' and he is her 'affectionate Father-in-law and Uncle.' It is a pity he did not add, 'and Cousin five times removed.'—'Believe me, dearest Daughter-in-law, and Niece, and Cousin five times removed, your affectionate Father-in-law, and Uncle, and Cousin five times removed, G. R.'—And the Prince of Wales ought surely to have been designated as her Royal Highness's first cousin and husband, and his Majesty's son.—'Yesterday I and the rest of my family had an interview with his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, your Royal Highness's first cousin and husband, and my son, at Kew;—which leaves his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in a situation to shew, whether his Royal Highness your Royal Highness's first cousin and husband, and my son, wishes to return to his family or not,' &c.—But to the Letter.

'My dearest Daughter-in-law and Niece,

'Yesterday I and the rest of my family had an interview with the Prince of Wales, at Kew. Care was taken on all sides to avoid all subjects of altercation or explanation, consequently the conversation was neither instructive nor entertaining; but it leaves the Prince of Wales in a situation to shew whether his desire to return to his family is only verbal or real, which time alone can shew. I am not idle in my endeavours to make enquiries that may enable me to communicate some plan for the advantage of the dear child, you and me, with so much reason, must interest ourselves about; and its effecting my having the happiness of living more with you, is no small incentive to my forming some ideas on the subject; but you may depend on their being not decided upon without your thorough and cordial concurrence; for your authority as mother, it is my object to support.

'Believe me, at all times,

'My dearest Daughter-in-law and Niece,

'Your most affectionate Father-in-law and Uncle,

'G. R.'—P. 43.

The silence of George III towards Bonaparte, (see p. 3.) when the latter, as First Consul, wrote him a pacific overture, was one of those assumptions of state, which tend to make royalty ridiculous, in the airs it gives itself over natural and undoubted greatness. It is a sort of official madness, not the less so for being thought proper by the formalists. The same remark applies to the silence of the Prince Regent, when Napoleon wrote to him after his downfall; only the latter added the ungraciousness of unequal fortune. The Prince had then an opportunity of shewing himself capable of one of those gallant pieces of courtesy and generosity, for which his canting flatterers had so often given him credit. He lost it and thus shewed that he never had been capable; for never was an occasion more golden. It would seem, by the practice of those who wear crowns, that it is difficult for a king as a king, to behave with the common proprieties of other men. The moment his state is touched, it is a signal for him to be absurd. Our author has the following remarks on the silence of George III:—

'The French republic, after the Revolution of the 18th Brumaire, existed only in chains at the feet of a successful soldier. Bonaparte was not long invested with the dictatorship, when he made overtures

* The History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. In 3 vols. 12mo. (Fifth Volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman & Co.

Digitized by Google

for peace, in a well-known letter addressed directly to George III. This letter has the frankness, simplicity, brevity, and elevation of the republican, with the courtesies of the royal style; and, affecting to discard the artifices of diplomacy, is a masterpiece of diplomatic skill. George III did not deign to answer this unanointed epistle: but Lord Grenville addressed to the French minister, Talleyrand, a reply unworthy of his talents and character. The English minister's diffuse state paper—supercilious without dignity, and disingenuous without adroitness—set forth in substance, that the king was ever desirous of peace, and then ready to negociate—provided only that Bonaparte would acknowledge himself unfit to be treated with, abdicate his power, and restore the power and persons of the Bourbons to France.'—P. 4. A modest request certainly. Though a man however can be 'disingenuous without adroitness,' we do not see how he can be expected to be 'supercilious with dignity.' Superciliousness is one of the worst proofs of want of dignity.

Our author makes some good observations on the apostacy of the late king from his old Whig friends. 'George IV.' he says, 'has been praised for abandoning party on the death of Mr Fox. This is one of the many instances in which a vice of character becomes a virtue in a prince. Their ardour had become cool, and his sincerity dubious much earlier; but habit made him bow to the authority, or vanity made him bask in the lustre, of Mr Fox's name. His subsequent neutrality was the effect, not of enlarged views, but of natural indolence, and of political and personal alienation. At this stage of his life, the more distinguished of his early friends had dropped into the grave, or withdrew from him in disgust. Sheridan and Lord Erskine alone remained to share his orgies and amusements rather than his counsels.'—P. 90.

Again:—The Regent's 'decision was the result of his indolence, his personal dislike of Lords Grey and Grenville, especially of the former, and an intriguing manœuvre practised by Sheridan. The prince, now in his forty-ninth year, had lost, in the idleness of a frivolous and sensual life, all energy and impulse of action and motive; he dreaded the unbending principles and character of Lord Grey, and was disposed to pronounce against him the same sentence of exclusion which his father had pronounced against Mr Fox; he calculated upon less trouble and more complaisance from Mr Perceval and his colleagues, who had little of personal or private character to compromise, and were more versed in the routine of administration; and Sheridan, who divined his wishes with the unerring instinct of a court slave, continued to gratify them.'—P. 139.

All the motives here attributed to the Prince Regent no doubt had their share in his proceedings: but we think the author has left one out, the greatest of all; to wit, the natural Toryism of Kings, and the preference that all new sovereigns have for those who have served the old one with the greatest devotion. The sovereign whom in these days we have the good fortune to possess, is an anomaly in the history of kings, made in great measure by an education, and an experience of life, very extraordinary for a prince: and even he is most probably influenced, not only by circumstances, but by recollections, if not of preference to some, at least of antipathy to others and to their preferences.

Sheridan cuts a wretched figure in these pages, and we fear too true a one. He is a fine admonitory picture for men of the world, even of the cleverest kind. His very romance was a mistake; for he knew nothing of what is called sentiment, and was unable to exhibit disinterestedness itself but in union with the poorest subserviency. The following was one of the innumerable scrapes into which he got himself in consequence. The occasion spoken of was the revival of the Catholic Claims, and the disappointment and disgust which the Irish felt at the broken promises of the Regent:—

'Sheridan's devotion to the Prince of Wales was sincere and disinterested, but servile and self-debasing. For it he compromised that reputation for public integrity which, with his genius, palliated the vices of his private life. His hollow finesse on this occasion received a happy rebuke. He happened to dine at the house of a distinguished English Catholic, in company with the late Mr Scully, who had come over from Ireland, as a member of the Catholic deputation. The conversation naturally turned upon the approaching debate. "If," said Sheridan, "Moira and I, from particular circumstances, should not take an active part on the Catholic petition as you could wish, you may still be assured, Mr Scully, that our hearts are with you."—"And if," replied the latter, "the French should invade Ireland, and the Irish Catholics, from peculiar circumstances, should not take as active a part as you could wish, you may still be assured, Mr Sheridan, that our hearts are with you." '—P. 33.

To return awhile to the intrigues respecting the ministries of George IV, we shall lay before our readers an extract, which furnishes a crowning specimen of poor Sheridan's perdition. It relates to the prospect of a Whig Ministry, at the death of Perceval:—

'On the 5th of June (1812) Lord Moira having previously had a conversation with the Duke of Bedford, addressed a note to Lords Grey and Grenville, proposing a conference. They declined an unauthorized discussion as unusual, and likely to lead to no advantageous result. Lord Moira, in rejoinder, informed them next day, that, since his first communication, he had received authority and full liberty from the Prince Regent to negociate specially with them. A conference, at which Lord Erskine was present, by the desire of Lord Moira, took place on the 8th of June. It may be useful to state here, that Lord Moira had, in conversation with Lord Spencer, previously declared his determination not to admit, as a subject for consideration, in any new arrangements, the great offices of the Prince Regent's household. Lord Spencer objected to this exemption, as unprecedented and unconstitutional,—failed to make any impression upon the mind of Lord Moira,—prepared Lords Grey and Grenville for Lord Moira's objections,—and gave them his opinion, which entirely coincided with their own, that in the conference with Lord Moira, the household should be made a preliminary question. Accordingly, Lords Grey and Grenville asked whether Lord Moira's "full liberty" extended to the consideration of "new appointments to those great offices of the household, which have been usually included in the political arrangements made on a change of administration; and stated that they made this stipulation solely on public, not personal grounds, as necessary to give to a new government that character of efficiency and stability, and those marks of the constitutional support of the crown, which were required to enable it to act usefully for the public service." Lord Moira answered, that he was not restricted by the Prince Regent; but that he would not himself agree to "the positive exercise of such a power in the formation of an administration." —"A decided difference of opinion," says the minute of the conference, "as to this point having been thus expressed on both sides, the conversation ended with mutual declarations of regret."

'Lord Moira went back to the Regent, announced his failure, resigned his commission, and advised the revival of the Perceval Ministry. Lord Liverpool was accordingly appointed first Lord of the Treasury, and announced his appointment in the House of Lords on the 8th of June.

'The secret and only desired end of the negotiation was thus attained at last, and the household party which hemmed in the Regent, a willing captive, triumphed. The proceedings which followed in both Houses throw considerable light upon the negotiations.

'The great offices of the household, it should be remembered, were held by members of the Hertford family.

'Lord Moira accounted for his tenacity on the question of those offices, as arising from his fear that, by submitting them to consideration, "he should countenance every ribald tale of scandal which had been circulated abroad." The course pursued by him had precisely the effect which he professed his desire to avoid, and which it is strange that he should not have foreseen. There is something incomprehensible in the system adopted by Lord Moira. "Is your Royal Highness prepared," said he, to the Prince Regent, "if I should advise it, to part with the officers of your household?" The answer was, "I am."—"Then," rejoined Moira, "your Royal Highness shall not part with one of them;" and having thus heroically or theatrically taken the responsibility upon himself, he went upon his inauspicious mission to Lords Grey and Grenville.

'It may be rash to decide whether Lord Moira was the dupe or confederate of the secret cabal, but it is obvious that he was most effectually playing their game.

'Sheridan repeated and improved upon the intriguing part which he had played at the commencement of the preceding year. It was industriously circulated abroad that Lords Grey and Grenville were made acquainted with the intention of the household to resign as soon as a new ministry should be definitely formed; and that those lords insisted upon its dismissal as a preliminary stipulation, in order to humiliate and enslave the Prince. Lord Yarmouth, who held the office of Vice-Chamberlain, stated in the House of Commons, that the officers of the household were resolved to resign "at only ten minutes' notice," before certain gentlemen should receive the seals of office, and that he communicated this resolution to Sheridan for the purpose of reaching the "certain gentlemen" to whom he alluded. Sheridan, it came out, advised Lord Yarmouth not to resign, suppressed Lord Yarmouth's communication, and upon being asked by Mr Tierney, offered to bet five hundred guineas that no such thing was ever thought of by the household. Confronted with the two principal witnesses—Lord Yarmouth and Mr Tierney—in the House of Commons, Sheridan gave notice that he should make his defence on a future day. When that day came he was taken ill whilst speaking, and sate down doubly an object of commiseration to the House. He returned to the subject on a subsequent night, sought refuge in self-degrading buffoonery and flimsy generalities, and was from that hour a lost man.'—P. 191.

It is interesting to consider who of these persons are alive now, and what they are about. Sheridan is gone; George IV is gone; Lord Moira is gone: Lord Grey is the popular minister of a new sovereign in totally new times; and Lord Grenville, we presume, as we hear nothing of him, is enjoying the supercilium cum dignitate.

We must have another article on this amusing book.

Digitized by Google

MUSIC.

1. 'The Sea.' A Song, sung by Mr Phillips, at the Public Concerts, &c. The poetry by Barry Cornwall, Esq. The music composed and dedicated to his friend, Capt. Gosling, R.N., by The Chevalier Sigismond Neukomm. (Cramer, Addison, and Beale.)

2. 'Oh Smile not upon me.' Ballad written and dedicated to Mrs Ames, by Thomas Haynes Bayly, Esq. The music by H. R. Bishop. (Goulding and D'Almaine.)

3. 'When first me met.' Ballad, sung by Miss Paton, Miss H. Cawse, and Miss Stephens. Written by Thos. Haynes Bayly, Esq. (Goulding and D'Almaine.)

4. 'Helen Trevor.' Ballad, the words by Mrs Geo. Sharpe. Composed for and inscribed to Miss Paton, by Chas. E. Horn. (Goulding and D'Almaine.)

The reader has already heard our opinion of the talents of the Chevalier Neukomm. At so high a rate do we estimate them, that we feel jealous of his ever putting forth a composition that shall sink below the water-mark of his ordinary minor pieces; yet justice compels us to say, that his adaptation of Mr Barry Cornwall's animated lines have disappointed our expectations. The character of the song is spirited, and, as might be expected, it displays, upon occasion, the master's hand in the harmonies; but we perceive no indication of careful thought or deliberation in the melody: in short—the word must out—we think it common-place; yet we understand that it is a more popular composition than his 'Napoleon's Midnight Review,' a cantata of fifty times its merit; but a performer of the latter piece must be both a good player as well as an advanced singer.

No. 2 is a simple and plaintive little ballad, in the key of C, triple time.

No. 3 is in the key of D, two sharps, simple common time. Its character is smooth, flowing, and graceful, and the harmonies sufficiently full for the lightness of the subject.

No 4 is unequal to several ballads by the same tasteful musician that have come under our notice. It is in the key of G, triple time, is within the range of the most moderate performer's abilities, and although we perceive no novel effects in the melody, the harmonies are here and there graced by the judicious introduction of accidentals that betray the practised musician, while they gratify the ear that is accustomed to seek for unhackneyed combinations.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent-Garden.—The Maid of Judah—Napoleon Buonaparte.
Haymarket.—The Happiest Day of My Life—Secrets Worth Knowing—The Widow Bewitched—A Roland for an Oliver.
French Plays.—Antoine—Le Tailleur de Jean Jacques Rousseau—Les Anglaises pour Rire.

King's Theatre.

Signor Paganini favoured the public with his 'fifth and last concert at this theatre,' last night, but not, it seems, with his fifth and last appearance; for he is to play this evening for the benefit of Lablache, besides the four other performances, we suppose, which he is to be prevailed upon to bestow upon us, and the forty elsewhere.—Well: the public are accustomed to these managerial tricks, and ought to be prepared for them; which does not seem to have been the case with some persons last night, by their hissing at the commencement of the benefit. Besides, Paganini is fine enough to make the public wish to hear him again and again, at some little expence to the perfection of his morale. Whether he would not be finer still, if his proceedings were as strait-forward as his bow, is a question of refinement, which it may be hard to urge in a matter of violin-playing.

Let us not belie the effect however which this extraordinary player had upon us last night. To begin with the beginning,—he had a magnificent house. We thought at first we were literally going to hear him, without seeing his face; for the house was crammed at so early an hour, that on entering it, we found ourselves fixed on the lowest of the pit stairs. It was amusing to see the persons who came in after us. Some, as they cast up their eyes, gaped amazement at the huge mass of faces presented in all quarters of the house; others looked angry; others ashamed and cast a glance around them to see what was thought of them; some gallantly smiled, and resolved to make the best of it. One man exclaimed, with unsophisticated astonishment, 'Christ Jesus!' and an Italian whispered in a half-execrating tone, 'Oh Dio!'

Meantime we heard some interesting conversation around us. We had been told, as a striking instance of the effect that Paganini has produced upon the English musical world, that one eminent musician declared he could not sleep the first night of his performance, for thinking of him, but that he got up and walked about his room. A gentleman present last night was telling his friends, that another celebrated player swore that he would have given a thousand guineas to keep the Italian out of the country, he had put everybody at such an immeasurable distance. These candid confessions, it seems, are made in perfect good-humour, and therefore do honour to the gentlemen concerned. The truth is, as a late writer observed, that men of real pretensions are not apt to grudge higher pretensions in others, if they are of a very genuine surpassing nature. Envy is lost in admiration.

The performances commenced with Haydn's beautiful symphony, No. 9, the fine, touching exordium of which, full of a kind of hushing meaning, appeared admirably adapted to be the harbinger of the evening's wonder. A duet between Santini and Curioni followed; and then, after a due interval, came in Signor Paganini, and 'brought the house down' with applause.

As it was the first time we had seen the great player, except in the criticisms of our musical friends, which had rendered us doubly curious, we looked up with interest at him, from our abysm in the pit. A lucky interval between a gentleman's head and a lady's bonnet favoured our endeavour, and there we beheld the long, pale face of the musical marvel, hung, as it were, in the light, and looking as strange as need be. He made divers uncouth obeisances, and then put himself in a masterly attitude for his work, his manner being as firm and full of conscious power when he puts the bow to the instrument, as it is otherwise when he is not playing. We thought he did not look so old as he is said to be; but he is long-faced and haggard, with strongly-marked prominent features, wears his black hair flowing on his neck like an enthusiast, has a coat of ancient cut which astonishes Fop's Alley; in short, is very like the picture of him in the shops. He is like a great old boy, who has done nothing but play the violin all his life, and knows as much about that, as he does little of conventional manners. His face at the same time has much less expression than might be looked for. At first it seemed little better than a mask; with a fastidious, dreary expression, as if inclined to despise his music and go to sleep. And such was his counteuance for a great part of the evening. His fervour was in his hand and bow. Towards the close of the performances, he waxed more enthusiastic in appearance, gave way to some uncouth bodily movement from side to side, and seemed to be getting into his violin. Occasionally also he put back his hair. When he makes his acknowledgments, he bows like a camel, and grins like a goblin or a mountain-goat.

His playing is indeed marvellous. What other players can do well, he does a hundred times better. We never heard such playing before; nor had we imagined it. His bow perfectly talks. It remonstrates, supplicates, answers, holds a dialogue. It would be the easiest thing in the world to put words to his music. We heard an enthusiastic violin player assert once, in the heat of argument with a painter, that it would be as possible to call for a chop at a tavern by playing, as by painting it. Last night we almost began to think that this hyperbole was hardly a fiction. We are sure that with a given subject, or even without it, Paganini's best playing could be construed into discourse by any imaginative person.

Last night he began a composition of his own (very good, by the way)—an Allegro Maestoso movement (majestically cheerful) with singular force and precision. Precision is not the proper word; it was a sort of peremptoriness and dash. He did not put his bow to the strings, nor lay it upon them; he struck them, as you might imagine a Greek to have done when he used his plectrum, and 'smote the sounding shell.' He then fell into a tender strain, till the strings, when he touched them, appeared to shiver with pleasure. Then he gave us a sort of minute warbling, as if half a dozen humming birds were singing at the tops of their voices, the highest notes sometimes leaping off and shivering like sprinkles of water; then he descended with wonderful force and gravity into the base; then he would commence a strain of earnest feeling or entreaty, with notes of the greatest solidity, yet full of trembling emotion; and then again he would leap to a height beyond all height, with notes of desperate minuteness, then flash down in a set of headlong harmonies, sharp and brilliant as the edges of swords; then warble again with inconceivable beauty and remoteness, as if he was a ventriloquizing-bird; and finally, besides his usual wonderful staccatos in ordinary, he would suddenly throw handfuls, as it were, of staccatoed notes, in distinct and repeated showers over his violin, small and pungent as the tips of pins.

Digitized by Google

In a word, we never heard anything like any part of his performance, much less the least marvel we have been speaking of. The people sit astonished, venting themselves in whispers of 'Wonderful!'—'Good God!'—and other unusual symptoms of English amazement; and when the applause comes, some of them take an opportunity of laughing, out of pure inability to express their feelings otherwise.

But we have come to the end of our room, and must have another article upon him to-morrow.

[As many old friends have expressed their regret, from old friendship, at finding the usual sign manual omitted to the Editor's theatrical articles, and as the omission has subjected him, with others, to a report of neglect or absence, which he has reason to think a little hard, and too much reason to know might be a serious injury to him if unrefuted, he has thought it best, having once begun with his signature, to restore it, and to put it, as in a former paper, to all that he writes.]

A NATURAL PICTURE.

As gentle shepherd in sweet eventide,
When ruddie Phœbus gins to welk in west,
High on an hill, his flock to viewen wide,
Marks which do bite their hasty supper best,
A cloud of cumbrous gnats do him molest,
All striving to infix their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he nowhere can rest;
But with his clownish hands their tender wings
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

SPENSER.

How sweet is this last passage, with the repetition of the word oft, and the low internal sound of the concluding sentence.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

For the Benefit of Signor Lablache.

An Opera Buffa, compressed into One Act, entitled

L'ITALIANA IN ALGIERI.

[By ROSSINI.]

The Principal Characters by Mme. Raimbaux, Mme. Castelli, Mlle. Feliani, Signor Rubini, Signor Santini, Signor Deville, and Signor Lablache.

After which, an Opera Buffa, compressed into One Act, entitled

LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA.

[By GNECCO.]

The Principal Characters by Mme. Pasta, Mme. Castelli, Mlle. Feliani, Signor Rubini, Signor Santini, Signor De Angeli, Signor Deville, Signor Galli, and Signor Lablache.

With OTHER ENTERTAINMENTS, and

A FAVORITE BALLET,

In which Mlle. Taglioni will dance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

THE GAMESTER.

[By MOORE.]

Mrs Beverley, Miss F. Kemble. Charlotte, Miss Lawrence. Lucy, Mrs Daly.
Beverley, Mr C. Kemble. Stukely, Mr Warde. Lewson, Mr Abbott.
Bates, Mr F. Matthews. Jarvis, Mr Egerton.
Dawson, Mr Baker. Waiter, Mr Heath.

Previous to the Play, Cherubini's Overture to 'Les Deux Journées.'

At the End of the Play, Miss Inverarity will sing 'Bonnie Prince Charlie.' After which, 'My Father Land,' by Miss Harrington, Messrs. Tett, Irwin, Benedict, and Sherriff.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows. Doppet, Mr Collett.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schönbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, The Carnival at Naples; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Mr MATHEWS will have the honor to publish the Second Volume of his

COMIC ANNUAL,

In Three Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—Songs, 'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—Songs, 'The Omnibus,' and 'The Country Concert.'

PART III.—Song, 'Thames Sailing Match.' Scena. Song, 'Harlowe Bush Fair.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

A Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

After which, the Opera of

THE LORD OF THE MANOR.

[By BURGOYNE.]

Sophia, Miss Land. Annette, Miss Wells. Peggy, Mrs T. Hill.
Moll Flagon, Mr Harley.
Sir John Contrast, Mr Gattie. Trumore, Mr B. Taylor. Rashly, Mr Huckel.
Young Contrast, Mr Vining. La Nippe, Mr Brindal.
Rentall, Mr W. Johnson. Ralph, Mr J. Cooper. Corporal Drill, Mr Coveney.
Serjeant Sash, Mr Field. Serjeant Snap, Mr Bishop.

To which will be added the Comedy of

THE GREEN EYED-MONSTER.

[By Mr PLANCHE.

Lady Speyenhausen, Mrs Faucit. Amelia Rosenthal, Mrs T. Hill.
Luise, Mrs Humby.
Baron Speyenhausen, Mr W. Farren. Col. Arnsdorf, Mr Cooper.
Marcus, Mr Vining. Krout, Mr Harley.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of

KILLING NO MURDER.

[By Mr HOOK.]

Mrs Watchet, Mrs Tayleure. Nancy, Miss J. Scott. Fanny, Mrs T. Hill.
Buskin, Mr Harley. Sir Walter Wilton, Mr Gattie.
Bradford, Mr Coveney. Apollo Belvi, Mr Webster.
Tap, Mr Bishop. Servant, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Way To Keep Him; The Widow Bewitched; The Intrigue; and The Agreeable Surprise.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comic Opera of

LOVE IN A VILLAGE.

[By BICKERSTAFF.]

Deborah Woodcock, Madame Simon. Lucinda, Miss Vincent.
Rosetta, Miss Somerville, in which she will introduce 'Lo here the gentle lark.'
Madge, Mrs Vale. Housemaid, Miss Nicol. Cook, Mr Webb.
Sir William Meadows, Mr Gough.
Young Meadows, Mr Edwin, in which he will introduce, 'Can I forget thee, no?' 'Wilt thou meet me then, love,' and, with Miss Somerville, the Duet, 'When thy bosom heaves the sigh.' Justice Woodcock, Mr Williams.
Hawthorn, Mr Ransford, who will introduce, 'Who deeply drinks of wine,'
Eustace, Mr Maitland. Hodge, Mr Vale.
Footman, Mr Rogers. Carter, Mr Young.

The celebrated Tarantella, from 'Masaniello,' by Mlle. Rosier and Master Saunders.

To conclude with the Drama, entitled

PIZARRO! OR, THE DEATH OF ROLLA.

[By SHERIDAN.]

Spaniards.—Elvira, Miss M. C. Poole. Pizarro, Mr D. Pitt.
Alonzo, Mr C. Hill. Valverde, Mr Honner. Almagro, Mr Rogers.
Davila, Mr Asbury. Gonzalo, Mr Collier. Fernando, Mr Tully.
Centinel, Mr Young.
Peruvians.—Cora, Miss Scott. Ataliba, Mr Almar.
Orozembo, Mr Williams. Orano, Mr Lee. Limatro, Mr Webb.
Old Man, Mr Gough. Peruvian Boy, Miss Ellis.
Rolla, Mr Osbaldiston.
Priestess, Miss Somerville. High Priest, Mr Ransford.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Asim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Come dwell with me.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Davies. Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacet, Mr G. Smith.
Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Emperor of the French, by Miss Edwin—Clown, by Mr Edwin—Mr Edwin will take a Flying Ascent through a Volcano of Fire, and a Somerset through Six Balloons—Crusaders and Knights of St Patrick, in which a Tournament, &c. will be introduced—Masquerade in Full Costume, by Mr J. Cooke—Circumvolutions, by Mr Williams—Extraordinary Evolutions—Egyptian Monuments—Tight Rope—Countryman's Visit—Attitudinarian—The High-mettled Charger—Russian Courier—Billy Button's Disasters.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Canonbury Tower—English Paganini—The Devil at Dunmow.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 252.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24, 1831.

THE LATE KING.*

[Concluded from yesterday.]

The following passage respecting his present Majesty will be interesting to our readers. It is coloured perhaps a little highly by a natural admiration of his conduct since he has come to the throne; but we remember well, that he was the most frequent and the most effective speaker of the Royal family:—

'The Duke of Clarence was endowed with the faculty of eloquence, not only beyond his brothers, but in a degree which, with due exercise, would have placed him in the first rank of debaters in the house of lords. His name appears more frequently than those of the other princes in the parliamentary debates. He defended Lord St Vincent with the zeal of a friend; and asked on one occasion, in February 1805, whether or not the conduct of that nobleman was to become the subject of a formal enquiry? After evasive answers from Lords Sidmouth and Hawkesbury, the Chancellor (Lord Eldon) left the woolsack to rebuke the Duke of Clarence for putting "questions inconsistent with order." The Duke, in reply to what he described as "the conscientious admonition of the Noble and Learned Lord," maintained the regularity of his questions, though they might not, he admitted, "be quite agreeable to his Lordship and the Ministers." Some few other sharp and civil encounters took place between the Prince and the Chancellor. In one instance the former aptly reminded the latter of the irregular frequency with which he left the woolsack to address the House upon the same question. The Chancellor made no reply at the moment, but referred on a subsequent night to the expressions of the Duke of Clarence. Upon this the Prince of Wales, in explanation, disclaimed, on the part of the Duke, all personal offence, and declared that "he understood his noble relation as merely illustrating the necessity of a liberal and indulgent construction of the orders of the House." The observations of the Prince of Wales are given at length in the Parliamentary debates, and were made with a facility and propriety which produced expressions of regret that he addressed the House so rarely.'

How could anybody regret the silence of a man, who has been represented to us by one who knew him as the most prosing of companions, and whose literary feats of bad reasoning and bad grammar are before the public? The lingering infatuation on this point is wonderful, and can only be accounted for by supposing that the gratuitous admiration paid to him when in the bloom of his youth and person, never ceased to affect his beholders in their old age, in spite of their better sense. Perhaps our author (of whom we have no knowledge, but who must infallibly be taken for an old gentleman when he writes in this manner) retains a sympathetic recollection of some costume, or common enjoyment, in former times. Falstaff accounted for another Prince of Wales's fondness for a common-place associate, by saying that their 'legs were both of a thickness.' Perhaps our author has a bit of regard for the Prince; because their pigtails were once of a like affinity.

The remark at the end of the passage we are about to quote, is of another strain. Speaking of the departure of the Prince's regiment for the Peninsula, he says, that 'His Royal Highness went to Portsmouth, and directed in person the embarkation of the regiment. The following speech was addressed by him to the corps at parting:—"It is one of the most painful regrets of my life, that circumstances do not admit of my accompanying you. To Brigadier-General Slade I present my sword: he will lead you; and to go under his command is, I know, as much your wish as it is mine." When taking leave of the officers he burst into tears, and both officers and men shared his emotion. There is no ground for classing the account of this scene with the sycophant flatteries which were so common at the time. His long familiarity with the regiment, which was a source of pride, and an object of constant care to him, was likely to have endeared them to each other. Suspicion, indeed, may attach to the frequency with which he was described as shedding tears. He visited, it was said, Lord Lake in his last illness this year, "burst into tears, and fainted away" at the bed side of his dying friend. This too is not only possible, but perfectly consistent with the known selfishness of his feelings. There is a fastidious, pampered, selfish sensibility of the nerves, as well as a humane sympathy with the suffering of a fellow-creature and a friend.'

The author is happy in remarks of this nature. He knows the town-side of humanity well, and can 'spy into an abuse.' Very sensitive and very selfish people are alike given to tears, if the latter are selfish on the side of personal indulgence. They get their senses into a state to be moved by any kind of excitement that stimulates their languor, and take a wonderful degree of pity on—themselves: for such is the secret of their pretended pity for others. You may always know it by the fine things they say of their own sufferings on the occasion. Sensitive people, on the other hand, of a more generous sort, though they cannot always restrain their tears, are accustomed to do so, partly out of shame at being taken for the others, partly because they can less afford the emotion. The sensitive selfish have the advantage in point of natural strength, being often as fat, jolly people as any, with a trick of longevity. George IV, with all his tears, and the wear and tear of his dinners to boot, lasted to a reasonable old age. If he had been shrewder, and taken more care of himself, he might have lived to a hundred. But it must be allowed, that he would then have been still more selfish than he was; for these luxurious weepers are at least generous in imagination. They include a notion of other people somehow, and are more convertible into good people when young. The most selfish person we ever met with, was upwards of a hundred, and had the glorious reputation of not being moveable by anything or anybody. He lasted, as a statue might last in a public square; which would see the whole side of it burn, with stony eyes, and bowels of Scotch granite.

The pinguitude of our late sovereign's person was a subject not lightly to be touched during his life-time, even though the courtiers who stood by, took a provoking advantage of the silence to swear he was an Adonis. See what short work is made of these sacred matters, when a king is dead:—

'The new Parliament, (says our author), was opened (in 1812) by the Regent in person. It was the first time of his performing this duty, which, for the preceding eight years, had been executed by commission. The House of Lords never was, and in fact never could have been, more crowded. The Regent's gorgeous robes and forest of plumes did not conceal his corpulency and the coarseness of his countenance,—and he read the speech with little of the dignity or grace of delivery for which he was famed, in a bass voice, which had the unbending harshness of age. Those to whom it was his first representation,—if that alien but expressive term be allowable,—and whose fancy associated with the Prince of Wales the accomplishments of manner and enunciation, were disappointed.'

The Duke of York's character suffers in these pages, in a like proportion. 'A dead lord,' said Gray, 'ranks with commoners.' A dead prince, we fear, must rank sometimes with very common commoners. The Duke was a good-natured man, but not superior to petty spites; and his weakness had a reserve of obstinacy, which took a direction that might have been very unfortunate for these realms, had he come to the throne. He had a fancy for being a bigotted Anti-Catholic. Our author does justice to all parties, in the famous business of Mrs Clarke. The following passages from this portion of his book are amusing:—

'The adventures, vicissitudes, and fascinations of Mrs Clarke, had been for sometime the engrossing theme of conversation and curiosity. She was a person of obscure origin, who had deserted her husband, passed through the usual alternations of luxury and destitution, which marked the career of "certain persons"—as Mr Wilberforce decorously expressed it,—ruining, by her prodigalities, those whom she fascinated by her charms, until she had passed the morning of her life, when it was her fortune to make the conquest of the Duke of York. The appearance of this modern Phryne at the bar of Parliament fully vindicated the interest which she had excited, and the renown which preceded her. She was of, or under, the middle stature of her sex. Her figure and beauty were still scarcely impaired by age. But the secret of her sway lay chiefly in her exercised, if not accomplished, faculties and manner. Her obeisance, on presenting herself at the bar of the House, was

* The History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. Second Volume. (Fifth Volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) 12mo. Longman and Co.

Digitized by Google

pronounced a chef-d'œuvre of theatric grace. In the course of her examination, she sometimes discovered the pert effrontery of women of her class. But the ease, adroitness, and pleasantry of her replies, and her artful command at pleasure, of self-possession and emotion, soon obtained her personal as well as political partizans. When the freedom, point, or levity of her answers were checked with cries of "order," and appeals to the dignity of the House by Mr Perceval and Mr Wilberforce, others encouraged and cheered her. "Who," asked the Attorney-General, "brought you that message?"—"A particular friend of the Duke's."—"Who was he?"—"Mr Taylor, the shoe-maker of Bond street."—(A laugh.)—"By whom did you send your desires to the Duke?"—"By my own pen."—"I mean who brought the letter?"—"The same ambassador."—"What ambassador?"—"Why the ambassador of Morocco." This sally produced an explosion of merriment, and the Speaker threatened her with the displeasure of the House.

'The enquiry occupied the time of Parliament for seven weeks, and the secrets revealed will be regarded as among the most edifying monuments of the state of manners in England at the commencement of the 19th century. The sale of promotions by Mrs Clarke, not only in the army, but in the church, was proved undeniably. She had her known agents and her fixed scale of prices. Candidates for advancement in the army and in the church duly sent into her their titles and testimonials. An aspirant to the mitre, placed in her hands the recommendation of an archbishop, and obtained, through her influence over the Duke of York, "the honour of preaching before royalty" at Weymouth. "This gentleman," said one of the London newspapers, describing the effect of the sermon, "certainly possesses that sweet charm, that celestial unction, which Christian oratory demands. He inveigled with peculiar energy against the savage philosophy of the French deists. His lips are touched with the live coal from the altar. The king was very attentive, and stood the whole time; the queen and princesses were melted into tears." Unfortunately George III had a dislike to the Irish O' in the preacher's name, and Mrs Clarke failed to make him a bishop.'—P. 111.

The ensuing is an anecdote, apparently of a very different sort, but not quite so in reality:—

'There was a friendly contention between Lords Ellenborough and Erskine,—each claiming to the Chief-Justiceship, and yielding to the other the higher honours of the Chancellorship. Lord Erskine's personal vanity would have preferred the seals, precarious as they were; but, with the consciousness that he was ignorant both of the principles and practice of equity, he trembled for his fame, and affected the modesty of concession. Lord Ellenborough, with his characteristic frankness, cut the matter short, by saying, "Why, Erskine, I know as little of equity as you do yourself."'—P. 45.

Sea history is accused of being surprisingly deficient in the supernatural. Its most romantic portions are undoubtedly those of its real life. The following is a specimen:—we have here a very ghastly, yet a real ship:—

'The project,' (that made to Pitt for blowing up the French flotilla) 'was equally hateful and ridiculous. No effect whatever appears to have been produced by the Catamarans; and twelve fire-ships exploded without any serious mischief, from the success with which the enemy's vessels manœuvred to avoid them. The fire-ships were cutters or brigs, differing from the ordinary kind only in their giving no indication of what they were before their near approach. The first which bore down with full sails was never suspected by the French to be a death-ship without a soul on board, until they perceived it advancing under a tremendous fire, without returning a single shot.'

The author, in his history of the Spanish campaign, has given an account of 'the remarkable combat of Redinha:'—

'Ney sustained, with the French rear-guard, for several hours, the shock of the mass of the British army, and then effected his retreat in the following manner, with safety and facility. Lord Wellington's intention was to seize, Ney's to pass, the defile of Redinha. Whilst the engagement still continued, Ney gave orders that the colours of each battalion should be conveyed and planted, under the care of an adjutant, on the other side of the ravine. The retreat was commenced by signal with the utmost rapidity, and the French troops suddenly disappeared from the eyes of the British, who as suddenly made for the brow of a hill, which would admit of plunging a destructive fire upon the retreating and encumbered French masses. Ney had provided against this movement: two battalions placed by him in ambuscade checked the British by a close and deadly fire, and effected their own retreat, whilst the battalions which had before retreated, were already re-formed under their respective colours, in order of battle. In this obscure but well-fought combat, Lord Wellington had the mortification to know that Ney had awed him into mistaken caution, by the strategic skill and artful confidence with which he presented his inadequate force, and the happy thought by which he effected his retreat. Had the overwhelming mass of the British been directed against him, with quickness and vigour, he must, according to military authorities, both French and English, have been crushed.'

Ney was a shallow politician, and not a very scrupulous moralist; but like many shallow politicians and unscrupulous moralists, he was a great soldier; and we think the Duke of Wellington might have retained enough sympathy with him to have borne in mind this gallant adventure, at a time when it might reasonably have done one soldier a service with another.

We think our author overrates the talents of Lord Wellesley, and undervalues those of Talleyrand; the former, perhaps, because he looks upon him with something of that personal fondness of recollection which mingles with his disapprobation of George IV; the latter, because Talleyrand gave up the Emperor Napoleon. See pages 128 and 279. Did he ever read a masterly character of the Noble Lord's eloquence, given by the late Mr Hazlitt in answer to a writer under the signature of Vetus? It is to be found in the collection of some political pieces by Mr Hazlitt, published under the title of Political Essays and Characters. If we are not mistaken, a silence of a very remarkable description followed upon the appearance of the answer, and (so to speak) has never since been broken. As to Talleyrand, whose ascendancy, under certain circumstances, our author thinks unaccountable, seeing that his political talents are not of 'the first order,' we take the reverse to have been the fact; that is to say, compared with those of the heads he had to do with. We know not how high the political views of Talleyrand may be, in the most exalted sense of the word. Perhaps they are nothing; perhaps they see what is inevitably coming for the world, and are glad of it. But compared with the soldiers and kings he had to 'transact business with,' we have no doubt he is as much their superior as head is superior to hand, or brain to diadem.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—L'Italiana in Algieri—La Prova d'Un Opera Seria—Kenilworth.

COVENT-GARDEN.—The Gamester—Napoleon Buonaparte.

HAYMARKET.—Widow Bewitched—Lord of the Manor—The Green-Eyed Master—Killing No Murder.

FRENCH PLAYS.—MONDAY.

DEAR MR TATLER,—It was announced, a few weeks since, that M. POTIER, after acting for a short time at the Adelphi Theatre, would take his farewell of the stage; we are now told that he bids adieu to the English stage only. This has much the appearance of a trick. If it be one, it has failed, as it deserved to do; for however great the talents of this comedian, the houses are not such as would evince a general appreciation of them. But it may be a little caprice on the part of M. POTIER himself, who is, I am told, one of those restless geniuses who are fond of coquetting with the world, and for ever taking their last leave, as if merely for the pleasure of returning to it; while the good, easy, innocent world allows itself to be cajoled, and is always ready to forgive them, because it has more interest in the exercise of their talents than in their steadiness of purpose. Of the three pieces performed on Monday night, I saw the second, entitled Le Juif, ou La Forêt de Remival. I think it has been performed in English, but at what theatre, or by what name, I cannot say; my memory being of that troublesome sort, that neither wholly loses or wholly retains what is given to its keeping. Some of your readers may recognize it by the plot, or rather the subject of the piece, justly termed anecdotique. A diligence is overturned near a village inn in the vicinity of the forest of Remival, which is infested by banditti. Though the hostess can ill lodge the passengers, they are compelled to remain till the vehicle is repaired; and in the course of conversation a young lady, no less communicative than her neighbours, tells them that she is on her way to Orleans, to purchase the freedom of her lover, who, in a fit of despair at his mother's determined opposition to their union, had enlisted in the army. The hostess turns out to be the mother, and finding the damsel unexpectedly in possession of 11,000 francs, becomes very affectionate; while an old Jew, who expresses great interest for the young girl, counsels her not to talk so openly of her affairs in the presence of strangers. The lover, impatient to see his mistress, deserts from his regiment to pay her a visit, and while lingering about his mother's door, in his way, is recognised by the former, who explains her errand, and the mother's consent, and by this sudden announcement, awakens him to a sense of his own danger. He confesses the fact; the girl asks counsel of the old Jew, who writes a letter to the Colonel, and the lover is sent to hide himself until the answer arrives. Meantime the robbers make their appearance among the party, and take possession of watches, reticules, &c. The Jew conceals himself under the table, but being at last discovered, affects to make common cause with the robbers, persuades them to return the trumpery booty they had taken, and tells them that the young lady is in possession of 11,000 francs, stipulating for 1,000 to himself, as a reward. The poor girl is thrown into despair, and the Jew, naturally mistrusted by his companions, walks about with a tranquillity that seems to them the most consummate impudence. The mother becomes acquainted with the arrival and danger of her son, who is about to make the best of his way to Orleans, to throw himself at the feet of his Colonel, when the Jew steps out for some of the military, brought to the spot by the report of the robbery (a night being supposed to have intervened) and desires them to take the youth prisoner. While all unite in execrating the old Israelite's treachery, his messenger returns with the answer to his letter, and brings the news that the robbers are taken. They are presently brought into the inn, and made to restore the girl's money; when, one thousand francs being missing, they assert that it was the share of their comrade, the Jew; who is ordered to make restitution, and follow the robbers to prison. He very composedly returns the money; the officer congratulates the lady upon having recovered all her property; the old man says there is yet a trifle wanting. Being desired to explain, he says, that he alludes to the 200,000 francs in his pocket, to save which he had discovered the 11,000— in the young lady's possession;—which he himself had sent her. He then produces the Colonel's letter, which sets the lover at liberty; and it appears that he only gave him in charge, to prevent his leaving the village before this letter arrived. He announces himself as the friend of the young lady's father, who died in America, and is now as much esteemed and applauded as, before, he was scouted and despised. M. Potier's composed demeanour, throughout all the unmerited obloquy cast on him, was admirable, and his account of the death and last request of his friend, both touching and natural; but in some parts, I did not think his representation of the Jew so good as M. La Porte's, who acted it some seasons ago, at the English Opera-House. La Porte made natural goodness of heart the prominent feature of the character; M. Potier gives it an air of thought. The latter represents a kind-hearted man acting upon principle, and guided by reason; the former, a man strong in his good intentions, who acts upon impulse, and is guided altogether by his feelings. La Porte makes the heart predominate,—M. Potier, the head. M. La Porte, on the present occasion, acted the garçon of the village inn, in which he was very amusing. M. Paulin, who was the lover, did well the little he had to do. Madame Baudin, in the repulsive character of the mother, looked almost too cordial for a woman with only a fraction of a heart, and that not very tender; and Mademoiselle St Ange so well pourtrayed the warm-hearted and affectionate girl, intent upon restoring her lover to liberty and happiness, that one could only wish the Colonel there, to see how good an excuse the young soldier had for running away. This lady nicely hits the mean between forwardness and prudery. Some lines, sung after the robbers were taken, were not inapplicable to late events; they were noticed by a few individuals, but did not excite general attention.

Digitized by Google

'Quel bien pour notre pays,
Si l'on voulait mieux s'entendre,
Et que l'on pût prendre
Les grands comme les petits.'

P.S. By the bye, Mr Tatler, your printers have made me answerable for errors not my own. In a letter published in your paper of Wednesday, May 15th, I said I knew of no English actor so natural as M. Potier. The name of La Porte has been substituted; who, though a clever and amusing comedian, cannot in any justice be placed above Farren, Liston, &c. He holds, perhaps, the same professional rank with Harley; certainly not higher.

Wednesday.

There can scarcely be two characters more dissimilar than those which M. Potier played in the first and second pieces performed on Wednesday evening; yet he was equally admirable in both. I must not say unrivalled, for, in Antoine, he has found a powerful rival in Farren. The piece has been played so repeatedly both in French and English, that most of your readers must be acquainted with it. I will not, therefore, dwell upon it further than to say that M. Potier's representation of the old steward appeared to me one of the most perfect pieces of acting that I ever witnessed; and that M. La Porte's aged Viscount, in the last act, was infinitely more interesting than his young one in the first; he was so well dressed, wigged, and wrinkle-marked, that one feared to discover that the forty years interval, supposed between the last two acts, had actually passed over all our heads. His voice, too, was well managed;—he spoke, looked, and moved with all the feebleness of seventy, without the least exaggeration of his age, which still seemed almost youthful when compared with that of Antoine. When I last saw the piece, the old man, having at last relieved his mind of the weighty secret which had oppressed it for so many years, fell back, exhausted by exertion, and overpowered by his feelings, into the arms of Jules; which was a much better conclusion than his sudden revival, and address to the audience, with which the piece ended on Wednesday. The audience warmly applauded the sentiments of the steward, muttered to himself, after listening to the complaint of one of his young masters, of the different treatment of himself and brother: it was not his fault that he came into the world last; and, for my part, I cannot see why one child should be fed with ortolans, and another with dry bread!"

The second piece, Le Tailleur de Jean-Jaques, is excellent, and would, I think, succeed on the English stage. Rousseau's tailor happens to bear his name, and endeavours to persuade himself, that, by some little frailty on his mother's part, he might probably be related to the great man. He affects a great respect for philosophers in general, and for Rousseau in particular; carries his works about with him, which he is always reciting or humming; boasts of the friendship of his illustrious customer; and piques himself upon his likeness to him, both in mind and person,—as he himself expresses it,—'He is nearly of my size, and I am exactly of his.' A farmer-general who gives great suppers, 'at which,' he tells us, 'everybody laughs,' makes interest with Mademoiselle Clairon to invite Jean Jaques to dinner, that he may endeavour to persuade him to go to these suppers; where he receives all the literati of the day. 'Voltaire,' he says, 'went once, only once,—he uever repeated his visit;' and he particularly wishes to gain Rousseau, whose works he keeps in his library, 'handsomely bound and gilt, and will not suffer any one to touch them.' A friend of Mademoiselle Clairon meets with the tailor, and contrives to deliver the lady's letter of invitation to him instead of his brother philosopher. The invitation is accepted: the tailor is delighted with his good fortune; the farmer-general, with the great talents of the supposed philosopher; and all goes on smoothly, till the secret of his trade breaks forth, and the catastrophe follows accordingly. The dialogue is lively, and the equivoque good. The audience were in ecstacies throughout the piece; and well they might. Potier was inimitable in the tailor,—grave himself, he kept the whole house laughing. The ludicrous contrast of some of his expressions with his profound veneration for philosophers, and the tranquillity of his self- importance,—perfectly unconscious of any mistake or imposition,—were truly irresistible. He makes no secret of his trade, and goes on to speak of the work he has on hand, one under press, some that have displeased M. St Lambert,—of the men of letters whom he has seen at the Hermitage, &c. &c. till the farmer-general, who misconceives the nature of all these works, is in rapture. The burly ignorance of the farmer-general is well hit off, and for once I liked M. Cloup. I never before saw him to such advantage. The whole weight of the piece, however,—if so light a piece can be said to have any,—rests on M. Potier, who suffers no joke, or pun, or point of humour of any kind, to fall to the ground. I should like to see him act Paul Pry. A French translation of the piece would succeed, too. Crowds of English would go to see their old favourite in a French dress, as they go to Primrose Hill, to look at St Paul's Church. I mean no ill compliment to LISTON. The Prys are a large family, but his Paul has hitherto been the only one, I believe, whose acquaintance has been generally courted.

Digitized by Google

When the cholera visited China, it was remarked that it selected such as lived in filth and intemperance; and that, on the contrary, persons of undaunted mind, with habits of cleanliness and moderation, were for the most part exempt from its attacks.

THE JESUITS.—Madame de Pompadour, writing to the Archbishop of Paris, says, 'As for your Jesuits, they must be left to the justice of the Parliament; their society has been the plague of Kings and of the states which have suffered them. A man who knows them well said, the other day, that they had done nothing good except bringing over the Peruvian bark: it was therefore necessary to have the fever, in order to love them.

NEW PLAYS IN OLD TIMES.—New plays seem always to have attracted large audiences. Dekker, in his News from Hell, 1606, observes, 'It was a comedy to see what a crowding, as if it had been at a new play, there was upon the Acherontic strand;' and one of the characters in Massinger's Fine Companion, says, 'A new play, and a gentleman in a new suit, claim the same privilege; at their first presentment, their estimation is double.' The behaviour of an audience on such an occasion is well described by Ben Jonson, the mirror of manners, in his Case is altered, acted at Blackfriars about 1599:—'But the sport (says Valentine, Act 2, sc. 4) is at a new play, to observe the sway and variety of opinion that passeth it. A man shall have such a confused mixture of judgment poured out in the throng there, as ridiculous as laughter itself. One says, he likes not the writing, another likes not the plot, another not the playing: and sometimes a fellow that comes not there past once in five years, at a Parliament time or so, will be as deep mixed in censuring as the best, and swear by God's foot he would never stir a foot to see a hundred such as that is!' The conduct of 'capricious gallants,' on the production of a new play is thus subsequently noticed by the same character:—'They have taken such a habit of dislike in all things, that they will approve nothing, be it never so conceited or elaborate; but sit dispersed, making faces and spitting, wagging their upright ears, and cry 'Filthy, filthy!' simply uttering their own condition, and using their wryed countenances, instead of a Vice, to turn the good aspects of all that sit near them from what they behold.'—Collier's Annals of the Stage.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A Play, in Three Acts, called

THE CARNIVAL AT NAPLES.

The Overture and Music composed by J. Barnett.

Duchess di Fontana, Mrs Lovell. Aurora di Cosenza, Miss Hughes.
Zoranthe, Miss Horton. Rodriga, Mrs Daly. Nina, Miss Taylor.
Theresa, Miss Phillips. Female Mask, Mrs Brown.
Duke di Fontana, Mr Egerton. Count Cosenza, Mr Blanchard.
Manfredi, Mr Warde. Valentine, Mr Wilson. Benedetto, Mr G. Bennett.
Harry Fortescue, Mr Abbott. Dermot O'Donovan, Mr Power. Rufo, Mr Evans.
Gasparo, Mr F. Matthews. Guiscard, Mr Irwin.

In the course of the Evening, the popular Glee, 'We Gipsies lead a merry Life,' by Messrs May, Miller, and Herriff.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.

Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows. Doppet, Mr Collett.

Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

To-morrow, Fazio; and Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

A Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

After which, the Comedy of

THE WAY TO KEEP HIM.

[By Mr MURPHY.]

The Widow Belmour, by A Lady. Mrs Lovemore, Mrs Faucit.
Muslin, Mrs Tayleure. Mignionet, Miss J. Scott. Lady Constant, Mrs Ashton.
Furnish, Mrs Coveney. Maid, Miss Barnett.
Sir Bashful Constant, Mr W. Farren. Lovemore, Mr Cooper.
Sir Brilliant Fashion, Mr Vining.
William, Mr W. Johnson. Sideboard, Mr Coveney.

To which will be added, the Interlude of

THE INTRIGUE.

Ellen, Mrs Humby. Tom, Mr Harley.
Captain Rambleton, Mr Vining. Varnish, Mr Brindal.

In the course of the piece Mrs Humby and Mr Harley will introduce the Duet of 'When a little Farm we keep.'

To conclude with the Farce of

THE AGREEABLE SURPRISE.

Laura, Miss Wells. Mrs Cheshire, Mrs Tayleure.
Fringe, Mrs Coveney. Cowslip, Mrs Humby.
Sir Felix Friendly, Mr Gattie. Compton, Mr Field. Eugene, Mr Newcombe.
Chicane, Mr W. Johnson. Lingo, Mr Harley. John, Mr Coveney.
Thomas, Mr Bishop. Stump, Mr V. Webster. Cudden, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Road to Ruin; The Widow Bewitched; The Review; and Monsieur Tonson.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

JEAN QUI PLEURE ET JEAN QUI RIT.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. SEVRIN et BRAZIER.

Madame Lepiteux, Mme. Baudin. Madame Gilleret, Mlle. St. Ange.
Aurore, Mlle. Jamain.
Jean Lepiteux, M. Potier.
Jean Guilleret, M. Préval. Beausoleil, M. Guenée. Un Facteur, M. Arnaud.

Suivi de

LE CENTENAIRE.

Vaudeville Nouveau en Un Acte, de MM. THEALON et DARTOIS.

Madame Lerond, Mme. Baudin. Isabeau, Mlle. St. Ange.
Philippe Gaillard, M. Potier. Jérome Gaillard, M. Préval.
Pierre Gaillard, M. St. Aubert. Antoine Gaillard, M. Paulin.
Ledru, M. Laporte.

On Finira par

MONS. DESCHALUMEAUX.

Opera Bouffon, en Trois Actes, Paroles de M. AUGUSTE.
Musique de Gaveau.

Madame de Brillon, Mlle. St. Ange. Madame de Villeroux, Mlle. Florval.
M. Deschalumeaux, M. Potier. Le Duc de Villars, M. St. Aubert.
M. de Bellemont, M. Paulin. M. Ducondray, M. Guenée.
Lajeunesse, M. Laporte. Lafleur, M. Alfred. Le Suisse, M. Granville.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Comedy of

THE BENEVOLENT JEW.

[By Mr CUMBERLAND.]

Mrs Ratcliffe, Mrs Vale. Eliza, Miss Scott. Dorcas, Madame Simon.
Mrs Goodison, Miss Nicol.
Sheva, Mr Elliston. Sir Stephen Bertram, Mr D. Pitt. Frederick, Mr C. Hill.
Charles Ratcliffe, Mr Osbaldiston.
Jabal, Mr Vale. Saunders, Mr Almar. Waiter, Mr Lee.

After which, a Nautical Drama, entitled

BLACK-EY'D SUSAN! OR, ALL IN THE DOWNS.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Overture and Music selected from Dibdin's Songs, arranged and adapted by Mr Blewitt.

Black-Ey'd Susan, Miss Scott. Dolly Mayflower, Mrs Vale.
Admiral, Mr Gough. Captain Crosstree, Mr Honner. Doggrass, Mr D. Pitt.
Gnatbrain, Mr Vale. Lieutenant Pike, Mr Maitland. Raker, Mr Ransford.
Hatchet, Mr Almar. Jacob Twig, Mr Rogers.
Blue Peter, with the Ballad of 'Black-Ey'd Susan,' Mr Edwin. Quid, Mr Lee.
William, (with a Parody on 'Bound 'Prentice to a Waterman,') Mr C. Hill.
Seaweed, Mr Asbury.

A Double Hornpipe, by Mr C. Hill and Mademoiselle Rosier.

To conclude with the Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled

THE ROVER'S BRIDE.

[By Mr ALMAR.]

ACT I.—WINTER.

Alice Manners, Miss Scott. Bella Manners, Miss Somerville.
Dame Bellerton, Miss Nicol. Nancy Blackberry, Miss Ellis.
Lawrence Glennon, Mr D. Pitt. Miles Bellerton, Mr C. Hill.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr Vale. Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honner.
Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.

Between the First and Second Acts a lapse of Five Years is supposed to take place.

ACT II.—SUMMER.

Alice Manners, Miss Scott. Bella, Miss Somerville.
Mary Blackberry, Miss Rumens. Kitty Spiteful, Mrs Rogers.
Captain Glennon, Mr D. Pitt. Barbelot, Mr Almar.
Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honner.
Culverdine and Avery, Mr Ransford and Mr Lee. Marmaduke Magog, Mr Vale.
Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers. Bluff Laconic, Mr C. Hill.
Master Marmaduke Magog, jun. Master Carberry.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.

Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.

The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Come dwell with me.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir Gerrge Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Davies. Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacet, Mr G. Smith.
Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Canonbury Tower—English Paganini—The Devil at Dunmow.

THEATRE SANS SOUCI, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Faithful Irishman—Jocko—Roland for an Oliver.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Youthful Days of William the Fourth—And other Entertainments.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 253.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1831.

HORTICULTURE AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.*

'God Almighty first planted a garden (says Bacon) and indeed it is the purest of human pleasures; it is the greatest refreshment to the spirits of man; without which buildings and palaces are but gross handy-works; and a man shall ever see, that, when ages grow to civility and elegancy, men come to build stately, sooner than to garden finely; as if gardening were the greater perfection.' And as philosophy has become diffused (the highest state of 'civility and elegancy' to which humanity can attain) we find horticulture claiming an almost universal interest, both on account of its graceful as well as useful qualities. Here, in the work before us, we find the chemist and the natural philosopher bringing his stock of science and practical experience in aid of that primitive and most benign of all arts, the tilling of the earth and culture of vegetation. Here is another 'sign of the times;' another proof of the scoffed at 'march of intellect.' Till the opening of the 19th century, who ever thought of blending disquisitions upon the phenomena of nature, as connected with the rearing and management of flowers and vegetables, for the instruction of the working gardener? Such however will be found in the present work, and accomplished too in a clear, manly, and copious style. Here are the most pains-taking and satisfactory explanations of the most modern improvements, and approved methods of bringing to luxuriant perfection the various tribes of vegetables, esculent as well as ornamental; and grafted on to these practical instructions, are luminous remarks upon, and examinations of the wonderful natural agents that unceasingly urge their complicated machinery in perfecting those graceful results.

To quote from a publication of this character at such length as to give the reader an idea of the practical value of the work (and large extracts only would suffice for that purpose) would occupy more space than our small periodical can afford: for the benefit of the mere practical horticulturist, however, we would refer to a specimen of the useful in the book, by recommending the author's instructions for the cultivation of that nutritious exotic the Indian corn; and to the lover of natural philosophy we would recommend an attention to his curious theory, and ingenious corroborations respecting electricity, as being the primum mobile of animated nature.

Upon referring to the former article—the culture of Indian corn—we cannot forbear quoting the author's concluding observation. His opinion is of value, for he has cultivated the vegetable, and patiently weighed the advantages and disadvantages attending it.

'Speaking,' he says, 'as an individual, from what I have witnessed, I should be happy in this time of severe distress, to see the experiment brought to a decisive trial during the year 1830. I wish the great landowners could be induced, severally, to devote a few of their surplus acres to the express object of relieving the wants of the necessitous labourer; and with the proviso that each man, able and willing to work, should crop one acre, or half an acre at the least, with Indian corn, according to a set of simple rules, which might be printed and distributed among the workmen. The crop, when ripe, to be at the entire disposal of the cultivator to sell or consume it at his pleasure. I am inclined to believe that the results, in less than a twelvemonth from the present time, would be the complete establishment of the grain as an article worthy of universal cultivation,—a manifest reduction in the price of pork-meat and poultry,—a great abatement in the poors' rate,—and finally, what to the good and benevolent would prove the best of all results, the grateful blessing of multitudes who now are "ready to perish," and "have no helper."'

The following appears to us an original observation upon the influence exerted by the great fountain of light and heat.

'Sun's Influence upon the Animal Creation.—The influence which the sun exerts upon the human frame and the animal creation in general, is strikingly coincident with that which it exerts upon plants and vegetables. Medical men of observation, particularly those who devote their attention to the symptoms arising from a deranged state of the organs of digestion, cannot fail to remark the characteristic expression of the countenance, which indicates the sensation of a peculiar debility, experienced at, or rather before noon, and for some succeeding hours. Many dispeptic persons, particularly those of weak and irritable nervous construction, are well aware of a prostration of mental and bodily strength, which can scarcely have any other origin than that of some powerful external cause acting through the medium of the nervous system, and which, at times, induces a complete alteration in a man's views and intentions; insomuch as to render him a different or distinct being to himself, in his own internal feelings, at some hours of the day, from what he is at others. Persons, even in comparatively sound health, experience the effect which is regularly produced by the influence of the sun during a few of the midday hours:—it is not mere lassitude occasioned by heat; it is not debility from indisposition; but a relaxation, or privation of energy; and a disinclination to exertion of any kind, as remarkable for the peculiarity of their attendant sensations, as for the periodical regularity of their recurrence and abatement.

'They, indeed, who constantly enjoy a high and robust state of health may not be able fully to appreciate the truth of these remarks; nevertheless, they may readily ascertain the general fact, that about the hours alluded to, there is a quietude throughout nature; and, in man, an abatement of that hilarious buoyancy of spirits which is experienced by the healthy, during the early morning, and again in the evening.

'Many who are intimately acquainted with the habits of animals,—as, for instance, coachmen and travellers, who have continual opportunities of observing the actions and habits of horses, may remark a quietude, or even languor, which is not apparent in the early and later hours of the day. Some horses almost invariably indicate, when on a journey, an absolute debility during the afternoon; but they rally, and regain spirit and vigor in the evening. Other horses may not manifest any great degree of languor or debility; yet, though they may not appear to suffer, they evince but little of that fire and high spirit which they possessed in the morning, and recover with the return of evening. These effects are not by any means confined to hot or moist seasons: they are produced as well during the frost of winter, as during the high temperature of summer. The foregoing are a few only of the multitude of facts which might be adduced, and which have led me to conclude, that all electrical phœnomena depend upon the action of the sun's rays; they do not indeed demonstrate that these rays create electricity, but they afford evidence of a power in constant operation throughout nature, producing effects which seem to point to remote consequences that have hitherto been but little suspected. These effects, if viewed in connexion with the phœnomena of the earth's magnetism and electricity, and with those ascribed to gravitation, display a grandeur of simplicity which tends to satisfy the mind, that there is indeed one great exciting principle, to the influence of which the phœnomena of nature may be ultimately referred.'

And that 'great existing principle,' the author believes to be ELECTRICITY; the 'theory' of which he proceeds to explain at a considerable length.

Unless we are mistaken, the work may be purchased in shilling parts, each part containing requisite instructions for performing the duties of the month. The book is cheap too as well as intrinsically valuable, for it is bulky, and the page is spacious and crowded. It is the very work for an amateur horticulturist, who moreover possesses an enquiring mind into the secret operations of nature. Such a one may confide in our recommendation, for we know the author to be practised in the craft he describes, while as a chemist and general experimental philosopher, he is worthy to sit with nobles of the science.

* The Domestic Gardener's Manuel; being an Introduction to Gardening. To which is added a concise Naturalist's Kalendar, and English Botanist's Companion, or Catalogue of British Plants, in the monthly order of their flowering. By a Practical Horticulturist. Whittaker, Treacher, and Co.

Digitized by Google

RAJAH RAMMOHUN ROY.

[A Correspondent, who has the best means of knowing what he writes about, has favoured us with the following particulars respecting the rank and native condition of this interesting individual.]

Many questions are asked about the rank of this personage in his native country, and many absurd notions are prevalent on the subject. Rajah is a title of nobility among the Hindoos, and generally applied to the Raj, or ruler of a district; as, for example, the Rajah of Burdwan, who still retains that title, though no political power is attached to it. The distinguished traveller now in this country derives his importance, as far as mere rank is concerned, from his high caste, combined with the antiquity and respectability of his family in Burdwan, where he was born. He traces his ancestors back, by a register in his possession duly kept, for 800 years in a direct line; and he is of the very highest caste of Brahmins. The title of Rajah was conferred on him very recently by the unhappy Sovereign of Delhi, on the occasion of his becoming his agent, to represent to the British Government in England the grievance which that ill-fated Monarch has sustained, and is sustaining, from the East India Company, by the infraction of a solemn treaty; but the best claims of Rajah Rammohun Roy to that universal homage which he is receiving, are his high character for honour and patriotism, his enlightened views, his great talents, and his varied attainments. The term Rajah, it may be observed, like King and Lord among ourselves, is a name as well as a title; and the Rajah's adopted son, whom he has brought home with him, to be educated here, bears this name and no other; though he is often called, in the public prints, Rajah Baba. Baba is only 'child,' or 'boy,' added in a familiar way, as a term of endearment. It may be as well also to notice another prevalent error, as to the Rajah's quality. Many suppose that because he is a Brahmin, he is necessarily of the order of the Priesthood; but this is a great mistake. The Priests are all Brahmins—but so far from Brahmins being all Priests, of the millions who compose that class, comparatively few are of the sacred order; although at the first institution of castes it was otherwise, the whole Hindoo population being divided into four great castes, which have since branched out into innumerable divisions and sub-divisions. When the Brahmins or Priests were prohibited from marrying until they were 40 years old, that they might not increase and multiply too fast. Brahmins now engage in many secular occupations not at all connected with the Priesthood; as bankers, merchants, writers or clerks, &c.; although there are of course many employments in which they cannot engage without degradation, and loss of caste, with the exception of the illustrious profession of milkman, the cow being sacred among the Hindoos.

Having mentioned the adopted son of the Rajah, it may perhaps convey information to many of our readers to add, that the Hindoo laws of inheritance recognize the right of adoption, and the adopted have equal rights to the property of the adopter with his own children. The adopted son of the Rajah is a native youth, who was left with him when very young by a gentleman of the Bengal civil service who died; and as the best mode of protecting him, the Rajah adopted him; although he has left in India children of his own, one grown up and married, and the other a very handsome boy, about fourteen years old, who speaks the English language fluently, and whose manners and carriage are remarkable for their combination of dignity and agreeableness.

In short, let the reader fancy a newly-made lord, of a very old family, and distinguished character, going from England to India, and taking with him a young gentleman of the name of Lord, whom he has adopted; and he will have a just idea of the light in which these highly respectable foreigners are regarded at the court of Delhi.

A HERMITAGE.

[The stanzas of Spenser are sometimes as complete in themselves, and as charming, as little cabinet pictures.]

A little lowly hermitage it was,
Down in a dale, hard by a forest's side,
Far from resort of people, that did pass
In travel to and fro. A little wide
There was an holy chapel edified,
Wherein the Hermit duly went to say
His holy things, each morn and eventide.
Thereby a christal stream did softly play,
Which from a sacred fountain welled forth alway.

Spenser.

MUSIC.

We were invited yesterday to hear a private rehearsal on the flute of a Monsieur Bucher, who, we understand, has newly arrived in this country—at all events he has not performed in public. The most cherished accomplishments on the flute, viz. the getting over the largest multitude of notes, and of making the most rapid steeple-hunting leaps in the shortest given time, have, we confess, no charms for us. These exhibitions, though admirable as proofs of practised labour and industry, do not appear to accord with the genius of the instrument, which is that of sustained tone and tender expression. Monsieur Bucher, however, lays claim to a merit beyond the mere playing of rapid passages. He has a clear and pure tone, and delicate and tasteful expression. In two pieces with variations that we heard him perform, we were much pleased with his style of giving the theme, and at the same time are unwilling to withhold the credit due to him for the neatness and precision with which he finished some extremely difficult passages in a few of the variations. The gratification we experienced in his performance was in a considerable degree disturbed by the manner in which he was accompanied on the piano-forte. We never witnessed a more perfect display of unenviable confidence with savage execution.

INSECURITY OF PROPERTY.

The Marquis keeps, to shew us what our sin does,
The gaping horror of his broken windows.
He keeps moreover, by the self-same token,
Riches untold, and a wise head unbroken.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— It is announced that Mr Kean will play at the Coburg on Monday, for the benefit of Mr Davidge.

— One of the Judges was lately drawn for the Militia; and, strange to say, though practising barristers are exempt, Judges are not, and his Lordship, therefore, was obliged to provide a substitute.

Nothing in Common.—A French nobleman, who was a member of the Academy, was discussing something with a learned man who was not a member,—'For the rest,' said the nobleman, irritated, 'what is there, Sir, in common between you and me?'—'Nothing, my Lord,' replied the commoner; 'for you are an academician, and I am a man of letters.'

Barons of England.—Henry VII, after his success at Bosworth, could only summon 28 Barons to his first Parliament; Henry VIII summoned 36 to his first Parliament; in 1830 the House of Peers consisted of 380 individuals, all Barons. The descent of 13 Peers can be traced to the 11th century, that of 10 to the 12th, 12 to the 13th, 13 to the 14th, 10 to the 15th, 37 to the 16th, 31 to the 17th, and 2 to the 18th; and 37 whose genealogies cannot be traced with accuracy.

Ruling Passion.—It is recorded of a celebrated courtier, that when he was dying, his face, in consequence of the pain he suffered, underwent many distortions; on which he apologised to a visitor, hoping that the agony he was enduring might be allowed to excuse him for exciting unpleasant sensations by the unavoidable disfigurement of his countenance.

— At the present Exhibition of Pictures at Paris there are not less than 40 subjects taken from the works of Sir Walter Scott. The Voleur adds, that at no former exhibition were so many shewn.

March of Intellect.—A few days since a dandy witness, whose personal appearance, including his mustachios, bespoke him as having reached the top round in the ladder of modern refinement, being called upon to give a character to a plaintiff, described him as being 'the most usefullest man' in the whole establishment—the witness himself turning out to be nothing more or less than a journeyman, at 30*s.* a week.

— Madame de Rossi, ci-devant Mademoiselle Sontag, who is giving concerts at the Hague, is about to appear as an author. The manuscript of her 'Travelling Sketches' has been purchased by the bookseller Hartmann, for eight or nine thousand francs.—Le Globe.

— A wag observed, that the Bills of Mortality, presented to the King at the Levee on Wednesday, should have been intrusted to the care of Admiral Coffin.

Notice Extraordinary.—The following advertisement was once posted up in a country tavern by the preceptor of the village academy:—'Whereas several idle and disorderly persons have lately made a practice of riding an ass belonging to Mr —— up and down the academy stairs; now, lest any accident should happen, he takes this method of informing the public that he is determined to shoot this said ass, and cautions any person who may be riding it at the time to take care of himself, lest, by some unfortunate mistake, he should shoot the wrong one.' Mr —— was never troubled again by the racing of Jack up and down stairs.—New York Evening Journal.

A Witty Butcher.—During the late election at Stamford, a violent Tory went into the shop of a Whig butcher. 'What is your pleasure?' demanded the knight of the cleaver.—'I want a calf's head,' was the reply. The butcher, having two, inquired of his Tory customer which he would prefer—a Tory one or a Whig one?—'A Tory one, to be sure,' rejoined the purchaser.—'Very well, Sir, I'll send it home for you.'—When the cook proceeded to dress it, the brains were missing, and the master was speedily made acquainted with the circumstance, when he returned to the butcher's, and indignantly inquired of him what had become of them.—'Are you not aware, Sir,' replied cleaver, 'that Tory heads do not contain brains? And did you not choose a Tory calf's head in preference to a Whig one?'

Digitized by Google

— Why is the death of General Diebitsch likely to create a universal sensation?—Because it will be felt from Pole to Pole.

MRS RENAUD, FORMERLY MRS POWELL.—An evening paper announces that this actress, who some years ago was celebrated for her personal attractions, and had besides considerable reputation as an actress, is now, in her advanced age, suffering under the combined evils of ill-health and indigence. It is to the credit of the theatrical profession that they are never backward to serve the unfortunate of their brethren and sisters; and accordingly we are not surprised to find that this lady is likely to have a benefit, on Tuesday or Wednesday next, at Covent Garden Theatre, Mr Charles Kemble having proposed that the theatre shall be devoted to her on one of those evenings. Mr Kean, with his usual alacrity, has offered his services; and in this instance, no less than others, he will no doubt have many imitators.

PLAYING AT MINOR THEATRES.—The example of Mr Kean, in playing at a London minor theatre, finds followers among other actors who have hitherto appeared only at the large houses. Mr Sinclair, we observe, is engaged at the Pavilion Theatre for a limited number of nights, and Mr Anderson is announced at the Cobourg. Both these gentlemen, according to the usage on such occasions, when dignity is supposed to condescend, are engaged only for a limited number of nights, but probably with no intention of confining themselves very strictly to the limits of their first engagement. They who have been said to 'live to please' are keen-sighted enough to see that the public of the present day can recognise merit where they at one time would have been blind to it; and they very wisely infer that they will not eventually lose in public estimation by falling in with the spirit of the times. The minor theatres do not yet possess the means of giving full effect to the genuine drama, but they have improved greatly of late years, and there is no reason to doubt that they will go on improving.

INCITEMENTS TO EARLY RISING.

Shepherds, rise, and shake off sleep!
See, the blushing morn doth peep
Through the windows, while the sun
To the mountain-tops is run,
Gilding all the vales below
With his rising flames, which grow
Greater by his climbing still.
Up, ye lazy grooms, and fill
Bag and bottle for the field!
Clasp your cloaks fast, lest they yield
To the bitter north-east wind.
Call the maidens up, and find
Who lay longest, that she may
Go without a friend all day;
Then reward your dogs, and pray
Pan to keep you from decay:
So unfold, and then away,

Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—The Carnival at Naples—Napoleon Buonaparte.
HAYMARKET.—The Widow Bewitched—The Way To Keep Him—The Intrigue—The Agreeable Surprise.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Jean Qui Pleure et Jean Qui Rit—Le Centenaire—Mons. Deschalumeaux.

KING'S THEATRE.

[Notice of PAGANINI concluded, from Thursday.]

OUR wizard's Allegro Maestoso was succeeded by an 'Adagio Flebile con Sentimento,'—a composition with a very 'particular fellow' of a title, by which we are to understand a strain of pathos amounting to the lachrymose, and disclosing a deep perception of the delicacy of that matter. If we are inclined to doubt the perfection of Signor PAGANINI'S playing it would be upon this point. He has a great deal more feeling than is usually shewn by players of extreme execution: his supplication in particular is admirable; he is fervent and imploring: you would think his violin was on its knees: the very first note he draws, in movements of this character, is the fullest, the gravest, the most forcible, and the most impassioned we ever heard; it is wonderfully in earnest. And yet, though there is a feeling of this kind throughout, and we never heard notes so touching accompanied with such admirable execution, we cannot help thinking, that we miss, both in the style and the composition, that perfection of simplicity, and of unconsciousness of everything but the object of its passion or admiration, which is perhaps incompatible with these exhibitions of art. It is difficult to avoid speaking of ultra-refinements of playing, like those of PAGANINI, except in terms of ultra-refinement. What we mean to say is, that with all his feeling, we think that science and force are still the predominant qualities of his playing, and that his 'sentiment' is of a less profound cast than he takes it for. It is evident enough that he supplicates; it is evident that he implores; it is plain that he holds a long and fervent argument, extremely to the purpose; but supposing, for the sake of a ground to go upon, that he is entreating a mistress, or remonstrating with fate for depriving him of some friend, he sets about it, we should say, still more obviously than deeply, or at all events endangers the simplicity and truth of the sentiment by the literality of the address. If he is to be supposed making love, we should say that he did it with more fervour of the senses than entireness of heart. In short, it is easier to doubt the perfection of his sensibility than of his skill. His 'Andantino Gaio' that followed, might be reckoned, in a similar spirit of comparison, defective of gaiety. There was gaiety in it, but by no means in proportion to the skill and the quaintness. In the quaint and fantastic, his mastery is equal to his execution. His performances the other night concluded with a Dance of Witches; and here he left nothing to desire. The author of the music in Macbeth would have hugged him for it. Levity, gravity, the homely, the supernatural, the odd, the graceful, figured in strange combination; and every now and then a voice was heard as of some fearful old beldam venting herself in a strain of feeble mystery, at once humorous and alarming. You imagined a pale old woman, dancing and whining, with a sort of ghastly affectation of the ridiculous.

Signor PAGANINI'S exploits on the 'single string' have been already described. Suffice it to say, that it was as marvellous the other night as ever, and that his single string beats other men's whole instrument. It has been said, that some portions of the phenomenon are not without trick; that is to say, that all which he does is not done by legitimate bowing. It is thought he must use some legerdemain. We have only to say to this, that if he does so, a man of his consummate skill has a right to do it, if he encreases the effect; because we are to suppose it done, not out of his own poverty, but the instrument's. At least, doing what he does do, the rest may be allowed him as a privilege. It was a trick in REMBRANDT to lay a positive relief of paint on some of his pictures,—as in the crust of jewellery over the altar-piece, in the picture of the 'Woman taken Adultery:'—but REMBRANDT is allowed to do what we should have refused to a less man, because his conceptions (if anything could) warranted the indulgence.

Upon the whole, our experience of the playing of this wonderful person has not only added to our stock of extraordinary and delightful recollections, but it has done our memories another great good, in opening afresh the world of ancient Greek music, and convincing us of the truth of all that is said of its marvellous effects. To hear PAGANINI, and to see him playing on that bit of wood with a bit of catgut, is to convince us that the Greeks might really have done the wonders attributed to them with their shells and their quills. We always thought it unaccountable that PLATO, and PLUTARCH, and others, could have written the extraordinary things they have done respecting the mysteries of the musical art, and the transports occasioned by the lyrical feats of their countrymen, and that the Greeks all the while should have been the infants in music which the self-love of modern art has been too willing to suppose. Scriblerus's performance in the balcony is still a good joke; but from this moment our faith is confirmed in the wonders recorded of Æolic and Doric modulations; and we owe gratitude to PAGANINI, if only for confirming it, and doubling the pleasure with which we read of the Timotheuses and Terpanders. What if he is but a poor player to the least of them? For now that we see what such instruments can do, there is no knowing how much they can do beyond it.

But even after what we have heard, how are we to endure hereafter our old violins and their players? How can we consent to hear them? How crude they will sound, how uninformed, how like a cheat! When the Italian goes away, violin-playing goes with him, unless some disciple of his should arise among us and detain a semblance of his instrument As it is, the most masterly performers, hitherto so accounted, must consent to begin again, and be little boys in his school. ☞

Digitized by Google

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Buffa, compressed in One Act, intitled

L'ITALIANA IN ALGIERI.

[By ROSSINI.]

Elvira, wife of Mustapha - - - Madame Castelli.
Zulma, confidant of Elvira - - - Madame Feliani.
Isabella, an Italian lady - - - Madame Raimbaux.
Mustapha, Bey of Algiers - - - Signor Santini.
Haly, Captain of the Algerine Corsairs - - Signor Deville.
Lindoro, a young Italian favourite of Mustapha - Signor Rubini.
Thaddeus, companion of Isabella - - Signor Lablache.

After which, an Opera Buffa, compressed into One Act, intitled

LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA.

[By GNECCO.]

Corilla Tortorini, Prima Donna for the Opera Seria — Madame Pasta.
Violante Pescarelli, Seconda Donna - - Madame Castelli.
Frederico Mordeute, Prima Tenore - - Signor Curioni.
Companone, Maestro and Composer of the Music of the Piece - - - - - Signor Lablache.
Don Grilletto Pasticci, Poet, and Author of the Drama — Signor Santini.
Fastidio Trivella, Impressario (Manager) - Signor Deville.
Fischetto, Prompter, Copyist, and Director of the Chorus (Opera Seria) - - - Signor De Angeli.

To conclude with

A FAVOURITE BALLET.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Taylor. Clara, Miss Phillips. Bianca, Miss F. Kemble.
Giraldi Fazio, Mr Warde. Duke of Florence, Mr Egerton.
Bartolo, Mr Blanchard. Philario, Mr Henry. Falsetto, Mr Parry.
Gonsalvo, Mr Baker.

To conclude with a Grand Historical and Military Spectacle, in Five Parts, called

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.

The Music composed and arranged by Messrs. Piccini, Amédée, and G. Stansbury.
Victoria, Miss Taylor.
Buonaparte, Mr Warde. Dugommier, Mr Bartley. Duroc, Mr G. Stansbury.
Junot, Mr Duruset. Hubert, Mr G. Bennett. Vincent, Mr Wrench.
Louis, Mr G. Penson. Cabri, Mr Meadows. Doppet, Mr Collett.
Part 1.—The Camp before Toulon. 1793.
Part 2.—Passage of Mount St Bernard. May 1800.
Part 3.—The Palace of Schöenbrunn (Vienna). May, 1809.
Part 4.—Montereau (in France). 1814.
Part 5.—Fontainebleau Palace. April, 1814.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; Napoleon Buonaparte.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

A Comic Piece, in One Act, called

THE WIDOW BEWITCHED; OR, LOVE AT FAULT.

[By Mr P. FARREN.]

The Principal Characters: Miss Sidney,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Vining, Mr Webster, Mr Coveney.

After which, the Comedy of

THE ROAD TO RUIN.

[By HOLCROFT.]

The Widow Warren, Mrs Glover. Sophia, Miss Sidney.
Mrs Ledger, Mrs Coveney. Milliner, Miss Barnett. Mantua-maker, Mrs Lodge.
Jenny, Mrs Tayleure. Maid, Mrs W. Johnson.
Old Dornton, Mr W. Farren. Harry Dornton, Mr Vining. Mr Sulky, Mr Gattie.
Mr Silky, Mr Webster. Goldfinch, Mr Harley. Milford, Mr Brindal.
Mr Smith, Mr Coveney. Hosier, Mr W. Johnson. Sheriff's Officer, Mr Field.
Jacob, Mr J. Cooper. Hatter, Mr Moore. Furrier, Mr Bishop.
Marker, Mr V. Webster. Waiter, Mr Lodge. Footman, Mr Coates.

To which will be added, the Musical Farce of

THE REVIEW; OR, THE WAGS OF WINDSOR.

[By COLMAN, the Younger.]

Grace Gaylove, Mrs Humby. Lucy, Mrs T. Hill. Martha, Mrs W. Johnson.
Phœbe Whitehorn, Miss J. Scott.
Caleb Quotem, Mr Harley. Mr Deputy Bull, Mr Gattie.
Captain Beaugard, Mr Brindal. Looney Mactwolter, Mr H. Wallack.
John Lump, Mr Webster. Charles Williams, Mr Newcombe.
Serjeant, Mr Coveney. Dubbs, Mr Bishop.

To conclude with the Farce of

MONSIEUR TONSON.

[By Mr MONCRIEFF.]

Adolphine de Courcy, Miss J. Scott. Madame Bellegarde, Mrs Tayleure.
Mrs Thompson, Mrs Coveney.
Monsieur Morbleu, M. Gattie. Tom King, Mr Brindal.
Mr Thompson, Mr W. Johnson. Jack Ardourly, Mr Bartlett.
Nap, Mr Webster. Rusty, Mr J. Cooper. Useful, Mr Mullency.
Trap, Mr Bishop. Wantem, Mr Field. Fip, Mr Coveney.
Snap, Mr V. Webster. Servant, Mr Coates.

On Monday, The Beggar's Opera; Who Wants A Guinea; Love, Law, and Physic.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL,

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'
PART II.—'The Omnibus,' Scena, Tim Wasp. And 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID,

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine Characters.

SURREY THEATRE.

An Historical Musical Drama, entitled

THE BEGGAR OF CRIPPLEGATE.

Marian, Miss Somerville, in which she will introduce 'Tell me my heart.'
Millicent, Miss Vincent. Mother Milldoll, Mrs Rogers. Alison, Miss Perry.
Annot, Miss Nicol. Kate, Miss Rumens.
Henry VIII, Mr D. Pitt. Godfrey Osgood, Mr Gough.
Vincent Lorimer, Mr Honner. Sir Piers Maltravers, Mr Almar.
The Beggar of Cripplegate, Mr C. Hill. Barnaby, Mr Williams.
Cocke Lorell, Mr Vale. Father Ignatius, Mr Ransford. Fabian, Mr Asbury.
Valentine, Mr Rogers. Wynkin Cross-eye, Mr Webb. Ambrose, Mr Young.

The celebrated Tarantella, from 'Masaniello,' by Mademoiselle Rosier and Master Saunders.

After which, the Play of

THE MOUNTAINEERS.

Floranthe, Miss Somerville. Zorayda, Miss Scott. Agnes, Mrs Vale.
Octavian, Mr Osbaldiston. Bulcazin Muley, Mr D. Pitt.
Count Virolet, Mr Honner. Killmalloch, Mr Young. Sadi, Mr Vale.
Lopo Tocho, Mr Williams. Ganem, Mr Almar. Perequillo, Mr T. Hill.
Roque, Mr Gough. Old Man, Mr Hobbs. Yusif, Mr Webb.
Muleteer, Mr Asbury. Boy, Miss Ellis.
Muleteers (with a Glee) Messrs Ransford, Maitland, and Tully.

To conclude with a Romantic Melo-Drama, in Three Acts, called

BAMPFYLDE MOORE CAREW.

[By Mr D. W. JERROLD.]

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

Bridget, Miss Vincent. Earl Moreland, Mr D. Pitt.
Nicholas, Mr Vale. Martin, Mr Gough. Bampfylde Moore Carew, Mr C. Hill.
Albert, Mr Maitland. De Leon, Mr Webb. Walter, Mr Young.
Planxty, Mr Osbaldiston. Judge, Mr Lee. Officer, Mr Almar.
Coleman, Mr Nelson. Escott, Mr Hobbs. Willie M'Dougal, Mr Asbury.
First Gipsey, Mr Tully. Second Gipsey, Mr Rogers. Third Gipsey, Mr T. Hill.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

FALSE AND CONSTANT.

Constance, Mrs Waylett, who will sing her Popular Ballads, 'Away to the Mountain's Brow,' and 'Come dwell with me.'
Arabelle, Mrs Evans. Susan, Miss Andrews.
Major Fitzcannon, Mr Hammerton. Mr Fairport, Mr Munroe.
Harry Severton, Mr Marshall. Charles Trueman, Mr Spencer. Robert, Mr Davies.
Mr Standish, Mr Porteus. And Sir George Darewell, Mr Green.

To conclude with the Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled

MY FRIEND FROM TOWN; OR, THE ELECTION.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Louisa, Miss Dix. Kitty, Miss Andrews. Margery, Miss Brothers.
Mr Pindarus Pump, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Woodville, Mr Spencer.
Alderman Progwell, Mr Munroe. Mr Addleton, Mr Porteus.
Ralph, Mr Davies. Chevy, Mr G. Lejeune. Jacet, Mr G. Smith.
Sir Omnibus Dabble, Mr Green.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—The Battle of Waterloo.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Canonbury Tower—English Paganini—The Devil at Dunmow.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET.—Turkish Troops—Pigmy Ponies—Unrivalled Leaps—Quang Coelis—Clown's Dandyzette—King of Italy—Lubin and Annette Six New Characters, by Mr J. Cooke—Roman and Venetian Statues—The Enchanted Ladder—Cupid and Zephyr—The Brentford Election.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N°. 254.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JUNE 27, 1831.

INTERESTING EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF POLAND.*

We do not remember to have been more interested in any historical work, than in the one before us. History is for the most part a doubtful and a dull business, compared with other kind of reading. We learn to suspect the facts; we find multitudes of them not worth telling; and we become tired and provoked at being obliged to attend on the movements of a series of barbarous or vulgar persons, who under the titles of generals and kings have unaccountably swayed the destinies of nations. We long to have new histories, of a kind hitherto unknown;—to see ages designated after their great men, and not after any pretender who happened to be at the head of a court;—we begin to consider history, hitherto so called, as noth ing but a record of the inexperience and childhood of mankind, its drum and trumpet state, and squabbling with the neighbouring schoo-l-ground.

The Polish history, God knows, has enough of these puerilities; but still there is a novelty throughout it, compared with that of other countries. The elective nature of its monarchy at different periods; the singular condition of its nobility, who formed a kind of nation within a nation, on horseback; the extremes of meanness and dignity to be found in the characters of the sovereigns; its multitudes of commercial Jews, and the religious toleration to which they gave rise; the large scale upon which so small a nation has acted, and now acts again; the very face of the country, which is described as being so flat, that 'a balloon might pass over almost the whole of it, at the height of twenty toises, without coming in contact with any obstruction;' the physical superiority of the natives over the people surrounding them, not unconnected, perhaps, with some curious circumstances in their moral condition; the very peculiarity of costume, noble and picturesque, which they retained long after other nations had agreed to dress alike; the extraordinary adventures of some of their kings; and above all, the romantic events of late times, beginning with the appearance of Kosciusko, and promising to terminate in a manner worthy of his memory,—present a mass of interest, distinct from what is afforded by the records of any other people, and not the less striking from being compressed by the paucity of its annals into a smaller compass. This is, at least, the impression made by the volume before us. The author is the reverse of an ostentatious writer, and appears dull in the setting out, but he rises with his subject by the force of an unaffected sympathy and generous good sense; and we heartily recommend his volume to the reader. It has the marks of truth in it at every step, and yet is as entertaining as a romance. The amusement of the book commences at about page twenty, with an account of the anti-Penelope example set by the Polish women, during a seven years expedition of their husbands into Russia; and it continues throughout. At page twenty-five, is a pleasant trait of an ambassador, who was sent by one of the Polish kings to the Emperor Henry V, with overtures of peace:—

'Henry is said to have received him very haughtily, and given him to understand that the Poles must not expect any peace from him, unless they submitted to his conditions and became tributary. At the same time, runs the story, he led him to histreasury, to exhibit his wealth; and pointing to the gold, told him there were the weapons with which he would reduce the Poles to subjection. To this the ambassador made no answer, but taking a ring from his finger, threw it into the heap, saying with a smile, "Here is something to augment the store." Henry is said to have answered with equal coolness, shutting the coffer, "Habdank; I thank you." . . A battle ensued in which the Germans were completely routed.'

Here follows an anecdote of Casimir the Just, the most amiable of the Polish Kings. His only fault seems to have been, that like some other princes of his stamp, he rather too literally deserved the title of 'Father of his People:'—

'He was one day at play and won all the money of one of his nobility, who, incensed at his ill-fortune, suddenly struck the prince a blow on the ear, in the heat of his uncontrolled passion. He fled immediately from justice; but, being pursued and overtaken, was condemned to lose his head. The generous Casimir determined otherwise. "I am not surprised," said he, "at the gentleman's conduct; for not having it in his power to revenge himself on fortune, no wonder he should attack her favourite in me." After these generous words he revoked the sentence, returned the nobleman his money, and declared that he alone was faulty, as he encouraged by his example a pernicious practice, that might terminate in the ruin of hundreds of the people.'—P. 31.

The author has presented us with an interesting account of the origin and polity of the Cossacks (see page 68); but we hasten to give his narrative of one of the most striking events in modern history, the raising of the siege of Vienna by the famous John Sobieski. Sobieski was one of the elected monarchs of Poland, and not a mere soldier, though his reputation is founded on his military genius. For a great man, however, and an elected prince, he partook of the defects of his time and his rank; and as he was of a temperament, which seems accompanied in Poland with more of the heroical character than is commonly found with it, he had a wife much younger than himself, who contrived to diminish his reputation. His reign upon the whole had the reverse effect upon Poland from what might have been expected of it. However, let us indulge ourselves in laying before the reader the greatness of a great man; and leave his faults to be seen in the book:—

'Leopold, Emperor of Germany and King of Hungary, had driven his Hungarian subjects to revolt by his infringement on their national liberties. The noted Tekeli, one of the principal nobles of that oppressed country, was their leader; and they then entered into an alliance with the Turks. Mahomet sent notice to Leopold, that the Hungarians were now the allies and subjects of the Porte, and that all the Austrian troops must be withdrawn from Hungary, unless he chose to be considered the infringer of the peace. Leopold earnestly begged the aid of the Poles, but Sobieski seemed at first disinclined to assist the proud and tyrannical emperor. But he next turned to a more favourable listener in the queen. Several reasons made the proposal agreeable to her; she was piqued with Louis XIV, for his neglect of her family, and was glad to thwart him in his attempts to subject Leopold to Turkish invasion; besides, the emperor promised to marry the arch-duchess to her son, and to ensure the succession to the Polish crown in her family. Sobieski could not withstand Mary's artifices; and perhaps he was in fact glad of the opportunity to break a lance with the Turks. But a trifle almost deprived the Emperor of this invaluable ally. John refused to sign the treaty unless the Emperor styled him His Majesty, which for a long time he obstinately refused. This demand was, without doubt, made at the instigation of Mary, who was piqued because Louis would not give her husband that title. Leopold was at last obliged, though reluctantly, to yield assent, and John Sobieski became his ally.

'Louis in the meantime had not been idle in attempting to counteract these designs. His ambassador succeeded in attaching a strong party to his interest, but the vigilance of Sobieski frustrated the plan, and the French ambassador, nettled at his defeat, returned to amuse and deceive Louis with telling him that the Polish king was grown too fat and gouty to be able to make a single campaign. In a few weeks, however, all Europe was told a different story.' . . . . . .

'In the beginning of May 1683, the Moslem army set out on its march. The troops amounted to nearly 300,000 men, but above two-thirds of them were Hungarians and Tartars They were well provided with ammunition, and had more than three hundred pieces of artillery. Their general was Kara Mustapha, the grand vizier, who was invested with plenary power by the Sultan.

'The Duke of Lorraine, Leopold's brother-in-law, who had been one of Sobieski's competitors for the Polish crown, commanded the imperial troops, who barely mustered 37,000 men.

'The vizier marched his army from Belgrade, along th e western side of the Danube, and proceeded almost without a blow to Vienna. The Emperor became now as timid and crouching in his adversity as he had been proud and overbearing in his prosperity. The haughty Leopold was to be seen running away before the Tartars from town to town, an edifying picture of humiliated tyranny. To add to his troubles, the Empress, who accompanied him, was then pregnant, and even in this state she was obliged, one night during their retreat, to sleep in a wood on a bundle of straw. This was a time for the bleak night-winds to teach Leopold that monition, "take physic, Pomp." Behind him he could see the farms and cottages of his poor subjects in flames, of which his tyrannical pride was the incendiary, as conscience, no doubt, too plainly told him. But though he was the cause of all these troubles, he did not hazard a hair of his head to remove them, but left his capital to defend itself against the immense host of Turks pouring down upon it.

* The History of Poland, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. By James Fletcher, Esq. of Trinity College, Cambridge. With a Narrative of the Recent Events, obtained from a Polish Patriot Nobleman. 8vo. pp. 428. Cochrane and Pickersgill.

Digitized by Google

'It was on the 8th of July that the Turkish artillery began to play on the walls, and the Austrians to tremble for the result.' . .

'The Duke of Lorraine sent repeated messages to Sobieski to beg him to bring speedy succour; but the Polish troops could not be assembled till towards the end of August, and even then they amounted to only 24,000 men. Before Sobieski began his march, he received a letter from the Emperor, which shews how adversity can lower the pride of little minds. 'We are convinced,' said Leopold, 'that by reason of the vast distance of your army, it is absolutely impossible for it to come time enough to contribute to the preservation of a place which is in the most imminent danger. It is not your troops, Sire, that we expect, but your Majesty's own presence, being fully persuaded that if your royal presence will vouchsafe to appear at the head of our forces, though less numerous than those of the enemy, your name alone, which is so justly dreaded by them, will make their defeat certain.

'The Queen accompanied him to the frontiers, and the following letter, which he wrote to her on the day after their parting, will make us more intimately acquainted with the champion of Vienna:—

'"ONLY JOY OF MY SOUL, CHARMING AND BELOVED MARIETTE! —I have passed a very bad night here. One of my arms is numbed; I have also suffered great pain in the spine of my back. I shall have an attack of rheumatism after this.

'"Dupont has given me still more pain; he returned from you at nine in the evening, and has told me that the violent agitation you feel may probably affect your health. I beg you, my dear soul, to compose yourself, and submit to the will of God. He will deign to grant me his guardian angels, and allow me to return to my friends safe and sound."

'Thus Sobieski, fifty-four years old, and in such a state of health, so weak and debilitated as to be obliged to be almost lifted on his horse, was the only man whom the empire could look to for aid.' . .

'The Polish forces marched along the banks of the Danube without any resistance, and were joined there by the Duke of Lorraine, and some other German forces, hastening to the rescue of Vienna.' . . . . . .

'As the Polish army crossed the bridge, they were particularly admired for the fineness of their horses, their uniform, and general appearance, but one battalion seemed a sad exception, being very badly accoutred. One of the generals expressed his opinion to the King, that it was a disgrace to the rest, but Sobieski thought otherwise. "Look at it well," said he, as it was passing the bridge; "it is an invincible body, that has sworn never to wear any clothes but what it takes from the enemy. In the last war they were all clad in the Turkish manner."

'The Turks offered not the least opposition to the Poles as they crossed the bridge, and all the Imperial troops were safely assembled on the western side of the Danube by the 7th of September and amounted to about 70,000 men.

'They could hear from Tuln the roar of the Turkish cannon. Vienna was, in fact, reduced almost to its last gasp. Most of the garrison were either killed or wounded, and disease was making even greater ravages than the enemy's balls. "The grave continued open without ever closing its mouth." As early as the 22nd of August, the officers had estimated that they could not withstand a general attack three days. If the Vizier had pursued his advantage, Vienna must have fallen into his hands. But it was his object to avoid taking it by storm, in which case the plunder would be carried off by the soldiers, whereas, if he could oblige it to surrender, he might appropriate the spoil to his own use. So careless was he too in his confidence, that he had not yet ascertained that the Poles had arrived, till they were in his immediate vicinity, and when the news was afterwards brought to him, that the King of Poland was advancing, "The King of Poland!" said he laughing, "I know indeed that he has sent Lubomirski with a few squadrons." ' . . .

'On the 11th of September, they reached Mount Calemberg, the last which separated them from the Turks. "From this hill," says Sobieski's biographer, "they were presented with one of the finest and most dreadful prospects of the greatness of human power; an immense plain and all the islands of the Danube covered with pavilions, whose magnificence seemed rather calculated for an encampment of pleasure than the hardships of war; an innumerable multitude of horses, camels, and buffaloes; 200,000 men all in motion; swarms of Tartars dispersed along the foot of the mountain in their usual confusion; the fire of the besiegers incessant and terrible, and that of the besieged such as they could contrive to make; in fine, a great city, distinguishable only by the tops of the steeples and the fire and smoke that covered it."—But Sobieski was not imposed on by this formidable sight.—"This man," said he, "is badly encamped: he knows nothing of war; we shall certainly beat him." The eagle eye of the experienced warrior was not mistaken.' . . . . . .

'Sunday, the 12th of September 1683, was the important day, "big with the fate" of Leopold, that was to decide whether the Turkish crescent was to wave on the turrets of Vienna.' . . . . .

'At eight in the morning there was some warm skirmishing; at eleven the Christian army was drawn up in array on the plain, and Kara Mustapha came to command his troops in person. He was stationed in the centre, and Sobieski occupied the same situation in his army.

'It was nearly five in the evening, and the engagement had only been partial, for Sobieski's infantry had not come up, and the vizier was to be seen under a superb crimson tent, quietly sipping coffee, while the King of Poland was before him. At length the infantry arrived, and Sobieski ordered them to sieze an eminence which commanded the vizier's position. The promptitude and gallantry with which this manœuvre was executed, decided the fate of the day. Kara Mustapha, taken by surprise at this unexpected attack, ordered all his infantry to his right wing, and the movement put all the line in confusion. The king cried out that they were lost men; he ordered the Duke of Lorraine to attack the centre, which was now exposed and weakened, while he himself made his way through the confused Turks, straight for the vizier's tent. He was instantly recognized by the streamers which adorned the lances of his guard. "By Allah!" exclaimed the Cham of the Tartars, "the king is with them!" An eclipse of the moon added to the consternation of the superstitious Moslems. At this moment, the Polish cavalry made a grand charge, and at the same time the Duke of Lorraine with his troops, added to the confusion; and the route of the Turks became general. The vizier in vain tried to rally them. "And you," said he, to the Cham of the Tartars, who passed him among the fugitives, "cannot you help me?"—"I know the King of Poland," was the answer. "I told you if we had to deal with him, all we could do would be to run away. Look at the sky; see if God is not against us." The immense Turkish army was wholly broken up, and Vienna was saved.' . . . . . .

'On the following day John made his entrance into Vienna. The breach made by the Turks, and through which they expected to march to the destruction of the city, was the road which admitted its deliverer. The citizens received him with undisguised expressions of gratitude; and even the stern warrior, Sobieski, shed a tear or two of joy at receiving the thanks and acclamations of the victims whom he had rescued from destruction. "Never," said he, "did the crown yield me pleasure like this!" The people could not help comparing him to their own disgraceful sovereign, and exclaiming, "Ah, why is not this our master?" With difficulty could the stern looks of the emperor's officers check these natural expressions of feeling. But Sobieski did not arrogate to himself only the glory of the victory; he went to the cathedral to return thanks, and began to sing the Te Deum himself. A sermon was afterwards delivered, and the preacher, in the taste of that age of conceits and far fetched puerilities, chose the following text for the occasion:—"There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." . . .

'But the low-minded Leopold, who had descended to such adulation and entreaty when danger threatened, could not bear to witness the triumph of his deliverer. Every report of the cannon, which announced a fresh tribute of applause to Sobieski, fell like a reproach on his ears. He lingered on his journey on the banks of the Danube, unwilling to add by his presence to the honour of his rival and his own shame. "It was the weakness of the councils that you had a share in," said he, turning spitefully to one of his ministers, "that occasions me this disgrace."

'Leopold's weak mind sunk under the burden of such a favour, and envy and spleen, together with a sense of his own littleness, would not allow him to magnify his benefactor and the object of his jealousy with expressions of his gratitude. "A man who reminds one of a favour, cancels it," says a pithy aphorist; and to this we might add, that he who receives a kindness ungraciously doubles the obligation. But not so thought the emperor. In this moment, when the heart should pour forth its gratitude, he was deferring the evil day by disgraceful quibbles about the ceremony with which he was to receive Sobieski. He enquired whether an elective king ever had an interview with an emperor, and how he was received. "Receive him," said the Duke of Lorraine, who had been one of Sobieski's unsuccessful competitors for the Polish crown; "receive him with open arms, since he has preserved the empire." The emperor, however, refused to give his benefactor the right hand, and John was too goodnatured and unceremonious to urge this point of unmeaning and trumpery etiquette. At length it was agreed that the interview should take place on horseback in the open plain, and that they should remain facing each other, which would not allow much punctilio in the mode of salutation.

'At the appointed hour John Sobieski rode up to the emperor, in the same armour which he had worn in the defence of Vienna, and accosted him with the ease of conscious but unassuming rank. The emperor, on the contrary, was very distant and ceremonious, and began to recount in a very ungracious manner the services the Germans had rendered the Poles, at different periods. At length he wrung from his lips the word gratitude for the deliverance of Vienna, at which Sobieski merely remarked, "Brother, I am glad I have done you that small service." The young Polish prince, James, came up at this moment, and his father presented him to Leopold, with these words, "This is a prince whom I am educating for the service of Christendom." The emperor merely nodded, although this was the young man whom he had promised to make his son-in-law. One of the Polish Palatines stepping forward to kiss the emperor's boot, was checked by Sobieski, exclaiming, "Palatine, no meanness." The interview was then at an end.'

Digitized by Google

Leopold was a right emperor of the modern German sort,—a puppet made up of punctilio, who sat looking down upon men of virtue and genius, as a wooden idol does upon all who come near it.

In the works of the Italian poet Filicaia, are some fine odes addressed to Sobieski on his deliverance of Vienna.

[To be continued.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A PRIZE AND A BLANK.—Dennis Currie, a poor Irish orange-seller, as we are informed by the N. Y. Constellation, last week drew a prize of 5,000 dollars; and the day after his wife presented him, as he said, with "three twins, partly boys and partly girls; fine sprightly childer."—New York Paper.

— The name of Diebitsch, as we lately observed, signifies in his native language 'thievish.' On his death the command of the Russian army was, it appears, assumed by another German, whose name is Toll, which, in the same language, means 'mad.' It is to be wished that the non-success of General Mad may at least equal that of his predecessor, General Thief.

— The Chinese, when going on voyages, provide themselves with a very simple means of preservation in the event of a shipwreck. This consists of four spars joined together so as to form a square hollow frame, which being put below the arms, easily supports a person floating in the sea.

— When the cholera raged in China, the city of Pekin is said to have owed its comparative exemption from it to the firmness of the Emperor, who, on one occasion, is reported to have said to those about him, 'Do not suppose the disease is more powerful than yourselves; the pusillanimous alone die of it.'—In addition to courage, which no doubt has its good effects, we would beg to remind our countrymen in the dirtier districts of the metropolis, that cleanliness is a great anti-contagionist.

— It would be as well if those who have the management of such matters would bear in mind, that watering the streets, and rendering them a mass of mud, are two very different things. The mud may make it very pleasant for those who ride in carriages; but, as regards pedestrians, we can assure the gentlemen in question it is quite another affair.

REPRESENTATIVES IN PARLIAMENT.—In the Saxon times, each borough sent but one Deputy; yet the number was considerable—for any town or village that chose to send one was at liberty: but the King's purpose was better served by having two Deputies only from places under his influence. The Barons also took care that those dependent on them should send Deputies also; whilst the independent boroughs sent none, although their right to do so was not then disputed. Such was the origin of that partiality in the representation so much complained of.

POPULAR PASTIMES IN GERMANY.—I was taken this morning to a public garden in the vicinity, where the "merry and wise" congregate during these solstitial days. It was a lively scene;—all were welcome that came, and all that came were apparently happy. There were cool shady arbours for the over-heated or contemplative, green mazes for the restless to tire themselves in, and delightful seats to receive them when weary. There was smooth velvet turf for the waltzers, wine for the herrschaft, flowers and confections for the ladies, beer and tobacco for the bourschaft, music which kept the waltzers in a perpetual wirl, and gave them an additional pair of wings; with a right merry holiday to all.—Dr Beattie's German Courts.

POETRY AND PASTRY.—A pastry-cook, who, in addition to his ordinary vocation, sometimes tried his hand at a comic opera, read one to the Abbé Lattaignant, entitled 'La Galette' (The Muffin). The Abbé, smiling, advised him to put it again into the oven. The verse-stricken pastry-cook did not relish this advice, and begged to say that a certain eminent professor, whom he had served these twenty years, had told him that 'it was full of salt.'—'Oh! I see how it is,' said Lattaignant; 'you give this professor credit, don't you?'—'Indeed do I,' replied the pastry-cook; 'and at this very moment he owes me six hundred francs for patties.'—'There is the point,' continued Lattaignant; 'do you but find fault with him for not paying you, and he will find fault with you for meddling with operas.'—[This anecdote (from the French) falls in with the prejudices, in some respects justly entertained, against those who deviate from their regular calling; and yet the fault is but a venial one, and is moreover sometimes justified by success; witness the example of a contemporary, who unites in himself the apparently incompatible characters of author, alderman, and pastry-cook, respectable in the two former, and in the last it is not safe to trust one's self to speak of him, at least in a paragraph, so delicious is the flavour which his 'works' leave on the palate even of one's memory. But the Common Council and the men of wealth and taste in the city speak his praises, and give him puff for puff; and the little boys, forgetting the tartness of his name, at the very name of his tarts, with one voice cry 'Birch for ever!']

CHOICE OF COMPANIONS.

A drop of rain fell on a glowing iron;
It hiss'd and was no more.
Another fell into a fragrant flower;
And glitter'd long as dew.
A third dropp'd just within a muscle shell,
And there became a pearl.
Son, fancy not that friendship with the bad,
With the indifferent, or with the good,
Can be all one to thee.

Historic Survey of German Poetry. Vol. III, p. 33.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—L'Italiana in Algieri—La Prova d'Un Opera Seria—A Favorite Ballet.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Fazio—Napoleon Buonaparte.

HAYMARKET.—The Widow Bewitched—The Road to Ruin—The Review—Monsieur Tonson.

KING'S THEATRE.

A CELEBRATED composer has published a piece of music entitled 'Recollections of PAGANINI.' We do not wonder that those who have heard this wonderful performer try to recall him to their minds, both for their own sakes and those of their friends. We find ourselves repeatedly called upon to say something about him, and every time seem to recollect something new. These reminiscences have induced us to add a word or two to our former articles.

Singular and complicated as the compositions of PAGANINI are, he sometimes plays from memory; perhaps always, when the composition is one that he repeats often. For the music-book before him proves nothing. There is nothing very extraordinary in this: but it is curious to observe, with what masterly precision he gives the cue to the orchestra, how exact to the time his memory is, and with what instantaneous and easy nicety he takes up, as it were, the whole of the weight of the accompaniments on the tip of his bow, and hangs it on the right peg. The official conductor at the piano-forte seems to sit staring in pure wonder; and the people that crowd behind the musicians on either side the stage, turn round to one another with lifted hands and smiles of astonishment. All the orchestra appear mechanical, and he the soul standing in front.

When the transports of the audience have produced a dead silence, PAGANINI seems to take advantage of it to introduce his marvels of delicate execution, and passages sui generis. It is then that he treats us with his distant warblings of birds, and those singular showers of little distinct notes, as if he sprinkled one's ears in play. However, there is no playfulness in his face. He looks so grave, that we begin to see nothing but grave mystery in his performance; a fancy which is increased by his own little intervals of silence, as if he were preparing his charm like a sorcerer. Now he comes down with his flashing harmonies,—and then is silent. He then gives us some of his showers,—and is again silent. Then, when the listening is at its height, and everybody is sitting in breathless expectation, he touches the minutest of notes in alto, and comes rapidly whispering to us all down his violin in the most extraordinary of chromatic passages, as if some wonderful nightingale were making experiments upon its voice, and knew that the neighbourhood were enchanted.

He seems to have few of the affected gestures and attitudes of other players. His position, when he begins, is admired as being highly comme il faut, and like a man who knows how to plant himself to his violin; but his manner is generally simple. He now and then indulges his conscious mastery, at the termination of a favourite passage, by thrusting his bow beyond the instrument, and chucking the note, as it were, up into the air; as though he had delivered something worthy of its reception.

But as an instance of what we doubted respecting the profundity of his 'sentiment,' we may observe, that the tender mode in which he thought fit to play the German 'God save the King,' ('God preserve the Emperor Francis,') appeared to us altogether a mistake. This composition of HAYDN'S is surely a point of severe and simple playing, and not a subject for whining and chromatics. The style in which PAGANINI gave it the other night was rather what we should have expected from some unthinking shewer-off than a great master. It should have been affectionate, but only in such a way as to be compatible with a Hymn, and with the modesty of a religious petition;—fervent, cathedral, deferential, yet at the same time self-collected; conscious of a presence, before which there is to be no unseemly weakness or overweeningness. Yet to those who were aware of the nature of the subject, and recollected the words, PAGANINI's chromatical, fond, and effeminate manner of playing it resembled a caricature of some morbid loyalist, who had got maudlin with the Emperor's wine, and must needs go sighing and dying through the National Hymn.—Here was a deficiency in that judgment which implies the very deepest taste, or the perfection of the sense of truth.

Digitized by Google

☞

'THE SCHOOLMASTER' WANTED.—The following note was lately received by the Overseers of Hoghton, from a person holding a similar situation in a neighbouring township:—

'May 1st 1831

'To the Overseer Houtton

'Thos King younees Sun Lieng Ded in his house Ples hee his not able to in tair the bodey as Nother Not Likely to leeve long. Please to a Seast him at this Time and give mee noe trouble.'

Another.—In one of the principal streets in this town may be seen a sign-board, over a door, with the following inscription painted upon it in conspicuous characters:—

'W—— A—— Maker of Decoction from Herbs And Roots for the use of Swellings Gatherings Cuts Burns Scolds & Likewise Old Sore fore Eyes Films Taken off the sight of Man horse and Beast also Canker or Scurvy in the Gums Jaundice Drinks for the use of Coffs Colds, &C.'—Blackburn Gazette.

ETIQUETTE.—A respectable bourgeois having waited upon Marshal Count Torrano, to complain of the number of soldiers who were quartered upon him, the Count, who was no German, called his interpreter. The honest burgess, however, conscious that he could talk, and talk well too, declined the friendly intervention; and drawing himself up square in front of the Count, with a low and reiterated bow, addressed him with 'Ihr Eelenz.' The Count returned the bow, repeating the salutation,—'Ihr Eelenz.'—Surprised at the honour thus suddenly accorded him, the sagacious client fancied he must have mistaken the title, and, therefore, with a still lower bow, resumed, 'Monseigneur!'—'Monseigneur,' said the Count, interrupting him in a more serious tone,—'We'll stop at that, if you please, lest, in the excess of our mutual compliments, we arrive at "Your Majesty."' The shopkeeper was nonplussed and embarrassed, which the Count perceiving, enquired, 'What is your name, my friend?'—'Spanckenberg,' answered the man of ceremony. 'Good!' said the Count, 'and mine is Torrano. Now, Spanckenberg, what is your business with Torrano?'—Dr Beattie's German Courts.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

SHAKSPEARE's Tragedy of

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Juliet, Miss Fanny Kemble.
Lady Capulet, Mrs Lovell. Nurse, Mrs Gibbs.
Romeo, Mr John Mason. Prince Escalus, Mr Henry.
Paris, Mr Parry. Montague, Mr Turnour. Capulet, Mr Egerton.
Benvolio, Mr Holl. Tybalt, Mr Baker. Mercutio, Mr C. Kemble.
Friar Lawrence, Mr Evans. Friar John, Mr Mears.
Apothecary, Mr Meadows.
Page, Miss Fortescue. Balthazar, Mr Irwin. Abram, Mr Heath.
Samson, Mr Fuller. Gregory, Mr Norris. Peter, Mr Keeley.

In Act I. A Masquerade and Dance.
In Act V. The Funeral Procession of Juliet, and a Solemn Dirge.

Previous to the Tragedy, Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflöte.

To conclude with the Melo-drama of

THE MILLER AND HIS MEN.

[By Mr POCOCK.]
The Music by Mr Bishop.
Clandine, Mrs Vining. Ravina, Mrs Lovell. Laurette, Miss P. Horton.
Grindoff, Mr Farley. Count Friberg, Mr Parry.
Karl, Mr Blanchard. Lothair, Mr Duruset. Kelmar, Mr Evans
Kreutz, Master Watson. Riber and Golotz, Messrs Henry and Mears.
Zingra, Mr Norris. Lindorf, Mr Sherriff. Coburg, Mr S. Tett.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Opera of

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA.

[By GAY.]
Polly, Miss Wells. Lucy, Mrs Humby. Jenny Diver, Mrs W. Johnson.
Sukey Tawdry, Miss Barnett. Mrs Peachum, Mrs Tayleure.
Peachum, Mr W. Farren. Lockit, Mr Gattie.
Captain Macheath, Mr B. Taylor.
Filch, Mr Webster. Mat o'the Mint, Mr Field. Ben Budge, Mr Newcombe.
Jemmy Twitcher, Mr Bartlett. Wat Dreary, Mr Lodge.
Crook Fingered Jack, Mr Bishop. Harry Paddington, Mr V. Webster.
In Act III. A Hornpipe in Fetters, by Mr V. Webster.

After which, the Comedy of

THE CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE.

[By COLMAN the Elder, and GARRICK.]
Mrs Heidelberg, Mrs Glover. Miss Sterling, Mrs W. Clifford.
Fanny, Mrs Ashton. Chambermaid, Mrs Coveney.
Trusty, Mrs W. Johnson. Betty, Mrs Tayleure.
Lord Ogleby, Mr W. Farren. Lovewell, Mr Cooper. Sterling, Mr Gattie.
Sir John Melville, Mr Brindal. Brush, Mr Vining.
Canton, Mr Webster. Serjeant Flower, Mr W. Johnson.
Truman, Mr V. Webster. Traverse, Mr Coveney.

To conclude with the Farce of

LOVE, LAW, AND PHYSIC.

Mrs Hillary, Mrs T. Hill. Laura, Miss J. Scott. Maid, Mrs Coveney.
Doctor Camphor, Mr Gattie. Flexible, Mr Vining.
Lubin Log, Mr Harley. Captain Danvers, Mr Brindal.
John Brown, Mr Mulleney. Andrew, Mr Webster. Coachman, Mr Coveney.

To-morrow, As You Like It; A Friend at Court; and Animal Magnetism.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LE CI-DEVANT JEUNE HOMME.

Comédie en Un Acte, en Prose, de M. MERLE.
Madame de Blainville, Mlle. St. Ange.
Florville, M. Pelissié. Floricour, M. Paulin. M. Sombreuil, M. Préval.
La Branche, M. Laporte. Grugeon, M. Gamard.
Usurier, M. Guenée. M. Carrick, M. Arnaud.

Suivie de

LES SUITES D'UN MARIAGE DE RAISON.

Vaudeville Nouveau en Un Acte, de MM. CARTOIS et L'HERIE.
Suzette, Mlle. Irma. Madame Pinchon, Mlle. St. Ange.
Bertrand, M. Pélissie. Le Général Comte de Brémont, M. St. Aubert.
Edouard, M. Alfred. Pinchon, M. Laporte. Michel, M. Arnaud.

Suivi de

WERTHER.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, du Théatre des Variétés.
Charlotte, Madame Préval.
Werther, M. Potier. Volmar, M. Alfred. Albert, M. Cloup.
Fritz, M. Gamard. Loustick, M. Guenée.

On Finira par

LES ANGLAISES POUR RIRE.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. SEVRIN et DUMERSAN.
Aspasie, Mlle. St. Ange. Goton, Mme. Gamard.
M. Menu, M. Potier. M. Coclet, M. Laporte. M. Copeau, M. Cloup.
M. Fusin, M. Gamard.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, founded on SHAKSPEARE'S Tragedy of

KING RICHARD III.

Queen, Miss Scott. Lady Anne, Miss Vincent. Duchess of York, Madame Simon.
King Henry VI., Mr Gough. Prince of Wales, Miss Ellis.
Duke of York, Master Frank Carbery. Duke of Buckingham, Mr Honner.
Richard, Duke of Gloucester, Mr Elton.
Duke of Norfolk, Mr Maitland. Tressel, Mr C. Hill.
Earl of Richmond, Mr D. Pitt. Earl of Oxford, Mr Ransford.
Lord Stanley, Mr Almar. Lord Mayor, Mr Webb.
Sir William Catesby, Mr Rogers. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr Lee.
Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr Asbury. Sir William Brandon, Mr Tully.
Sir James Tyrell, Mr Hobbs. Sir James Blunt, Mr Collier.

To conclude with the Grand Romantic Drama, entitled

ONE O'CLOCK.

[By G. LEWIS.]
Clotilda, Madame Simon. Una, Miss Vincent. Paulina, Mrs Vale.
Hardyknute, Mr C. Hill. Leolyn, Miss Ellis.
Guelpho, Mr Williams. Oswy, Mr Maitland. Willikind, Mr Vale.
Rolf, Mr Ransford. Karl, Mr Young. Rupert, Mr Tully.
Minstrel, Mr Collier.
Incidental Characters.—Auriol, Miss Nicol.
Sangrida, Mr Asbury. Hacho, Mr Almar.
The Shades of Ruric and Alexina, Mr Hobbs and Miss Runnens.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

For the Benefit of Mr Bennett.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Lejeune.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr E. Seguin. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hasan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, the Farcical Interlude called

FREAKS AND FOLLIES.

Ellen, Miss Andrews.
Sir William Franklin, Mr Munroe. Ned Franklin, Mr Forester.
Doctor Growl, Mr Porteus. Captain Rowland, Mr Spencer.
Chouse, Mr G. Smith. Tom Trippit, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with the Burletta of

MIDAS.

[By KANE O'HARA.]
Immortals—Juno, Miss Wells. Venus, Miss Forster.
Minerva, Miss Berresford. Hebe, Miss Haton. Cupid, Mlle. Josephine.
The Graces, Miss Ward, Miss Gilbert, and Miss Bennett.
Jupiter, Mr Spencer. Mercury, Mr Davies. Bacchus, Mr Young.
Pan, Mr G. Smith. Mars, Mr Willing.
Apollo, Mrs Waylett.
Mortals—Mysis, Mrs Garrick. Nysa, Miss Weston. Daphne, Miss Dix.
Justice Midas, Mr Marshall. Demætus, Mr G. Lejeune.
Sileno, Mr Bennett.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Indian Hunter — Hare-bell — Black Sicilian Pony—Tight Rope—Lilliputian Bacchus—Leaping—Animated Architecture—Inebriated Soldier—Amazon's Victory—Feats of Riding—Reaper—Brentford Election.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard III—Napoleon of Humble Life—The White Fairy.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE. — Lear of Private Life—The Youthful Days of William IVth—Richard Turpin.

GARRICK THEATRE.—The Barber of Seville—Matrimony—No Song No Supper.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—Variety of Entertainments.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNATH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº. 255.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28, 1831.

THE MARRIED CRUSOE. *

THE volumes before us detail the adventures of a young married couple who, though shipwrecked, and for a long period cut off from all intercourse with the world, appear to be, as the hero himself expresses it, the peculiar care of providence. The proceedings of this happy pair, seem a sort of playing at Crusoe, in the manner of a party of gentlefolks making a gipsying excursion;—everything being so ordered that there shall be no inconvenience. Sir Edward and his lady have a ship's cargo at hand, which supplies almost everything they can desire. The islands harbour neither serpents nor beasts of prey. Animals run into their dog's mouth, whenever they are in want of fresh meat; they set the seeds of the fruit they eat, and everything thrives under their hands. They build a log-house, which, though slightly put together, withstands tremendous storms; and when they begin to find that they have too much work on their hands, Fortune sends them a supply of servants. She leads them into a cavern, too, where they find great treasure in gold and silver; and, as this would be of little use to them in a desert island, a smuggling vessel soon makes its appearance, which, being unarmed, and chased by a Spanish brig, is saved, and the latter put to flight, by three guns fired from a rock. The young couple make a short voyage in the vessel of the smuggler, who, though a man of bad character, and greedy of gain, makes no endeavour to obtain possession of any of the chests of gold which he knows to be on board. The travellers return with artisans, sailors, negroes, &c.—and their dependants, of whatever sex, age, or country, are all honest, faithful, industrious, peaceable, and under their auspices become pious.

The book is one which we might expect to find in an old country mansion among the literary treasures of a great-grand-mother. It seems to have been written by some good-natured person, who had an affection for the children of his fancy, and could not bear to see anything go wrong with them. So important do their smallest actions appear to him, that they cannot eat an orange or a pumpkin, but he thinks it necessary to tell us that they planted the seeds, and gave the rind to the goats;—and this he repeats upon every several occasion. We can hardly persuade ourselves that it could have been written less than a century ago; its age only, and the country education of the principal characters, can account for the prosing sort of piety, and the formality of speech, observable in every page. If the hero wishes to say a kind thing to his wife, he sets about it like a country beau paying a compliment to his partner at a race-ball; every expression of feeling is worked up into a set speech. Sir Edward and his wife are good genuine human beings, but all their habits seem to partake of a certain constraint, as though they wore a moral bag-wig and hoop. There is, throughout the work, a good nature and consideration for the comfort of others, which excites our interest, and, in some degree, reconciles us to the endless repetition of the minute occurrences of every passing day. We should like to go out a Crusoeing in this pleasant fashion exceedingly. Nobody is ill, nobody is unhappy; letters are continually arriving from friends in England; friends come out themselves to join them;—in short they are not only intended to be 'very happy after;' but everybody is happy in these wonderful islands, for several succeeding years. When at last, they have secured a doctor for the colony a little illness follows of course; and to keep him in practice, a few Spanish prisoners are taken, ready wounded to his hands. So little experience of sorrow have our islanders, for a long period, that the news of the Queen of England's death, is felt as a deep affliction, We give the author's own words:—

'On the 10th of February 1738, we received the melancholy intelligence of the death of our most excellent and most amiable queen, which was communicated by a letter to my dear wife from Lady Sundon. I will not attempt to describe the affliction this information occasioned. It was a day of sorrow I never can forget.'

Lady Seaward's notions of the tender sensibilities of her majesty, are singularly simple and unsophisticated; so considerate is she of the royal feelings, that she is earnest to conceal the fact that a few Germans, settled, by the Queen's desire, in the Seaward Islands, did, upon some extraordinary occasion, actually get tipsy, and quarrel:—

'My beloved wife was exceedingly distressed at this affair. She felt that the Queen's honour was sullied by the conduct of her countrymen; and she feared that they might hereafter prove a source of disquietude to the settlement, and of repeated vexations to me. I said everything in my power to assure her that I considered the act as the result of barbarous ignorance, and not of a rebellious or vicious spirit; and that I already forgave it, although an appearance of displeasure would be required, and measures must be taken to prevent the recurrence of such an offence again.—"You are always kind and good," returned my dear Eliza, "and I believe all you say; but still such an act leaves a stain behind it that can never be completely removed; and I should be doubly grieved, if anything so disgraceful to her people were ever to come to the ears of the Queen. I think," continued she, "in looking into my own mind, it is for her Majesty, rather than for those ignorant boors, that I feel so sharply."

Sovereigns would, indeed, be in a pitiable condition, if their honour were stained and their hearts afflicted by every act of intemperance in their subjects. We must suppose, too, that a German princess would be too well accustomed to such excesses in her countrymen, to be very greatly shocked at the occurrence of an occasional quarrel. We might as well imagine our present King tearing his hair, because two English sailors had had a boxing-match on the coast of Caramania. And another curious instance of simplicity, is the easy familiarity with which our pious friends keep their religiou sengagements;—quite in mercantile fashion. They lay it down as a principle that a seventh part of their time is due to Heaven, and this time is to be paid in prayer, and abstinence from every kind of work. The six days passed in a constant succession of good and kind actions, in zealous endeavours to promote the happiness of those dependent upon them, are considered less acceptable to God than the one day spent in alternate prayer and idleness. If by any chance the debt of time is not duly paid on the sabbath, account must be kept of the deficiency until some other day has been substituted:

'In consultation with Mr Rowley (the clergyman) I determined to borrow the Lord's day, and work, as our need was pressing; and dedicate an early day, in lieu, to fasting and prayer, which we might hope in mercy would be accepted.'

We can imagine young readers perusing these volumes with great delight,—and certainly not without benefit. Humanity, generosity, truth, and a straightforward line of conduct under all circumstances, are inculcated in every page. The affectionate and entire confidence of the husband and wife, and their mutual reliance upon each other on all occasions, are beautifully pourtrayed; the characters are natural, and sufficiently interesting to carry us with them to the end, though we sometimes complain of their tediousness by the way. We get somewhat fatigued with continual planting, and building, and fishing, and following each individual in his or her frequent removal from one residence to another; and occasionally we turn over the pages to see how far we have yet to go;—but we do go to the end, page after page,—as we might eat unripe mulberries;—they are a little hard, and rather harsh, but upon the whole, we rather like them than not, especially as we now and then meet with a sweet one,

* Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative of his Shipwreck and Consequent Discovery of Certain Islands in the Carribean Sea: with a Detail of Many Extraordinary and Highly Interesting Events in his Life, from the Year 1733 to 1749, as Written in his own Diary. Edited by Miss Jane Porter. 3 vols. 12mo. Longman.

Digitized by Google

INTERESTING EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF POLAND.*

[Continued from Yesterday.]

THE reign of Sobieski was disgraced by the trial and execution of Lysinski, a Lithuanian nobleman, for atheism. The King did not cause the trial, but he did not interfere to prevent it:—

'Lysinski,' says Mr Fletcher, 'was in fact a religious and benevolent man, but sufficiently intelligent to ridicule some of the current superstitions. He was unfortunately rich, and that was the principal witness against him. The ground of accusation was a note made on a book which had been written by a stupid German, to prove the existence of a Deity. The reasoning was inconclusive; which Lysinski observing, wrote on the margin, Ergo non est Deus. He was tried by some bigotted Catholic Bishops, and found guilty, "not only of having denied the existence of a God, but the doctrine of the Trinity, and the divine maternity of the Virgin Mary."

'Zaluski was one of those villains who were concerned in the torment, an office which even the most degraded systems of theology have allotted to devils. We will let him condemn himself out of his own mouth. "The convict was led to the scaffold," he says, "where the executioner first, with a red hot iron, tore his tongue and his mouth, with which he had been cruel towards God; then they burnt his hands, instruments of the abominable production, at a slow fire. The sacrilegious paper was thrown into the flames—himself last: that monster of his age, that deicide, was cast into the flames of expiation, if such a crime could be atoned."—P. 141.

The author has a just perception of the character of the famous Charles XII of Sweden, one of those common-place men, who by dint of a little excess of physical energy, have been allowed to obtain reputation by dint of war and bloodshed. Charles, at one time, dictated a king to Poland. He had an interview with the ex-King, Augustus of Saxony:—

The Swede was arrayed as usual, 'in his military uniform, a coarse, blue coat with gilt buttons and jack-boots. The conversation, as may be imagined, was not very lively; they were not so friendly disposed to each other, as to chat without reserve. Besides, Charles was no talker, and most likely his taciturnity was a cover for his want of information. The only subject he started for the amusement of Augustus was his jack-boots. These, he gravely assured him, had never been off his legs for six years, except when he lay down. That men who can find nothing to talk about but jack-boots should rule the destinies of millions!'—P. 161.

The death of Charles XII restored Augustus to the throne, and exiled Stanislaus, who on his part was restored on the death of Augustus, but again driven out by the ascendancy of the Russians, and finally settled in France, where he became beloved for his good sense and benevolence. His daughter had married Louis XV The celebrated Chevalier de Boufflers, the French wit, who received his Christian name from him, was of his little court.

'The goodness of this prince's heart was exhibited,' says Mr Fletcher, 'in numberless instances; but none is more striking than his treatment of the children of the very Augustus who had deprived him of his throne, and driven him from his country. When Frederic the Great overran Saxony, in 1756, the elector, calculating on the generosity of Stanislaus, absolutely confided his children to his protection. "Heaven," said the warm-hearted and forgiving philosopher, "no doubt drove me from my country that I might be able to afford you an asylum in misfortune; it is sweet to me to be able to revenge myself by kindness to you. You shall not be mere visitors in my court, and until the day when you embrace your father, I, my friends, I will supply his place." This excellent man lived to the age of eighty-nine; but the extreme part of this long life was embittered by the death of his grandson, the dauphin, a promising youth, with whose education immense labour and care had been taken, and who profited from his advantages. About six weeks after this sad event, the venerable old king accidentally set fire to his clothes, and was so seriously burnt before assistance could be afforded to him, that he soon after died, on Feb. 23, 1766.'—P. 179.

Augustus III, the successor of Augustus of Saxony, was a dull prince, who, agreeably to the singularity of the Polish annals, continued to be a strange one nevertheless; and he had a dull proud minister, who was as odd:—

'Augustus devoted himself solely to the amusements of society and hunting; he imitated his father's luxurious magnificence, but it was more from habit than taste: he ruined himself by extravagance, without having any inclination for it, and in collecting pictures, without having any taste for them. He was a moral, "good sort of man;" and though strikingly handsome, continued inviolably faithful to his wife, the ugliest princess of the age. A habit of familiarity, rendered Count Bruhl his favourite and prime-minister. This servile minister made it his whole business to please the King, and enter into his amusements. But to others he was the proudest of men, and though his master was simple and unostentatious, he affected the very extreme of magnificence and pomp. In the midst of all the proud feelings of his heart, there lurked a servile superstition, which made him one of the most abject of creatures. This he studiously kept a secret, however, till one day two visitors, entering his private apartment hastily, saw with surprise the proud and pompous minister on his knees, with his face to the ground before an illuminated table. Bruhl rising hastily from his kneeling position, as if ashamed of being detected, said to them, "After having served my temporal master all day, I must give some few moments to eternity."—P. 181.

What a religion! To be proud, servile, and worldly all day, and then to endeavour to cant the Divine Being a few minutes before going to bed! The religion of bad men is always a bad religion. As they think others no better than themselves, they naturally think not much better of the creator of others; and as they like to be cringed to, they pay God the compliment of thinking he is of their taste, and that he would spite them if they did not attend his levee!

The bad government of Bruhl, and the factious intrigues of the Polish nobility, conspired, with the quarrels of the neighbouring powers, to put an end to the reign of the Saxon family; and the upshot was, that as Russia had now become the dictatress of this divided country, Catherine put one of her lovers upon the throne. This was Count Poniatowski, a handsome young dandy libertine, not unamiable nor without a tincture of letters, but not very wise Mr Fletcher treats the character of Poniatowski with great contempt. We know not his authority for all that he has said of him, but as he is no ungenerous historian, the effect is greatly to Poniatowski's disadvantage; and this puppet of royalty will probably cut a much worse figure hereafter in the memory of English readers, than he has done hitherto.

'Poniatowski,' says our author, 'was one of those men who could be almost anything and are absolutely nothing; he was one of those characters which nature draws out in a neutral tint of light and shade, ready to take any colour, but which she sends into the world without any. He had pride, but it was not pride of intellect, rank, or spirit; ambition, but it was a mere craving after he knew not what, which was as much satiated by fulsome approval of a doggrel sonnet as the proudest success of important schemes; a kind of philanthropy, but it was a mere love of his species, and did not assume either of those definite characters, patriotism, friendship, or charity; warmth of heart, which as it was not associated with the feelings and affections of any particular object, had no gratification but sensual passion.

'Such was the state of Poniatowski's mind and character when Sir Charles Williams, the English ambassador, arrived at Warsaw. Some similarity of feeling and disposition led to an acquaintance between these two young men, which grew into firm friendship, and, as may be supposed, did not much tend to renovate the youthful and pliant Pole's principles. Under the care of this dissolute friend, Poniatowski took a butterfly tour through foreign countries, sipping, as he skimmed along, only the froth of society. He made a short sojourn at Paris, that city of gaiety, so congenial to his habits, while Williams proceeded to discharge his diplomatic duties in England. The young Pole was quite intoxicated with the pleasures of the French capital; gamed, intrigued, made love, and swore eternal affection to every woman he met. So unguarded was he, and so favourably were his addresses received, that thirty ladies are said to have encountered each other one day in his country house, to lay claim to their gay deceiver. His finances could not bear the extravagant drafts which his pleasures and gaming drew upon them, so that he was involved in debt, and the harpies of the law laid their unhallowed hands on the embryo king. From this dilemma he was delivered by one of his female friends, and then made the best of his way to Engiand to join Williams. The only fruits of his visit to Paris were an experience in the wiles of captivating the female heart, and an affectation of kingly deportment which he studied in Louis XV. The former of these acquirements, as will be seen, gained him the throne, and the latter taught him how to fill it.

'Williams was now appointed ambassador to Petersburgh, and the Czartoriski gladly seized his offer to take Poniatowski to Russia as his secretary. The wily diplomatist threw his young friend in the way of Catherine, who was then only grand duchess, and whose heart was opened to any attachment, by the contempt she had for her husband, Peter. Williams contrived to let them have a private interview in the English Consul's house, where Catherine went on foot, and alone, in a Russian winter's night. Poniatowski was young, handsome, and fascinating, well experienced in the arts of winning womans' affections, and bold enough to seize the decisive moment of victory. What a different language did love now speak to that which Catherine had been accustomed to hear! Instead of the course jests of a Russian boor, she now listened to the witty and voluptuous seductions of French elegance; and if the former could find the way to her heart, what resistance was to be now expected? The Pole's blandishments this night falsified the dogma that love "has no great influence on the sum of life," for while they won a woman's affections they gained a crown which contained within its circumference, the destinies of millions, and the Sway of Poland.'—P. 190.

* The History of Poland, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. By James Fletcher, Esq. of Trinity College, Cambridge. With a Narrative of the Recent Events, obtained from a Polish Patriot Nobleman, 8vo. pp. 428. Cochrane and Pickersgill.

Digitized by Google

Poniatowski, however, did not obtain the crown without an anxious interval of hope and fear, during which he was recalled to Poland, and, according to Mr Fletcher, was in the habit of weeping:—

'The Poles in general, or at least all those who did not expect any advantage from the enslavement of their country, would not allow themselves to imagine that Poniatowski, one of Catherine's kept men, could ever wear the Polish crown, and wished their hero Branicki to accept it, in full confidence that he would restore its tarnished lustre. But although age had not chilled Branicki's patriotism, it had curbed his spirit of enterprise, and he felt that even if he were elected he should be king only of half his people.

'Count Oginski, who had married Michael Czartoriski's daughter, was another and powerful rival to Poniatowski. He went to Petersburgh in the hope of subverting his relative's interest with Catherine, and even Orloff exclaimed in full court, when he saw him, "This is the man who ought to be king, and not a poor player like Poniatowski." But the Empress was resolute, and when she was told one day that her lover's grandfather had been a dependant of the Sapiehas, she coloured at the word, but exclaimed imperiously, "Had he been so himself, I wish him to be king, and he shall be!" —P. 205.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— On balancing the accounts of the late season at Drury Lane Theatre, the Management finds itself loser to the amount of nearly 4,000*l.*

MINOR THEATRES.—We intend shortly to visit the Cobourg, the Garrick, the Pavilion, and the rest of the theatres which have lately started up, and are exerting themselves so laudably to diffuse cheerfulness and rational amusement throughout the metropolis. At the Garrick Theatre in Goodman's Fields, the bills announce, as engaged, Mr Hunt, late of Covent Garden, and Mr Latham and Miss Phillips, of Drury Lane Theatres.

— He that tempts me to drink beyond my measure, civilly invites me to a fever.—Jeremy Taylor.

PICKING THE PARLIAMENT'S POCKETS, OR THE TABLES TURNED.—The newspapers inform us, than no less than seventeen pickpockets, busily engaged in their vocation, were apprehended near the Houses of Parliament, on the occasion of his Majesty's visit there on Tuesday.

A CLEVER MAN.—In the list of insolvents whose petitions are advertised to be heard at York, on Tuesday next, we find the name of 'Michael Bell,' who is described as late of Stone-gate, in the parish of St Michael-le-Belfrey, in the city of York, milliner, dress-maker, and journeyman joiner!—Leeds Intelligencer.

A HINT TO FATHERS.—George Brown, of Colstoun, fl. cir. 1611, and m. Jean Haye, daughter of Lord Yester, ancestor of the Marquis of Tweedale. The dowry of this lady consisted of the famous 'Colstoun pear,' which Hugh de Gifford, of Yester, who died in 1267, her remote ancestor, famous for his necromantic powers, was supposed to have invested with the extraordinary virtue of securing for the family who might possess it, unfailing prosperity. This Palladium is preserved at Colstoun, with the care due to so singular an heir loom, which, regardless of the superstition, must be esteemed a very wonderful vegetable curiosity, having existed more than five centuries.—Burke's Dictionary of the Peerage.

DIGNITY v. PROPRIETY.—Boileau recommends poets to have recourse to severe critics rather than to indulgent friends to enlighten them upon the faults of their works. The recommendation is excellent; but it should be recollected, that though there are many good critics, there are still more who are ridiculous and trifling.—A young man went to consult Danchet upon a poem which commenced thus:—

Maison qui renferme mon aimable maîtresse.
(House which encloses my amiable mistress).

At these words Danchet interrupted the reader to tell him that the word house is not sufficiently dignified for poetry.—'But, Sir'——'No, that renders your verse too mean; rather put palace.'—'Allow me to'——'It is of no use! I tell you to put palace.'—'But really, Sir'——'Well, there it is, people come for advice, and when they get it they will not follow it.'—'Alas, Sir,' exclaimed the young man, impatiently, 'I cannot put palace, since my mistress is in the hospital.'

HUMMING.—'Music Mad.—London is swarming with Musicians, till it is humming all over like a bee-hive. Ries has come, in order to conduct a new oratorio of his at Dublin; Hummel is going to try his luck at Manchester; what the celebrated Field, from Petersburg, is come for, we have not yet been able to learn; and there are fifty more, at least, all ready to rival Paganini, and delight John Bull.'—Literary Gazette.—[There is something of a hum in the above paragraph. We are mightily at a loss to know how Ries, by conducting a new oratorio of his at Dublin, or how Hummel, going to try his luck at Manchester, can fill London with humming. If the paragraph were not from the Literary Gazette, we should look upon it as a bit of a bull.]—Atlas.—And why not from them?

SINGULAR WILL AND FUNERAL.—Among curious wills, that of Louis Cartusius, a Judge of Padua, deserves to be mentioned. Here are some of the principal articles:—1st. I forbid my house being hung with black after my death; and I desire that all those who attend my funeral may be dressed in green.—2d. I require that there be collected all the violins, all the flutes, and all the drums in the city, in order that they may accompany me to my last home.—3d. I name for my heir the person who shall laugh most at my interment.—Never did funeral present a more singular appearance. There were all the relations of the deceased striving to laugh, with as much sincerity as, under the usual circumstances, they would have endeavoured to cry.—The will was disputed by a near relative, as the production of a madman: but the lawyer who was retained to defend it, maintained that a judge could never be charged with madness, and upon this conclusive reasoning the will was pronounced valid.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT-GARDEN.—Rrmeo and Juliet—Miller and His Men.
HAYMARKET.—The Beggar's Opera—The Clandestine Marriage—Love, Law, and Physic.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Le Ci-Devant Jeune Homme—Les Suites D'Un Mariage de Raison—Werther—Les Anglaises pour Rire.

HAYMARKET.

THE sterling wit, and delightful airs of The Beggar's Opera, are in themselves a sufficient inducement to allure a play-goer to the theatre; but when to these are added the probability of hearing a successful debutante in Polly, the temptation is too strong to be resisted. Miss WELLS, whose first appearance in Susanna, in the Marriage of Figaro, we noticed last week, appeared in this favourite character last night, and with the success that might have been anticipated from her previous performances. The character of Susanna gave occasion chiefly for the display of her talents in songs of a lively character; in Polly she had opportunities of shewing how beautifully she could accommodate her style to the soothing and tender. We may mention particularly the beautiful air commencing 'Can love be controlled by advice,' and the still more affecting lines, 'Oh ponder well;' and again, in the air, 'How now, saucy jade,' her transition to gentle remonstrance, when, appealing to Macheath, she says, 'how can you see me made the scoff, &c.' was a fine exemplification of the effect which can be added to a sweet melody by correct feeling in the performer. 'But he so teaz'd me,' we thought was given too briefly, and with less than her usual care; but the following air, 'I'm like a ship,' lighted up her face with the joyousness which so well becomes it, and her voice poured forth its richest tones in accordance with it. She was warmly encored. From the compass of her voice, there is no doubt that she could, if she pleased, astonish by lengthened flourishes and accumulated ornaments, but she shews her good taste in leaving the effect of simple airs undiminished by such injudicious, but, to some, enticing vagaries. In her countenance, particularly when uplifted, there is a very pleasant resemblance to Miss STEPHENS, which would be without alloy if it did not remind us that that charming vocalist has forsaken us. Of Mr B. TAYLOR'S Macheath we cannot say much. He appears to us to have more taste and judgment than natural powers to give those excellent qualities their due effect. His voice is not without sweetness at times, but there is generally an approach to huskiness about it which deprives it of efficient expression. His acting wants vigour; there is nothing of the mixture of 'port wine and brandy,' which, according to the late Mr Hazlitt, ought to make up the character of the bold captain. Mrs HUMBY makes as good a Lucy as the stage could furnish just now; her abrupt angular style of acting falls in well with such parts as this, in which the demands on sensibility are not of a nature or degree to find so smart an actress at fault. Mr WEBSTER played Filch, which we were surprised at, considering that HARLEY belongs to the company.

[Omitted yesterday.]

HOLCROFT'S comedy of The Road to Ruin was performed here on Saturday to a full house. There was nothing novel in the cast of the characters, with the exception of Miss SIDNEY in the part of Sophia, on which we have little to say. She is a lively girl, and plays accordingly with a good deal of spirit; but there is withal too much that is obviously artificial. Sophia is a kind-hearted, unsophisticated creature, moved by impulse more than by reflection, and every indication of art is out of keeping with her character. We wish, for the credit of her taste and judgment, to say nothing of the injury she will do her health, that Miss SIDNEY would not lace so tightly. FARREN'S Old Dornton is a clever performance; not equal, we think, to several of his that we could mention, nor in some points to that of some of his predecessors in the same character; but on the whole a correct, and not a coldly correct, representation of the good banker, who is always struggling between his irritability and his natural affections. GATTIE'S Sulky is a judicious fulfilment of the author's intentions, but the latter has made the character unnecessarily abrupt and repulsive. WEBSTER, in Silky, looked the old usurer to perfection; nobody could expect to borrow of him, under 50 per cent. We saw this actor last week play the boyish character of Zekiel Homespun, in the Heir at Law, in a very natural and effective manner, and were struck last night with his facility in adapting himself to the decrepitude of old age. We do not like the character of Goldfinch in this play; it is a specimen, fresh from the turf perhaps, of vulgarity and bad habits, with no other relief than a witless vivacity, further marred by the continual iteration of a stupid cant phrase. HARLEY did not reconcile us to it by his manner of performing it, though we cannot charge it with any striking faults. He was most effective in the imitation parts, which he made very like reality. Mrs GLOVER played the Widow Warren with a happy mixture of heartlessness and vivacity. The manner in which she recovered from the distress in which she appeared to be plunged at the loss of Harry Dornton, by the arrival of Goldfinch still at her service as a husband, was a piece of genuine comedy. VINING entered into the part of Harry Dornton with great spirit, and evinced, in the more pathetic parts, the feelings becoming an erring but repentant son.

Digitized by Google

THE BAG OF THE BEE.

About the sweet bag of the bee
Two Cupids fell at odds;
And whose the pretty prize should be
They vow'd to ask the Gods:
Which Venus hearing, thither came,
And for their boldness stript them,
And, taking from them each his flame,
With rods of myrtle whipt them.
Which done, to still their wanton cries,
When quiet grown she'd seen them,
She kiss'd and wip'd their dove-like eyes,
And gave the bag between them. Herrick.

THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Buffa, compressed into One Act, intitled

L'ITALIANA IN ALGIERI.

[By ROSSINI.]

Elvira, wife of Mustapha	Madame Castelli.
Zulma, confidant of Elvira	Madame Felissi.
Isabella, an Italian lady	Madame Raimbaux.
Mustapha, Bey of Algiers	Signor Santini.
Haly, Captain of the Algerine Corsaires	Signor Deville.
Lindoro, a young Italian favourite of Mustapha	Signor Rubini.
Thaddeus, companion of Isabella	Signor Lablache.

After which, an Opera Buffa, compressed into One Act, intitled

LA PROVA D'UN OPERA SERIA.

[By GNECCO.]

Corilla Tortorini, Prima Donna for the Opera Seria	Madame Pasta.
Violante Pescarelli, Seconda Donna	Madame Castelli.
Frederico Mordente, Prima Tenore	Signor Curioni.
Companone, Maestro and Composer of the Music of the Piece	Signor Lablache.
Don Grilletto Pasticci, Poet, and Author of the Drama	Signor Santini.
Fastidia Trivella, Impressaria (Manager)	Signor Deville.
Fischetto, Prompter, Copyist, and Director of the Chorus (Opera Seria)	Signor De Angeli.

After which, the New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of

KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Signor Costa.

The Principal Characters by Mlle. Brocard, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Zoe Beaupré.
M. Lefebvre, M. Emile. M. Simon, M. Antoni, and M. Vernfra.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

SHAKSPEARE'S Comedy of

AS YOU LIKE IT.

Hymen, Mrs T. Hill. Rosalind, Miss Taylor.
Celia, Mrs Ashton. Phœbe, Miss J. Scott. Audrey, Mrs Humby.
The Duke, Mr H. Wallack. Duke Frederic, Mr Coveney.
Amiens, Mr Bianchi Taylor. Jaques, Mr Cooper. Le Beau, Mr Bartlett.
Oliver, Mr Brindal. Orlando, Mr Vining.
Adam, Mr Mulleney. Touchstone, Mr Harley. Corin, Mr Gattie.
Jacques de Bois, Mr W. Johnson. Sylvius, Mr Newcombe.
William, Mr J. Cooper. Louis, Mr Coates. Charles, Mr V. Webster.
Eustace, Mr Lodge. Foresters, Messrs Huckel, Field, Moore, and Bishop.

After which, a Comedy in Two Acts, called

A FRIEND AT COURT.

Principal Characters—Miss Taylor, Mrs Faucit,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Cooper, Mr Vining, and Mr Brindal.

To conclude with the Farce of

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

[By Mrs INCHBALD.]

Constance, Mrs T. Hill. Lisette, Mrs Humby.
Doctor, Mr W. Farren. The Marquis, Mr Vining. Jeffery, Mr J. Cooper.
La Fleur, Mr Harley. Picard, Mr Coveney. François, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Rivals; Rosina; and other Entertainments.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.

NEW COMIC ANNUAL,

In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.

PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'

PART II.—'The Omnibus,' Scena, Tim Wasp. And 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called

YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.

In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine Characters.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Drama, in Five Acts, intitled

VIRGINIUS.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Virginia, Miss Vincent. Servia, Miss Scott.
Appius Claudius, Mr D. Pitt. Caius Claudius, Mr Honner. Marcus, Mr Almar.
Virginius, Mr Osbaldiston. Dentatus, Mr J. Dawson.
Icilius, Mr C. Hill. Numitorius, Mr Gough. Lucius, Mr Lee. Titus, Mr Webb.
Servius, Mr Rogers. Cneius, Mr Maitland. Publius, Mr Asbury.
The Minuet de la Cour and Gavot de Vestris, by Mlle. Rosier and Miss L. Slade.

After which the Interlude of

"SWING."

[By Mr BARNETT.]

Lucy, Miss Vincent. Landlady, Miss Rumens.
Daniel Roper, Mr Vale. Timothy Sidewing, Mr C. Hill. Jokely, Mr Honner.
Justice, Mr Gough. Jorum, Mr Webb. Frank, Mr Rogers.
Constable, Mr Asbury. Prompter, Mr Emden.

To which will be added, the Melo-Drama of

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Rosara, Miss Vincent. Viletta, Madame Simon.
Bianchi Gavotti, Mr D. Pitt. Count Crimani, Mr Lee.
Firmin, Mr Maitland. Albert, Mr Honner.
Renardo, Mr Webb. Fabian, Mr Rogers.
Fernando Spogliati, Mr Osbaldiston.
Carlotti, Mr Almar. Bulbi, Mr Young. Matakti, Mr Asbury. Alberdi, Mr Tully
Spoletti, Mr Collier. Falari, Mr Hobbs. Yaldi, Mr Boulanger.

The whole to conclude with the laughable Burletta, entitled

THE SPOIL'D CHILD.

Little Pickle, with the Original Songs and a Sailor's Hornpipe, Miss Laura Slade.
Miss Pickle, Mme Simon. Maria, Miss Nicol,
Margery, Mrs Rogers. Susan, Miss Rumens.
Old Pickle, Mr D. Pitt. John, Mr Rogers. Thomas, Mr Tully. Tag, Mr Vale.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Hammerton.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr G. Lejeune. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, the Farcical Interlude called

FREAKS AND FOLLIES.

Ellen, Miss Andrews.
Sir William Franklin, Mr Munroe. Ned Franklin, Mr Forester.
Doctor Growl, Mr Porteus. Captain Rowland, Mr Spencer.
Chouse, Mr G. Smith. Tom Trippit, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with the Burletta of

MIDAS.

[By KANE O'HARA.]

Immortals—Juno, Miss Wells. Venus, Miss Forster.
Minerva, Miss Berresford. Hebe, Miss Haton. Cupid, Mlle. Josephine.
The Graces, Miss Ward, Miss Gilbert, and Miss Bennett.
Jupiter, Mr Spencer. Mercury, Mr Davies. Bacchus, Mr Young.
Pan, Mr G. Smith. Mars, Mr Willing.
Apollo, Mrs Waylett, who will sing the following favourite Songs:—'Be by your friends advised,' 'Pray Goody,' 'Come where the aspens quiver,' 'Lovely Nymph,' and 'Kate Kearney.'
Mortals—Mysis, Mrs Garrick. Nysa, Miss Weston. Daphne, Miss Dix.
Justice Midas, Mr Marshall. Demætus, Mr G. Lejeune.
Sileno, Mr Bennett.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Battle of Waterloo.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Indian Hunter — Hare-bell — Black Sicilian Pony—Tight Rope—Lilliputian Bacchus—Leaping—Animated Architecture—Inebriated Soldier—Amazon's Victory—Feats of Riding—Reaper—Brentford Election.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE. — Lear of Private Life—The Youthful Days of William IVth—Richard Turpin.

GARRICK THEATRE.—The Barber of Seville—Matrimony—No Song No Supper.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS'S Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 15 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N° 256.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29, 1831.

INTERESTING EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF POLAND.*

[Concluded.]

In consequence of the struggle of foreign interests in Poland, and the selfish factions of the aristocracy, Catherine was enabled to force her lover on the throne by dint of her soldiers' bayonets; yet she had no sooner done it, than she seemed to care nothing about him:—

'Her jealousy had been roused by rumours of his gallantries, and her good sense most probably saw through the shewy disguise of his imbecility, and began to be ashamed of her former admiration. With so little satisfaction did she receive the news of his election from Count Oginski; that she said coolly, "I congratulate you on it," and withdrew. . . . .—The Coronation took place on the 25th of November, and, as if to observe a consistent opposition to the laws, it was performed at Warsaw instead of Cracow. Stanislaus, ashamed of the Polish costume, which he would in fact have only disgraced, refused to sacrifice his long black curls to appear with his head cropped, as was customary, dressed himself in a theatrical style, with a helmet, and presented himself in this garb to receive the sacred unction, amidst the sneers of his subjects.'—P. 211.

The spirit of caricature that marks the passage in Italics in the following extract, makes us receive Mr Fletcher's contemptuous phraseology with caution. It is a good passage for a squib, but hardly fit for a history:—

'Stanislaus (Poniatowski) bore his honours as might be expected; frivolity, shew, and extravagance now exhibited themselves under royal protection. He pretended to turn his attention to military matters, and raised several regiments; but he ordered the cadets to wear such immense helmets, and such high plumes, that a gust of wind blew down his young army. The Count, however, sometimes made his camelion character assume the shew of a stern moralist, on shewy follies and extravagance, and on this account we can readily believe an anecdote told by Solignec. He one day went to pay the voyvode of Kiow a visit, and saw among the company a nobleman very conspicuous by the costliness and sumptuousness of his dress. The king had the impertinence to ask him why he was decked out so finely, and was answered that it was a token of respect to his Majesty. "You are mistaken." said Stanislaus, with disgusting affectation, "a Pole ought to be distinguished only by courage and talent."—P. 213.

Our lady's-man was for affecting sovereign independence; and with the view of marrying an archduchess, proposed to Catherine to enter into alliance with Austria, the mortal enemy of Frederick of Prussia. Frederick discovered the plot, and exclaimed with contemptuous anger, 'I'll break his head with his crown.'

The Infamous Partition of Poland (for it ought never to be mentioned without that epithet) took place in the reign of Poniatowski. Feeble, voluptuous, hampered with Russian influence, not wishing ill, but too fond of his ease to wish the best, he was just the fit prince to behold it. The causes and motives of this imprudent measure are strongly disputed to this day. Surely the popular instinct understands it well, and nobody would have doubted them an instant, but the half-foolish and half-witted refinements of those who are gifted with the title of politicians. Poland was divided in itself: Russia had got a great hold on it: Austria was jealous of Russia, and as ambitious; Prussia was in the like predicament towards the others; the management of Poland was troublesome to them; and accordingly they agreed to gratify their jealousy, their ambition, and their convenience, by dividing among them the object of their disputes. The pretences of right, of reprisal, &c. do notdeserve a notice. There were three different partitions, or growths of partition, all infamous. The first left the king with a domain to rule over, the second left him less, the third nothing. In the course of their robberies, the Allied Powers had become exasperated by the rise of the French Revolution, and by the appearance of a host of real patriots in Poland, headed by the immortal Kosciusko; and at the same time the other Princes of Europe had begun to hate the name of public virtue, and to feel solely for themselves. England to her shame, had not interposed, because she was carrying on an unjust and tyrannical war against her American Colonies; a mistake, during which she was little inclined to hear of patriotism and peoples' rights. The success of kings then, was their misery afterwards: and the success of the 'Holy Alliance' is found not to have guaranteed their good fortune since, for patriotism is now stronger than ever, and Poland is conquering.

* The History of Poland, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. By James Fletcher, Esq. of Trinity College, Cambridge. With a Narrative of the Recent Events, obtained from a Polish Patriot Nobleman. 8vo. pp. 428. Cochrane and Pickersgill.

KOSCIUSKO.

Kosciusko became first known to history in the war that preceded the second partition. On one occasion, the division under his command withstood an enemy three times their number, and after much slaughter made an honourable retreat. From this day the Poles marked him out as a great leader; and when the intrigues of the Aristocracy, and the weakness of the King, left the only real affairs of the country in the hands of the patriots, he became their head, and was declared Generalissimo and Dictator.

'His power was absolute: he had the command of the armies, and the regulation of all affairs, political and civil. He was commissioned, however, to appoint a national council, the choice being left to his own will. He was also empowered to nominate a successor, but he was to be subordinate to the national council.

'Never before,' says Mr Fletcher, 'was confidence so fully and so scrupulously reposed by a nation in a single individual, and never were expectations better grounded than in the present instance. Thaddeus Kosciusko was born of a noble but not very illustrious Lithuanian family, and was early initiated in the science of war at the military school of Warsaw. In his youth his affections were firmly engaged to a young lady, the daughter of the Marshal of Lithuania, but it was his fate to see his love crossed, and his inamorato married to another, Prince Lubornirski. He then went to France, and on his return applied to Stanislaus for a military appointment, but was refused because he was a favourite of Adam Czartoryski's, whom Stanislaus hated. Kosciusko sought to dispel his disappointment in the labours of war. The British colonies of America were then throwing off the yoke of their unnatural mother country—their cause was that of justice and liberty, and one dear to the heart of a young proud-spirited Pole. Our young hero served in the patriotic ranks of Gates and Washington, and was appointed aide-de-camp to the latter great general. When the glorious struggle in the new world was crowned with success, he returned to his own country, where he found an equally glorious field for his exertions.'—P. 327.

It is delightful to see Kosciusko issuing out of the same voluntary fires of experience and the love of liberty as Lafayette, and serving in the ranks of Washington! Good and great men help to make others. Washington, in the plains of America, was fighting the future battles of France and Poland: the old generals of the latter countries were his ensigns and his aides-de-camp.

It is not our intention to go through the particulars of Kosciusko's campaigns. We must refer for those to the book. Our object is to lay before our readers the morale of his history; and therefore it will be sufficient to say, that no man behaved better than he did, either as a general or a statesman. It was not only in one battle, that he fought against multitudes. It was his custom. The invaders were astonished at seeing a man with a comparative handful of followers, armed with the first things that came to hand, perpetually re-appearing in different quarters, sometimes retreating like a wounded lion, sometimes overthrowing them with a bloody slaughter, at all times apparently invincible, even when vanquished. And nothing could be more just than his civil government. He repressed abuses; he would have no injustice, even against the cruel enemy; he acted always upon the noblest and purest principles, the only real strength of a good cause: and he shewed in his own person and manners the modesty and tranquillity of it. Count Oginski, one of his fellow-patriots, in giving a narrative of his interview with him in his camp near Warsaw, where he was awaiting the Russians and Prussians, found him sleeping upon straw. He dined with almost equal simplicity:—

'We passed,' says the Count, 'from Kosciusko's tent to a table prepared under some trees. The frugal repast which we made here, among about a dozen guests, will never be effaced from my memory. The presence of this great man, who has excited the admiration of all Europe; who was the terror of his enemies and the idol of the nation; who, raised to the rank of generalissimo, had no ambition but to serve his country and fight for it; who always preserved an unassuming, affable, and mild demeanour; who never wore any distinguishing mark of the supreme authority with which he was invested; who was contented with a surtout of coarse grey cloth, and whose table was as plainly furnished as that of a subaltern officer; could not fail to awaken in me every sentiment of esteem, admiration and veneration, which I have sincerely felt for him at every period of my life.'—P. 335.

Digitized by Google

The enemy failed before Warsaw; and had the other nobles been as noble as this great man, and felt as truly in the cause of freedom, all might have gone well; but he was one of that advanced guard of martyrs, who of necessity make their appearance when their example is of more future than immediate value; and for a time, numbers and iniquity prevailed.

Suwarrow, the Empress of Russia's fanatical slaughter-man, had arrived in Poland at the head of an immense multitude, to overpower the little bands of patriots. He had laid open the road to Warsaw by a defeat of one of them; and Poland hastened to fight another Russian general, before Suwarrow and he should effect a junction.

'The 10th of October (1794) was the decisive day; Kosciusko attacked Fersen, near Macieiowice. The battle was bloody and fatal to the patriots; victory was wavering, and Poninski, who was expected every minute with a reinforcement, not arriving, Kosciusko, at the head of his principal officers, made a grand charge into the midst of the enemy. He fell covered with wounds, and all his companions were killed or taken prisoners. His inseparable friend, the amiable poet, Niemcewicz, was among the latter number. The great man lay senseless among the dead; but at length he was recognized, notwithstanding the plainness of his uniform, and was found still breathing. His name even now commanded respect from the Cossacks, some of whom had been going to plunder him, they immediately formed a litter with their lances to carry him to their general, who ordered his wounds to be dressed, and treated him with the respect he merited. As soon as he was able to travel, he was conveyed to Petersburgh, where Catherine condemned this noble patriot to end his days in prison. Clemency, indeed, was not to be expected from a woman who had murdered her husband.

'Such was the termination of Kosciusko's glorious career. The news of his captivity spread like lightning to Warsaw, and every one received it as the announcement of the country's fall. It may appear incredible," says Count Oginski, "but I can attest what I have seen, and what a number of witnesses can certify with me, that many women miscarried at the tidings; many invalids were seized with burning fevers; some fell into fits of madness which never afterwards left them; and men and women were seen in the streets ringing their hands, beating their heads against the walls, and exclaiming in tones of despair, "Kosciusko is no more; the country is lost!" '— P. 340.

The poet may well have exclaimed, in his fine line, that 'Freedom shriek'd when Kosciusko fell.'

Suwarrow, having effected his junction with Fersen, proceeded to Warsaw, which, after dreadful work in the suburb of Praga, capitulated. The garrison in Praga was composed of the flower of the Polish army, now of no avail, since Kosciusko was gone.

'Eight thousand Poles perished sword in hand, and the Russians having set fire to the bridge, cut of the retreat of the inhabitants. Above 12,000 townspeople, old men, women, and children, were murdered in cold blood, and to fill the measure of the iniquity and barbarity, the Russians fired the place in four different parts, and in a few hours the whole of Praga, inhabitants as well as houses, was a heap of ashes.

'The council finding that Warsaw could not be defended any longer, capitulated on the 6th of November; many of the soldiers were obliged to lay down their arms, and the Russian troops entered the city. The authors of the revolution, the generals and soldiers who refused to disarm, had quitted Warsaw, but being pursued by Fersen, many were killed or dispersed, and the rest surrendered on the 18th.

'All the patriots of consequence, who fell into the hands of the Russians, were immured in the prisons of Petersburgh, or sent to Siberia. Ignatius Potocki, Mostowski, Kapustas, and Kalinski, were among the captives. Their treatment, however, was not so cruel as it has been frequently represented; Kosciusko's prison, for instance, was a comfortable suite of rooms, where he beguiled his time with reading and drawing; Potocki was equally well lodged, and amused himself with gazing at the passers by from his windows. This was not, indeed, an exact observance of the article of capitulation, "We promise a general amnesty for all that is passed," but it was the very acme of honour, compared with the general tenor of Russia's conduct towards Poland.'—P. 342.

The third infamous partition now took place. Kosciusko remained in prison till the death of Catherine, and then came to England on his way to America. The King accepted a Russian pension, and on the death of the same empress, went to Petersburg, 'where he ended,' says the historian, 'his unhappy and dishonourable life.'

While the immortal Pole was in durance, we learn from Peter Pindar's works, that he became acquainted with the writings of that facetious person, and expressed himself much pleased with them; which Peter, after his style of self-gratulation, justly makes a boast of. George III was no friend to the Poles, or to Washington; and Kosciusko perhaps was not disagreeably surprised to find at what a low pitch that monarch's understanding was rated by the satirist.

A passage was extracted the other day, in this paper, from the preface to Miss Porter's new edition of 'Thaddeus of Warsaw,' describing the appearance of Kosciusko, as seen by her brother then in England. Dr Warner, in his 'Literary Recollections,' not long since published, has given the following account of an interview with him at Bristol, which Mr Fletcher quotes in the work before us:—

'I never contemplated,' says the Doctor, 'a more interesting human figure than Kosciusko stretched upon his couch. His wounds were still unhealed, and he was unable to sit upright. He appeared to be a small man, spare and delicate. A black silk bandage, crossed his fair and high, but somewhat wrinkled, forehead. Beneath it, his dark eagle eye sent forth a stream of light, that indicated the steady flame of patriotism which still burned within his soul; unquenched by disaster and wounds, weakness, poverty, and exile. Contrasted with its brightness was the paleness of his countenence, and the wan cast of every feature. He spoke very tolerable English, though in a low and feeble tone; but his conversation, replete with fine sense, lively remark, and sagacious answers, evinced a noble understanding, and a cultivated mind. On rising to depart, I offered him my hand; he took it. My eyes filled with tears; and he gave it a warm grasp. I muttered something about "brighter prospects and happier days!" He faintly smiled and said, (they were his last words to me), "Ah, Sir, he who devotes himself for his country, must not look for his reward on this side the grave." '—P. 355.

The public have been made familiar with the appearance of Kosciusko on his couch, by several prints of him in that condition, one of those from a picture by the late Mr West. We have heard Mrs West describe with enthusiasm the effect which the sight of him had upon her, and the additional grace thrown upon it by the entrance of the late Duke of Bedford into the room, in all the bloom of his rank and good looks. This was Francis, Duke of Bedford, whose statue is in the square. He approached Kosciusko, she said, with all the deference of a courtier, and bending towards him as he reclined, took his hand and kissed it.

'And what did you think of his Grace, when he did that?' asked a gentleman.

'Think!' cried the enthusiastic old lady; 'I felt in love with him.'

But no anecdote of this great man is more touching than the one related by Miss Williams, in her account of the events that took place in France after Napoleon's downfall. From England Kosciusko went to America, and afterwards to France, whence he finally removed to Switzerland, where he died in 1817, 'fuller,' says Miss Porter, 'of glory than of years.' During the occupation of France by the allied troops, some Polish soldiers, in their search after forage, had come upon the grounds of a farm, the fences of which they were treating with little ceremony. The occupant of the farm came forward, and remonstrated. They laughed at him, and persisted; but finding themselves more sternly rebuked, and in their own language, they began to consider the man. Suddenly, astonishment seizes upon some of the older ones: they gaze, they colour, the tears came into their eyes; and the word 'Kosciusko' bursting from them, the next moment the soldiers are on the ground, prostrating themselves, and kissing the stranger's feet.

This is one of the most affecting anecdotes we ever met with.

Kosciusko's inaction, covered as he was with wounds, and conscious that his example could not die, became almost as glorious to him as the greatest days of his strength; nor did fortune refuse him the satisfaction of being able to continue the proofs of his patriotism in the most triumphant manner. He refused to fight either for Napoleon or the Allies: he would not lend Napoleon his name; he had wedded himself to the cause of truth and liberty, and he knew that it was the business of a genuine humanist to set mankind an example of perseverance. He would pave the way neither for Napoleon into Russia, nor for Constantine into Poland. He knew that real regeneration accompanied neither of them, and that a principle maintained in adversity was better in the long run than a cause made equivocal in success.

Events are bearing him out. Kosciusko may again be considered as fighting in Poland. If the Poles had the superstition of old Spain, they would see him leading them to battle, in his shroud.

Digitized by Google

Mr Fletcher has carried his history up to the very latest period, and gives some extraordinary accounts of the brutality of Constantine, which we shall extract in another Number. He thinks that if the Poles succeed, they will confer the crown on Prince Czartorisky, a descendant of the ancient dynasty of the Jagellons, and, according to our author, a good man. We are glad of his goodness, and think it likely enough that the Poles will choose a king, because, in spite of all that the world has suffered from them, kings as well as nations are still to be considered when people choose a government, otherwise we should have had at least two republics close at hand to us by this time: but we confess that if it were not for William IV, we should have become sick of the very name of king, and ashamed of any set of men who could seriously think of setting one up, while they could have a cheaper, a more rational, and a more truth-telling government. ☞

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— A concert will take place at the Palace this evening, for the purpose of introducing Signor Paganini to the King and Queen.

PAGANINI.—A series of concerts are to be given at Covent Garden Theatre, for the purpose of gratifying the numerous persons who have been hitherto disappointed of the opportunity to hear and see the wonder-working Paganini. For this purpose the theatre, it is stated, will be re opened, after it shall have closed for the regular season, on Thursday next.—Atlas.

COMPLIMENT TO A LADY.—In the beautiful tale of Aucassin et Nicolette, there is a passage strongly expressive of the contempt entertained by the knights and minstrels for the monks and clergy. The Viscount (Beaucaire, Nicolette's master) represents to Aucassin the great joys of heaven and pains of hell; to which Aucassin replies by ridiculing the idea of this paradise, which he considers to be the abode of none but filthy monks, priests, and hermits. He further declares his resolution of going to the devil, with whom, he says, "he is sure of finding good company—kings, valiant knights and faithful esquires, minstrels and jugglers, and above all, his Nicolette."—Romantic Poetry of the Italians.

REMARKABLE ANTICIPATION in a work published in 1795.—'The conviction is now becoming universal, that nothing but a Constitutional Reform, in which the rights of each class of citizens may be defined with precision, and protected by adequate regulations, against all arbitrary encroachments, can preserve every other country from similar scenes (those of the French Revolution). The magical illusions with which nations have hitherto been deceived, can be managed only in a mist. Reason has a length dispelled it. All the social institutions must be now submitted to her revisal. The growth of a civilization more diffusive must be favoured. The superfluous laws and superannuated establishments of the barbarous ages must be carefully removed. They cannot long be held up even by force. Violent means, besides their being no less odious than unjust, help indeed for the moment, but in reality accelerate the dreadful catastrophe they are intended to prevent. It is obvious, therefore, that nothing remains but the sooner the better to resolve upon doing what ought to have been done long age. A new constitution to be arbitrated between convened deputies of the people and the powers established, a constitution founded on universal justice and the nature of civil society, is the infallible, easy, and single remedy to remove all the curable evils of political community, to restore the greatest possible harmony between sovereign and subject, and to settle the welfare of states upon a solid and irreversable foundation.'—Juno. 'Thy proposal has much of my approbation. I do not see why monarchs should hesitate to set about this important work with pleasure, and of their own accord.'—Wieland's Dialogues of the Gods

PRAISE OF MIRTH.

'Tis Mirth that fills the veins with blood,
More than wine, or sleep, or food;
Let each man keep his heart at ease,
No man dies of that disease.
He that would his body keep
From diseases, must not weep;
But whoever laughs and sings,
Never he his body brings
Into fevers, gouts, or rheums,
Or ling'ringly his lungs consumes;
Or meets with aches in the bone,
Or catarrhs, or griping stone:
But contented lives for aye;
The more he laughs, the more he may.
Beaumont and Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle.

NIGHT.

Clamour grew dumb, unheard was shepherd's song,
And silence girt the woods; no warbling tongue
Talk'd to the echoes; Satyrs broke their dance,
And all the upper world lay in a trance,
Only the curling stream soft chidings kept;
And little gales, that from the green leaf swept
Dry summer's dust, in fearful whisperings stirr'd,
As loth to waken any singing bird. Browne's Pastorals.

Merciful God! how horrible is night
Upon the plains of Aztlan! there the shout
Of battle, the barbarian yell, the bray
Of dissonant instruments, the clang of arms,
The shriek of agony, the groan of death,
In one wild uproar and continuous din,
Shake the still air; while overhead the moon,
Regardless of the stir of this low world,
Holds on her heavenly way. Southey's Madoc.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

KING'S THEATRE.—L'Italiana in Algieri—La Prova d'Un Opera Seria—Kenilworth.

HAYMARKET.—As You Like It—A Friend at Court—Animal Magnetism.

HAYMARKET.

A NEW Comedy in two acts, entitled A Friend at Court, was last night produced at this theatre. The scene is laid at Cassel, and the plot, as nearly as we can recollect it, is as follows:—Adolph Graffenthorpe, an officer in the German service, at his death left a daughter Emma (Miss TAYLOR) unprovided for, but recommended to the protection of his brother, the Baron Von Ludwig (Mr COOPER) at whose mansion she was accordingly received. He had another brother, Conrad Graffenthorpe (Mr FARREN) who, for marrying a tradesman's daughter, had been disinherited by their father, had engaged in trade, and by his industry had become very opulent. This brother's residence was Odessa; between him and the Baron there was a total cessation of intercourse, owing greatly to the arrogant spirit of the Baroness (Mrs FAUCIT), who abhorred everything (except conduct) that was not noble. At the commencement of the piece we find Hebert (Mr BRINDAL) the son of Conrad Graffenthorpe, in the house of the Baron; his father soon after arrives, and we learn that the youth had left his father's house clandestinely to pursue a love project, and that he is actually the Secretary of the Baron, and the admirer of Emma. Conrad determines not to make himself known to his brother, whom he had not seen for twenty years, but to represent himself as the father of Hebert, a merchant of Lubeck, named Schrieber. Under this character he watches the proceedings of the family. His rough manners offend them; the Baron, however, willingly entertains him, on learning that he is immensely rich; for his own extravagance, and the loss of court favour, have reduced him to the contrary condition. To relieve himself from his embarrassments, he is intriguing for a place at court, in which he is assisted by a court fly, Count Florelli (Mr VINING), who informs him, that for four thousand ducats the place he desires may be procured. This sum they propose to borrow of the new guest, and they get his promise. In the mean time Conrad sees his niece, and is delighted with her simplicity and warm-heartedness. He does not make himself known as her uncle, but he gathers from her that a great change has recently taken place in her treatment. At first she had been treated as a dependant; now she is flattered and studied, the place of maid of honour has been procured for her at the court of the Elector, and she is that very night to accompany the Baron and his lady to a court ball. Conrad is indignant at her former treatment, for he had himself remitted his brother forty thousand florins for her use; and with regard to the sudden change he takes means to discover the cause. It was this. Prince Carl, the son of the Elector, had, under a feigned name, been visiting the Baron; he had been struck with the beauty of Emma, and was desirous of getting her into his power, by attaching her to the court. Florelli had been his agent to effect this purpose, and the Baron and Baroness (ignorant of his real intention) had very readily acquiesced in opening the door to court favour. All this Conrad discovers by his own interest at court. He takes the opportunity of revealing the whole matter to Emma, just as she is full dressed and in extacy at the prospect of going to the ball. He asks her what she will do? She at once takes off her ornaments, and addresses a letter to the Electress, resigning her appointment. The Baron and Baroness enter, and are in amazement. Conrad is suspected to be an impostor, but all is uncertainty. He enters, and in his assumed character of Schrieber, pretends to have a letter from Conrad, requesting him to demand payment from the Baron of the 40,000 florins. The Baron is at first indignant, and pretends that the money is safe, and is reserved for Emma at her marriage. Conrad no longer conceals his knowledge of the Baron's ruined circumstances, tells him of the plot against Emma, and how he frustrated it; but that she was still to go to court and to give her hand to a man of wealth and family. The Baron is struck with dismay; and appears to feel the folly of his past conduct. Conrad then reveals himself, points to Hebert, the nephew, as Emma's bridegroom; becomes reconciled to his proud brother, whom he promises to assist far beyond his desires, and hands to the Count Florelli a letter from the Elector, banishing him from his dominions. This is the termination of the piece. The reader will have seen, that though called a comedy, the piece is of a serious nature. We have left ourselves little room for remark. There is some novelty in the plot, and the interest is well sustained, and increases as the piece proceeds. The dialogue, although occasionally a little inflated in language, is made the medium of many laudable sentiments; court dependency and practices are spoken of with due contempt, and the short-sighted policy of the worldling is made to appear more evident by contrast with the unostentatious conduct of the honest man. Of the acting we must confine ourselves to saying that it was generally excellent. FARREN's part was an arduous one, for its length, and in a masterly style did he perform it; and it is only the necessity of bringing this notice to a close, which prevents us from dilating on it, and on the acting of Miss TAYLOR and Messrs VINING and COOPER. The applause was unanimous and enthusiastic.

Digitized by Google

ROMANTIC STORY.—At Rome there was a brazen statue, extending the fore-finger of the right hand; and on its forehead was written Strike here. Being suspected to conceal a treasure, it had received many bruises from the credulous and ignorant, in their endeavours to open it. At length Gerbert unriddled the mystery. At noonday observing the reflection of the fore-finger on the ground, he marked the spot. At night he came to the place, with a page carrying a lamp. There, by a magical operation he opened a wide passage in the earth; through which they both descended and came to a vast palace. The walls, the beams, and the whole structure were of gold: they saw golden images of knights playing at chess, with a king and queen of gold at a banquet, with numerous attendants in gold, and cups of immense size and value. In a recess was a carbuncle, whose lustre illuminated the whole palace; opposite to which stood a figure with a bended bow. As they attempted to touch some of the rich furniture, all the golden images seemed to rush upon them. Gerbert was too wise to attempt this a second time: but the page was bold enough to snatch from the table a golden knife of exquisite workmanship. At that moment all the golden images rose up with a dreadful noise, the figure with the bow shot at the carbuncle; and a total darkness ensued. The page then replaced the knife; otherwise, they both would have suffered a cruel death.—Translated by Warton, out of William of Malmsbury.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Comedy of

THE RIVALS.

[By SHERIDAN.]

Mrs Malaprop, Mrs Glover. Julia, Miss Taylor. Lydia Languish, Mrs Humby.
Lucy, Mrs T. Hill. Maid, Mrs W. Johnson.
Sir Anthony Absolute, Mr W. Farren. Captain Absolute, Mr Vining.
Faulkland, Mr Cooper. Acres, Mr Harley.
Sir Lucius O'Trigger, Mr H. Wallack. Fag, Mr Coveney.
David, Mr J. Cooper. Coachman, Mr W. Johnson.

After which, a Comedy in Two Acts, called

A FRIEND AT COURT.

Principal Characters—Miss Taylor, Mrs Faucit,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Cooper, Mr Vining, and Mr Brindal.

To conclude with the Musical Entertainment of ROSINA.

[By Mrs BROOKE.]

Rosina, Miss Land. Phœbe, Mrs Humby. Dorcas, Mrs Tayleure.
Belville, Mr B. Taylor. Captain Belville, Mr Huckel. William, Mrs T. Hill.
Rustic, Mr Field. 1st Irishman, Mr H. Wallack. 2nd Irishman, Mr Bishop.

To-morrow, Clari; Fish Out of Water; Popping the Question; and A Friend at Court.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LE CHIFFONNIER: OU, LE PHILOSOPHE NOCTURNE.

Vaudeville Nouveau en Cinq petits Actes, par MM. THEAULON et ETIENNE.
Madame de Verseuil, Mlle. Jamain. Madame Gerval, Mme. Baudin.
Céline, Mademoiselle Florval.
Chiffonnier, M. Potier.
Ernest d'Arleville, M. Alfred. Alfred, M. Paulin. M. Gripefort, M. Préval.
M. Chapoulard, M. Cloup. Un Garde du Commerce, M. Guenée.
Un Valet, M. Granville.

Suivi de

KETTLY! OU, LE RETOUR EN SUISSE.

Comédie Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. DUVERT.
Kettly, Mlle. Irma. Madame Werner, Mme. Baudin.
Frantz, M. Préval. Rutly, M. Gamard. M. de Senneville, M. Alfred.
Henry, M. Arnaud.

On Finira par

MONS. DESCHALUMEAUX.

Opera Bouffon en Trois Actes, Paroles de M. AUGUSTE.
Musique de Gaveau.
Madame de Brillon, Mlle. St. Ange. Madame de Villeroux, Mlle. Florval.
M. Deschalumeaux, M. Potier. Le Duc de Villars, M. St. Aubert.
M. de Bellemont, M. Paulin. M. Ducondray, M. Guenée.
Lajeunesse, M. Laporte. Lafleur, M. Alfred. Le Suisse, M. Granville.

GINGER BEER,

Of a superior quality, warranted to keep, in half-pint bottles, 1*s.* 9*d.* per dozen.
ÆRATED LEMONADE, a cooling and refreshing beverage, 1*s.* 9*d.* per dozen.
SEIDLITZ GINGER BEER, a slight and pleasant aperient, 4*s.* 6*d.* per dozen, stamps included.
TONIC GINGER BEER, an agreeable preparation of sulphate of quinine, useful in many cases, where, from weakness of stomach, it might not agree, in any other form, 5*s.* 6*d.* stamps included.
WHITE SPRUCE BEER, 1*s.* 9*d.* per dozen.
SUPER-CARBONATED SALINE DRAUGHTS, an extremely useful and agreeable domestic febrifuge, 4*s.* 6*d.* per dozen, stamps included.
Prepared and sold by T. KENT, (Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, Manufacturer of Domestic Chemical Preparations, 5 Borough Road, near the Obelisk.)
Mr KENT has no intention of making a secret of the composition of any of the medical preparations, and rests his claim to the patronage of the public, simply on the accuracy with which a medical and chemical education enables him to prepare them.
Orders and letters, post paid, will receive immediate attention.

SURREY THEATRE.

For the Benefit of Mr Edwin.

MASSINGER's Play, entitled

A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.

Lady Allworth, Miss Scott. Margaret, Miss Vincent.
Froth, Miss Nicol. Tabitha, Miss Rumens, Abigail, Miss Jordan.
Sir Giles Overreach, Mr Elton.
Lord Lovel, Mr Gough. Wellborn, Mr C. Hill. Allworth, Mr Honner.
Justice Greedy, Mr Vale. Marrall, Mr D. Pitt. Tapwell, Mr Hobbs.
Order, Mr Lee. Amble, Mr Rogers. Vintner, Mr Collier.
Watchall, Mr Maitland. Furnace, Mr Webb. Welldo, Mr Young.
Tailor, Mr Asbury.

After which, the FESTIVAL of APOLLO.

To conclude with the Opera of

ROB ROY.

[Adapted by Mr POCOCK.]

Diana Vernon, Miss Somerville, in which she will sing 'The banners of blue,' and 'He's what they ca' a bonnie lad.'
Helen Macgregor, Madame Simon.
Mattie, Mrs Vale. Jean M'Alpine, Miss Rumens. Martha, Miss Nicol.
Rob Roy, Mr Osbaldiston. Sir Frederick Vernon, Mr Gough.
Rashleigh Osbaldistone, Mr D. Pitt. Francis Osbaldistone, Mr Edwin, in which he will sing 'My love is like the red red rose,' 'Auld lang syne,' 'The lass o' Gowrie,' and the Duets, 'Though I leave thee now in sorrow,' and 'Forlorn and broken hearted,' with Miss Somerville.
Baillie Nicol Jarvie, Mr Vale. Owen, Mr Young.
Major Galbraith, Mr Ransford. Capt. Thornton, Mr Almar.
Dougal, Mr Asbury. M'Stewart, Mr Lee. Saunders Wylie, Mr Webb.
Andrew, Mr Rogers. Hamish, Mlle. Rosier. Robert, Mr C. Pitt.
Allan, Mr Tully. M'Vittie, Mr Hobbs.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.

[By Mr HAINES.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Hammerton.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr G. Lejeune. Almorrad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, the Farcical Interlude called

FREAKS AND FOLLIES.

Ellen, Miss Andrews.
Sir William Franklin, Mr Munroe. Ned Franklin, Mr Forester.
Doctor Growl, Mr Porteus. Captain Rowland, Mr Spencer.
Chouse, Mr G. Smith. Tom Trippit, Mr Wilkinson.

To conclude with the Burletta of

MIDAS.

[By KANE O'HARA.]

Immortals—Juno, Miss Wells. Venus, Miss Forster.
Minerva, Miss Berresford. Hebe, Miss Haton. Cupid, Mlle. Josephine.
The Graces, Miss Ward, Miss Gilbert, and Miss Bennett.
Jupiter, Mr Spencer. Mercury, Mr Davies. Bacchus, Mr Young.
Pan, Mr G. Smith. Mars, Mr Willing.
Apollo, Mrs Waylett, who will sing the following favourite Songs:—'Be by your friends advised,' 'Pray Goody,' 'Come where the aspens quiver,' 'Lovely Nymph,' and 'Kate Kearney.'
Mortals—Mysis, Mrs Garrick. Nysa, Miss Weston. Daphne, Miss Dix.
Justice Midas, Mr Marshall. Demætus, Mr G. Lejeune.
Sileno, Mr Bennett.

COBOURG THEATRE.

SHAKSPEARE's Tragedy of

MACBETH.

Macbeth, Mr Kean.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Battle of Waterloo.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—Jane Shore—The Youthful Days of William IV—Mine of Rubies.

GARRICK THEATRE.—The Barber of Seville—Matrimony—No Song No Supper.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

N° 257.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1831.

The Newsvenders who serve this Paper will be good enough to go for it henceforward to No. 26, Brydges street, opposite York street, a few doors from Drury Lane Theatre; where premises are taken for its exclusive publication.

A FEW MORE WORDS RESPECTING POLAND AND KOSCIUSKO.

In consequence of omitting to mark a passage in our manuscript, for the printer to put in Italics, the third paragraph in our yesterday's first article referred to what it did not intend, and must have left a strange mystification in the reader's mind. The passage alluded to was the caricature description of Stanislaus' 'young army,' who wore such high plumes, that the wind blew them down.

In saying that Kosciusko 'refused to fight either for Napoleon or the Allies,' we omitted to observe, that his noble nature at one time thought it had found something corresponding to it in the character of the Emperor Alexander; that he wrote him a letter requesting him to declare a general amnesty for his countrymen, to make all the serfs free on their returning home, and to become sovereign of an independent kingdom in Poland. He concluded with expressing a wish he could have preceded him thither. He even honoured Alexander by asking a favour of him for a friend. The imperial male-coquet of virtue answered the patriot's letter in good holiday terms, granting all his requests. But this unequal intercourse did not last long. Kosciusko wrote the Emperor, who was at Vienna, another letter a year afterwards (June 1815) in which he reminded him of certain 'magnanimous promises.' To this no answer was returned; and Kosciusko expressing to Prince Adam Czartorisky his prophetic anticipations of what afterwards took place, retired to Soleure in Switzerland, where he died on the 16th of October 1817. His remains were taken to Poland (we are not told when), and deposited in the cathedral of Cracow, in the same chapel with those of Sobieski.

We find it difficult to tear ourselves from this subject of Poland and Kosciusko. The misfortunes of this fine country arose from its horde of aristocracy, who were too few to constitute a nation of themselves, and too numerous to behave well either to king or people. Their kings, their people, and themselves, consequently became at the mercy of their neighbours, and thus they have been struggling for centuries, till dreadful experience and the general diffusion of knowledge have taught them better, and rendered their cause one of the noblest under the sun.

It has been thought by some, that this very virtue of Kosciusko was an injury to his cause. His mildness, according to Mr Fletcher, has been reckoned among the causes 'which, in the first instance, enervated the confederacy: but perhaps,' continues the historian, 'more is to be imputed to his emancipating the serfs, and enrolling them among his troops,—a step which was obstinately and selfishly opposed by many of the rich nobles.'—This does not look like a wrong mildness on the part of the man who could persevere against the obstinacy; but the latter looks very like the old Polish error,—the 'first cause' of whatever enervation was to be found among a brave people. The mildness complained of in Kosciusko most likely consisted in his not treating the people under his command as these nobles would have treated them. What then? Would they have done any better? Did they ever do half so well as he did? If they had even conquered, would their success have been of a kind to excel the future benefits of his very failure? We doubt it; and we will state the reasons for our donbt.

In the first place, they would have taken the opportunity of playing the part of a little 'Holy Alliance,' and tightened the bonds of their serfs; which would have done no good to the 'many' in the first instance, and as little to the 'few' in the long-run. Who would have sympathized with them in their next war? And how could they have escaped wars or convulsions, as the rest of the world became wiser?

Secondly, what good has any victory done when it has been on the side of the few? or for how long a period has its effects lasted, since a knowledge of the interests of the many has come up? Have even its gainers benefited? Have they become happier, or wealthier, or more popular men? Has the world benefited, except in the unintended neutralization of some worse evil, and the exhibition of an example the reverse of what was designed? Where is Napoleon? What was the final happiness of Lord Liverpool, or Lord Castlereagh, or the Bourbons, and what will posterity think of them? What has the Duke of Wellington got by fighting for a wrong principle, but an universal sense on the part of the community that it was a wrong one, and that he is nothing but a mistaken soldier, hopeless of getting into power again? The laurels of mistaken conquest fade, or turn to poison.

On the other hand, the laurels of a genuine principle revive after defeat and death, and rejoice the nations with their loveliness. Kosciusko's virtues are at this moment fighting and triumphing in Poland: and the world, with louder and louder lips, is every day blessing his name. What are Napoleon's principles doing? and who wants them? The utmost that his friends can do for him, is to doubt what they were. Kosciusko failed, in the immediate worldly sense. 'The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light.' But are they wiser for the next generation? Are they wiser for their own real tranquillity? Kosciusko's failure neither made him an unhappy old man, nor has ~~hindered his cause from raising its glorious head.~~ What was the cause of a man like Frederick the Second, and what sort of an account has Zimmerman his physician given of his old age? He was one of the most successful 'children of this world,' and he became a peevish old man, mistrusting everybody, enjoying nothing, and finding no better relief to his splendid misery, than a hot supper, which tormented him till he got his next! Kosciusko, it is true, was laid prostrate with wounds, was pale, feeble, often in a state of great suffering: but he had still a kind answer for everybody; the sweetness of his character had left a honied drop at the bottom of his cup; the homage that came about him was full of love, and he knew it to be so. Even had he been miserable, this would have been a comparative nothing, for such men do not set out with the intention of living for themselves. They are sacrifices for the many, and they know it: though upon this very account, it is impossible that they should not experience some relief of mind, unless they become a mass of disease, or their faculties are disturbed. In a word, the very miseries of such men are something;—the greatest successes of the others end in worse than nothing.

The remainder of the history of Poland is soon told. Alexander would have done her as much good as he thought compatible with his despotism; Napoleon would have done her as much good as he thought compatible with his. The world wanted neither; and a monster of cruelty having been luckily placed over Poland, she has thrown him off with indignation and loathing, and is at length in the clear way to be free. Opinion has grown powerful on the right side; and this, and her arm together, will do the work. ☞

ENORMITIES OF THE GRAND-DUKE CONSTANTINE.

'This personage, who has played so conspicuous a part in the affairs of Poland, is worthy of something more than a mere passing notice. Though possessed of very considerable talents, he is, in fact, an untamed tiger, giving way on all occasions to the most violent paroxysms of temper. He has a deep sense of the rights of his order, and holds the feelings of every other class of human beings as absolutely nought. So soon, therefore, as he found that his imperial brother was no longer the liberal patron of constitutional rights, he gave the most unrestrained license to his capricious and violent injustice. A few instances are better than general assertion:—A most opulent and respectable man named Woloski, the principal brewer of Warsaw, had, through some of his people, without his own knowledge, hired as a servant in his establishment a

Digitized by Google

Russian deserter. The defendant was detected, and proof of innocence on the part of his employer being disallowed, the Grand Duke, by his individual decree, ordered this respectable individual to be fettered, and in that condition he was compelled to work with a wheelbarrow in the public streets. His daughter, an amiable young lady, ventured to appeal to the mercy of the Grand Duke in behalf of her parent, and the unmanly monster kicked her down stairs, using at the same time the most abusive language. In the same way, he caused two Polish officers to be seized in the dead of night, and without trial, or even accusation, sent them to Russia. Some of the publishers of Warsaw having incurred his displeasure, he sent soldiers in the middle of the night to break up the presses and destroy the types. Taxes were levelled without consulting the Diet; and when a distinguished member, Niemoyewski, protested against such proceedings, he was arrested and sent to his country house under the charge of Cossacks, who kept him there for ten years, notwithstanding the most urgent affairs that required his attention elsewhere. The students too, especially at Wilna, were persecuted and harassed by a most notorious person, named Nowozilzoff, who succeeded Prince Adam Czertoryski, as a curator of the universities. This fit tool in Constantine's hands displayed on every occasion the most atrocious rapacity, and an entire absence of common humanity. One of the richest inhabitants of Lithuania had been arrested at the instance of this modern Sejanus; but 15,000 ducats, or 7,000*l.* sterling, effected his liberation. His most infamous act, if it be possible to give any pre-eminence in acts almost pre-eminently wicked, was performed on the following occasion:—A boy of nine years, a son of Count Plater, had in the playfulness of childhood, written in chalk on one of the forms, "The 3rd of May for ever!" that being the day of Kosciusko's constitution. The fact was discovered by some of the innumerable spies, employed even among these infants, to Nowozilzoff, who instituted an enquiry among the boys. Not one would betray poor Plater: they were all ordered to be flogged with the utmost severity. The unhappy offender declared that he had written the offensive words. The Grand Duke condemned him to be a soldier for life, incapable of advancement in the army; and when his mother threw herself before his carriage to implore forgiveness for her wretched child, he spurned her like a dog with his foot!

'Every one possessed of the means naturally fled from such unheard-of tyranny, and, among others, a highly accomplished gentleman, who sought refuge in London. Constantine sent an emissary after him, in the foolish belief that he could carry him off. The emissary soon discovered the folly of his errand, and returned, to the great chagrin of his master.

'Shaving the heads of ladies who displeased him was a common occurrence, and, on one occasion, four soldiers were severely punished because they abstained from carrying such an order into effect, as they found it impossible to do so without using personal violence. Tarring and feathering the shaved heads of the offenders was also a favourite recreation of the commander-in-chief, whose delight it was to witness these barbarities.

'This career of oppression and cruelty on one occasion met with a reproof, and the manner in which it was received is too illustrative of the Grand Duke's character not to be recorded. Among other subjects of his oppressiou was a Polish officer of rank, who was confined in a foul dungeon placed under a common sewer. There the unhappy man was wasting away, in a noisome and pestilential atmosphere. This happened to reach the ears of one of those men who do honour to their high calling,—a bold, intrepid priest, who considered himself bound, as the minister of a benevolent Deity, to interpose, and if possible to soften the obdurate heart of the tyrant. By the mere accident of receiving permission from the Grand Duke Michael, he was admitted to Constantine's presence. He stated the object of his visit, firmly but respectfully. The Grand Duke stormed,—the priest declared that, undeterred by menaces, he would fulfil what he deemed a paramount duty. Astonished at this, the Grand Duke sprang out of the window, declaring that there was a madman within. The priest was conveyed to a convent, where he was confined; but his interference effected no relief to the individual he sought to serve, nor did he obtain any general relaxation.'
—Fletcher's History of Poland, p. 403.

SURGEONS AND PHYSICIANS.*

Mr Alcock, in a course of lectures delivered in the Autumn of 1828, endeavours to impress upon the minds of his pupils the necessity of attention to those common diseases and minor operations, which, from their very frequency or apparent simplicity, are apt to be lightly passed over. He shews that in the mere operation of bleeding, many accidents may arise, from want of sufficient knowledge in the operation; that they actually do happen much more frequently than is supposed, and sometimes end in death, of which he gives some instances. He laments that very many diseases are treated according to settled rule, without reference to the peculiar habit of body, circumstances of the case, &c.:—

'It has been, unfortunately for medical science, too much the custom to consider diseases as if they were specific entities, and having assigned to each a name, to prescribe, as it were, for the name of the disease, according to the dogmas or hypotheses of systematic writers, rather than to investigate, with any attempt to attain philosophical precision, what are the parts of the animal machine which actually suffer, and in what manner or degree they suffer; what are the causes which tend to keep up the actual derangement of the suffering parts; what are the rational indications of treatment; and by what means such indications may be most effectually fulfilled. The adaptation of those names from time to time, to the varied changes which actually occur in the progress of disease, is as essential to the welfare of the patient, as was the first appropriate use of them.'

Mr Alcock gives some examples of cases in which the supervention of another, during the progress of the primary disease, has rendered the most accurate investigation doubly important. He very sensibly recommends the young practitioner to acquire every possible information of the state of his patient, past as well as present, before he attempts to determine upon the nature of the disease. We are not prepared to say how far Mr Alcock's recommendation to have at hand a printed list of the questions to be put to the patient, would be likely to benefit the medical practitioner, or to inspire confidence. In one instance, in which he himself practised this plan, we understand that it produced an impression not very desirable; though we confess that nothing has more astonished us in medical practice, than the total omission of enquiries respecting the previous habits of the patient, his diet, hours, &c.; and we think that the list ought invariably to be in the practitioner's head, whatever objections there may be to his carrying it in his hand. This point deserves special inculcation; and Mr Alcock merits the thanks of patients for what he has done towards it.

Our author dwells at some length upon the defective education of students in the medical profession, and shews very clearly, not only that the elementary part of education should be precisely the same for the physician and surgeon, but that both should continue to pursue the same studies; that the same knowledge of anatomy, of disease, and of medical treatment, is required in both, but that the latter has the greater occasion for manual dexterity. It is therefore no more than just that a surgeon, if properly qualified for his profession, should take the higher rank, as compared with the physician; but it would seem reasonable that the general practitioner, if not higher, should at least be on a level with the surgeon. That he is not so, tells as plainly as it can be told, that the general practitioner is but imperfectly qualified, either in a medical or surgical point of view. We have heard it affirmed by an eminent surgeon, that no man could excel in either department who was not competent to both, and that it was much to be regretted that surgery and medicine had ever been considered as distinct professions. A man who is qualified to perform surgical operations thinks himself a competent surgeon,—forgetting that he should also know when such operations should or should not be performed, and be able to decide upon the treatment of the patient, both before and after.

'The pure surgeon,' says Mr Alcock, 'too frequently despises the knowledge of medicine, without which a surgeon cannot safely be trusted, and many are the unfortunate instances in which the mere performance of a dangerous operation has been skilfully effected, yet the patient has died in consequence of the want of medical skill in the after treatment.'

It is well known that many have suffered painful operations which might have been spared them, had the surgeon in attendance possessed a competent knowledge of medicine. The same remark extends to oculists, &c. &c. Many a disease of the eye has been cured by medical treatment, which a mere oculist, unskilled in medicine, would not have hesitated to operate upon; and nothing can be more evident to any person of common sense, than that all students in medicine or surgery, whatever department they may intend to practise in, should pursue the same course of education generally, perfecting their knowledge at last, with a yet more attentive study of the department itself. Mr Alcock laments, in a passing glance, that the examination of students is verbal only, not practical. This is a subject which demands more consideration. Surely no measure should be neglected, that could tend to ensure to every one allowed to prastice the profession, such a degree of knowledge as should enable him to do so, without danger to the public. A man who persists in exercising a profession which affects the lives and comforts of his fellow-beings, and which repeated failures may have convinced him he has not sufficiently studied, can hope neither to acquire reputation, nor to enjoy peace of mind;—much less can he aspire to that power of alleviating pain and of diffusing happiness around him, which some eminent practitioners have arrived at. We might cite numerous instances, but will con-

* Lectures on Practical and Medical Surgery. By Thomas Alcock, Member of the Royal College of Physicians, &c. &c. pp. 302. Burgess and Hill.

Digitized by Google

tent ourselves with the mention of one, and that one a foreigner, M. Parée, who was so high in public estimation, as to render his presence or absence a question of national importance. The passage is quoted by our author from Mr John Bell:—

'When all the noblesse of France were shut up in Mentz, which was besieged by Charles the Fifth in person, at the head of 100,000 men, they sent a sort of embassy to the king their master, beseeching him to send Parée to them. An Italian captain, for a great reward, introduced him into the city. They instantly sent at midnight to awaken the prince who commanded the city, with the good news of his arrival. The governor begged of him that he would go next day, and shew himself upon the breach. He was received with shouts of triumph; Mentz was then the bulwark of France; and it has always been ascribed to the presence of this single man (so perfect was their confidence in him) that they kept the city till the gallant army which lay around it perished beneath its walls.'

Mr Alcock's style is deficient in perspicuity. He sometimes occupies a page, with matter that might have been conveyed in half a dozen lines; so that we cannot follow him without effort. This is unfortunate, because, in lectures addressed to youth, the attention, if not compelled, should at least be led gently onward. In the verbal delivery of these lectures, the most zealous student might have some difficulty in keeping pace with the lecturer. In some particular passages, where, perhaps, the subject is more than usually interesting to him, he is clear and forcible enough; and the more valuable and judicious the instruction given, the more we should wish to see this power extend itself throughout the volume.

A FORMER FAMINE IN IRELAND.—DEATH OF SPENSER THE POET.

Warton, in his 'Observations on the Fairy Queen,' alludes 'to the massacres committed upon the people of Munster in Ireland, after the rebellion,' and quotes from Spenser's 'State of Ireland' the following passage:—'Out of every corner of the woodes and glennes they came creeping forth upon their handes, for their legs could not bear them: they looked like anatomies of death; they spake like ghostes crying out of their graves; they eat the dead carrions—happy were they could they find them—yea, and one another soon after; insomuch as the very carcases they spared not to scrape out of their graves. And if they found a plot of water-cresses or shamrockes, there they flocked as to a feast, for the time, yet not able to continue there withal; that in short space there were none almost left, and a most populous and plentiful country suddenly left void of man and beast.' Warton continues—'Spenser himself died in Ireland, in the most wretched condition, amid the desolations of this rebellion; as appears from the following curious anecdote in Drummond, who has left us the heads of a conversation between himself and Ben Jonson:—'Ben Jonson told me that Spenser's goods were robbed by the Irish in Desmond's rebellion; his house and a little child of his burnt, and he and his wife narrowly escaped; that he afterwards died in King street [Dublin] by absolute want of bread; and that he refused twenty pieces sent him by the Earl of Essex, and gave this answer to the person who brought them, "That he was sure he had no time to spend them."' Camden informs us that Spenser was in Ireland when the rebellion broke out under Tyrone, 1598, but that being plundered of his fortune, he was obliged to return into England, where he died that same or the next year. Camden adds, [that he was buried in the Abbey of Westminster, with due solemnities, at the expense of the Earl of Essex. If Drummond's account be true, it is most probable that the Earl, whose benefaction came too late to be of any use, ordered his body to be conveyed into England, where it was interred as Camden relates. It must be owned that Jonson's account, in Drummond, is very circumstantial, and that it is probable Jonson was curious enough to collect authentic information on so interesting a subject. At least his profession and connexions better qualified him to come at the truth. Perhaps he was one of the poets who held up Spenser's pall.

POETRY.

CHAUCER'S KNIGHT

(Going to St Thomas's Shrine at Canterbury with the other Pilgrims.)

[In the passages that we propose to extract out of this great Poet from time to time, the spelling will be modernized, and the lines (with all humility) new framed on occasion; so as to accommodate general readers, and warrant the insertion where obsoleteness of language might otherwise be complained of.]

At mortal battles had he been fifteen,
And foughten for the faith at Tramisene;
And evermore he bore a sovereign price;
And though that he was worthy, he was wise,
And of his port as meek as is a maid:
His tongue no villany had ever said
In all his life to any the least wight:
He was a very perfect, gentle knight.
As to his horse, 'twas good, but nothing gay;
His doublet was of fustian, strong and grey,
All smutted with his iron habergeon,
Which he but lately morn and noon had on,
For newly had this Knight come over sea,
And to the shrine betook him soberly.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

CHANGES OF A TWELVEMONTH.—The great days of July have come back again. . . . . On casting a glance back at the last year, what an immense alteration do we not see in all human affairs! Truly may we say that 'We look and see the face of things all changed.'

A little year ago, and George IV ruled in England and Hanover—Charles X in France—Pius VIII in Rome—Charles Felix in Sardinia—Francis Janvier in Naples—Anthony in Saxony—Pedro in Brazil—Charles in Brunswick—William had the kingdom of the Netherlands—Nicholas was undisputed autocrat of Poland. Where are they now?—in the grave—in exile—or shorn of their dominions. And yet the revolution has not much more than begun. A New Spirit has been unchained, and he hovers over the world whether for good or for evil. We have had no comet shaking its horrid hair above us, but earthly portents of direr kind, with fear of change, are perplexing monarchs.

'Now powers from home, and discontents at home,
Meet in one line; and vast confusion waits
(As doth a raven on a sick-fallen beast)
The imminent decay of wrested pomp.
How happy he, whose cloak and cincture can Hold out this tempest.' Fraser's Magazine for July.

GHOSTS.—One argument to prove that the common relations of ghosts and spectres are generally false, may be drawn from the opinion held, that spirits are never seen by any more than one person at a time; that is to say, it seldom happens to above one person in a company to be possessed with any high degree of spleen or melancholy.—Pope.

ST DUNSTAN AND THE ÆOLIAN HARP.—St Dunstan is said to have been a good musician, painter, and graver; and to have amused himself with joining, turning, and smithery; in the last of which he was supposed to be employed, when he seized the devil by the nose with a red-hot pair of tongs. A man, says Granger, of so many accomplishments, might well be looked on as a magician in his days. He was accused as such to King Athelstan, for that he made his harp not only to have motion, but to make music of itself.

St Dunstan's harp, fast by the wall,
Upon a pin did hang-a,
The harp itself, withly and all,
Untouch'd by hand did twang a.

By this it would be supposed he had found out the Æolian Harp; and as he was banished the court for it, it is no wonder if the invention died with him.

WORTH OBSERVING.—That metaphysico-republican illuminism, which had pervaded and survived the French revolution, was preserved and propagated by secret oaths, signs, and symbols, through the armies of Napoleon, and threatened his political despotism more than once. It spread rapidly, and exploded through various conspiracies, on the restoration of the Bourbons in France; communicated itself, in the general contact of armies and nations, in the general peace, even among the officers of the Russian army; and disturbed the latter days of the Emperor Alexander; produced the constitutional movements of 1820, and the revolution of 1830; exists still, and will continue to exist, "active and unquenchable as the Greek Fire."—Life and Reign of George the Fourth.

STOCK AND THE FUNDS.—Money lent to the government of a country, or invested in the funds of a chartered trading company, and which is usually divided into shares of a determinate size, is called Stock; because it is fixed and not repaid, but brings forth fruits under the name of interest, or dividends. These shares, or Stock, which have the name of Government Stock, East India Stock, Bank of England Stock, &c. are transferable at pleasure; and the sales and purchase are managed for the parties by Stock-brokers. The sales are often merely nominal; and form a species of wagering as to the value of the Stock at some future day. This is called gambling in the funds, or Stock-jobbing, and the gamblers are Stock-jobbers. In the slang of Change-alley, where these operations are carried on, the nominal buyers of Stock on time (for it is the difference of value between the times of purchase and delivery only that is paid) are called Bulls, and the sellers Bears.—The money thus borrowed and denominated Stocks, forms the capital or funds of a trading company,—the foundation on which their trade is raised; but, as is the case with governments, when the money is expended, and nothing except the acknowledgment of the debt remains, the interest of which is paid from the taxes, it is rather a misnomer to call these government acknowledgments, Funds; yet such is the language. The lenders are called Fundholders; and this borrowing is called the Funding System. A portion of the taxes paid annually into the hands of certain persons called Commissioners, to be appropriated by them towards the reduction of the debt of the government, forms, or should form, the Sinking Fund.—Booth's Analytical Dictionary.

LIPS AND EYES.

In Celia's face a question did arise
Which were more beautiful, her Lips or Eyes:
"We," said the Eyes, "send forth those pointed darts
Which pierce the hardest adamantine hearts."
"From us," replied the Lips; "proceed those blisses
Which lovers reap by kind words and sweet kisses."
Then wept the Eyes, and from their springs did pour
Of liquid oriental pearls a shower.
Whereat the Lips, moved with delight and pleasure,
Through a sweet smile unlocked their pearly treasure,
And bade Love judge, whether did add more grace,
Weeping or smiling pearls in Celia's face. CAREW.

AN ARBOUR.

And over him art, stryving to compayre
With nature, did an arber greene dispred
Framed of wanton yvie, flowing fayre
Through which the fragrant eglantine did spred
His prickling arms, entrayled with roses red,
Which daintie odours round about them threw,
And all within with flowres was garnished,
That, when myld Zephyrus amongst them blew
Did breath out bounteous fields, and painted colours shew.
SPENSER.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

HAYMARKET.—The Rivals—A Friend at Court—Rosina.
FRENCH PLAYS.—Le Chiffonnier—Kettly—Mons. Deschalumeaux.

HAYMARKET.

LATE HOURS AT THEATRES.—The performances at this theatre are protracted to so late an hour, that the play-bills mislead, in their daily announcement of 'This evening will be performed,' &c. The truth is, that out of the four pieces which are frequently announced for one evening, the fourth is of necessity played on the following morning; and a correct statement of the fact would enable people to judge whether it was worth their while to make themselves unwell, and unfit for their usual occupations the next day, for the sake of the pleasure held out to them. For a time, it may be supposed that the amount of pleasure is in proportion to the accumulation of pleasurable materials; but experience, in all kinds of enjoyments, proves that beyond a certain point satiety commences, and that the next step is disinclination, and a resolution to abstain from sweets that have such bitter effects. In the time of SHAKSPEARE, we learn from Mr COLLINS's interesting Book, stage performances commenced at three o'clock, and lasted two or three hours. Now, we not only commence at an hour which precludes the possibility of enjoying pleasant conversation afterwards on the subject of the pieces we may have seen, but by consuming double the time in a heated theatre, we expose ourselves to colds and other inconveniences, and at the best, convert amusement into positive fatigue. Proprietors of theatres, whose avowed object it is to derive profit from their establishments, may be excusable in continuing the present system, if they find it answer their purpose; but we doubt if it does so. For if the foregoing considerations are of any weight, it may be fairly assumed, that though a little additional money may occasionally be drawn into the till, less is received in the whole season. Proprietors should consider the matter in this way; and if they found reason to believe that the public would be better satisfied with shorter performances, they could have no doubt of the good effects of an alteration in many other respects;—the nightly expenses of the theatres would of course be considerably diminished, and the health and comfort of all parties concerned in them very materially promoted. The saving of expense would be itself an augmentation of the profits of the concern; but these might be still further increased, by judiciously expending the money so saved, in improving the general efficiency of the company engaged, and thereby ensuring, more uniformly than at present, that most gratifying of spectacles in the eyes of theatrical proprietors—a full house.

THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Opera of
CLARI.
[By Mr HOWARD PAYNE.]
Clari, Miss Taylor.
Fidalma, Mrs Faucit. Vespina, Mrs Humby. Ninetta, Mrs T. Hill.
The Duke Vivaldi, Mr Brindal. Rolamo, Mr Cooper.
Jocoso, Mr Webster. Claudio, Mr Huckel. Stephano, Mr Field.
Nicolo, Mr W. Johnson. Nimpedo, Mr J. Cooper. Geronio, Mr Bishop.
Pietro, Mr V. Webster. Giulio, Mr Coates. Page, Master Reed.
Characters in the Episode.—Wife of Pelgrino, Mrs W. Clifford.
Leoda, Miss J. Scott. Nobleman, Mr Bartlett. Pelgrino, Mr Melleney.

After which, a Comedy in Two Acts, called
A FRIEND AT COURT.
Principal Characters—Miss Taylor, Mrs Faucit,
Mr W. Farren, Mr Cooper, Mr Vining, and Mr Brindal.

To which will be added, a Comic Piece, in One Act, called
POPPING THE QUESTION.
[By Mr J. B. BUCKSTONE.]
Miss Biffin, Mrs Glover. Bobbin, Mrs Humby. Ellen Murray, Miss J. Scott.
Miss Winterblossom, Mrs Tayleure.
Mr Primrose, Mr W. Farren. Henry Thornton, Mr Bartlett.

To conclude with the Musical Farce of
THE AGREEABLE SURPRISE.
Laura, Miss Wells. Cowslip, Mrs Humby. Mrs Cheshire, Mrs Tayleure.
Fringe, Mrs Coveney. Sir Felix Friendly, Mr Gattie.
Lingo, Mr Harley. Compton, Mr Field. Eugene, Mr Newcombe.
Chicane, Mr W. Johnson. John, Mr Coveney.
Thomas, Mr Bishop. Stump, Mr V. Webster. Cudden, Mr Coates.

To-morrow, The Road to Ruin; Peeping Tom; and A Friend at Court.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

Messrs MATHEWS and YATES AT HOME.
NEW COMIC ANNUAL,
In Two Parts, embellished with New Designs, and Humorous Cuts.
PART I.—In which Mr Mathews will introduce the following Songs:—
'London Exhibitions, 1830-31' and 'Armagh Assizes.'
PART II.—'The Omnibus,' Scena, Tim Wasp. And 'Harlowe Bush Fair.'

After which, a New Monopolylogue Entertainment, in One Act, called
YATES IN ITALY; OR, THE HANDSOME BARMAID.
In which Mr YATES will sustain Nine Characters.

SURREY THEATRE.

For the Benefit of Mademoiselle Rosier.
The Romantic Drama, entitled
THE BRIGAND.
Rosara, Miss Vincent. Viletta, Mme. Simon.
Governor of Rome, Mr D. Pitt. Firmin, Mr Maitland.
Albert, Mr Honner. Renardo, Mr Webb. Fabian, Mr Rogers.
Fernando Spogliati, Mr Osbaldiston.
In the course of the Piece, an Allemande, by Miss Vincent, Mlle. Rosier, and Mr Osbaldiston.

After which, the favorite Serio-Comic Pantomime, intitled
DON JUAN.
Donna Anna, Miss Nicol. Bride, Miss Ellis.
Fisherwomen, Mrs Vale and Miss Rumens.
Don Juan, Mlle. Rosier. Scaramouch, Mr S. F. Amherst.
Don Guzman, Mr D. Pitt. Don Fernando, Mr Edwin. Bridegroom, Mr T. Hill.
Fishermen, Mr Asbury and Mr Lee.
In Act II. The Minuet de la Cour et Gavotte de Vestris, by Mlle. Rosier and Miss Laura Slade.

In the course of the Evening, a Variety of Singing and Dancing.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of
THE FOREST OF BONDY.
Dame Gertrude, Mme. Simon. Ursula, Miss Vincent.
The Seneschal, Mr Almar. General Gontran, Mr Gough.
Chevalier Macaire, Mr D. Pitt. Aubri di Mont Didier, Mr Asbury.
Bertrand, Mr Vale. Eloi, Mlle. Rosier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

A New Grand Operatic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled
THE RUSSIAN CAPTIVE.
[By Mr HAINES.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music by the Right Hon. Lord Burghersh.
Russians—Katherine, Miss Dix. Captain Werstoff, Mr Hammerton.
Ultzi, Mr Davies. Hans Splitzic, Mr G. Smith. Count Zingerod, Mr Keppell.
Turks.—Omar El Azim, Mr G. Lejeune. Almorad, Mr Spencer.
Hassan Ali, Mr Bedford. Selim, Mr Bennett.
Bulgarians.—Myra, Mrs Waylett. Andreas Walberg, Mr Marshall.
Michael Rostopf, Mr Wilkinson. Rodolf, Mr Green.
The Concerted Music, by Mrs Garrick, Misses Brothers, Forster, Berresford, Messrs Willing, Barnett, Young, and Jones.
The Dances by Miss Ward, &c.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in Two Acts, entitled LOVE AND MYSTERY.
The Overture and Music by Mr A. Lee.
Celeste de Montmorency, Mrs Waylett. Eloisa, Miss Dix.
Juana, Miss Andrews.
Colonel de Liason, Mr Green. Don Rimarez, Mr Munroe.
Phelim O'Donaghue, Mr Hammerton. Philip Philpotts, Mr Marshall.
Don Carlos, Mr Keppell.

To conclude with the Burletta of
MIDAS.
[By KANE O'HARA.]
Immortals—Juno, Miss Wells. Venus, Miss Forster.
Minerva, Miss Berresford. Hebe, Miss Hatton. Cupid, Mlle. Josephine.
The Graces, Miss Ward, Miss Gilbert, and Miss Bennett.
Jupiter, Mr Spencer. Mercury, Mr Davies. Bacchus, Mr Young.
Pan, Mr G. Smith. Mars, Mr Willing.
Apollo, Mrs Waylett, who will sing the following favourite Songs:—'Be by your friends advised,' 'Pray Goody,' 'Come where the aspens quiver,' 'Lovely Nymph,' and 'Kate Kearney.'
Mortals—Mysis, Mrs Garrick. Nysa, Miss Weston. Daphne, Miss Dix.
Justice Midas, Mr Marshall. Demetus, Mr G. Lejeune.
Sileno, Mr Bennett.

ASTLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE.—Mazeppa—Rope Dancers—Ducrow's Scenes in the Circle—Battle of Waterloo.

COOKE'S EQUESTRIAN CIRCUS, GREAT WINDMILL ST. HAYMARKET. — Equestrian Education—Lubin and Annette — Knights Crusaders — Chinese Enchanter—The Sicilian Pony—Pigmy Ponies—Hare-bell—The Drunken Hussar—Countess of Lilliput—Enchanted Ladder—The Protean Nondescript—Shaw, the Life Guardsman—Bucephalus—Fire King.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The Devil at Dunmow—Canonbury Tower—British Paganini—Powder for Peeping.

ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—The Fire Raiser—And other Entertainments.

GARRICK THEATRE.—The Slave—Sandy and Jenny—The Padlock.

Published by ONWHYN, at THE TATLER Office, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom communications for the Editor are to be addressed); sold at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; by CHAPPEL; WILSON, Royal Exchange; FIELD, Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street; KENNETH, Corner of Bow street; TURNOUR, Theatrical Agent, 10 Broad Court, Long Acre; LLOYD, 42 Frith street, Soho; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
Advertisements received at the Office, as above; by Mr G. REYNELL, Country Newspaper and General Advertising Office, 42 Chancery lane; and by Messrs C. and W. REYNELL, at the Printing Office, 45 Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
3 1951 D01 713 847 R

Digitized by Google